

THE ALL ENGLAND LAW REPORTS 2003

Volume 3

Editor-in-Chief

CRAIG ROSE Barrister

Editor

KAREN WIDDICOMBE Solicitor

LexisNexis™ UK

Members of the LexisNexis Group worldwide

United Kingdom	LexisNexis UK, a Division of Reed Elsevier (UK) Ltd, Halsbury House, 35 Chancery Lane, LONDON, WC2A 1EL, and 4 Hill Street, EDINBURGH EH2 3JZ
Argentina	LexisNexis Argentina, BUENOS AIRES
Australia	LexisNexis Butterworths, CHATSWOOD, New South Wales
Austria	LexisNexis Verlag ARD Orac GmbH & Co KG, VIENNA
Canada	LexisNexis Butterworths, MARKHAM, Ontario
Chile	LexisNexis Chile Ltda, SANTIAGO DE CHILE
Czech Republic	Nakladatelství Orac sro, PRAGUE
France	Editions du Juris-Classeur SA, PARIS
Germany	LexisNexis Deutschland GmbH, FRANKFURT and MUNSTER
Hong Kong	LexisNexis Butterworths, HONG KONG
Hungary	HVG-Orac, BUDAPEST
India	LexisNexis Butterworths, NEW DELHI
Ireland	LexisNexis, DUBLIN
Italy	Giuffr� Editore, MILAN
Malaysia	Malayan Law Journal Sdn Bhd, KUALA LUMPUR
New Zealand	LexisNexis Butterworths, WELLINGTON
Poland	Wydawnictwo Prawnicze LexisNexis, WARSAW
Singapore	LexisNexis Butterworths, SINGAPORE
South Africa	LexisNexis Butterworths, DURBAN
Switzerland	St�mpfli Verlag AG, BERNE
USA	LexisNexis, DAYTON, Ohio

  Reed Elsevier (UK) Ltd 2003

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced in any material form (including photocopying or storing it in any medium by electronic means and whether or not transiently or incidentally to some other use of this publication) without the written permission of the copyright owner except in accordance with the provisions of the Copyright, Designs and Patents Act 1988 or under the terms of a licence issued by the Copyright Licensing Agency Ltd, 90 Tottenham Court Road, London, England W1T 4LP. Applications for the copyright owner's written permission to reproduce any part of this publication should be addressed to the publisher.

Warning: The doing of an unauthorised act in relation to a copyright work may result in both a civil claim for damages and criminal prosecution.

Crown copyright material is reproduced with the permission of the Controller of HMSO and the Queen's Printer for Scotland. Any European material in this work which has been reproduced from EUR-lex, the official European Communities legislation website, is European Communities copyright.

A CIP Catalogue record for this book is available from the British Library.

Printed and bound in Great Britain by William Clowes Ltd, Beccles and London

ISBN for the complete set of volumes: 0 406 85159 X for this volume:

ISBN 0-406-96515-3

Visit LexisNexis UK at www.lexisnexis.co.uk

CONSULTING EDITORS

Celia Fox Barrister

Kate O'Hanlon Barrister

Dilys Tausz Barrister

REPORTERS

James Brooks Barrister

Manjit Gheera Barrister

Martyn Gurr Barrister

Alexander Horne Barrister

Stephen Leake Barrister

Melanie Martyn Barrister

Neneh Munu Barrister

Victoria Parkin Barrister

Sanchia Pereira Barrister

Lynne Townley Barrister

Aaron Turpin Barrister

Gareth Williams Barrister

James Wilson Barrister (NZ)

MANAGING EDITOR

Helen O'Shea Dip Law, Dip LP

DEPUTY EDITOR

Paul Hardy LLM

SENIOR SUB-EDITOR

Rukhsana Hasnain LLB, Dip LP

SUB-EDITORS

Catherine Bayliss LLB, Dip LP

Sarah Semple BA

PRODUCTION/ INDEX MANAGER

Isabella Winter BA

House of Lords

The Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain:

Lord Falconer of Thoroton

Lords of Appeal in Ordinary

Lord Bingham of Cornhill
Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead
Lord Steyn
Lord Hoffmann
Lord Hope of Craighead
Lord Hutton

Lord Saville of Newdigate
Lord Hobhouse of Woodborough
Lord Millett
Lord Scott of Foscote
Lord Rodger of Earlsferry
Lord Walker of Gestingthorpe

Court of Appeal

The Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain

The Lord Chief Justice of England and Wales: Lord Woolf
(President of the Criminal Division)

The Master of the Rolls: Lord Phillips of Worth Matravers
(President of the Civil Division)

The President of the Family Division: Dame Elizabeth Butler-Sloss

The Vice-Chancellor: Sir Robert Andrew Morritt

Lords Justices of Appeal

Sir Paul Joseph Morrow Kennedy Sir Simon Denis Brown (Vice-President of the Civil Division)
Sir Christopher Dudley Roger Rose
(Vice-President of the Criminal Division)
Sir Peter Leslie Gibson
Sir Robin Ernest Auld
Sir Malcolm Thomas Pill
Sir William Aldous
Sir Alan Hylton Ward
Sir Konrad Hermann Theodor Schiemann
Sir Mathew Alexander Thorpe
Sir Mark Howard Potter
Sir Henry Brooke
Sir Igor Judge (Deputy Chief Justice)
Sir George Mark Waller
Sir John Frank Mummery
Sir Charles Barrie Knight Mantell
Sir John Murray Chadwick
Sir Richard Joseph Buxton

Sir Anthony Tristram Kenneth May (Vice-President of the Queen's Bench Division)
Sir Simon Lane Tuckey
Sir Anthony Peter Clarke
Sir John Grant McKenzie Laws
Sir Stephen John Sedley
Sir Jonathan Hugh Mance Dame Brenda Marjorie Hale
Sir David Nicholas Ramsey Latham
Sir John William Kay
Sir Bernard Anthony Rix
Sir Jonathan Frederic Parker Dame Mary Howarth Arden
Sir David Wolfe Keene
Sir John Anthony Dyson
Sir Andrew Centlivres Longmore
Sir Robert John Anderson Carnwath
Sir Thomas Scott Gillespie Baker Dame Janet Hilary Smith
Sir Roger John Laughtarne Thomas (appointed 14 July 2003) (Senior Presiding Judge for England and Wales)

High Court of Justice

The Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain

The Lord Chief Justice of England

The President of the Family Division

The Vice-Chancellor

The Senior Presiding Judge for England and Wales

The puisne judges of the High Court

Chancery Division

The Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain

The Vice-Chancellor

Sir John Edmund Frederic Lindsay
Sir Edward Christopher Evans-Lombe
Sir Robin Raphael Hayim Jacob
Sir William Anthony Blackburne
Sir Gavin Anthony Lightman
Sir Colin Percy Farquharson Rimer
Sir Hugh Ian Lang Laddie
Sir Timothy Andrew Wigram Lloyd
Sir David Edmund Neuberger

Sir Andrew Edward Wilson Park
Sir Nicholas Richard Pumfrey
Sir Michael Christopher Campbell Hart
Sir Lawrence Anthony Collins
Sir Nicholas John Patten
Sir Terrence Michael Elkan Barnett Etherton
Sir Peter Winston Smith
Sir Kim Martin Jordan Lewison

Queen's Bench Division

The Lord Chief Justice of England

Sir Stuart Neil McKinnon
Sir Douglas Dunlop Brown
Sir Michael Morland
Sir Roger John Buckley
Sir Peter John Cresswell
Sir Christopher John Holland
Sir Richard Herbert Curtis
Sir Anthony David Colman
Sir John Thayne Forbes
Sir Michael Alexander Geddes Sachs
Sir Stephen George Mitchell
Sir Rodger Bell
Sir Michael Guy Vicat Harrison
Sir William Marcus Gage
Sir Thomas Richard Atkin Morison
Sir Andrew David Collins
Sir Maurice Ralph Kay
Sir Anthony Hooper
Sir Alexander Neil Logie Butterfield
Sir George Michael Newman

Sir David Anthony Poole
Sir Martin James Moore-Bick
Sir Gordon Julian Hugh Langley Sir Roger John Laugharne Thomas (appointed Lord Justice of Appeal 14 July 2003)
Sir Robert Franklyn Nelson
Sir Roger Grenfell Toulson
Sir Michael John Astill
Sir Alan George Moses
Sir David Eady
Sir Jeremy Mirth Sullivan
Sir David Herbert Penry-Davey
Sir Stephen Price Richards
Sir David William Steel
Sir Charles Antony St John Gray
Sir Nicolas Dusan Bratza
Sir Michael John Burton
Sir Rupert Matthew Jackson Dame Heather Carol Hallett
Sir Patrick Elias

[continued on next page]

Queen's Bench Division (continued)

Sir Richard John Pearson Aikens
Sir Stephen Robert Silber
Sir John Bernard Goldring
Sir Peter Francis Crane Dame Anne Judith Rafferty
Sir Geoffery Douglas Grigson
Sir Richard John Hedley Gibbs
Sir Richard Henry Quixano Henriques
Sir Stephen Miles Tomlinson
Sir Andrew Charles Smith
Sir Stanley Jeffrey Burnton
Sir Patrick James Hunt
Sir Christopher John Pitchford
Sir Brian Henry Leveson
Sir Duncan Brian Walter Ouseley
Sir Richard George Bramwell McCombe
Sir Raymond Evan Jack

Sir Robert Michael Owen
Sir Colin Crichton Mackay
Sir John Edward Mitting
Sir David Roderick Evans
Sir Nigel Anthony Lamert Davis
Sir Peter Henry Gross
Sir Brian Richard Keith
Sir Jeremy Lionel Cooke
Sir Richard Alan Field
Sir Christopher John Pitchers
Sir Colman Maurice Treacy
Sir Peregrine Charles Hugo Simon
Sir Roger John Royce Dame Laura Mary Cox
Sir Adrian Bruce Fulford
Sir Jack Beatson
Sir Michael George Tugendhat

Family Division

The President of the Family Division

Sir Robert Lionel Johnson
Dame Joyanne Winifred Bracewell
Sir Jan Peter Singer
Sir Nicholas Allan Roy Wilson
Sir Nicholas Peter Rathbone Wall
Sir Andrew Tristram Hammett Kirkwood
Sir Hugh Peter Derwyn Bennett
Sir Edward James Holman Dame Mary Claire Hogg

Sir Christopher John Sumner
Sir Anthony Philip Gilson Hughes
Sir Arthur William Hessin Charles
Sir David Roderick Lessiter Bodey Dame Jill Margaret Black
Sir James Lawrence Munby
Sir Paul James Duke Coleridge
Sir Mark Hedley

Official Judgment Numbers and Paragraph References

Since 11 January 2001, official judgment numbers have been given to all judgments delivered in the House of Lords, Privy Council, both divisions of the Court of Appeal and the Administrative Court. All such judgments have fixed paragraph numbering, as do judgments delivered on or after 11 January 2001 in those parts of the High Court which did not then adopt the system of official judgment numbers (see Practice Note (judgments: neutral citation) [2001] 1 All ER 193 for the Court of Appeal and the High Court). On 14 January 2002 the system of judgment numbers was extended to all parts of the High Court (see Practice Direction (High Court judgments: neutral citation) [2002] 1 All ER 351). We have adopted the following practice in respect of judgments with official judgment numbers and official paragraph numbering:

- The official judgment number is inserted immediately beneath the case name;
- Official paragraph numbers are in bold in square brackets;
- Holding references in the headnotes, and any other cross-references, are to an official paragraph number, not to a page of the report;
- When such a judgment is subsequently cited in another report,
 - (i) the official judgment number is inserted before the usual report citations in the case lists and on the first occasion when the case is cited in the text. Thereafter, only the report citations are given;
 - (ii) All ‘at’ references are to the official paragraph number rather than to a page of a report, with the paragraph number in square brackets but not in bold;
 - (iii) The ‘at’ reference is only given in conjunction with the first report cited; eg [2001] 4 All ER 159 at [16], [2001] AC 61. If an ‘at’ reference is included on the first occasion when the case is cited, it also appears alongside the official judgment number.

For the avoidance of doubt, these changes do not apply to reports of judgments delivered before 11 January 2001 or to the citation of such cases in other reports.

CITATION

These reports are cited thus:

[2003] 3 All ER

REFERENCES

These reports contain references to the following major works of legal reference described in the manner indicated below.

Halsbury's Laws of England

The reference 14 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn) para 185 refers to paragraph 185 on page 90 of volume 14 of the fourth edition of Halsbury's Laws of England.

The reference 15 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 355 refers to paragraph 355 on page 283 of reissue volume 15 of the fourth edition of Halsbury's Laws of England.

The reference 7(1) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn) (1996 reissue) para 9 refers to paragraph 9 on page 24 of the 1996 reissue of volume 7(1) of the fourth edition of Halsbury's Laws of England.

Halsbury's Statutes of England and Wales

The reference 14 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2003 reissue) 734 refers to page 734 of volume 14 of the fourth edition of Halsbury's Statutes of England and Wales.

The reference 40 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2001 reissue) 269 refers to page 269 of the 2001 reissue of volume 40 of the fourth edition of Halsbury's Statutes of England and Wales.

Halsbury's Statutory Instruments

The reference 14 Halsbury's Statutory Instruments (2001 issue) 201 refers to page 201 of the 2001 issue of volume 14 of the grey volumes series of Halsbury's Statutory Instruments.

Cases reported in volume 3

	Page		Page
AD v East Kent Community NHS Trust [CA]	1167	Customs and Excise Comrs, Coppard v [CA]	351
A-G, R (on the application of Rusbridger) v [HL]	784	DPP v Stoke-on-Trent Magistrates' Court [QBD]	1086
A-G's Ref (No 152 of 2002) [CA]	40	Dartford & Gravesham NHS Trust, Skidmore v [HL]	292
Afrika v Cape plc [CA]	631	Do v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [CA]	1174
Ali Reza-Delta Transport Co Ltd v United Arab Shipping Co SAG (No 2) [CA] ..	1297	Donoghue v Folkestone Properties Ltd [CA]	1101
Anufrijeva (on the application of), R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [HL]	827	Douglas v Hello! Ltd (No 3) [Ch D] ..	996
Arsenal Football Club plc v Reed [CA] ..	865	Durham Constabulary, R (on the application of R) v [QBD DC]	419
Aston Cantlow and Wilmcote with Billesley Parochial Church Council v Wallbank [HL]	1213	EIC Services Ltd v Phipps [Ch D]	804
Bagnall v Official Receiver [Ch D]	613	East Kent Community NHS Trust, AD v [CA]	1167
Beard, Khiaban v [CA]	362	Edore v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [CA]	1265
Bebb Travel plc, IRC v [CA]	546	Edwards, Flightline Ltd v [CA]	1200
Berry, Wrexham County BC v [HL]	1	Elektrociepłownia Tychy SA, Insured Financial Structures Ltd v [CA]	987
Beteiligungs-Kommanditgesellschaft MS 'Northern Pioneer' Schiffahrtsgesellschaft mbH & Co, CMA CGM SA v [CA]	330	Field, R v [CA]	769
Black v Sumitomo Corp [CA]	643	Fincken, Savings and Investment Bank Ltd v [Ch D]	1091
Bloomsbury Publishing Group Ltd v News Group Newspapers Ltd [Ch D] ..	736	Flightline Ltd v Edwards [CA]	1200
Bolton, SCT Finance Ltd v [CA]	434	Folkestone Properties Ltd, Donoghue v [CA]	1101
Bridgegrove Ltd, Cranfield v [CA]	129	G, R v [CA]	206
Brighton and Hove City Council, Higgs v [CA]	753	Glen v Korean Airlines Co Ltd [QBD] ..	621
Bruton & Co, Masterman-Lister v [CA] ..	162	Grady v Prison Service [CA]	745
C (on the application of), R v Lewisham London BC [CA]	1277	Hampstead Homes (London) Ltd, Thames Water Utilities Ltd v [CA] ..	1304
CMA CGM SA v Beteiligungs-Kommanditgesellschaft MS 'Northern Pioneer' Schiffahrtsgesellschaft mbH & Co [CA] ..	330	Hello! Ltd, Douglas v (No 3) [Ch D] ..	996
Camelot Group plc, Inter Lotto (UK) Ltd v [Ch D]	191	Herefordshire Health Authority, Powell v [CA]	253
Cape plc, Afrika v [CA]	631	Higgs v Brighton and Hove City Council [CA]	753
Carson (on the application of), R v Secretary of State for Work and Pensions [CA]	577	Holder v Law Society [CA]	62
Chappell v Somers & Blake (a firm) [Ch D]	1076	Home Office, Wainwright v [CA]	943
Chichester DC v Searle [HL]	1	Hooper (on the application of), R v Secretary of State for Work and Pensions [CA] ..	673
Christie Manson & Woods Ltd (t/a Christie's), Marcq v [CA]	561	Hourigan v Secretary of State for Work and Pensions [CA]	924
Cinderella Rockerfellas Ltd v Rudd [CA] ..	219	Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority, R (on the application of Quintavalle) v [CA]	257
Compagnie Internationale de Navigation, Société Eram Shipping Co Ltd v [HL] ..	465	IRC v Bebb Travel plc [CA]	546
Congleton BC, Tomlinson v [CA & HL] ..	1122	IRC, R (on the application of Wilkinson) v [CA]	719
Cook, R v [CA]	40	Insured Financial Structures Ltd v Elektrociepłownia Tychy SA [CA] . ..	987
Cooksley, R v [CA]	40	Inter Lotto (UK) Ltd v Camelot Group plc [Ch D]	191
Coppard v Customs and Excise Comrs [CA]	351	Jewell, Masterman-Lister v [CA]	162
Cranfield v Bridgegrove Ltd [CA]	129	Johnstone, R v [HL]	884
		Jones v University of Warwick [CA] ..	760
		Keepers and Governors of the Free Grammar School of John Lyon, Shalson v [HL] ..	975

	Page
Khiaban v Beard [CA]	362
Knigfitts, R v [CA]	508
Korean Airlines Co Ltd, Glen v [QBD] ..	621
Kuwait Oil Tanker Co SAK v Qabazard [HL]	501
Larmer, Maronier v [CA]	848
Law Society, Holder v [CA]	62
Lewisham London BC, R (on the application of C) v [CA]	1277
M (on the application of), R v Secretary of State for Health (note) [QBD] ..	672
McFaul, R v [CA]	508
MacWilliam (JL) Co Inc v Mediterranean Shipping Co SA [CA]	369
Marcq v Christie Manson & Woods Ltd (t/a Christie's) [CA]	561
Maronier v Larmer [CA]	848
Masterman-Lister v Brutton & Co [CA] ..	162
Masterman-Lister v Jewell [CA]	162
Mediterranean Shipping Co SA, JI MacWilliam Co Inc v [CA]	369
Merck SmithKline Beecham plc, Sayers v [CA]	631
Metropolitan Police Comr, R (on the application of U) v [QBD DC]	419
News Group Newspapers Ltd, Bloomsbury Publishing Group Ltd v [Ch D]	736
O'Reilly, Westminster City Council v [QBD]	237
Official Receiver, Bagnall v [Ch D]	613
Parkside Health NHS Trust, Wong v [CA]	932
Pegram Shopfitters Ltd v Tally Weijl (UK) Ltd [QBD]	98
Pennycook v Shaws (EAL) Ltd [Ch D] ..	1316
Phipps, EIC Services Ltd v [Ch D]	804
Porter, South Bucks DC v [HL]	1
Powell v Herefordshire Health Authority [CA]	253
Practice Note (Chancery Division: remuneration of judicial trustees) [Ch D]	974
Price v Price (t/a Poppyland Headware) [CA]	911
Prison Service, Grady v [CA]	745
Qabazard, Kuwait Oil Tanker Co SAK v [HL]	501
Quintavalle (on the application of), R v Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority [CA]	257
R (on the application of Anufrijeva) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [HL]	827
R (on the application of C) v Lewisham London BC [CA]	1277
R (on the application of Carson) v Secretary of State for Work and Pensions [CA]	577
R (on the application of Hooper) v Secretary of State for Work and Pensions [CA] ..	673

	Page
R (on the application of M) v Secretary of State for Health (note) [QBD]	672
R (on the application of Quintavalle) v Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority [CA]	257
R (on the application of R) v Durham Constabulary [QBD DC]	419
R (on the application of Reynolds) v Secretary of State for Work and Pensions [CA]	577
R (on the application of Rusbridger) v A-G [HL]	784
R (on the application of U) v Metropolitan Police Comr [QBD DC] ..	419
R (on the application of Ullah) v Special Adjudicator [CA].. .. .	1174
R (on the application of Wilkinson) v IRC [CA]	719
R v Cook [CA].. .. .	40
R v Cooksley [CA]	40
R v Field [CA]	769
R v G [CA]	206
R v Johnstone [HL]	884
R v Knights [CA]	508
R v McFaul [CA]	508
R v Sekhon [CA]	508
R v Simpson [CA]	531
R v Stride [CA]	40
R v Threapleton [CA]	458
R v Young [CA]	769
Rafaela S, The [CA]	369
Reed, Arsenal Football Club plc v [CA] ..	865
Reynolds (on the application of), R v Secretary of State for Work and Pensions [CA]	577
Rosewood Trust Ltd, Schmidt v [PC]	76
Rudd, Cinderella Rockerfellas Ltd v [CA] ..	219
Rusbridger (on the application of), R v A-G [HL]	784
SCT Finance Ltd v Bolton [CA]	434
Salvage Association, Re [Ch D]	246
Sandeman Copimar SA v Transitos y Transportes Integrales SL [CA]	108
Savings and Investment Bank Ltd v Fincken [Ch D]	1091
Sayers v Merck SmithKline Beecham plc [CA]	631
Schering Health Care Ltd, X v [CA]	631
Schmidt v Rosewood Trust Ltd [PC]	76
Searle, Chichester DC v [HL].. .. .	1
Secretary of State for Health, R (on the application of M) (note) v [QBD]	672
Secretary of State for the Home Dept, Do v [CA]	1174

	Page		Page
Secretary of State for the Home Dept, Edore v [CA]	1265	Stoke-on-Trent Magistrates' Court, DPP v [QBD]	1086
Secretary of State for the Home Dept, R (on the application of Anufrijeva) v [HL]	827	Stride, R v [CA]	40
Secretary of State for the Home Dept, Sepet v [HL]	304	Sumitomo Corp, Black v [CA]	643
Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, Hourigan v [CA]	924	Tally Weijl (UK) Ltd, Pegram Shopfitters Ltd v [QBD]	98
Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, R (on the application of Carson) v [CA]	577	Thames Water Utilities Ltd v Hampstead Homes (London) Ltd [CA]	1304
Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, R (on the application of Hooper) v [CA]	673	Threapleton, R v [CA]	458
Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, R (on the application of Reynolds) v [CA]	577	Tomlinson v Congleton BC [CA & HL]	1122
Sekhon, R v [CA]	508	Transitos y Transportes Integrales SL, Sandeman Coprimar SA v [CA]	108
Sepet v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [HL]	304	Trusts of X Charity, Re [Ch D]	860
Shalson v Keepers and Governors of the Free Grammar School of John Lyon [HL]	975	U (on the application of), R v Metropolitan Police Comr [QBD DC]	419
Shaws (EAL) Ltd, Pennycook v [Ch D]	1316	Ullah (on the application of), R v Special Adjudicator [CA]	1174
Simpson, R v [CA]	531	United Arab Shipping Co SAG, Ali Reza-Delta Transport Co Ltd v (No 2) [CA]	1297
Skidmore v Dartford & Gravesham NHS Trust [HL]	292	University of Warwick, Jones v [CA]	760
Société Eram Shipping Co Ltd v Compagnie Internationale de Navigation [HL]	465	Wainwright v Home Office [CA]	943
Somers & Blake (a firm), Chappell v [Ch D]	1076	Wallbank, Aston Cantlow and Wilmcote with Billesley Parochial Church Council v [HL]	1213
South Bucks DC v Porter [HL]	1	Warriner v Warriner [CA]	447
Special Adjudicator, R (on the application of Ullah) v [CA]	1174	Westminster City Council v O'Reilly [QBD]	237
		Wilkinson (on the application of), R v IRC [CA]	719
		Wong v Parkside Health NHS Trust [CA]	932
		Wrexham County BC v Berry [HL]	1
		X v Schering Health Care Ltd [CA]	631
		Young, R v [CA]	769

Digest of cases reported in volume 3

AIR TRAFFIC – Statute imposing strict liability for ‘material loss or damage’ caused by aircraft to person on land ‘as if the loss or damage had been caused by the wilful act, neglect, or default’ of aircraft owner – Whether limited to physical loss or damage – Whether recovery under statute subject to common law rules as to category of persons entitled to recover
Glen v Korean Airlines Co Ltd	Simon J	621
ARBITRATION – Award – Leave to appeal against award – Appeal against refusal of leave to appeal to Court of Appeal – Principles to be applied
CMA CGM SA v Beteiligungs-Kommanditgesellschaft MS ‘Northern Pioneer’ Schiffahrtsgesellschaft mbH & Co	CA	330
BANKRUPTCY – Automatic discharge – Power of court to make interim ex parte order suspending automatic discharge
Bagnall v Official Receiver	Evans-Lombe J	613
BUILDING CONTRACT – Adjudication – Jurisdiction to make award – Parties accepting existence of construction contract but disputing its conditions – Appointment of adjudicator under statutory scheme – Whether adjudicator having jurisdiction
Pegram Shopfitters Ltd v Tally Weijl (UK) Ltd	Judge Anthony Thornton QC	98
CARRIERS – Contract – Carriage of goods – Compensation for loss of goods carried by road – Goods of no intrinsic value – Owner guaranteeing tax authorities for loss of goods – Liability under contract of carriage and sub-contracts – Whether guarantee payment constituting charge in respect of carriage of goods
Sandeman Coprimar SA v Transitos y Transportes Integrales SL	CA	108
CLAIM FORM – Service – Dispensing with service – Guidance on exercise of discretion
Cranfield v Bridgegrove Ltd	CA	129
—Service – Rule of procedure empowering court to grant post-expiry application for extension of time for serving claim form where court ‘unable to serve’ form within prescribed period – Whether court having jurisdiction to grant extension in cases where it had failed to serve due to neglect
Cranfield v Bridgegrove Ltd	CA	129
—Service – Rule of procedure requiring document to be served at individual’s usual or last known residence if no solicitor acting for that person and no address given for service – Whether service under that rule could be bad notwithstanding that conditions precedent satisfied
Cranfield v Bridgegrove Ltd	CA	129
—Service – Statutory provision permitting company to be served at its registered office – Rule of procedure requiring document to be served on solicitor if authorised to accept service and notifying serving party that he was so authorised – Inter-relationship between statutory provision and rule of procedure
Cranfield v Bridgegrove Ltd	CA	129
COMPANY – Administration order – Jurisdiction – Association incorporated by Royal Charter
Re Salvage Association	Blackburne J	246

COMPANY (CONT'D) – Dealing with company – Statutory provision operating in favour of ‘a person dealing with a company’ – Whether shareholder receiving bonus shares such a person

EIC Services Ltd v Phipps Neuberger J 804

—Shares – Proper approach to determining whether issue and allotment of bonus shares void for mistake

EIC Services Ltd v Phipps Neuberger J 804

CONFLICT OF LAWS – Foreign judgment – Registration in England – Whether judgment obtained without notice to defendant in breach of right to fair trial – Whether registration contrary to public policy

Maronier v Larmer CA 848

—Jurisdiction – Agreement between English company and Polish company providing for non-exclusive jurisdiction of Polish courts – English company commencing proceedings against Polish company in England – Whether Polish courts having exclusive jurisdiction

Insured Financial Structures Ltd v Elektrociepłownia Tychy SA CA 987

CONVERSION – Auctioneer’s liability – Whether auctioneer, acting in good faith and without notice, liable in conversion if not selling true owner’s goods but merely returning them to consignor

Marcq v Christie Manson & Woods Ltd (t/a Christie’s) CA 561

COSTS – Interest on costs – Date from which interest payable – Whether interest on costs payable from date of consent order or from date when issue of quantum resolved

Powell v Herefordshire Health Authority CA 253

—Multi-party actions – Whether cost-sharing order should provide for costs of common issues to follow determination of common issues – Whether cost-sharing order should provide for liability for common costs for discontinuing or settling claimants to be determined at trial of common issues

Sayers v Merck SmithKline Beecham plc, X v Schering Health Care Ltd, Afrika v Cape plc CA 631

—Order for costs – Judge placing quantified limit on costs unsuccessful defendant should pay – Whether placing of limit within judge’s discretion

SCT Finance Ltd v Bolton CA 434

—Order for costs – Power to award indemnity costs where defendant failing to beat claimant’s Pt 36 offer – Offer waiving interest uplift on damages and costs – Whether part of Pt 36 offer relating to waiver to be taken into account when deciding whether judgment was more advantageous than proposals contained in offer – Whether refusal of offer attracting exercise of court’s discretion to make order on indemnity basis

Ali Reza-Delta Transport Co Ltd v United Arab Shipping Co SAG (No 2) .. CA 1297

—Third party – Presence of party ultimately paying costs at assessment hearing – Action to be taken where party ultimately paying costs not present at assessment hearing

SCT Finance Ltd v Bolton CA 434

CRIMINAL LAW – Damage to property – Arson – Test to be applied in deciding whether defendant reckless – Whether defendant's act had created obvious risk that property would be destroyed or damaged – Whether obviousness of risk to be determined according to characteristics of particular defendant – Whether age of defendant to be taken into account in determining obviousness of risk – Whether failure to take account of defendant's age breaching right to fair trial
R v G	CA 206
—Young offender – Final warning scheme – Young offenders suspected of committing indecent assaults – Police failing to warn offenders that administration of final warning leading to entry on sex offenders register – Whether scheme complying with convention rights
R (on the application of U) v Metropolitan Police Comr, R (on the application of R) v Durham Constabulary	QBD DC 419
DAMAGES – Personal injury – Discount rate for future pecuniary loss – Statutory provision permitting court to take into account rate of return different from that prescribed by Lord Chancellor if it were 'more appropriate to the case in question' – Meaning of 'more appropriate in the case in question'
Warriner v Warriner	CA 447
—Unwanted pregnancy – Patient detained under Mental Health Act 1983 becoming pregnant while in care of NHS Trust and giving birth to healthy child – Patient unable to care for child – Whether damages recoverable by patient for costs incurred by grandmother in rearing child
AD v East Kent Community NHS Trust	CA 1167
DECLARATION – Jurisdiction – Jurisdiction of civil court to grant declaration regarding criminality of future conduct – Criteria to be applied when determining whether to grant such declaration
R (on the application of Rusbridger) v Attorney General	HL 784
DISCLOSURE – Production of documents before commencement of proceedings – Whether persons likely to be party to subsequent proceedings – Whether disclosure to be ordered when criteria of desirability met
Black v Sumitomo Corporation	CA 643
ECCLESIASTICAL LAW – Parochial church council – Whether parochial church council constituting for purposes of human rights legislation a public authority per se or a public authority when enforcing liability for chancel repairs
Aston Cantlow and Wilmcote with Billesley Parochial Church Council v Wallbank	HL 1213
EMPLOYMENT – Remuneration – National minimum wage – Non-compliance – Whether compliance officer having power to serve enforcement notice in respect of employer's failure to pay national minimum wage to former workers
IRC v Bebb Travel plc	CA 546
EMPLOYMENT APPEAL TRIBUNAL – Jurisdiction – Employee's estate vesting in trustee in bankruptcy – Whether unfair dismissal claim property right rather than personal right
Grady v Prison Service	CA 745
EQUITY – Breach of confidence – Celebrity couple entering into agreement with magazine for authorised wedding photographs – Rival magazine publishing unauthorised wedding photographs – Whether publication in breach of confidence
Douglas v Hello! Ltd (No 3)	Lindsay J 996

EUROPEAN COMMUNITY – European Court of Justice – Application of guidance given by European Court of Justice on law to findings of fact made by national court
Arsenal Football Club plc v Reed	CA	865
EVIDENCE – Improperly obtained evidence – Whether court concerned with method of obtaining evidence
Jones v University of Warwick	CA	760
EXECUTION – Third party debt order – Third party bank incorporated and registered in Switzerland but having place of business in England – Judgment debtors having accounts with third party bank in London and Switzerland – Whether court having jurisdiction to make third party debt order final
Kuwait Oil Tanker Co SAK v Qabazard	HL	501
— Third party debt order – Third party bank incorporated and resident in Hong Kong but having place of residence in England – Judgment debtors having accounts with third party bank in Hong Kong – Whether court having jurisdiction to make third party debt order final
Société Eram Shipping Co Ltd v Compagnie Internationale de Navigation								HL	465
EXECUTOR AND ADMINISTRATOR – Liability – Whether person appointed executor under will could be liable for losses suffered by estate or beneficiaries because of prolonged delay before will proved
Chappell v Somers & Blake (a firm)			Neuberger J	1076
HOUSING – Homeless person – Duty of housing authority to provide accommodation – Whether applicant entitled to make repeated applications for extension of time in appeals procedure
R (on the application of C) v Lewisham London BC				CA	1277
— Homeless person – Priority need – Whether sudden unexplained disappearance of caravan an emergency such as flood, fire or other disaster
Higgs v Brighton and Hove City Council	CA	753
HUMAN RIGHTS – Public authority – Whether non-governmental organisation could be regarded as ‘core’ public authority for purposes of human rights legislation
Aston Cantlow and Wilmcote with Billesley Parochial Church Council v Wallbank	HL	1213
— Right to peaceful enjoyment of possessions – Intervention in solicitor’s practice – Compliance of Law Society’s intervention procedure with human rights legislation
Holder v Law Society	CA	62
IMMIGRATION – Appeal – Decision relating to person’s entitlement to enter or remain in United Kingdom – Approach to appeal in which proportionality in issue
Edore v Secretary of State for the Home Dept	CA	1265 — Deportation – Whether deportation of asylum seekers leading to breach of right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion lawful
R (on the application of Ullah) v Special Adjudicator	CA	1174
— Leave to enter – Fear of persecution by applicant for refugee status – Conscientious objection to military service – Whether international law recognising right of conscientious objection to military service for purpose of establishing refugee status
Sepeet v Secretary of State for the Home Dept	HL	304

INCOME TAX – Allowances – Widow's bereavement allowance not available to widowers – Statutory provision discriminating against widowers
R (on the application of Wilkinson) v IRC	CA	719
INTENTIONAL INFLICTION OF HARM – Invasion of privacy – Visitors to prison who were strip searched suffering distress and humiliation – Whether intentional infliction of harm or invasion of privacy – Whether human rights legislation applicable retrospectively
Wainwright v Home Office	CA	943
JUDGE – Judge in fact – De facto doctrine – Meaning of doctrine – Whether de facto judge 'a tribunal established by law'
Coppard v Customs and Excise Comrs	CA	351
LANDLORD AND TENANT – Business premises – Notice by landlord to terminate tenancy – Tenant giving counter-notice erroneously indicating willingness to give up possession – Tenant giving second counter-notice within prescribed period correctly indicating unwillingness to give up possession – Whether first counter-notice binding
Pennycook v Shaws (EAL) Ltd	Pumfrey J	1316
—Leasehold enfranchisement – Whether lessee's works an 'improvement' for purposes of leasehold valuation if merely reversing work done by previous lessee that had depressed value of property
Shalson v Keepers and Governors of the Free Grammar School of John Lyon								HL	975
LICENSING – Permitted hours – Special hours certificate – Premises for which music and dancing licence in force for part of premises – Whether possible to have special hours certificate in force for whole premises
Westminster City Council v O'Reilly	Mackay J	237
MEDICAL PRACTITIONER – Disciplinary proceedings – Procedure – Categorisation of proceedings – Whether professional or personal conduct
Skidmore v Dartford & Gravesham NHS Trust	HL	292
MEDICAL TREATMENT – Human Reproduction – Tissue typing – Whether statutory authority having power to permit tissue typing in conjunction with pre-implantation genetic diagnosis
R (on the application of Quintavalle) v Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority	CA	257
MENTAL HEALTH – Patient – Removal or change of nearest relative – Compatibility with right to respect for private life
R (on the application of M) v Secretary of State for Health (note)	Maurice Kay J	672
OCCUPIER'S LIABILITY – Common duty of care – Lake open to the public – Occupier posting notices prohibiting swimming – Claimant running into lake, diving, and suffering injury – Whether occupier having taken such care as in all the circumstances was reasonable to see that claimant would be reasonably safe
Tomlinson v Congleton BC	CA and HL	1122
—Trespasser – Whether test of existence of duty of care to be determined having regard to circumstances prevailing at time of accident
Donoghue v Folkestone Properties Ltd	CA	1101

PARTICULARS OF CLAIM – Service – Factors to be considered in deciding whether to grant extension of time for service – Grant of extension of time subject to conditions

Price v Price (trading as Poppyland Headware) CA 911

POWERS OF TRUSTEE – Discretionary trusts – Isle of Man – Distinctions between trusts and powers

Schmidt v Rosewood Trust Ltd PC 76

PRACTICE – Application for directions – Trustees of charity applying in private for directions relating to pending proceedings – Whether court entitled to pronounce judgment in private

Re Trusts of X Charity Ch D 860

— Claim – Value of claim – Whether court having power to require claimant to claim sums which he had chosen not to include in his claim form or pleadings

Khiaban v Beard CA 362

— Parties – Capacity – Claimant suffering brain damage as result of road traffic accident – Claimant compromising action and later seeking to sue solicitors advising him to compromise – Claimant seeking to re-open issue of capacity – Whether claimant a ‘patient’ under the rules of the court – Whether burden of proof on claimant to show inability of managing or administering his affairs – Test to be applied to determine whether capacity in issue – Time at which issue of capacity to be raised

Masterman-Lister v Brutton & Co CA 162

— Order – Claimant obtaining freezing order against defendant – Court discharging freezing order by consent on undertaking by defendant not to withdraw or dispose of money in account – Whether terms of consent order giving claimant charge over money in parties’ solicitors’ account holding money paid in by third party being debt owed to defendant

Flightline Ltd v Edwards CA 1200

— Parties – Description of parties – Description sufficiently certain to identify defendant – Whether requirement that defendant be named

Bloomsbury Publishing Group Ltd v News Group Newspapers Ltd Sir Andrew Morritt V-C 736

PRECEDENT – Court of Appeal – Criminal Division – Doctrine of stare decisis not applied with same rigidity as in Civil Division of Court of Appeal

R v Simpson CA 531

PUBLIC ORDER – Football – Designated football match – Indecent or racist chanting – Whether chanting including use of word ‘Paki’ of a racist nature

DPP v Stoke-on-Trent Magistrates’ Court QBD DC 1086

RATES – Rateable occupation – Chattels enjoyed with land – Vessel used as floating nightclub – Vessel permanently secured to land – Vessel’s owner licensed to use land for such purpose – Whether rateable

Cinderella Rockerfellas Ltd v Rudd CA 219

ROAD TRAFFIC – Dangerous driving – Causing death by dangerous driving or by careless driving when under influence of drink or drugs – Sentence – Guidelines

R v Cooksley CA 40

SENTENCE – Confiscation order – Application for confiscation order – Whether non-compliance with statutory procedural requirements going to court's jurisdiction
R v Simpson	CA	531
—Confiscation order – Judge making costs order before determination of amount payable under confiscation order – Whether order for costs lawful
R v Threapleton	CA	458
—Confiscation order – Whether non-compliance with statutory procedural requirements for postponement of confiscation proceedings going to court's jurisdiction – Whether court having to specify period of postponement when deciding to postpone confiscation proceedings
R v Sekhon, R v McFaul, R v Knights	CA	508
—Disqualification – Whether order disqualifying individual from working with children could be made in respect of offence committed before implementation of statutory provisions creating order
R v Field, R v Young	CA	769
SHIPPING – Bill of lading – Hague Rules – Straight bill of lading – Rules applying to contracts 'covered by a bill of lading or any similar document of title' – Status of straight bill of lading
Jl MacWilliam Co Inc v Mediterranean Shipping Co SA, The Rafaela S. ..	CA	369
SOCIAL SECURITY – Benefits – Widows' benefits not available to widowers – Prohibition of discrimination
R (on the application of Hooper) v Secretary of State for Work and Pensions	CA	673
—Income support – Claimant asylum seeker entitled to benefit until date claim for asylum recorded by Secretary of State as having been determined – Secretary of State recording determination of claim for asylum – Whether claimant entitled to benefit until date of actual notification
R (on the application of Anufrijeva) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept	HL	827
—Income support – Income support claimant and another sharing beneficial interest in property as tenants in common in unequal shares – Whether claimant should be treated in calculating value of her capital assets as entitled to beneficial half share in property
Hourigan v Secretary of State for Work and Pensions	CA	924
—Jobseeker's allowance – Whether receipt by claimant aged 24 years old of contributions-based jobseeker's allowance calculated by reference to lesser age-related amount for persons aged between 18 and 24 years infringing her human rights
R (on the application of Carson) v Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, R (on the application of Reynolds) v Secretary of State for Work and Pensions	CA	577
—Retirement pension – Whether freeze on claimant's pension because of residence in South Africa infringing her human rights
R (on the application of Carson) v Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, R (on the application of Reynolds) v Secretary of State for Work and Pensions	CA	577
SOLICITOR – Law Society – Intervention – Compliance of Law Society's intervention procedure with human rights legislation
Holder v Law Society	CA	62

SOLICITOR (CONTD) – Will – Solicitors allegedly failing to progress administration of estate for five years – Executrix suing to recover loss of income on properties during five-year period – Whether executrix having cause of action
Chappell v Somers & Blake (a firm)	Neuberger J	1076
STATEMENT OF CLAIM – Leave to amend – Statements made in ‘without prejudice’ discussions inconsistent with statements made in affidavit – Whether within ‘unambiguous impropriety’ exception to ‘without prejudice’ rule
Savings and Investment Bank Ltd v Fincken	Patten J	1091
TORT – Harassment – Whether intentional infliction of harassment tort at common law
Wong v Parkside Health NHS Trust	CA	932
—Intentional infliction of harm – Claimant having brought private prosecution for assault – Whether claimant entitled to rely on assault to found claim for intentional infliction of harm
Wong v Parkside Health NHS Trust	CA	932
TOWN AND COUNTRY PLANNING – Enforcement of planning control – Unauthorised development of land – Whether court required to exercise independent judgment on planning issues and hardship when considering whether to grant injunction – Guidance on exercise of power
South Bucks DC v Porter	HL	1
TRADE MARK – Infringement – Use of identical trade mark – Non-trade mark use – Whether use affected function of trademark
Arsenal Football Club plc v Reed	CA	865
—Infringement – Whether essential ingredient of criminal offence use of registered trade mark as indication of trade origin – Whether reasonable belief no relevant trade mark registered a defence
R v Johnstone	HL	884
—Infringement – Whether infringement of trade mark in itself constituting wrongdoing of sufficient depravity to engage doctrine of ex turpi causa
Inter Lotto (UK) Ltd v Camelot Group plc	Laddie J	191
—Registration – Whether owner of registered trade mark having statutory right to use mark overriding another person's common law passing off rights
Inter Lotto (UK) Ltd v Camelot Group plc	Laddie J	191
TRUST AND TRUSTEE – Disclosure of trust documents – Isle of Man – Whether dependent upon proprietary interest of beneficiary – Whether object of mere power entitled to disclosure
Schmidt v Rosewood Trust Ltd	PC	76
—Judicial trustee – Remuneration – Common form of order
Practice Note (Chancery Division: remuneration of judicial trustees)	Ch D	974
WATER SUPPLY – Supply of water for domestic purposes – Premises never previously connected to supply of water for domestic purposes – Two buildings connected to supply of water converted into 109 flats – Whether flats premises never previously connected to supply of water for domestic purposes
Thames Water Utilities Ltd v Hampstead Homes (London) Ltd	CA	1304

House of Lords petitions

This list, which covers the period 25 June 2003 to 31 July 2003, sets out all cases which have formed the subject of a report in the All England Law Reports in which an Appeal Committee of the House of Lords has, subsequent to the publication of that report, refused leave to appeal. Where the result of a petition for leave to appeal was known prior to the publication of the relevant report a note of that result appears at the end of the report.

Cranfield v Bridgegrove Ltd [2003] 3 All ER 129. Leave to appeal refused 31 July 2003 (Lord Hoffmann, Lord Scott of Foscote and Lord Walker of Gestingthorpe).

Holder v Law Society [2003] 3 All ER 62. Leave to appeal refused 31 July 2003 (Lord Hoffmann, Lord Scott of Foscote and Lord Walker of Gestingthorpe).

Grady v Prison Service [2003] 3 All ER 745. Leave to appeal refused 8 July 2003 (Lord Steyn, Lord Hoffmann and Lord Walker of Gestingthorpe).

South Bucks District Council v Porter
c Chichester District Council v Searle and others
Wrexham County Borough Council v Berry
[2003] UKHL 26

d HOUSE OF LORDS

LORD BINGHAM OF CORNHILL, LORD STEYN, LORD CLYDE, LORD HUTTON AND LORD SCOTT OF FOSCOTE

7, 8, 9, APRIL, 22 MAY 2003

e Town and country planning – Enforcement of planning control – Unauthorised development of land – Power of court to grant injunction restraining breach of planning control – Whether court required to exercise independent judgment on planning issues and hardship when considering whether to grant injunction – Guidance on exercise of power – Town and Country Planning Act 1990, s 187B.

f

The three appeals concerned the enforcement of planning control against gipsies who were occupying lands in the areas of the respective local authorities without planning permission to do so. In each case the local planning authority had sought an injunction under s 187B of the Town and Country Planning Act 1990. That section provided: '(1) Where a local planning authority consider it necessary

g or expedient for any actual or apprehended breach of planning control to be restrained by injunction, they may apply to the court for an injunction, whether or not they have exercised or are proposing to exercise any of their other powers under this part. (2) On an application under subsection (1) the court may grant such an injunction as the court thinks appropriate for restraining the breach ...'

h Those injunctions were granted and the gipsies appealed to the Court of Appeal. The authorities argued that the judge exercising his s 187B discretion was more or less bound to grant an injunction unless the authority's application could be shown to be flawed on Wednesbury grounds and that it was not until the stage of committal for breach of an injunction that a court was entitled to reach an independent view on proportionality. They also contended that the court's role was unaffected by the Human Rights Act 1998. The Court of Appeal determined that the judge on a s 187B application was not required, nor even entitled, to reach his own independent view of the planning merits of each case, however, he should not grant injunctive relief unless he had considered for himself all questions of hardship for the defendant and his family. The court also held that it would not be consistent with the duty under s 6(1) of the 1998 Act to act compatibly with the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the 1998 Act) without considering the question of proportionality. The authorities appealed. a

j

Held – The jurisdiction of the court under s 187B of the 1990 Act was an original not a supervisory jurisdiction, and in all cases the court had to decide whether in all the circumstances it was just and proportionate, in the Convention sense, to exercise its discretion under the section to grant the relief sought against the particular defendant. Moreover, the word ‘may’ in s 187B(2) applied not only to the terms of any injunction a court might grant, but also to the decision as to whether it should grant any injunction. No single test could be prescribed as to when the court’s discretion, which was not unfettered, would be exercised in favour of granting an injunction from those in which it would not. Like every other judicial discretion it had to be exercised judicially with due regard to the purpose for which the power was conferred, namely to permit abuses to be curbed and urgent solutions provided where those were called for. Furthermore, an application by an authority under s 187B was not an invitation to the court to exercise functions allocated elsewhere. Thus it could never be appropriate for the court to hold that planning permission should not have been refused or that an appeal against an enforcement notice should have succeeded or that an authority should have had different spending priorities. Nevertheless, the court was not precluded from entertaining issues not related to planning policy or judgment. All would depend on the particular facts, and the court had always, of course, to act on evidence including whether the authority had taken account of the personal circumstances of the defendant and any hardship an injunction might cause. The guidance given by the Court of Appeal was judicious and accurate in all respects. Accordingly the appeals would be dismissed (see [20], [27]–[31], [38], [50], [53], [56], [73], [75], [86], [93], [104], below. b
c
d
e

Mole Valley DC v Smith, Reigate and Banstead BC v Brown (1992) 90 LGR 557 and Hambleton DC v Bird [1995] 3 PLR 8 disapproved. f

Decision of the Court of Appeal [2002] 1 All ER 425 affirmed.

Notes

For injunctions restraining breaches of planning control, see 46 Halsbury’s Laws (4th edn reissue) para 684. g

For the Town and Country Planning Act 1990, s 187B, see 46 Halsbury’s Statutes (4th edn) (1998 reissue) 698.

Cases referred to in opinions

A-G (on the relation of Hornchurch UDC) v Bastow [1957] 1 All ER 497, [1957] 1 QB 514, [1957] 2 WLR 340. h

A-G v Chaudry [1971] 3 All ER 938, [1971] 1 WLR 1614, CA.

Associated Provincial Picture Houses Ltd v Wednesbury Corp [1947] 2 All ER 680, [1948] 1 KB 223, CA.

Basildon DC v Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions [2001] JPL 1184. j

Buckley v UK (1996) 23 EHRR 101, [1996] ECHR 20348/92, ECt HR and E Com HR.

Castanho v Brown & Root (UK) Ltd [1981] 1 All ER 143, [1981] AC 557, [1980] 3 WLR 991, HL.

Chapman v UK (2001) 10 BHRC 48, (2001) 33 EHRR 399, ECt HR.

- City of London Corp v Bovis Construction Ltd* [1992] 3 All ER 697, CA.
- a East Barnet UDC v British Transport Commission [1961] 3 All ER 878, [1962] 2 QB 484, [1962] 2 WLR 134.
- Goumit v Union of Post Office Workers* [1977] 3 All ER 70, [1978] AC 435, [1977] 3 WLR 300, HL.
- Guildford BC v Smith* [1994] JPL 734, CA.
- b Hambleton DC v Bird [1995] 3 PLR 8, CA.
- Liddell's Settlement Trusts, Re, Liddell v Liddell* [1936] 1 All ER 239, [1936] Ch 365, CA.
- Manchester Corp v Connolly* [1970] 1 All ER 961, [1970] Ch 420, [1970] 2 WLR 746, CA.
- Mole Valley DC v Smith, Reigate and Banstead BC v Brown* (1992) 90 LGR 557, CA.
- c Pioneer Aggregates (UK) Ltd v Secretary of State for the Environment [1984] 2 All ER 358, [1985] AC 132, [1984] 3 WLR 32, HL.
- R (on the application of Alconbury Developments Ltd) v Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions* [2001] UKHL 23, [2001] 2 All ER 929, [2001] 2 WLR 1389.
- d R v Basildon DC, ex p Clarke [1996] JPL 866.
- R v Lincolnshire CC, ex p Atkinson* (1995) 8 Admin LR 529.
- R v Wicks* [1997] 2 All ER 801, [1998] AC 92, [1997] 2 WLR 876, HL.
- Sheffield City Council v Smart, Central Sunderland Housing Co Ltd v Wilson* [2002] EWCA Civ 4, [2002] LGR 467.
- e Tesco Stores Ltd v Secretary of State for the Environment [1995] 2 All ER 636, [1995] 1 WLR 759, HL.
- Waverley BC v Hilden* [1988] 1 All ER 807, [1988] 1 WLR 246.
- Westminster City Council v Great Portland Estates plc* [1984] 3 All ER 744, [1985] AC 661, [1984] 3 WLR 1035, HL.
- f Cases also referred to in list of authorities
- Ayres v Secretary of State for the Environment* (1997) 74 P & CR 246.
- Brind v Secretary of State for Home Dept* [1991] 1 All ER 720, [1991] 1 AC 969, [1991] 2 WLR 588, HL.
- Bristol City Council v Lovell* [1998] 1 All ER 775, [1998] 1 WLR 446, HL.
- g Brown v Stott (Procurator Fiscal, Dunfermline) [2001] 2 All ER 97, [2001] 2 WLR 817, PC.
- Bryan v UK* (1995) 21 EHRR 342, [1995] ECHR 19178/91, ECt HR.
- Buckingham CC v North West Estates plc* [2003] JPL 414.
- Jennison v Baker* [1972] 1 All ER 997, [1972] 2 QB 52, [1972] 2 WLR 429, CA.
- h Miles v Secretary of State for the Environment [1999] CA Transcript 1495.
- R (on the application of Samaroo) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept* [2001] EWCA Civ 1139, [2001] UKHRR 1150.
- R v Clarke* [2002] EWCA Crim 753, [2002] JPL 1372.
- R v DPP, ex p Kebeline, R v DPP, ex p Rechachi* [1999] 4 All ER 801, [2000] 2 AC 326, [1999] 3 WLR 972, HL.
- j R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, ex p Daly [2001] UKHL 26, [2001] 3 All ER 433, [2001] 2 AC 532, [2001] 2 WLR 1622.
- Runa Begum v Tower Hamlets London Borough Council* [2003] UKHL 5, [2003] 1 All ER 731, [2003] 2 WLR 388.
- Runnymede BC v Harwood* [1994] 1 PLR 22, CA.
- Tandridge DC v Delaney* [2000] 1 PLR 11.

Wrexham County BC v National Assembly for Wales [2002] EWHC 2414 (Admin), [2002] All ER (D) 77 (Oct).

Appeals

South Bucks DC v Porter

The defendant, South Bucks District Council, appealed with permission of the House of Lords Appeal Committee given on 18 March 2002 from a decision of the Court of Appeal (Simon Brown, Peter Gibson and Tuckey LJ) on 12 October 2001 ([2001] EWCA Civ 1549, [2002] 1 All ER 425, [2002] 1 WLR 1359) allowing the appeal of the claimant, Linda Porter, from the decision of Burton J on 27 January 2000 granting South Bucks District Council, an injunction under s 187B of the Town and Country Planning Act 1990 requiring the claimant within one year to cease using land at Willow Tree Farm, Iver, Buckinghamshire for stationing caravans and storage and business purposes, to demolish various outbuildings and to remove the hardstanding. The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Bingham of Cornhill.

Chichester DC v Searle and ors

The defendant, Chichester District Council, appealed with permission of the House of Lords Appeal Committee given on 18 March 2002 from a decision of the Court of Appeal (Simon Brown, Peter Gibson and Tuckey LJ) on 12 October 2001 ([2001] EWCA Civ 1549, [2002] 1 All ER 425, [2002] 1 WLR 1359) allowing the appeal of the claimants, Darren Searle, Danny Keet and Kim Searle, from the decision of Judge Barratt QC at the Chichester County Court on 30 June 2000 granting Chichester District Council an injunction under s 187B of the Town and Country Planning Act 1990 prohibiting the residential use of certain land by the claimants and requiring them within 28 days to remove mobile homes, certain other structures and the hardcore base. The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Bingham of Cornhill.

Wrexham County BC v Berry

The defendant, Wrexham County Borough Council, appealed with permission of the House of Lords Appeal Committee given on 18 March 2002 from a decision of the Court of Appeal (Simon Brown, Peter Gibson and Tuckey LJ) on 12 October 2001 ([2001] EWCA Civ 1549, [2002] 1 All ER 425, [2002] 1 WLR 1359) allowing the appeal of the claimant, Michael Berry, from the decision of McCombe J on 12 February 2001 granting Wrexham County Borough Council, an injunction under s 187B of the Town and Country Planning Act 1990 requiring the claimant to remove all caravans and vehicles off land lying within the Green Barrier near Wrexham. The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Bingham of Cornhill.

Timothy Straker QC and Ian Albutt (instructed by Sharpe Pritchard as agents for Lynne Reardon, Slough) for South Bucks.

Charles George QC and Stephen Cottle (instructed by the Community Law Partnership, Birmingham) for Mrs Porter.

Timothy Straker QC and Robin Green (instructed by Sharpe Pritchard as agents for Michael J Kelley, Chichester) for Chichester.

Mr Searle did not appear.

- a Timothy Straker QC and Robin Green (instructed by Sharpe Pritchard as agents for Anthony Williams, Wrexham) for Wrexham.
Charles George QC and Stephen Cottle (instructed by the Community Law Partnership, Birmingham) for Mr Berry.

b Their Lordships took time for consideration.

22 May 2003. The following opinions were delivered.

LORD BINGHAM OF CORNHILL.

- c [1] My Lords, on 12 October 2001 the Court of Appeal (Simon Brown, Peter Gibson and Tuckey LJ) ([2001] EWCA Civ 1549, [2002] 1 All ER 425, [2002] 1 WLR 1359) allowed three appeals and dismissed one. The dismissal of the fourth of these appeals (Hertsmere BC v Harty) has not been challenged and that case need not be mentioned further. The appellants before the Court of Appeal in each of the three cases now before the House were gipsies complaining of d injunctions granted against them at first instance on the application of local planning authorities under s 187B of the Town and Country Planning Act 1990. For reasons given by Simon Brown LJ in a judgment with which the other members of the court agreed (at [60], [61]) the gipsies' appeals were allowed and the cases were remitted to the respective trial courts for redetermination. By e leave of the House the three local authorities now appeal to it, challenging the guidance given by the Court of Appeal on the grant of injunctions under s 187B. The correctness of that guidance is the central issue in these appeals.

- f [2] Although the Court of Appeal described (at [5]) the facts of these particular cases as of secondary importance only, because the issue raised is one of principle, it is none the less relevant to record the facts in brief summary and to note factual developments in the period of 18 months since the Court of Appeal gave judgment.

MR BERRY

- g [3] Mr Berry bought land near Wrexham, within the Green Barrier, the Welsh equivalent of the Green Belt, in August 1994. The land is within the area of the Wrexham County Borough Council. His applications for planning permission to live on the land with his wife and six children were refused in October 1994, December 1995 and July 1999. He and his family were then living on a local authority site at Croesnewydd, but in September 1999 that site was closed and they were evicted. They transferred to another local authority site nearby at h Ruthin Road but were subjected to violence at the hands of other residents of the site and in September 2000 moved to the land which Mr Berry owned. The local authority warned him that he had no planning permission to use the site in this way, and called on him to rectify this breach of planning control. His solicitor was instructed to say that Mr Berry would apply for planning permission. The j local authority however resolved to issue an enforcement notice and seek an injunction. The application for an injunction was made on 26 October 2000. The hearing of this application was stayed to await the outcome of an application pending in the European Court of Human Rights (Chapman v UK (2001) 10 BHRC 48). On 12 February 2001 the application came before McCombe J, who granted an injunction requiring Mr Berry to remove himself and his caravans and vehicles from the site on or before 20 April 2001. Mr Berry's appeal against this decision was allowed by the Court of Appeal in the decision under appeal. He had by this time, following the grant of the injunction, again applied for planning permission which had again (July 2001) been refused. This refusal prompted the local authority to issue the enforcement notice authorised some ten months earlier, which it did on 31 July 2001. Mr Berry appealed both against the refusal of planning permission and against issue of the enforcement notice. On 18 June 2002 (well after the decisions of the judge and the Court of Appeal) both appeals succeeded. The local authority's challenge to those decisions was rejected by Sullivan J in the Administrative Court but awaits a further hearing by the Court of Appeal.

[4] There was evidence before McCombe J, to which he referred in his judgment (p 10), that Mr Berry had a history of cardiac illness. He had had a severe heart attack in about 1997. He remained under the care of a consultant cardiologist. His symptoms of chest pain were largely controlled by medication, but occasional emergencies required his admission to hospital.

[5] No site was available for occupation by Mr Berry and his family within the local authority's area, except at Ruthin Road.

MR SEARLE AND OTHERS

[6] In May 2000 Mr Searle (whom it is unnecessary to distinguish from his co-respondents) bought land within the area of the Chichester District Council from a Mrs Collins for £14,000. She had previously applied for planning permission for residential occupation of the land but had been refused. The land was not within a Green Belt but was in an area where development was closely controlled. Mr Searle was told by the local authority that planning permission was needed to move a mobile home on to the land, and gave more than one assurance that he would not do so, but by 12 June 2000 he had moved two such homes on to the site. He requested a form to apply for planning permission and asked that enforcement action be deferred, but on 19 June the local authority resolved to apply for the grant of an injunction. On 22 June application was made and on 30 June an injunction was granted by Judge Barratt QC, who ordered that both mobile homes be removed forthwith. The Court of Appeal allowed Mr Searle's appeal against that order in the decision now under appeal. After that date, the local authority issued an enforcement notice and Mr Searle appealed against the issue of that notice and also against the refusal of planning permission. It seems that an inquiry was held, the outcome of which is unknown to the House. But Mr Searle and his co-respondents have not appeared to resist the local authority's appeal to the House or uphold the decision of the Court of Appeal. This appeal therefore raises the same issue of principle as those of Mr Berry and Mrs Porter, but whatever the outcome of the appeal there can in this case be no question of remitting the matter to the trial judge or re-imposing the injunction, which is understood to have been overtaken by events.

MRS PORTER

[7] Mrs Porter has lived with her partner in a caravan on a site within the Green Belt at Iver in Buckinghamshire since 1985 when she bought the land. It is within the area of the South Buckinghamshire District Council. She has never had planning permission to live on the site, which her partner has used for breeding and dealing in horses. Applications for planning permission made by her in 1988, 1992, 1993 and 1997 were refused, and her appeals against these refusals were either withdrawn (1992, 1993) or dismissed (1998). Enforcement

- a notices were issued in 1987 and 1993: she was fined for non-compliance with the earlier of these notices in 1988; her appeal against the latter was dismissed in 1994. In September 2000 a further application for planning permission was refused, but she appealed and following a public inquiry in January 2002 an inspector, in February 2002, allowed her appeal and granted her planning permission limited to her personal occupation and requiring removal of her caravan as soon as she no longer needed it. The reason given by the inspector was that—

‘The status of [Mrs Porter] as a gipsy, the lack of an alternative site for her to go to in the area and her chronic ill health constitute very special circumstances which are, in this case, sufficient to override national and statutory development GB policies.’

- c The local authority challenged the inspector’s decision in the Administrative Court before Judge Rich QC in September 2002, but unsuccessfully. Permission was given to the local authority to appeal to the Court of Appeal against his decision, and on 19 May 2003 the appeal was allowed. Meanwhile, however, the present proceedings had been initiated. The local authority provisionally decided, subject to legal advice, to seek an injunction on 13 January 1999. Application was duly made on 1 December 1999 and on 27 January 2000 Burton J granted an injunction requiring Mrs Porter to cease to use the land for the stationing of caravans on or before 27 January 2001. It was Mrs Porter’s appeal against that decision which led to the judgment now under appeal before the House. It will be noted that planning permission had not been granted to Mrs Porter when Burton J and the Court of Appeal made their respective decisions.

- e [8] Mrs Porter was born in 1942. There was evidence before the trial judge that she suffered from chronic asthma, severe generalised osteo-arthritis and chronic urinary tract infection. Her mobility was poor as a result of her osteo-arthritis and asthma. She suffered from depression and was taking painkillers, antibiotics, antidepressants and medication for her asthma. Her general practitioner considered that eviction from the site would be detrimental to her health, which has worsened over the last few years.

- f [9] There were three residential gipsy sites within the local authority’s area, but all of them were full and had long waiting lists; there would be a delay of up to three years before a pitch was likely to become available.

g

PLANNING CONTROL

- [10] Over the past 60 years there has been ever-increasing recognition of the need to control the use and development of land so as to prevent inappropriate development and protect the environment. This is, inevitably, a sensitive process, since it constrains the freedom of private owners to use their own land as they wish. But it is a very important process, since control, appropriately and firmly exercised, enures to the benefit of the whole community.

- h [11] It is unnecessary for present purposes to do more than identify the rudiments of the current planning regime, now largely found in the 1990 Act. The cornerstone of this regime, regulated by ss 55–106B in Pt III of the Act, is the requirement in s 57(1) that planning permission be obtained for the carrying out of any development of land as defined in s 55. Applications are made to, and in the ordinary way determined in the first instance by, local planning authorities, which are local bodies democratically elected and accountable. The responsibility of the local community for managing its own environment is integral to the system. But the local planning authority’s decision is not final. An appeal against its decision lies to the Secretary of State, on the merits, which will be investigated by an expert, independent inspector empowered to hold an inquiry at which evidence may be received and competing interests heard before advice is tendered to the Secretary of State. The final decision on the merits rests with the Secretary of State, a political officeholder answerable to Parliament. The courts have no statutory role in the granting or refusing of planning permission unless, on purely legal grounds, it is sought to challenge an order made by the local planning authority or the Secretary of State: in such event s 288 of the Act grants a right of application to the High Court. In addition, there exists the general supervisory jurisdiction of the High Court, which may in this field as in others be invoked to control decisions which are made in bad faith, or perversely, or unfairly or otherwise unlawfully. But this is not a jurisdiction directed to the merits of the decision under review.

j

[12] The second crucial instrument of control provided by the Act is the enforcement notice, which local planning authorities are empowered to issue by s 172 where it appears to them that there has been a breach of planning control and that it is expedient to issue a notice. Once the notice has taken effect, it amounts to a mandatory order to do what the notice specifies as necessary to remedy the breach (s 173). Failure to comply may be penalised, on summary conviction, by a substantial fine, and on conviction on indictment by an unlimited fine (s 179(8)). Persistent non-compliance may give rise to repeated convictions (s 179(6)). The coercive effect of an enforcement notice may be reinforced by a stop notice, which the local planning authority may (save in the case of buildings used as dwelling houses) serve if they consider it expedient that any relevant activity should cease before the expiry of the period for compliance (s 183). Failure to comply may be visited with the same penalties as on non-compliance with an enforcement notice (s 187(2)), and persistent non-compliance may give rise to repeated convictions (s 187(1A)). Again, however, the local planning authority's decision on enforcement is not final: a right of appeal to the Secretary of State lies against an enforcement notice (s 174). On appeal the merits of the planning situation may be fully explored and an application for planning permission may be made (s 174(2)(a)). In this instance also the control regime is entrusted to democratically-accountable bodies, the local planning authority and the Secretary of State. The role of the court is confined to determining a challenge on a point of law to a decision of the Secretary of State (s 289), and to its ordinary supervisory jurisdiction by way of judicial review.

[13] The means of enforcement available to local planning authorities under the 1990 Act and its predecessors, by way of enforcement orders, stop orders and criminal penalties, gave rise to considerable dissatisfaction. There were a number of reasons for this, among them the delay inherent in a process of application, refusal, appeal, continued user, enforcement notice, appeal; the possibility of repeated applications, curbed but not eliminated by s 70A of the 1990 Act; and the opportunities for prevarication and obstruction which the system offered. In the case of gipsies, the problem was compounded by features peculiar to them. Their characteristic lifestyle debarred them from access to conventional sources of housing provision. Their attempts to obtain planning permission almost always met with failure: statistics quoted by the European Court of Human Rights in Chapman v UK (2001) 10 BHRC 48 at 65–66 (para 66) showed that in 1991, the most recent year for which figures were available, 90% of applications made by gipsies had been refused whereas 80% of all applications had been granted. But for many years the capacity of sites authorised for occupation by gipsies has fallen a well short of that needed to accommodate those seeking space on which to station their caravans. Sedley J alluded to this problem in R v Lincolnshire CC, ex p Atkinson (1995) 8 Admin LR 529 at 533, in a passage quoted in Chapman's case (2001) 10 BHRC 48 at 59–60 (para 45):

b 'It is relevant to situate this new and in some ways Draconic legislation in its context. For centuries the commons of England provided lawful stopping places for people whose way of life was or had become nomadic. Enough common land had survived the centuries of enclosure to make this way of life still sustainable, but by section 23 of the Caravan Sites and Control of Development Act 1960 local authorities were given power to close the commons to travellers. This they proceeded to do with great energy, but

c made no use of the concomitant power given to them by section 24 of the same Act to open caravan sites to compensate for the closure of the commons. By the Caravan Sites Act 1968, therefore, Parliament legislated to make the section 24 power a duty, resting in rural areas upon county councils rather than district councils (although the latter continued to possess the power to open sites). For the next quarter of a century there followed a d history of non-compliance with the duties imposed by the Act of 1968, marked by a series of decisions of this court holding local authorities to be in breach of their statutory duty, to apparently little practical effect. The default powers vested in central government, to which the court was required to defer, were rarely if ever used.'

e The essential problem was succinctly stated in a housing research summary, 'Local Authority Powers for Managing Unauthorised Camping' (Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, No 90, 1998, updated 4 December 2000):

f 'The basic conflict underlying the "problem" of unauthorised camping is between gipsies/travellers who want to stay in an area for a period but have nowhere they can legally camp, and the settled community who, by and large, do not want gipsies/travellers camped in their midst. The local authority is stuck between the two parties, trying to balance the conflicting needs and often satisfying no one.'

g [14] The perceived inadequacy of local authorities' enforcement powers led them to seek injunctive relief, whether in a relator action in the name of the Attorney General (as in A-G (on the relation of Hornchurch UDC) v Bastow [1957] 1 All ER 497, [1957] 1 QB 514, a case involving caravans but not gipsies), or by invoking the general injunctive power of the court (as in Manchester Corp v Connolly [1970] 1 All ER 961, [1970] Ch 420), or, later, under s 222 of the Local Government Act 1972 as in Waverley BC v Hilden [1988] 1 All ER 807, [1988] 1 WLR 2466 and Mole Valley DC v Smith (1992) 90 LGR 557). Dissatisfaction with the efficacy of measures to enforce planning control however persisted, and in July 1988 Mr Robert Carnwath QC was asked by the Secretary of State to j examine the scope and effectiveness of existing enforcement provisions and recommend improvements.

[15] In his report ('Enforcing Planning Control', February 1989), Mr Carnwath acknowledged (p 21 (para 1.1)) that the enforcement system had received a consistently bad press ever since the beginning of modern planning control in 1947. He recognised (p 24 (para 2.8)) that—

'The enforcement system therefore cannot be too rigid. There will always be difficult cases where there is a need to balance the interests of enforcement against the individual circumstances of a business or individual. The system needs to be flexible enough to accommodate such cases, while providing the teeth to secure effective action where it is justified. There will always be disagreement as to where the line is to be drawn.'

Mr Carnwath considered (p 41 (para 2.22)) that the best approach lay in recognition of the injunction as a back-up to the normal statutory remedies, since 'Use of the Courts ensures that both sides are fully protected, and that the remedies can be adapted to suit the needs of the case'. He favoured a formalisation and clarification, but not a significant extension, of the existing law, to give statutory recognition to this 'useful weapon in the planning armoury' (p 41 (2.23)). His recommendation on this matter was expressed in these terms (pp 85-86):

'10.1 As explained above (chapter 5, section 2), injunctions have proved a useful back-up to the statutory system in difficult cases. However, there are still doubts about the circumstances in which the remedy is available. In particular, it is unclear to what extent it is available to restrain an actual or threatened breach of planning control before it has become a criminal offence (following service of an enforcement notice or stop notice).

10.2 In my view the authority should be able to apply for an injunction in respect of any breach or threatened breach of planning control, whether or not an enforcement notice or stop notice has been served. There are likely to be two sets of circumstances where it will be especially useful. First, it can provide an urgent remedy in cases where there is a serious threat to amenity, to deal with either a threatened breach (before a stop notice can be served) or an actual breach (for example, where there are problems in preparing an effective enforcement and stop notice in time). Secondly, it can provide a stronger back-up power in cases where the existing remedies have proved, or are thought likely to be, inadequate. The latter function is well recognised in existing case-law, and has a precedent, for example, in section 58(8) of the Control of Pollution Act 1974.

10.3 I think it would be a mistake to attempt to prescribe too closely the circumstances in which the remedy would be available, or the forms of order which could be granted. Experience of decisions over the last few years (see Chapter 5 above) shows that the merit of the remedy is its flexibility and its ability to evolve to meet changing needs. What is required is its recognition in the Act as a normal back-up to the other remedies, and acceptance that it is for the authority to judge (subject to the ordinary judicial review criteria of reasonableness) when its use is appropriate. The court already has a wide discretion as to the terms on which an order is to be made. In cases where an order is made in advance of an enforcement or stop notice, the terms could include an undertaking by the authority to serve such notices, so that the ordinary procedures would be available for determining the merits and protecting the recipient.'

[16] Legislative effect was given to Mr Carnwath's recommendation by s 187B, inserted into the 1990 Act by s 3 of the Planning and Compensation Act 1991, which became effective on 2 January 1992. The correct interpretation and application of this section lie at the heart of these appeals. It provides:

Injunctions restraining breaches of planning control.—(1) Where a local planning authority consider it necessary or expedient for any actual or apprehended breach of planning control to be restrained by injunction, they may apply to the court for an injunction, whether or not they have exercised or are proposing to exercise any of their other powers under this Part.

(2) On an application under subsection (1) the court may grant such an injunction as the court thinks appropriate for the purpose of restraining the breach.

(3) Rules of court may provide for such an injunction to be issued against a person whose identity is unknown.

(4) In this section “the court” means the High Court or the county court.’

[17] Since the enactment of the section the Department of the Environment has given guidance to local planning authorities on the exercise of enforcement powers which, although inadmissible to construe the section, throws light on what was officially understood to be its effect. Thus in circular 21/91 (‘Planning and Compensation Act 1991: Implementation of the Main Enforcement Provisions’, 16 December 1991) it was stated:

‘7 The decision whether to grant an injunction is always solely a matter for the court, in its absolute discretion in the circumstances of any case. Nevertheless, it is unlikely that the court will grant an injunction unless all the following criteria are satisfied:— (1) the LPA [local planning authority] have taken account of what appear to be the relevant considerations in deciding that it is necessary or expedient to initiate injunctive proceedings; (2) there is clear evidence that a breach of planning, listed building, or conservation area control, or unauthorised work on a protected tree, has already occurred, or is likely to occur, on land in the LPA’s area; (3) injunctive relief is a commensurate remedy in the circumstances of the particular case ... Even when all these criteria are satisfied, the court may decide that the circumstances of the case do not, on the balance of convenience, justify granting an injunction. If an injunction is granted, the court may suspend its effect until a specified later date.’

This advice was substantially repeated in circular 10/97 (‘Enforcing Planning Control: Legislative Provisions and Procedural Requirements’, 31 July 1997, paras 5.5–5.10), with the substitution of ‘proportionate’ for ‘commensurate’ but again with reference to the ‘absolute’ discretion of the court. In ch 9 of Enforcing Planning Control: Good Practice Guide for Local Planning Authorities (1997), the Department of Environment, Transport and the Regions addressed the topic again:

‘The personal nature of injunctive proceedings

9.9. Unlike an enforcement notice or a stop notice, a planning enforcement injunction is not primarily directed at the parcel of land on which the breach of control is taking place. Injunctive proceedings are “personal” in the sense that the LPA seeks to obtain an order from the court to restrain a person, or a number of people, who must each be cited by name in the LPA’s application, from carrying on the breach. It follows that, in assessing what is called “the balance of convenience” in the decision whether to grant injunctive relief on the LPA’s application, the court will have to weigh the public interest (which the LPA represents) against the private interest of the person or people whom the LPA seek to restrain. This differs from, for example, the process of an enforcement appeal where the decision-maker is concerned with whether the appeal should succeed on its legal or planning merits. And, even if the court concludes that an interlocutory injunction should be granted, its effect may be suspended for a specified period so that the defendant has time in which to make suitable alternative arrangements for whatever activity is to be restrained. The court may require the plaintiff (the LPA) and the defendant to appear in person at the end of an initial period of suspension of an injunction, so that the balance of convenience can be reassessed.'

THE COURT OF APPEAL DECISION

[18] In the Court of Appeal separate teams of counsel represented the appellant gipsies and the respondent local authorities and the submissions made on each side were not to identical effect. Simon Brown LJ summarised the gipsies' argument (see [2002] 1 All ER 425 at [29]–[34]). In broad summary the argument, in all essentials the argument repeated by Mr Charles George QC in the House, was to the following effect. Section 187B gives the judge a discretion, to be exercised as an original jurisdiction not a review power. Since injunctions are likely to prove the most effective way of remedying breaches of planning control, because attended by the most severe sanctions, including imprisonment, they should be granted only where plainly appropriate and where the court is willing to contemplate the imposition of severe penalties. If the court is unwilling to commit it should be unwilling to enjoin. In cases such as Mole Valley DC v Smith (1992) 90 LGR 557 and Hambleton DC v Bird [1995] 3 PLR 8 the court had taken too narrow a view of its discretion. The court—

'would only be prepared to grant injunctive relief in cases which the court itself regarded as clear, cases where it was quite satisfied first that the planning authority (whether the district council or the Secretary of State/inspector on appeal) had properly reached a final conclusion that the gipsies' continuing occupation of the site could no longer be tolerated in the public interest, and secondly that it was appropriate to enforce their removal by injunction even though, in a case where no alternative sites were available, that would drive the gipsies either onto the roads, into homelessness accommodation (see Chapman v UK (2001) BHRC 48 at 62–63 (para 54)) or, on non-compliance with the injunction, into prison.' (See [2002] 1 All ER 425 at [31].)

Whatever the position before the Human Rights Act 1998, the court must now address the issues arising under art 8(2) of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the 1998 Act) and reach its own decision on whether the gipsies' removal from the site is proportionate to the public interest in preserving the environment. This did not mean that the court would pay no heed to the decisions of local planning authorities: issues as to whether or not planning permission should be granted are exclusively a matter for them, and the planning history of the site, including any recent decisions, will be highly relevant. Respect should be accorded to the decisions of a democratically accountable body. But it is still for the court to reach its own independent conclusion on the proportionality of the relief sought to the object to be attained.

a [19] In the Court of Appeal Mr Timothy Straker QC represented the three local authorities now before the House and Simon Brown LJ summarised (at [35]) his essential argument as being—

b 'that the judge exercising his s 187B jurisdiction is more or less bound to grant an injunction unless the local planning authority's application can be shown to be flawed on Wednesbury grounds [see Associated Provincial Picture Houses Ltd v Wednesbury Corp [1947] 2 All ER 680, [1948] 1 KB 223].'

c The court's function is supervisory. The power to grant an injunction should be exercised in support of planning control. The Mole Valley and Hambleton cases were rightly decided. Not until the stage of committal for breach of an injunction is the court entitled to reach an independent view on proportionality. At the injunction stage the court should consider only whether the gipsies should leave the site, not whether they should suffer serious penalty if they fail to do so. The court's role is unaffected by the 1998 Act. Reliance was placed on the decision of the House in R (on the application of Alconbury Developments Ltd) v Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions [2001] UKHL 23, [2001] 2 All ER 929, d [2001] 2 WLR 1389.

[20] The Court of Appeal's ruling on the approach to s 187B was expressed in five paragraphs of Simon Brown LJ's judgment, which I must quote in extenso:

'THE APPROACH TO SECTION 187B

e [38] I would unhesitatingly reject the more extreme submissions made on either side. It seems to me perfectly clear that the judge on a s 187B application is not required, nor even entitled, to reach his own independent view of the planning merits of the case. These he is required to take as decided within the planning process, the actual or anticipated breach of planning control being a given when he comes to exercise his discretion. But f it seems to me no less plain that the judge should not grant injunctive relief unless he would be prepared if necessary to contemplate committing the defendant to prison for breach of the order, and that he would not be of this mind unless he had considered for himself all questions of hardship for the defendant and his family if required to move, necessarily including, g therefore, the availability of suitable alternative sites. I cannot accept that the consideration of those matters is, as Burton J suggested was the case in the pre-1998 Act era, "entirely foreclosed" at the injunction stage. Questions of the family's health and education will inevitably be of relevance. But so too, of course, will countervailing considerations such as the need to enforce h planning control in the general interest and, importantly therefore, the planning history of the site. The degree and flagrancy of the postulated breach of planning control may well prove critical. If conventional enforcement measures have failed over a prolonged period of time to remedy the breach, then the court would obviously be the readier to use its own, more coercive powers. Conversely, however, the court might well be j reluctant to use its powers in a case where enforcement action had never been taken. On the other hand, there might be some urgency in the situation sufficient to justify the pre-emptive avoidance of an anticipated breach of planning control. Considerations of health and safety might arise. Preventing a gipsy moving onto the site might, indeed, involve him in less hardship than moving him out after a long period of occupation. Previous planning decisions will always be relevant; how relevant, however, will inevitably depend on a variety of matters, including not least how recent they are, the extent to which considerations of hardship and availability of alternative sites were taken into account, the strength of the conclusions reached on land use and environmental issues, and whether the defendant had and properly took the opportunity to make his case for at least a temporary personal planning permission.

[39] Relevant too will be the local authority's decision under s 187B(1) to seek injunctive relief. They, after all, are the democratically-elected and accountable body principally responsible for planning control in their area. Again, however, the relevance and weight of their decision will depend above all on the extent to which they can be shown to have had regard to all the material considerations and to have properly posed and approached the art 8(2) questions as to necessity and proportionality.

[40] Whilst it is not for the court to question the correctness of the existing planning status of the land, the court in deciding whether or not to grant an injunction (and, if so, whether and for how long to suspend it) is bound to come to some broad view as to the degree of environmental damage resulting from the breach and the urgency or otherwise of bringing it to an end. In this regard the court need not shut its mind to the possibility of the planning authority itself coming to reach a different planning judgment in the case.

[41] True it is, as Mr McCracken [counsel for Hertsmere BC] points out, that, once the planning decision is taken as final, the legitimate aim of preserving the environment is only achievable by removing the gipsies from site. That is not to say, however, that the achievement of that aim must always be accepted by the court to outweigh whatever countervailing rights the gipsies may have, still less that the court is bound to grant injunctive (least of all immediate injunctive) relief. Rather I prefer the approach suggested by the 1991 circular: the court's discretion is absolute and injunctive relief is unlikely unless properly thought to be "commensurate"—in today's language, proportionate. The Hambleton approach seems to me difficult to reconcile with that circular. However, whatever view one takes of the correctness of the Hambleton approach in the period prior to the coming into force of the 1998 Act, to my mind it cannot be thought consistent with the court's duty under s 6(1) to act compatibly with convention rights. Proportionality requires not only that the injunction be appropriate and necessary for the attainment of the public interest objective sought—here the safeguarding of the environment—but also that it does not impose an excessive burden on the individual whose private interests—here the gipsy's private life and home and the retention of his ethnic identity—are at stake.

[42] I do not pretend that it will always be easy in any particular case to strike the necessary balance between these competing interests, interests of so different a character that weighing one against the other must inevitably be problematic. This, however, is the task to be undertaken by the court and, provided it is undertaken in a structured and articulated way, the appropriate conclusion should emerge.'

MOLE VALLEY DC v SMITH

a [21] Before considering the merits of the competing arguments and the correctness of the guidance given by the Court of Appeal, account should be taken of earlier Court of Appeal authority. Mole Valley DC v Smith (1992) 90 LGR 557 was one of two appeals heard and reported together. The other was Reigate and Banstead BC v Brown, which involved different gipsies and a different b (although neighbouring) local authority.

[22] In the Mole Valley case the gipsies appealed against the grant of an injunction by Hoffmann J at first instance under s 222 of the 1972 Act. The facts disclosed (at 565–566) a history of unsuccessful enforcement by the local planning authority and non-compliance by the gipsies over several years. The principal c issue before the Court of Appeal was whether the gipsies could successfully resist eviction by the local planning authority on the ground that a different body, the county council, had fallen down on its statutory duty to provide enough pitches to accommodate the gipsies seeking them (see (1992) 90 LGR 557 at 559–560). Lord Donaldson of Lymington MR held (at 568) that they could not, a conclusion shared by Balcombe LJ (at 569) and Stuart-Smith LJ (at 570). Lord Donaldson of d Lymington MR approved (at 567) a passage in the judgment of Hoffmann J where he had said:

‘There can be no doubt that requiring [the defendants] to leave the site would cause considerable hardship. This court, however, is not entrusted with a general jurisdiction to solve social problems. The striking of a balance e between the requirements of planning policy and the needs of these defendants is a matter which, in my view, has been entrusted to other authorities.’

The Court of Appeal did not approach this case as one turning on hardship to the f gipsies, which was not relied on as a ground of appeal. No reference was made to age, infirmity, ill-health or the reasonable needs of children. The Court of Appeal furthermore understood (at 563) that a number of additional pitches would become available in the reasonably near future, declined to shorten the period allowed by the judge for complying with the injunction (at 568–569) and envisaged that in deciding whether to enforce the injunction the local planning g authority would have regard to the availability of alternative authorised pitches ‘very shortly thereafter’ (at 569).

[23] In the Reigate and Banstead case the principal issue was the same (see (1992) 90 LGR 557 at 559–560) but the evidence of unsuccessful enforcement and non-compliance was even stronger (at 563–565). There was little prospect of h additional pitches becoming available in this area in the near future (see (1992) 90 LGR 557 at 563). In this case the gipsies did rely on what they claimed (at 559) would be exceptional hardship if interlocutory relief were granted pending trial, but no allusion was made to this ground of appeal in the judgments and no reference was made to the personal circumstances of the gipsies. The court j granted the same period of suspension (at 568–569), and made (at 569) the same observation about enforcement, envisaging, it would seem, that these gipsies would take advantage of the additional pitches expected to become available nearby.

[24] The ratio of both decisions was that the problems confronting the gipsies, the local planning authorities and the county council—

'are social in nature and fall to be solved in the context of town and country planning policies. These are matters ultimately for the Secretary of State, subject only to the court's supervisory jurisdiction by means of judicial review which is not invoked in these proceedings.' (See (1992) 90 LGR 557 at 566.)

HAMBLETON DC v BIRD

[25] In this case ([1995] 3 PLR 8) the local authority appealed against the refusal of the trial judge to grant an injunction under s 187B to restrain the respondent gipsies, a large family, from continuing to use land, which they owned, for the purpose of siting residential caravans. The gipsies had used the site, in breach of planning control, for a number of years. Applications for planning permission had been refused and an enforcement notice had proved ineffective, as had prosecutions for non-compliance (see [1995] 3 PLR 8 at 9–11). In declining to grant an injunction the judge had referred to the financial burden on the local authority of housing the gipsies, money which the judge plainly thought could be better spent (see [1995] 3 PLR 8 at 12), and he considered it wrong to grant an injunction, which would cause 'gross disruption to no great public benefit' when the gipsies were contemplating a further planning application which might arguably succeed (see [1995] 3 PLR 8 at 12).

[26] Giving the leading judgment in the Court of Appeal, Pill LJ made detailed reference to the Mole Valley case, and also to a decision of Scott J in Waverley BC v Hilden [1988] 1 All ER 807 at 821–822, [1988] 1 WLR 246 at 264. He criticised (at 15) the trial judge for taking it upon himself to assess the benefits and disbenefits to the public as a whole and to exercise the policy function of planning and housing authorities. He also held (at 15) that the possibility of a future grant of planning permission was not a legitimate reason for refusing an injunction to restrain a breach of the law. These errors were held to vitiate the judge's exercise of discretion, and exercising a fresh discretion Pill LJ thought it clear that an injunction should be granted, a conclusion with which Sir Ralph Gibson (at 16) and Balcombe LJ (at 18) agreed. In the course of his judgment Pill LJ made no reference to hardship. He accepted (at 12) that at the date of trial no alternative site was available, although Sir Ralph Gibson (at 17) thought it clear that such a site would before long become available, and he discounted the gipsies' objections to it.

SECTION 187B

[27] The jurisdiction of the court under s 187B is an original, not a supervisory, jurisdiction. The supervisory jurisdiction of the court is invoked when a party asks it to review an exercise of public power. A local planning authority seeking an injunction to restrain an actual or apprehended breach of planning control does nothing of the kind. Like other applicants for injunctive relief it asks the court to exercise its power to grant such relief. It is of course open to the defendant, in resisting the grant of an injunction, to seek to impugn the local authority's decision to apply for an injunction on any of the conventional grounds which may be relied on to found an application for judicial review. As Carnwath J observed in R v Basildon DC, ex p Clarke [1996] JPL 866 at 869:

'If something had gone seriously wrong with the procedure, whether in the initiation of the injunction proceedings or in any other way, it was a difficult to see why the County Court judge could not properly take it into account in the exercise of his discretion to grant or refuse the injunction.'

But a defendant seeking to resist the grant of an injunction is not restricted to reliance on grounds which would found an application for judicial review.

b [28] The court's power to grant an injunction under s 187B is a discretionary power. The permissive 'may' in sub-s (2) applies not only to the terms of any injunction the court may grant but also to the decision whether it should grant any injunction. It is indeed inherent in the concept of an injunction in English law that it is a remedy that the court may but need not grant, depending on its judgment of all the circumstances. Underpinning the court's jurisdiction to grant an injunction is s 37(1) of the Supreme Court Act 1981, conferring power to do so c 'in all cases in which it appears to the court to be just and convenient to do so'. Thus the court is not obliged to grant an injunction because a local authority considers it necessary or expedient for any actual or apprehended breach of planning control to be restrained by injunction and so makes application to the court. No assistance is gained from R v Wicks [1997] 2 All ER 801, [1998] AC 92, d relied on by the local authorities, where it was held to be too late to challenge an enforcement notice in criminal proceedings, a situation quite unlike the present.

[29] The court's discretion to grant or withhold relief is not however unfettered (and by quoting the word 'absolute' from the 1991 circular ([2002] 1 All ER 425 at [41]) Simon Brown LJ cannot have intended to suggest that it was). The discretion of the court under s 187B, like every other judicial discretion, must e be exercised judicially. That means, in this context, that the power must be exercised with due regard to the purpose for which the power was conferred: to restrain actual and threatened breaches of planning control. The power exists above all to permit abuses to be curbed and urgent solutions provided where these are called for. Since the facts of different cases are infinitely various, no f single test can be prescribed to distinguish cases in which the court's discretion should be exercised in favour of granting an injunction from those in which it should not. Where it appears that a breach or apprehended breach will continue or occur unless and until effectively restrained by the law and that nothing short of an injunction will provide effective restraint (City of London Corp v Bovis Construction Ltd [1992] 3 All ER 697 at 714), that will point strongly towards g grant of an injunction. So will a history of unsuccessful enforcement and persistent non-compliance, as will evidence that the defendant has played the system by wilfully exploiting every opportunity for prevarication and delay, although s 187B(1) makes plain that a local planning authority, in applying for an h injunction, need not have exercised nor propose to exercise any of its other enforcement powers under Pt VII of the Act. In cases such as these the task of the court may be relatively straightforward. But in all cases the court must decide whether in all the circumstances it is just to grant the relief sought against the particular defendant.

j [30] As shown above the 1990 Act, like its predecessors, allocates the control of development of land to democratically-accountable bodies, local planning authorities and the Secretary of State. Issues of planning policy and judgment are within their exclusive purview. As Lord Scarman pointed out in Pioneer Aggregates (UK) Ltd v Secretary of State for the Environment [1984] 2 All ER 358 at 363, [1985] AC 132 at 141, 'Parliament has provided a comprehensive code of planning control'. In R (on the application of Alconbury Developments Ltd) v Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions [2001] UKHL 23 at [48], [60], [75], [129], [132], [139]–[140], [159], [2001] 2 All ER 929 at [48], [60], [75], [129], [132], [139]–[140], [159], [2001] 2 WLR 1389 the limited role of the court in the planning field is made very clear. An application by a local planning authority under s 187B is not an invitation to the court to exercise functions allocated elsewhere. Thus it could never be appropriate for the court to hold that planning permission should not have been refused or that an appeal against an enforcement notice should have succeeded or (as in Hambleton DC v Bird [1995] 3 PLR 8) that a local authority should have had different spending priorities. But the court is not precluded from entertaining issues not related to planning policy or judgment, such as the visibility of a development from a given position or the width of a road. Nor need the court refuse to consider (pace the Hambleton case) the possibility that a pending or prospective application for planning permission may succeed, since there may be material to suggest that a party previously unsuccessful may yet succeed, as the cases of Mr Berry and Mrs Porter show. But all will depend on the particular facts, and the court must always, of course, act on evidence. a

b
c

[31] In Westminster City Council v Great Portland Estates plc [1984] 3 All ER 744 at 750, [1985] AC 661 at 670 Lord Scarman drew attention to the relevance to planning decisions, on occasion, of personal considerations: d

‘Personal circumstances of an occupier, personal hardship, the difficulties of businesses which are of value to the character of a community are not to be ignored in the administration of planning control. It would be inhuman pedantry to exclude from the control of our development the human factor. The human factor is always present, of course, indirectly as the background to the consideration of the character of land use. It can, however, and sometimes should, be given direct effect as an exceptional or special circumstance. But such circumstances, when they arise, fall to be considered not as a general rule but as exceptions to a general rule to be met in special cases. If a planning authority is to give effect to them, a specific case has to be made and the planning authority must give reasons for accepting it. It follows that, though the existence of such cases may be mentioned in a plan, this will only be necessary where it is prudent to emphasise that, notwithstanding the general policy, exceptions cannot be wholly excluded from consideration in the administration of planning control.’ e
f
g

Ouseley J made the same point more recently in Basildon DC v Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions [2001] JPL 1184, an appeal under s 288 of the 1990 Act, when he said (at 1193 (para 33)):

‘From that analysis I conclude, first, that quite apart from any considerations of common humanity, the needs of these particular gypsy families were a material consideration because they had a need for this development in this location. Those personal circumstances entitled the Secretary of State to have regard to them as relevant to the decision he had to make in the public interest about the use of the land for the stationing of residential caravans. Their particular need for stability in the interest of the education of the younger children can also reasonably be seen as an aspect of the wider land use interest in the provision of gypsy sites, which interest includes the need for stable educational opportunities. There is also a public h
j

interest in the planning system providing stable educational opportunities for gypsy families, including these gypsy families.'

Thus, the Secretary of State was entitled to have regard to the personal circumstances of the gypsies, as he did in the cases of Mr Berry and Mrs Porter. When application is made to the court under s 187B, the evidence will usually make clear whether, and to what extent, the local planning authority has taken account of the personal circumstances of the defendant and any hardship an injunction may cause. If it appears that these aspects have been neglected and on examination they weigh against the grant of relief, the court will be readier to refuse it. If it appears that the local planning authority has fully considered them and none the less resolved that it is necessary or expedient to seek relief, this will ordinarily weigh heavily in favour of granting relief, since the court must accord respect to the balance which the local planning authority has struck between public and private interests. It is, however, ultimately for the court to decide whether the remedy sought is just and proportionate in all the circumstances, and there is force in the observation attributed to Václav Havel, no doubt informed by the dire experience of central Europe: 'The Gypsies are a litmus test not of democracy but of civil society' (quoted by McCracken and Jones, counsel for Hertsmere in the fourth appeal, 'Article 8 ECHR, Gypsies, and Some Remaining Problems after South Buckinghamshire' [2003] JPL 382 at 396, fn 99).

[32] When granting an injunction the court does not contemplate that it will be disobeyed (see Re Liddell's Settlement Trusts, Liddell v Liddell [1936] 1 All ER 239 at 247–248, [1936] Ch 365 at 373–374; Castanho v Brown & Root (UK) Ltd [1981] 1 All ER 143 at 150, [1981] AC 557 at 574). Apprehension that a party may disobey an order should not deter the court from making an order otherwise appropriate: there is not one law for the law-abiding and another for the lawless and truculent. When making an order, the court should ordinarily be willing to enforce it if necessary. The rule of law is not well served if orders are made and disobeyed with impunity. These propositions however rest on the assumption that the order made by the court is just in all the circumstances and one with which the defendant can and reasonably ought to comply, an assumption which ordinarily applies both when the order is made and when the time for enforcement arises. Since a severe financial penalty may be imposed for failure to comply with an enforcement notice, the main additional sanction provided by the grant of an injunction is that of imprisonment. The court should ordinarily be slow to make an order which it would not at that time be willing, if need be, to enforce by imprisonment. But imprisonment in this context is intended not to punish but to induce compliance, reinforcing the requirement that the order be one with which the defendant can and reasonably ought to comply. The court ought not to face the dilemma addressed by Staughton LJ in Guildford BC v Smith [1994] JPL 734 at 739.

[33] There is no reason to doubt that Mole Valley DC v Smith (1992) 90 LGR 557 and Hambleton DC v Bird [1995] 3 PLR 8 were rightly decided on their facts, but they should now be read subject to this opinion.

ARTICLE 8 OF THE EUROPEAN CONVENTION ON HUMAN RIGHTS

[34] If s 187B is interpreted and applied in accordance with the principles adumbrated in the foregoing paragraphs, it is very questionable whether art 8 of the convention has any bearing on the court's approach to an application under the section. But since the European Court of Human Rights has given judgment in two cases involving gipsies in the United Kingdom, brief reference should be made to those cases. In both it was effectively common ground that enforcement action by the local planning authority to secure the removal of the gipsy from a site involved an interference by a public authority with the gipsy's right to respect for her home, that such interference was in accordance with the law and that the measures pursued aims entitled to recognition under the convention as legitimate. The issue was whether measures were 'necessary in a democratic society' or, differently expressed, whether the means employed to pursue those legitimate aims were proportionate.

[35] In Buckley v UK (1996) 23 EHRR 101 at 120 (paras 84–86) the Commission concluded, by a narrow majority, that the measures were excessive and disproportionate. Even allowing for the margin of appreciation enjoyed by the national authorities, the Commission found that the interests of the applicant outweighed the general interest. The court, also by a majority, took the opposite view: it concluded (at 132 (para 84)) that the responsible planning authorities had arrived at their decision after weighing in the balance the various competing interests at issue; that it was not for the court to sit in appeal on the merits of that decision; that the reasons relied on by the planning authorities were relevant and sufficient; and that the means employed to achieve the legitimate aims pursued could not be regarded as disproportionate.

[36] A majority of the court again rejected the complaint of the applicant in Chapman v UK (2001) 33 EHRR 399. The report of this case contains a helpful and detailed summary of the factual background and also makes reference to the Framework Convention for the Protection of National Minorities (ETS no 157), which the United Kingdom ratified and which came into force in May 1998 (the framework convention) (see also (2001) 10 BHRC 48). In this case the Commission found, by a majority, that there had been no violation of Mrs Chapman's rights under art 8 ((2001) 10 BHRC 48 at 66 (para 69)), and a majority of the court agreed (at 75 (para 115)). The court recognised (at 67 (para 73)) that Mrs Chapman's occupation of her caravan was an integral part of her ethnic identity as a gipsy but acknowledged (at 70 (para 92)) that as a supranational court it was ill-equipped to assess matters within the proper purview of national authorities and did not accept (at 71 (para 94)) that a consensus had emerged on the practical steps necessary to give effect to the framework convention. It envisaged (at 71 (para 95)) that problems might arise under art 14 if gipsies were treated differently from non-gipsies. In rejecting Mrs Chapman's complaint the court (at 74 (para 113)) was not persuaded that there were no alternatives available to her other than remaining in occupation of land without planning permission in a Green Belt area and held (at 75 (para 115)):

'The humanitarian considerations which might have supported another outcome at national level cannot be used as the basis of a finding by the court which would be tantamount to exempting the applicant from the implementation of the national planning laws and obliging governments to ensure that every gipsy family has available for its use accommodation appropriate to its needs. Furthermore, the effect of these decisions cannot on the facts of this case be regarded as disproportionate to the legitimate aim being pursued.'

[37] These cases make plain that decisions properly and fairly made by national authorities must command respect. They also make plain that any interference with a person's right to respect for her home, even if in accordance

- a with national law and directed to a legitimate aim, must be proportionate. As a public authority, the English court is prohibited by s 6(1) and (3)(a) of the Human Rights Act 1998 from acting incompatibly with any convention right as defined in the Act, including art 8. It follows, in my opinion, that when asked to grant injunctive relief under s 187B the court must consider whether, on the facts of the case, such relief is proportionate in the convention sense, and grant relief only if b it judges it to be so. Although domestic law is expressed in terms of justice and convenience rather than proportionality, this is in all essentials the task which the court is in any event required by domestic law to carry out. I should add that while nothing in the Court of Appeal judgment in Sheffield City Council v Smart, Central Sunderland Housing Co Ltd v Wilson [2002] EWCA Civ 4, [2002] LGR 467 is, as I read it, inconsistent with what is said above, I should be wary of concluding c that any action by a public authority seeking possession of residential property occupied by a defendant engages the operation of art 8.

CONCLUSION

- d [38] The guidance given by the Court of Appeal in the judgment of Simon Brown LJ quoted in [20], above was in my opinion judicious and accurate in all essential respects and I would endorse it.

- [39] In the Berry case the Court of Appeal concluded ([2002] 1 All ER 425 at [49]) that the trial judge had erred in regarding Chapman's case as effectively determinative of the application before him. I find no fault with that conclusion. I would accordingly dismiss this appeal with costs, and affirm the Court of e Appeal's order that the matter be remitted to the Queen's Bench Division for the underlying application for an injunction to be determined.

- [40] In the Searle case I would again dismiss the appeal, but with no order for costs and no order for remission. The Court of Appeal was entitled to conclude (at [44]) that the trial judge had taken too restricted a view of the discretion which f he was called upon to exercise.

- [41] In the Porter case I would dismiss the appeal and make the same orders as in the Berry case. The judge was wrong to regard all questions of hardship as 'entirely foreclosed' by the Mole Valley and Hambleton decisions, as the Court of Appeal rightly held (at [43]).

- g [42] I have had the advantage of reading in draft the opinions of my noble and learned friends with which I agree.

LORD STEYN.

- h [43] My Lords, the question is how s 187B of the Town and Country Planning Act 1990 (as inserted in the 1990 Act by the Planning and Compensation Act 1991) should be interpreted. Section 187B reads as follows:

- j '(1) Where a local planning authority consider it necessary or expedient for any actual or apprehended breach of planning control to be restrained by injunction, they may apply to the court for an injunction, whether or not they have exercised or are proposing to exercise any of their other powers under this Part.

(2) On an application under subsection (1) the court may grant such an injunction as the court thinks appropriate for the purpose of restraining the breach.

(3) Rules of court may provide for such an injunction to be issued against a person whose identity is unknown.

(4) In this section “the court” means the High Court or the county court.’ a

The Civil Procedure Rules 1998 make the provision contemplated by sub-s (3): RSC Ord 110, r 1; CCR, Ord 49, r 7.

[44] The question of interpretation before the Court of Appeal ([2001] EWCA Civ 1549, [2002] 1 All ER 425, [2002] 1 WLR 1359) was whether (as three local planning authorities contended) it is beyond the power of the court under s 187B(2) to take into account in the exercise of its discretion the hardship likely to be caused by an injunction to vacate land in the case of a defendant who was in ill health and had nowhere else to go. Counsel for the local authorities acknowledged that in accordance with the law as stated in Westminster City Council v Great Portland Estates plc [1984] 3 All ER 744, [1985] AC 661 such matters are relevant to the decisions of local authorities and the Secretary of State. Overruling first instance decisions the Court of Appeal held that such matters may also be relevant to the exercise of the discretion of the court under s 187B and it remitted the decisions for rehearing at first instance. The local authorities now challenge the decision of the Court of Appeal. b
c

[45] The setting of s 187B is as follows. By the 1980s it had become a notorious fact that determined individuals and enterprises could, by playing the system with the aid of lawyers, frustrate the implementation of valid planning decisions for many years. It was not only old people in caravans which caused the problem. More frequently flagrant and persistent breaches were perpetrated by entrepreneurs for commercial profit. It is true that the 1990 Act provides for a system of enforcement notices which if ignored may lead to a prosecution (s 171A). The 1990 Act also contains provisions for the service of stop notices (s 183(1)). These powers were supported by the power of the Attorney General on relation of a local authority to claim an injunction restraining a breach of planning law (see A-G (on the relation of Hornchurch UDC) v Bastow [1957] 1 All ER 497, [1957] 1 QB 514). This power was supplemented by s 222 of the Local Government Act 1972 as amended. Section 222(1) provides: d
e
f

‘Where a local authority consider it expedient for the promotion or protection of the interests of the inhabitants of their area—(a) they may prosecute or defend or appear in any legal proceedings and, in the case of civil proceedings, may institute them in their own name, and (b) they may, in their own name, make representations in the interests of the inhabitants at any public inquiry held by or on behalf of any Minister or public body under any enactment.’ g

There was nevertheless a strong perception that the planning system was systematically abused and that it required more effective enforcement. h

[46] This led to the Report by Robert Carnwath QC, entitled ‘Enforcing Planning Control’, which was published in February 1989. Paragraph 10.3 of the Report described the supplemental function of injunctions:

‘I think it would be a mistake to attempt to prescribe too closely the circumstances in which the remedy would be available, or the forms of order which could be granted. Experience of decisions over the last few years ... shows that the merit of the remedy is its flexibility and its ability to evolve to meet changing needs. What is required is its recognition in the Act as a normal back-up to the other remedies, and acceptance that it is for the authority to judge (subject to the ordinary judicial review criteria of reasonableness) when its use is appropriate. The court already has a wide discretion as to the j a terms on which an order is to be made. In cases where an order is made in advance of an enforcement or stop notice, the terms could include an undertaking by the authority to serve such notices, so that the ordinary procedures would be available for determining the merits and protecting the recipient.' (My emphasis.)

b Mr Carnwath's recommendation was:

c 'Recommendation (11) I recommend that there be an express power for authorities exercising planning functions to apply to the High Court or County Court for an injunction to restrain any threatened or actual breach of planning control (whether or not an enforcement or stop notice has been served), where they consider it necessary or expedient in order to prevent serious damage to amenity or otherwise to supplement the powers available under the Act.'

It will be noted that the language of s 187B follows the wording of recommendation 11 to a substantial extent.

d [47] Counsel for the local authorities fastened on to the italicised words in para 10.3 to argue that it is the exclusive task of democratically elected planning authorities to weigh issues of personal hardship against the public interest in enforcing planning law. Taken in isolation there may be some logical force in this argument. The main emphasis of the Carnwath Report was on the public interest in enforcing planning. But Mr Carnwath did not ignore considerations of personal hardship. But Mr Carnwath did not ignore considerations of e 'The enforcement system ... cannot be too rigid. There will always be difficult cases where there is a need to balance the interests of enforcement against the individual circumstances of a business or individual. The system needs to be flexible enough to accommodate such cases, while providing the teeth to secure effective action where it is justified. There will always be disagreement as to where the line is to be drawn.'

f In para 2.22 (p 41) he observed that 'use of the courts ensures that both sides are fully protected'. In para 4.2 (p 58) he emphasised the value of 'a flexible system of interim remedies—based on the balance of convenience'. The support for the position of the local authorities in the Carnwath Report is therefore fragile.

g [48] Next, counsel for the local authorities relied on dicta in the House of Lords, in diverse contexts, which emphasise that, subject to judicial review, the planning system is essentially one administered by democratically elected authorities: see Pioneer Aggregates (UK) Ltd v Secretary of State for the Environment [1984] 2 All ER 358, [1985] AC 132; Tesco Stores Ltd v Secretary of State for the Environment [1995] 2 All ER 636, [1995] 1 WLR 759; R v Wicks [1997] 2 All ER 801, [1998] AC 92; R (on the application of Alconbury Developments Ltd) v Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions [2001] UKHL 23, [2001] 2 All ER 929, [2001] 2 WLR 1389. These dicta do not directly or by useful analogy throw any light on the amplitude of the court's jurisdiction to grant an injunction operating in personam requiring a defendant to vacate land.

j [49] Counsel for the local authorities put forward a related point based on the structure of the 1990 Act. He submitted in his printed case, and in oral argument, that it is for the local planning authority to determine whether an injunction is appropriate, and for the court, exercising a limited review jurisdiction, to grant an injunction in terms suited to restricting the relevant breach. I would reject this argument. It depends on interpolating words into the language of s 187B(2) which are ill-suited to the context. Under s 187B(2) the court is not exercising a review jurisdiction: the coercive power conferred by statute is an original jurisdiction. Moreover, the remedy is an equitable one, which prima facie carries with it the notion of a broad discretion.

[50] The starting point must be the language of s 187B read in the context of its purpose viz in the words of the Carnwath Report that 'use of the courts ensures that both sides are fully protected' (p 41 (para 2.22)). The argument of the local authorities that consideration of questions of hardship by them means that this aspect may not be considered by the court under s 187B sits uneasily with the breadth of the statutory language. The critical provision is sub-s (2) which provides that the court may grant such an injunction as the court thinks appropriate for the purpose of restraining the breach. 'May' does not mean 'shall'. The notion of 'appropriate' relief necessarily involves an exercise of judgment weighing the factors for and against the grant of an injunction. There is not a hint of the restriction of the court's ordinary powers to consider logically relevant countervailing considerations at the stage of the grant of an injunction.

[51] The local authority is empowered to apply for an injunction under s 187B(1) whenever it considers it 'necessary or expedient' to do so. I would not accept a tentative suggestion in argument that 'or' in this phrase could be read as 'and'. In my view the local authority may apply for an injunction if it considers it 'expedient', that is convenient, to do so. It is not in doubt that the local authority may take into consideration questions of hardship. But the independent criterion of expediency suggests that the intent was that the local authority is entitled to take the view that notwithstanding marked personal hardship 'we will put the matter before the court for it to decide on all countervailing issues'. The Encyclopaedia of Planning Law and Practice, vol 2 (para P187B.09) rightly points out that s 187B(1) is only 'a deliberately loose entry barrier and is not the criterion upon which the court is required to act'.

[52] Procedural considerations pull in the same direction. There may be a delay between the decision of the local authority and the hearing of application for an injunction by the court. During this period the personal circumstances of a defendant may change adversely, eg the individual may suffer a stroke or a heart attack. On the interpretation of the local authorities the solution is the contrived one that the matter should be adjourned for the local authority to reconsider the decision already taken. If the Court of Appeal's decision is correct, the solution is simple and straightforward: the court will consider the case in the round as it is presented to it on the day of the hearing.

[53] There is an even more important factor to be taken into account. The terms of an injunction must be strictly observed. The potential penalties upon a breach of an injunction are considerable. The local authorities argue that, while personal hardship may not be taken into account by the court considering the grant of an injunction, the court will be able to do so in considering what penalties to impose in committal proceedings. The concession is, of course, inevitable. But it results in the situation that, even in a case where the judge would not contemplate sending a defendant to prison for a breach, he must nevertheless impose an injunction carrying that threat. Such an approach does not advance the rule of law. It tends to bring the law into disrepute. In the Court of Appeal Simon Brown LJ found the right balance. He observed:

a 'It seems to me perfectly clear that the judge on a s 187B application is not required, nor even entitled, to reach his own independent view of the planning merits of the case. These he is required to take as decided within the planning process, the actual or anticipated breach of planning control being given when he comes to exercise his discretion. But it seems to me no less plain that the judge should not grant injunctive relief unless he would be prepared if necessary to contemplate committing the defendant to prison for breach of the order, and that he would not be of this mind unless he had considered for himself all questions of hardship for the defendant and his family if required to move, necessarily including, therefore, the availability of suitable alternative sites. I cannot accept that the consideration of those matters is, as Burton J suggested [in South Buckinghamshire DC v Porter] was the case in the pre-1998 Act era, "entirely foreclosed" at the injunction stage. Questions of the family's health and education will inevitably be of relevance. But so too, of course, will countervailing considerations such as the need to enforce planning control in the general interest and, importantly therefore, the planning history of the site. The degree and flagrancy of the postulated breach of planning control may well prove critical.' (See [2002] 1 All ER 425 at [38], [2002] 1 WLR 1359 at [38].)

I would endorse this approach. In short the granting of an injunction under s 187B is an equitable remedy and the court has a wide discretion.

e [54] A series of circulars issued by the Department of Environment, and its successor the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions, have since 1991 emphasised the width of the power of the court and that injunctive relief must be a commensurate remedy in the particular case: circular 21/91 dated 16 December 1991 (para 7); circular 18/94 dated 23 November 1994; circular 10/97, dated 31 July 1997 (para 5.10); DETR guidance dated 26 July 2000 (para 9).

f Section 187B came into force on 2 January 1992 (see Planning and Compensation Act 1991 (Commencement No 5 and Transitional Provisions) Order 1991, SI 1991/2905). But it received the Royal Assent on 25 July 1991. These circulars are not relevant to the construction of s 187B: they were not part of the contemporary materials available to Parliament when the legislation was passed.

g On the other hand, they may arguably have some value as persuasive evidence of the workability of the interpretation preferred by the Court of Appeal. It is unnecessary, however, to rely on these materials in the present case.

h [55] That leaves two Court of Appeal decisions which undoubtedly assist the argument of the local authorities. The first is Mole Valley DC v Smith (1992) 90 LGR 557. The defendants, who were gipsies, had persistently flouted planning laws in respect of caravan sites. They relied on the fact that the city council was in undoubted breach of its statutory duty to gipsies by failing to provide sufficient sites for them. Lord Donaldson of Lynton MR relied on a dictum of Hoffmann J at first instance which was to the following effect (at 567):

j 'There can be no doubt that requiring [the defendants] to leave the site would cause considerable hardship. This court, however, is not entrusted with a general jurisdiction to solve social problems. The striking of a balance between the requirements of planning policy and the needs of these defendants is a matter which, in my view, has been entrusted to other authorities.'

With the agreement of the other members of the court the Master of the Rolls dismissed the appeal against the grant of an injunction. a

[56] The second decision is Hambleton DC v Bird [1995] 3 PLR 8. Despite persistent breaches of the planning laws the judge had refused to grant an injunction requiring the defendants to vacate certain land. The Court of Appeal held that the judge had misdirected himself by taking into consideration the merits of the planning decision and whether a further application for planning permission might be successful; and he wrongly considered the availability of alternative accommodation for the respondents, the evidence that the official site was unsuitable, and the hardship to the respondents (see [1995] 3 PLR 8 at 17). There are passages in the judgments which suggest that under s 187B hardship is legally irrelevant to the exercise of the court's discretion. b

[57] These decisions pre-date the coming into operation of the Human Rights Act 1998. But even under domestic law the dicta were in my view too austere in so far as they appeared to suggest that even great hardship was irrelevant. A civil society requires a fairer and more balanced approach. There was insufficient allowance for the equitable nature of the remedy and the width of the discretion. On this ground alone these decisions of the Court of Appeal should no longer to be treated as controlling. c

[58] In any event, the new landscape of the 1998 Act requires a different perspective. Article 8 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the 1998 Act) contains a fundamental right. It reads: d

'1. Everyone has the right to respect for his private and family life, his home and his correspondence. e

2. There shall be no interference by a public authority with the exercise of this right except such as is in accordance with the law and is necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security, public safety or the economic well-being of the country, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others.' f

It is unlawful for the court to act in a way which is incompatible with a convention right (s 6(1)). Even if it had previously been possible to ignore great or marked hardship in the exercise of discretion under s 187B—a hypothesis which I do not accept—such an approach is no longer possible. Sometimes, perhaps more often than not, the interference with a convention right may be justified on public interest grounds. But effective protection of a convention right requires the court to approach the matter in a structured fashion in accordance with the principle of proportionality. What in the context of the present case is required was explained by Simon Brown LJ in terms on which I cannot improve. He said: g

'Proportionality requires not only that the injunction be appropriate and necessary for the attainment of the public interest objective sought—here the safeguarding of the environment—but also that it does not impose an excessive burden on the individual whose private interests—here the gipsy's private life and home and the retention of his ethnic identity—are at stake.' (See [2002] 1 All ER 425 at [41].) h

Plainly, the protection of the relevant convention right would not be effectively protected by leaving it to local authorities acting under s 187B(1) to consider j a matters of hardship under art 8. It follows that, whatever their earlier status, the reasoning in the Mole and Hambleton decisions are no longer authoritative or helpful.

[59] For the reasons given by my noble and learned friend Lord Bingham of Cornhill, as well as the reasons I have given, I would make the orders proposed by Lord Bingham.

b
LORD CLYDE.

[60] My Lords, these three appeals concern the enforcement of planning control against gipsies who were occupying lands in the areas of the respective local authorities without planning permission to do so. The respondents in one of the appeals, that of Chichester DC v Searle and others did not present argument at the hearing because they have sold the lands in question and left them. In each of the two remaining cases planning permissions have been given at least to secure the occupation by the respective respondents but these are currently under appeal. The issue before this House relates to the granting of injunctions against the respective respondents under s 187B of the Town and Country Planning Act 1990.

[61] Section 187B provides:

e '(1) Where a local planning authority consider it necessary or expedient for any actual or apprehended breach of planning control to be restrained by injunction, they may apply to the court for an injunction, whether or not they have exercised or are proposing to exercise any of their other powers under this Part.

(2) On an application under subsection (1) the court may grant such an injunction as the court thinks appropriate for the purpose of restraining the breach.'

f [62] It is undisputed that under sub-s (2) the court has a discretion. What is in dispute is the extent of that discretion, in particular with regard to the possible effects of an injunction on the defendants by way of hardship. The appellants contend that the role of the court is essentially a supervisory one. On their approach, if the local authority have considered the question of the possible hardship to the defendants, and all other relevant factors, the court may not explore such matters but must accept the conclusion reached by the authority. The respondents argue that the particular point of dispute in the present cases is whether the court may consider the consequences of the injunction for the defendants in deciding whether or not to grant it. They contend that at the very least the court may properly have regard to the possible hardship for the defendants. The issue thus raises questions about the precise scope of the discretion given to the court by s 187B(2).

j [63] It may be noted at the outset that the section is talking about an injunction. This is not a new remedy created by Parliament but a familiar and long-established form of remedy in English law. What the section did was to give an express statutory power for local planning authorities to apply to the court for that remedy and a discretion in the court to grant it. The power was given expressly to local planning authorities, so that this remedy may not be sought under the statute by anyone else. Parliament imposed an express pre-condition for the application upon the authority, namely that it must consider it necessary or expedient for an actual or apprehended breach of planning control to be restrained by injunction. That initial step of consideration is one which they must have taken before they can make the application and it serves as an initial restraint on the power to make the application under the Act. It does not seem to me to bear upon the problem of the scope of the court's discretion. I note in passing that we are not required in the present case to explore the application of the possibly overlapping tests of 'necessary or expedient'.

[64] Subsection (1) may be seen as widening the availability of the power to apply in providing that the application may be made whether or not the authority have exercised or are proposing to exercise any of the other powers in Pt VII of the Act. That includes in particular the power to issue a planning contravention notice under s 171C, an enforcement notice under s 172, a breach of condition notice under s 187A, and a stop notice under s 183. But that does not mean that the court may not take account of the facts regarding any other remedy which the authority have pursued or the fact that they have not pursued any other remedy. In my view the provisions in sub-s (1) all relate to the power in the authority to make the application. They do not cast any direct light on the question of the scope of the discretion given to the court in sub-s (2) in the granting or withholding of the remedy. The authority have to decide in accordance with the statute to make the application for an injunction but it is for the court to decide whether or not to grant it and the decision to make the application cannot determine that question.

[65] Since the remedy which the court was expressly permitted to grant under sub-s (2) was a familiar remedy under English law it might be expected that in dealing with an application for such a remedy the court would adopt the same approach and apply the same tests as it has always done in relation to injunctions. The jurisdiction expressly conferred upon the court by sub-s (2) is plainly an original jurisdiction. It is not presented as a means of appeal or of review of the decision to enforce planning control or of the decision to apply for an injunction. On the face of it there seems no reason why the court should not take into account what effect an injunction might have on the personal circumstances of the defendant.

[66] Counsel for the appellants laid stress on the final phrase of s 187B(2) 'for the purpose of restraining the breach'. As a matter of the construction of the subsection this phrase does not seem to me to circumscribe the power of the court so as to make the whole choice of action dependant upon the consideration of whether or not an injunction would serve the purpose of restraining the breach. If that was the intention of the final phrase then it would be hard to imagine any case in which an injunction would not be granted. In every case an injunction operates to restrain the breach. But the court is not compelled to grant an injunction. The subsection only empowers that to be done. I cannot read into the phrase any limitation upon the matters to which the court may have regard in exercising its discretion nor can I find there an indication that the court's role is intended to be a supervisory one. The importance of the phrase to my mind is in directing the court to the purposes which any injunction must be designed to achieve. The injunction which is permitted by the subsection is 'such' injunction as will serve the stated purposes. The phrase indicates the kind of injunction, the terms of the order, if any, which may be granted. It does not resolve the question how far the court's discretion may go.

[67] The principal theme in the appellants' argument as it seemed to me was the concern that the court should not trespass into areas with which it has no concern. I certainly accept that it is for the planning authorities and not for the a courts to see to the preparation and administration of plans and policies for the use of land. What uses should or should not be allowed of lands within the area of the authority, what developments should or should not be permitted to take place, upon such lands, are questions for the planning authorities and not for courts of law to resolve. The expression 'planning matters' may be too uncertain a use of language in this context. I also find the expression 'planning code' which b was sometimes used in the argument lacking in precision. The expression 'planning merits' seems to me to be more exact, but I would prefer to identify the forbidden ground as comprising matters of 'planning judgment'.

[68] The factors which require to be considered in the making of a planning judgment are potentially many and varied. They include matters relating to the economic and social needs of the locality, the interests of the public and of the individual members of it who live there, the preservation of the environment and the protection of amenity. Lord Hoffmann observed in Tesco Stores Ltd v Secretary of State for the Environment [1995] 2 All ER 636 at 657, [1995] 1 WLR 759 at 780:

d 'If there is one principle of planning law more firmly settled than any other, it is that matters of planning judgment are within the exclusive province of the local planning authority or the Secretary of State.'

The courts may consider the legality of a planning judgment but not the merits of the planning decision. In R (on the application of Alconbury Developments Ltd) v Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions [2001] UKHL 23, [2001] 2 All ER 929, [2001] 2 WLR 1389 this distinction was recognised and held e to be consistent with art 6(1) of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998). If the courts were to embark upon a reassessment of matters of planning judgment they would, to use the language of Lord Hoffmann in R v Wicks [1997] 2 All ER 801 at 818, [1998] AC 92 at 120 be subverting the whole scheme of the Act.

f [69] Planning authorities will in particular require to consider the human factor. In Westminster City Council v Great Portland Estates plc [1984] 3 All ER 744 at 750, [1985] AC 661 at 670 Lord Scarman observed:

g 'Personal circumstances of an occupier, personal hardship, the difficulties of businesses which are of value to the character of a community are not to be ignored in the administration of planning control.'

Certainly in the enforcement of planning control these personal and human factors must be taken into account. They will also play a part in the earlier stages of the drawing up of plans and policies as well, of course, in the decisions in h individual cases whether or not some particular permission should or should not be granted.

[70] But the enforcement of the planning decisions which have been reached by planning authorities does not in my view strictly involve the exercise of a planning judgment. The statutory provisions relating to enforcement are set out in a distinct part of the 1990 Act, Pt VII. They are in a broad sense 'planning matters'. Indeed the initiative to enforce planning control under these provisions lies with the authority. In deciding whether to take action in the event of a breach of planning control the authority will require to weigh a variety of factors which go beyond the considerations of the planning judgment in the light of which the plans were made and permissions granted or refused. The factors will now include the seriousness of the breach and its effect in the particular case. The authority will also require to consider which of the various methods of enforcement provided by the statute they should adopt. Enforcement notices and stop notices are courses which the authority may take at their own hand. So also is the breach of condition notice introduced by s 187A. But the injunction provided for by s 187B requires the intervention of the court. Parliament has expressly given the power to grant this particular form of remedy to the court. The authority must decide that the course is 'necessary or expedient', but it is for the court, not for them, to issue the order. a
j

b

[71] In exercising its power the court must not reassess matters which are the subject of a planning judgment. But that does not mean that the factors which have been considered by the authority in making their planning judgment may not be properly taken into account by the court in deciding whether or not to grant this particular remedy. In looking at the factors which weighed with the authority the court is not embarking upon a reassessment of what was decided as matter of planning judgment but entering upon the different exercise of deciding whether the circumstances are such as to warrant the granting of the particular remedy of an injunction. c

[72] It is said that if the court was enabled to take into account matters which have been considered by the planning authority in deciding whether a particular development was acceptable in planning terms and the court refused an injunction it would in effect be granting a temporary planning permission for the development. But the analogy is not exact. The authority might be able to take fresh steps for enforcement on a more secure basis than that on which they had attempted to do so before. They could also seek enforcement if any change of circumstances occurred. So the defendant does not truly enjoy any protective permission. The temporary relief which he may enjoy is no different from the relief which he would achieve through a successful challenge by judicial review and the propriety of the court granting review of an invalid decision by the local authority should not be open to criticism on the ground that the court is granting some kind of temporary permission to the person who applied for review. d
e
f

[73] Accordingly in my view s 187B(2) allows and has always allowed the court in the exercise of its discretion in granting an injunction to weigh up the public interest in securing the enforcement of planning policy and planning decisions against the private interests of the individuals who are allegedly in breach of planning control. In particular I would hold that it is open to the court to consider questions of hardship, particularly as regards health, arising out of the effect on such individuals of a grant of an injunction. In that regard I do not consider the observations contrary to that view in Mole Valley DC v Smith, Reigate and Banstead BC v Brown (1992) 90 LGR 557 and more particularly in Hambleton DC v Bird [1995] 3 PLR 8 to be sound. g
h

[74] Those two cases were decided before the 1998 Act came into effect. The requirement imposed by s 6(1) of that Act on a court to whom an application for an injunction is made under s 187B of the 1990 Act now makes it a matter of statutory necessity for the court in any case where art 8 of the convention applies to see whether the test of proportionality is satisfied before an injunction is granted. Counsel for the appellants sought assistance from the decision of the Court of Appeal in Sheffield City Council v Smart, Central Sunderland Housing Co Ltd v Wilson [2002] EWCA Civ 4, [2002] LGR 467. But that case was dealing with non-secure tenancies under s 193 of the Housing Act 1996 and it may be noted by way of distinction that Laws LJ said (at [31]): j

a 'In my judgment it is important to notice that the regimes of secure tenancies and of planning control (engaged in the gipsy cases), require the court to adjudicate upon the specific merits or otherwise of coercive action in the individual case ...'

b Counsel also argued that the court did not require itself to apply a test of proportionality where the regime was already compliant with the convention. But while the scheme of the planning legislation may comply with the convention the application of particular provisions of it in particular circumstances gives rise to distinct and separate questions which are not solved merely by reference to the general regime.

c [75] So far as the particular cases before us are concerned I gratefully adopt the account of the facts which has been set out in the speech of my noble and learned friend Lord Bingham of Cornhill. In that regard I would point out that the circumstances of the two cases where the respondents have contested the appeal before us are quite special. In each case the respondent owns the land in question and while the two pieces of land lie respectively in an area of Green Belt or Green Barrier it is not suggested that there is any urgent environmental problem. In d each case there are problems of health and lack of alternative accommodation made more problematic as the respondents are gipsies where considerations of humanity may be particularly acute owing to their particular traditions and lifestyle. That their cases are far from hopeless on the merits is reflected in the fact that they have each been granted a planning permission, although since the e hearing before us I understand that an appeal by the local authority in Mrs Porter's case has been upheld. These considerations give a particular force to the proposition that an injunction may be an inappropriate remedy. But that these particular cases have that force should not be understood as diminishing in any way the value of the means of enforcement of planning control provided by s 187B. One reason for its introduction was to reduce the risk of the system for the enforcement of planning control being abused. It remains a potent weapon f for that purpose and no doubt in other cases its use to support and back up the other methods of control will be found to be appropriate.

g [76] However in the present case I consider that the Court of Appeal proceeded upon the correct approach and I agree with the decision which they reached. I agree in particular with their criticism of the decision in the case of Berry whose facts in my view can be distinguished from those in Chapman v UK (2001) 10 BHRC 48. I would accordingly dismiss the three appeals which are before us.

h LORD HUTTON.

j [77] My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speeches of my noble and learned friends Lord Bingham of Cornhill and Lord Steyn and I am in full agreement with the reasons which they give for dismissing these appeals. I will only add a few observations of my own relating to the issue of personal hardship.

[78] The appeals are concerned with the problem which arises when the enforcement of planning control would result in considerable personal hardship to the occupier of the site against whom the enforcement is to take place. The present cases are examples of the difficulties which arise when it is desirable on planning grounds relating to the amenity of the area to stop the use of land as a site for a caravan or mobile home, but when an injunction under s 187B of the Town and Country Planning Act 1990 ordering the cessation of such use would cause severe hardship to the person who lives in the caravan or mobile home because of his or her age or ill health.

[79] Section 187B of the 1990 Act provides:

'(1) Where a local planning authority consider it necessary or expedient for any actual or apprehended breach of planning control to be restrained by injunction, they may apply to the court for an injunction, whether or not they have exercised or are proposing to exercise any of their other powers under this Part.

(2) On an application under subsection (1) the court may grant such an injunction as the court thinks appropriate for the purpose of restraining the breach.'

[80] In his judgment in the Court of Appeal (with which Peter Gibson and Tuckey LJ agreed) Simon Brown LJ stated ([2001] EWCA Civ 1549 at [4], [2002] 1 All ER 425 at [4], [2002] 1 WLR 1359) that the central issue for determination on the appeals was the extent to which the court itself on a s 187B application should exercise an independent judgment in deciding whether or not to grant an injunction. After a careful consideration of the authorities Simon Brown LJ stated (at [38]–[42]) his opinion as to the approach which a court should take on an application for an injunction under s 187B in cases such as the present ones, which have been set out in full in the speech of Lord Bingham.

[81] Mr Straker QC, for the appellants, submitted that the Court of Appeal erred in departing from the approach taken by that court in earlier decisions that it is not for a court to weigh competing interests in planning matters. Parliament had entrusted to local planning authorities, which are democratically elected bodies, the task of weighing such interests and the decisions of those authorities are subject to an appeal on the merits to the Secretary of State who is answerable to Parliament. Therefore it is not the concern of a court to carry out that function and to decide where the balance lies between the interests of the defendant occupier and the wider community. If, on an application under s 187B, a local planning authority proves a breach of planning control, an injunction should be granted unless it can be shown that its decision to enforce planning control is invalid on Wednesbury grounds (see Associated Provincial Picture Houses Ltd v Wednesbury Corp [1947] 2 All ER 680, [1948] 1 KB 223). The purpose of the court is to assist in the enforcement of planning control, not to make planning decisions itself.

[82] Mr Straker cited a number of decisions in support of this submission: Pioneer Aggregates (UK) Ltd v Secretary of State for the Environment [1984] 2 All ER 358, [1985] AC 132; Tesco Stores Ltd v Secretary of State for the Environment [1995] 2 All ER 636, [1995] 1 WLR 759; R (on the application of Alconbury Developments Ltd) v Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions [2001] UKHL 23, [2001] 2 All ER 929, [2001] 2 WLR 1389. The statement which most strongly supports the appellants' argument is the observation of Lord Hoffmann in the Tesco Stores case [1995] 2 All ER 636 at 657, [1995] 1 WLR 759 at 780:

'The fact that the law regards something as a material consideration therefore involves no view about the part, if any, which it should play in the decision-making process. This distinction between whether something is a material consideration and the weight which it should be given is only one aspect of a fundamental principle of British planning law, namely that the a courts are concerned only with the legality of the decision-making process and not with the merits of the decision. If there is one principle of planning law more firmly settled than any other, it is that matters of planning judgment are within the exclusive province of the local planning authority or the Secretary of State.'

b [83] However the issue which lies at the heart of this case is what in Westminster City Council v Great Portland Estates plc [1984] 3 All ER 744, [1985] AC 661 Lord Scarman termed 'the human factor'. The cases on which Mr Straker relied related to matters of planning policy and the planning merits of particular cases and were not concerned with cases where the question of human hardship arose. On this issue the speech of Lord Scarman (with which the other members of the House concurred) provides clear guidance. In the Great Portland Estates case a question arose as to whether in formulating a plan for the development of the use of land under the Town and Country Planning Act 1971 a city council should have regard to the interests of individual occupiers of premises. In his speech Lord Scarman considered the extent to which the human factor can be taken into account in planning decisions. He cited ([1984] 3 All ER 744 at 749–750, [1985] AC 661 at 669) the observation of Lord Parker CJ in East Barnet UDC v British Transport Commission [1961] 3 All ER 878 at 884, [1962] 2 QB 484 at 491 that 'what one is really considering is the character of the use of the land, not the particular purpose of a particular occupier'. He said ([1984] 3 All ER 744 at 750, [1985] AC 661 at 670) that 'a planning purpose is one which relates to the character of the use of land' and stated:

e 'However, like all generalisations Lord Parker CJ's statement has its own limitations. Personal circumstances of an occupier, personal hardship, the difficulties of businesses which are of value to the character of a community are not to be ignored in the administration of planning control. It would be inhuman pedantry to exclude from the control of our development the human factor. The human factor is always present, of course, indirectly as the background to the consideration of the character of land use. It can, however, and sometimes should, be given direct effect as an exceptional or special circumstance. But such circumstances, when they arise, fall to be considered not as a general rule but as exceptions to a general rule to be met in special cases.' (See [1984] 3 All ER 744 at 750, [1985] AC 661 at 670.)

f [84] In his judgment Simon Brown LJ ([2002] 1 All ER 425 at [38]) drew a distinction between the planning merits of a case on the one hand and the hardship which would be suffered by a defendant and his family on the other. He held that it was not for the judge to decide purely planning matters—this was a matter for the local planning authority, but that it was right for the judge to take into account the human factor, stating:

j 'It seems to me perfectly clear that the judge on a s 187B application is not required, nor even entitled, to reach his own independent view of the planning merits of the case. These he is required to take as decided within the planning process, the actual or anticipated breach of planning control being a given when he comes to exercise his discretion. But it seems to me no less plain that the judge should not grant injunctive relief unless he would be prepared if necessary to contemplate committing the defendant to prison for breach of the order, and that he would not be of this mind unless he had considered for himself all questions of hardship for the defendant and his family if required to move, necessarily including, therefore, the availability of suitable alternative sites.’ a

[85] As Lord Scarman recognised in his speech in the Great Portland Estates case that the human factor is sometimes a distinct and additional factor to be viewed separately from ordinary planning considerations and that on occasions it should be given direct effect as an exceptional or special circumstance, I think that Simon Brown LJ was right to make the distinction he did between purely planning considerations and the human factor, and that he was also right to hold that the human factor should be taken into account in deciding whether planning control should be enforced by the granting of an injunction. b

[86] I do not accept Mr Straker’s submission that it is not appropriate for a court to take into account and weigh against purely planning considerations the hardship which the defendant would suffer if he or she were forced to move from the site. It is clear that s 187B gives the court an original jurisdiction which it is to exercise as it thinks right. Subsection (2) states that the court ‘may’ grant such an injunction as the court ‘thinks appropriate’ for the purpose of restraining the breach. Therefore it is not for the court to act merely as a rubber stamp to endorse the decision of the local planning authority to stop the user by the particular defendant in breach of planning control. Moreover the court is as well placed as the local planning authority to decide whether the considerations relating to the human factor outweigh purely planning considerations; the weight to be attached to the personal circumstances of a defendant in deciding whether a coercive order should be made against him is a task which is constantly performed by the courts. c
d
e

[87] Article 8 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998 provides:

‘1. Everyone has the right to respect for his private and family life, his home and his correspondence. f

2. There shall be no interference by a public authority with the exercise of this right except such as is in accordance with the law and is necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security, public safety or the economic well-being of the country, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others.’ g

In Buckley v UK (1996) 23 EHRR 101 the European Court of Human Rights held that the fact that a gipsy was living in a caravan on a site in breach of planning control did not disentitle her from claiming that the caravan was her ‘home’ within the meaning of art 8. Simon Brown LJ held (at [41]) that under s 6(1) of the 1998 Act a court hearing an application for an injunction under s 187B must act in a way which is compatible with the right given by art 8. In my opinion he was right to do so because s 187B requires the court to decide on the facts of the individual case whether it is appropriate to grant an injunction which, in cases such as these, will require the defendant to leave his or her home. h
j

[88] The learned Lord Justice (at [38]–[42]) gave what, in my respectful opinion, is clear and helpful guidance as to the factors which a court hearing a s 187B application should take into account, which included the following. He stated (at [38]):

a 'Questions of the family's health and education will inevitably be of relevance. But so too, of course, will countervailing considerations such as the need to enforce planning control in the general interest and, importantly therefore, the planning history of the site. The degree and flagrancy of the postulated breach of planning control may well prove critical. If conventional enforcement measures have failed over a prolonged period of b time to remedy the breach, then the court would obviously be the readier to use its own, more coercive powers.'

And (at [39]):

c 'Relevant too will be the local authority's decision under s 187B(1) to seek injunctive relief. They, after all, are the democratically elected and accountable body principally responsible for planning control in their area.
Again, however, the relevance and weight of their decision will depend above all on the extent to which they can be shown to have had regard to all the material considerations and to have properly posed and approached the d article 8(2) questions as to necessity and proportionality.'

In Chapman v UK (2001) 10 BHRC 48 at 72–73 the European Court of Human Rights stated:

e '102. Where a dwelling has been established without the planning permission which is needed under the national law, there is a conflict of interest between the right of the individual under art 8 of the convention to respect for his or her home and the right of others in the community to environmental protection ... When considering whether a requirement that the individual leave his or her home is proportionate to the legitimate aim f pursued, it is highly relevant whether or not the home was established unlawfully. If the home was lawfully established, this factor would self-evidently be something which would weigh against the legitimacy of requiring the individual to move. Conversely, if the establishment of a home in a particular place was unlawful, the position of the individual objecting to an order to move is less strong. The court will be slow to grant protection g to those who, in conscious defiance of the prohibitions of the law, establish a home on an environmentally protected site. For the court to do otherwise would be to encourage illegal action to the detriment of the protection of the environmental rights of other people in the community.'

h 103. A further relevant consideration, to be taken into account in the first place by the national authorities, is that if no alternative accommodation is available, the interference is more serious than where such accommodation is available. The more suitable the alternative accommodation is, the less serious is the interference constituted by moving the applicant from his or her existing accommodation.

j 104. The evaluation of the suitability of alternative accommodation will involve a consideration of, on the one hand, the particular needs of the person concerned—his or her family requirements and financial resources—and, on the other hand, the rights of the local community to environmental protection. This is a task in respect of which it is appropriate to give a wide margin of appreciation to national authorities, who are evidently better placed to make the requisite assessment.'

[89] I consider that the factors stated by Simon Brown LJ properly reflect the considerations which in Chapman's case the European Court stated should be taken into account and that a court which follows the guidance given by him will be acting compatibly with art 8. a

[90] Whilst I do not express a concluded opinion on the point which was not the subject of detailed argument before the House, I see no reason to doubt the view expressed by Laws LJ in Sheffield City Council v Smart, Central Sunderland Housing Co Ltd v Wilson [2002] EWCA Civ 4 at [40], [41], [2002] LGR 467 at [40], [41] that there are some statutory regimes under which the balance of interests arising under art 8(2) has in all its essentials been struck by the legislature and under which a court, before ordering a defendant to give up possession of accommodation where he has been living, is not obliged to adjudicate upon the specific merits of coercive action in an individual case. b
c

[91] Mr George QC, for the respondents, submitted that Simon Brown LJ had gone too far in stating that the judge on a s 187B application was not entitled to reach his own independent view on the planning merits of the case. He advanced the submission that, whilst it would be right for the judge to accord great deference to the decision of the local planning authority on matters of planning policy such as whether an area of land should be kept as an open space or should be used for the building of houses, the judge was not bound by its decision on every aspect of planning control. Thus, for example, if the local planning authority decided to enforce the removal of some unsightly structure because it spoilt the view of a number of houses, it would be open for the judge to differ from that decision if it were proved that no house had a view of the structure. d
e

[92] In stating that the judge should not come to a decision on the planning merit of the case I think that Simon Brown LJ was intending to give effect to the principle stated by Lord Hoffmann in Tesco Stores Ltd v Secretary of State for the Environment [1995] 2 All ER 636 at 657, [1995] 1 WLR 759 at 780 and was not considering the unusual type of case suggested by Mr George. In my opinion the judge is not precluded from deciding some factual issue, such as that instanced by counsel. But I think that such cases would be rare and I consider that a judge should be alert to ensure that he does not embark on the determination of an issue which would, in reality, involve him in the assessment of planning considerations which lie within the ambit of the functions of the local planning authority. f
g

[93] Accordingly for the reasons which I have given, and also for the reasons given by Lord Bingham and Lord Steyn, I would dismiss these appeals.

LORD SCOTT OF FOSCOE. h

[94] My Lords, the issue of importance raised by these three appeals relates to the function of the court and the criteria the court should apply when dealing with an application by a local planning authority, made under s 187B of the Town and County Planning Act 1990, for an injunction to restrain a breach of planning control. I have had the advantage of reading in advance the opinions of my noble and learned friends Lord Bingham of Cornhill, Lord Steyn, Lord Clyde and Lord Hutton and need not repeat what they have said about the facts of the three cases and about the background to and the reasons for the enactment of s 187B. j

[95] I respectfully agree that the jurisdiction exercised by the court on an application under s 187B is an original, as opposed to a supervisory, jurisdiction. The section did not, however, confer a new jurisdiction. It had been settled law

a for many years that the court had jurisdiction to grant a civil law remedy by way of injunction in order to enforce the public law, except in cases where statute had expressly or by necessary implication removed the jurisdiction. In A-G v Chaudry [1971] 3 All ER 938 at 947, [1971] 1 WLR 1614 at 1624 Lord Denning MR said:

b 'Whenever Parliament has enacted a law and given a particular remedy for the breach of it, such remedy being in an inferior court, nevertheless the High Court always has reserve power to enforce the law so enacted by way of an injunction or declaration or other suitable remedy. The High Court has jurisdiction to ensure obedience to the law whenever it is just and convenient so to do.'

c [96] The principle was confirmed by this House in Gouriet v Union of Post Office Workers [1977] 3 All ER 70, [1978] AC 435 but their Lordships emphasised that the jurisdiction was one 'of great delicacy and ... to be used with caution' ([1977] 3 All ER 70 at 83, [1978] AC 435 at 481 per Lord Wilberforce).

d [97] Absent some special statutory authorisation, an application for an injunction to enforce the public law has to be brought by the Attorney General. In A-G (on the relation of Hornchurch UDC) v Bastow [1957] 1 All ER 497 at 500, [1957] 1 QB 514 at 519 Devlin J described the Attorney General as 'the only authority who has a right to bring a civil suit on the infringement of public rights'. This principle, too, was confirmed by the House in Gouriet's case. However, s 222 of the Local Government Act 1972 empowered local authorities to institute civil actions in their own name where they considered it 'expedient for the promotion or protection of the interests of the inhabitants of their area ...'. Post 1972, therefore, an application by a local planning authority for an injunction to enforce the planning law could be made in an action brought by the local authority in its own name. Previously the action had to be a relator action brought in the name e and with the consent of the Attorney General. But the nature of the application f for an injunction was not changed by the advent of locus standi for the local authority to sue in its own name. Nor were the criteria to be applied by the court in deciding whether or not to grant the injunction altered. The criteria remained those expressed in s 37 of the Supreme Court Act 1981 (and its predecessor, s 45 of the Judicature Act 1925), which empowered the High Court to grant an g injunction: 'in all cases in which it appears to the court to be just and convenient to do so.'

[98] Section 187B, providing specifically in relation to planning controls an authority to bring proceedings that previously had been provided generally by s 222 of the 1972 Act, authorised a local planning authority to apply for an h injunction in support of planning law where the local planning authority 'consider it necessary or expedient for any actual or apprehended breach of planning control to be restrained by injunction' (sub-s (1)). The criteria of 'necessary or expedient' relate to the decision of the local authority to apply for the injunction. They take the place of criteria set out in s 222 of the 1972 Act. j They are not criteria which apply to the court's decision whether or not to grant the injunction. Section 187B(2) says that on an application under sub-s (1) the court 'may grant such an injunction as the court thinks appropriate for the purpose of restraining the breach'. This language does not, in my opinion, add to or subtract from the criteria expressed in s 37 of the 1981 Act. The grant of the injunction must be 'just and convenient'. If the grant of the injunction cannot satisfy this test it can hardly be thought 'appropriate' to grant it.

[99] The criteria that govern the grant by the court of the injunction make clear, in my opinion, that the court must take into account all or any circumstances of the case that bear upon the question whether the grant would be 'just and convenient'. Of particular importance, of course, will be whether or not the local planning authority can establish not only that there is a current or apprehended breach of planning control but also that the ordinary statutory means of enforcement are not likely to be effective in preventing the breach or bringing it to an end. In a case in which the statutory procedure of enforcement notice, prosecution for non-compliance and exercise by the authority of such statutory self-help remedies as are available had not been tried and where there was no sufficient reason to assume that, if tried, they would not succeed in dealing with the breach, the local planning authority would be unlikely to succeed in persuading the court that the grant of an injunction would be just and convenient.

[100] In deciding whether or not to grant an injunction under s 187B the court does not turn itself into a tribunal to review the merits of the planning decisions that the authority, or the Secretary of State, has taken. The purpose of the injunction would be to restrain the alleged breach of planning controls and the court could not in my opinion properly refuse an injunction simply on the ground that it disagreed with the planning decisions that had been taken. If the court thought that there was a real prospect that an appeal against an enforcement notice or a fresh application by the defendant for the requisite planning permission might succeed, the court could adjourn the injunction application until the planning situation had become clarified. But where the planning situation is clear and apparently final the court would, in my opinion, have no alternative but to consider the injunction application without regard to the merits of the planning decisions.

[101] It does not, however, follow that once the planning situation is clear and apparently final it is not open to the court to take into account the personal circumstances of the defendant and the hardship that may be caused if the planning controls are enforced by an injunction. Planning controls are imposed as a matter of public law. The local planning authority in seeking to enforce those controls is not enforcing any private rights of its own. If a local authority mortgagee is seeking an order for possession against the mortgagor, or a local authority landlord is seeking an order for possession against a tenant, or a local authority landowner is seeking an order to remove squatters or to restrain trespass, the local authority is seeking an order to enforce its private property rights. It is as well entitled to do so as is a private mortgagee, landlord or landowner. The function of the court in civil litigation of that character is, in my opinion, to give effect to the private rights that the local authority claimant is seeking to enforce. But an application for an injunction under s 187B, or any other application for an injunction in aid of the public law is different. As Lord Wilberforce said in Gouriet's case, the jurisdiction to grant such injunctions is one of great delicacy and to be used with caution.

[102] I respectfully agree with the criticism expressed by my noble and learned friend Lord Steyn of the two Court of Appeal authorities particularly relied on by the appellant planning authorities (see [2002] 1 All ER 425 at [55]–[57] of his opinion). The hardship likely to be caused to a defendant by the grant of an injunction to enforce the public law will always, in my opinion, be relevant to the court's decision whether or not to grant the injunction. In many, perhaps most, cases the hardship prayed in aid by the defendant will be of insufficient weight to a counter balance a continued and persistent disobedience to the law. There is a strong general public interest that planning controls should be observed and, if not observed, enforced. But each case must depend upon its own circumstances.

[103] The manner in which the Court of Appeal approached the issue, as evidenced by the judgment of Simon Brown LJ (at [38]–[42]), cited by my noble and learned friend Lord Bingham of Cornhill, was, in my respectful opinion, correct.

b [104] For these reasons, as well as those to be found in the opinions of my noble and learned friends with all of which I am in agreement, I too would dismiss these appeals and make the orders proposed by Lord Bingham.

Appeals dismissed.

Dilys Tausz Barrister.

R v Cooksley

R v Stride

R v Cook

Attorney General's Reference (No 152 of 2002)

[2003] EWCA Crim 996

COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION

LORD WOOLF CJ, GAGE AND MOSES JJ

31 MARCH, 3 APRIL 2003

Road traffic – Dangerous driving – Causing death by dangerous driving or by careless driving when under influence of drink or drugs – Sentence – Guidelines.

(1) An immediate custodial sentence will generally be necessary in respect of a person who has been convicted of causing death by dangerous driving. Aggravating factors include (a) consumption of drugs (including legal medication known to cause drowsiness) or alcohol; (b) excessive speed, racing, competitive driving or 'showing off'; (c) disregard of warnings from fellow passengers; (d) a prolonged, persistent, and deliberate course of very bad driving; (e) aggressive driving, e.g. driving much too close to the vehicle in front, persistent inappropriate attempts to overtake or cutting in after overtaking; (f) driving while unavoidably distracted, e.g. by reading or by use of a mobile telephone (especially if hand-held); (g) driving when knowingly suffering from a medical condition that significantly impairs driving skills; (h) driving when knowingly deprived of adequate sleep or rest; (i) driving a poorly maintained or dangerously loaded vehicle, especially where that has been motivated by commercial concerns; (j) other offences committed at the same time, e.g. driving without ever holding a licence, driving while disqualified, driving without insurance, driving while a learner without supervision, taking a vehicle without consent, driving a stolen vehicle; (k) previous convictions for motoring offences, particularly offences involving bad driving or the consumption of excessive alcohol before driving; (l) more than one person killed as a result of the offence, especially if the offender knowingly puts more than one person at risk or the occurrence of multiple death is foreseeable; (m) serious injury to one or more victims in addition to any death(s); (n) behaviour at the time of the offence, e.g. failing to stop, falsely claiming that one of the victims was responsible for the crash or trying to throw the victim off the bonnet by swerving in order to escape; (o) causing death in the course of dangerous driving in an attempt to avoid detection or apprehension; and (p) committing the offence while on bail (see [15], [21], below).

(2) Mitigating factors include (a) a good driving record; (b) the absence of previous convictions; (c) a timely plea of guilty; (d) genuine shock or remorse (which may be greater if the victim is either a close relation or a friend); (e) the offender's age (but only in cases where lack of driving experience has contributed to the commission of the offence); and (f) the fact that the offender has also been seriously injured as a result of the offence, but only very serious, or life-changing, injury should have a significant effect on the sentence (see [15], [20], below).

a (3) In cases where there are no aggravating circumstances, the starting point for adult offenders, even when there is a plea of guilty, is a custodial sentence of perhaps 12 to 18 months, a custodial sentence only being avoidable if there are exceptional mitigating features. A starting point of two to three years is appropriate for an offence involving a momentary dangerous error of judgment or a short period of bad driving but which has been aggravated by an habitually unacceptable standard of driving on the part of the offender (aggravating factors (j) or (k)), by the death of more than one victim or serious injury to other victims (aggravating factors (l) and (m)) or by the offender's irresponsible behaviour at the time of the offence (aggravating factors (n) to (p)). It is possible to foresee circumstances, particularly where more than one of those aggravating factors are present, where five years may be appropriate. When the standard of the offender's driving is more highly dangerous (as indicated, for example, by the presence of one or two of aggravating factors (a) to (i)), a sentence of four to five years is the starting point in a contested case. For contested cases involving an extremely high level of culpability on the offender's part, the starting point is six years (see [21]–[23], [25], [26], [28], [29], below).

d (4) For sentencing purposes, cases of causing death by careless driving when under the influence of drink or drugs do not form a separate category to cases of causing death by dangerous driving. It will be perfectly possible for sentencing judges to fit such cases into one of the guideline categories set out above (see [34], below).

e (5) Matters relevant to fixing the length of the driving disqualification for the offence of causing death by dangerous driving will be much the same as the factors already listed. Bans of two years or so will be appropriate where the offender has a good driving record and the offence results from a momentary error of judgment. Longer bans of between three and five years are appropriate where, having regard to the circumstances of the offence and the offender's record, it is clear that the offender tends to disregard the rules of the road or drives carelessly or inappropriately. Bans of between five and ten years may be used where the offence itself, and the offender's record, show that he represents a real and continuing danger to other road users. Disqualification for life is a highly exceptional course, but may be appropriate in a case where the danger represented by the offender is an extreme and indefinite one (see [40]–[42], below).

g Notes

For causing death by dangerous driving or by careless driving when under the influence of drink or drugs, see 40(2) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) paras 673, 682.

h Cases referred to in judgment

A-G's Ref (No 26 of 1999) [2000] 1 Cr App R (S) 394, CA.

A-G's Ref (No 56 of 2002) [2002] EWCA Crim 2292, [2003] 1 Cr App R (S) 476.

A-G's Ref (No 58 of 2000) [2001] 2 Cr App R (S) 102, CA.

j R v Boswell [1984] 3 All ER 353, [1984] 1 WLR 1047, CA.

R v Braid [2002] EWCA Crim 737, [2002] 2 Cr App R (S) 509.

R v Brown [2001] EWCA Crim 2108, [2002] 1 Cr App R (S) 504.

R v Browning [2001] EWCA Crim 1831, [2002] 1 Cr App R (S) 377.

R v Corkhill [2001] EWCA Crim 2683, [2002] 2 Cr App R (S) 60.

R v France [2002] EWCA Crim 1419, [2003] 1 Cr App R (S) 108.

R v Jenkins [2001] EWCA Crim 242, [2001] 2 Cr App R (S) 265.

R v Locke (1995) 16 Cr App R (S) 795, CA.

R v Mallone [1996] 1 Cr App R (S) 221, CA.

R v Newton (1982) 77 Cr App R 13, CA.

R v Noble [2002] EWCA Crim 1713, [2003] 1 Cr App R (S) 312.

R v Pettipher (1989) 11 Cr App R (S) 321, CA.

R v Pimm [1994] RTR 391, DC.

R v Roche [1999] 2 Cr App R (S) 105, CA.

R v Shepherd, R v Wernet [1994] 2 All ER 242, [1994] 1 WLR 530, CA.

Appeals against sentence and application for leave to refer sentence

R v Cooksley

Robert Charles Cooksley appealed against the sentence of four years' imprisonment and six years' disqualification from driving imposed on him by Judge David Wynn Morgan in the Crown Court at Cardiff on 10 September 2002 for an offence of causing death by careless driving when under the influence of drink. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

R v Stride

Ian Paul Stride appealed against the sentence of two-and-a-half years' imprisonment and five years' disqualification from driving imposed on him by Judge Balston in the Crown Court at Maidstone on 13 September 2002 for an offence of causing death by dangerous driving. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

R v Cook

Neil Terence John Cook appealed against the sentence of seven years' detention imposed on him by the Recorder of Liverpool (Judge David Clarke QC) in the Crown Court at Liverpool on 27 September 2002 for two offences of causing death by dangerous driving. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

Attorney General's Reference (No 152 of 2002)

The Attorney General applied under s 36 of the Criminal Justice Act 1988 for leave to refer to the Court of Appeal as unduly lenient the sentence of 12 months' imprisonment suspended for two years and disqualification from driving for four years imposed on the respondent, Richard James Crump, by Judge Sessions in the Crown Court at Chichester on 29 November 2002 for an offence of causing death by dangerous driving. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

Hilary Roberts (assigned by the Registrar of Criminal Appeals) for Cooksley.

Stephen Morley (instructed by Pattinson & Brewer, Maidstone) for Stride.

Gerald Baxter (assigned by the Registrar of Criminal Appeals) for Cook.

Nicholas Hilliard (instructed by the Treasury Solicitor) for the Attorney General.

Geoffrey Mercer QC (instructed by Bennett Griffin, Worthing) for Crump.

3 April 2003. The following judgment of the court was delivered.

LORD WOOLF CJ.

[1] This judgment relates to three appeals against sentence and one Attorney General's reference. The appeals and the reference have been listed together to enable us to decide whether we should issue fresh guidelines as to sentencing for the offence of causing death by dangerous driving and careless driving when under the influence of drink or drugs in view of the advice of the Sentencing Advisory Panel (the panel) of February 2003 (the advice) which recommended that there should be new guidelines. In his foreword, the chairman of the panel, Professor Martin Wasik, pointed out:

'This offence causes particular difficulty for sentencers. By definition, it is one which always gives rise to extremely serious harm: the death of at least one victim (and in some cases serious injury to others). Understandably this often leads to calls from victims' families, and from the wider community, for tough sentencing. On the other hand, an offender sentenced for causing death by dangerous driving did not intend to cause death or serious injury, even in the extreme case where he or she deliberately drove for a prolonged period with no regard for the safety of others. The Panel believes that new guidelines will help sentencers to strike an appropriate balance between the level of culpability of the offender and the magnitude of the harm resulting from the offence. The Panel drew up its initial proposals on the basis that the outcome of an offence, including the number of people killed, was relevant to the sentence, but that the primary consideration must always be the culpability of the offender. That was supported by the majority of respondents to our consultation paper, and it remains our view. Two of the detailed points in the Panel's advice deserve particular mention. One is the significance of multiple deaths. Although the number of people killed is often a matter of chance, there are (as some of our consultees pointed out to us) cases where the offender has knowingly put more than one person at risk, or where the occurrence of multiple deaths was reasonably foreseeable. In such cases, we recommend that the occurrence of more than one death should be treated as a more seriously aggravating factor. The second point is the inclusion of "driving when knowingly deprived of adequate sleep or rest" in the list of factors that would aggravate the seriousness of an offence. Under previous sentencing guidelines, "briefly dozing at the wheel" was seen as an example of a "momentary dangerous error of judgment", indicating a less serious offence. The Panel's view (again supported by consultees) is that falling asleep is more likely to aggravate than mitigate the seriousness of an offence, because drivers do not normally fall asleep without warning, and the proper course of action for a motorist who feels drowsy is to stop driving and rest.'

[2] Mr Nicholas Hilliard appears on behalf of the Attorney General on the reference. In addition, he has assisted the court by making submissions on the advice of the panel. He has referred to paras 1.1–1.3 of the Department of Transport's paper Tomorrow's roads: safer for everyone. The Government's road safety strategy and casualty reduction targets for 2010 (1 March 2000). Those paragraphs provide:

'1.1 Road accidents cause immense human suffering. Every year, around 3,500 people are killed on Britain's roads and 40,000 are seriously injured. In total, there are over 300,000 road casualties, in nearly 240,000 accidents, and about fifteen times that number of non-injury incidents. This represents a serious economic burden; the direct cost of road accidents involving deaths or injuries is thought to be in the region of £3 billion a year.

1.2 Nevertheless, Britain has had—relatively speaking—remarkable success in reducing road casualties. And this is despite the vast growth in traffic since the beginning of the last century. In 1930 there were only 2.3 million motor vehicles in Great Britain, but over 7,000 people were killed in road accidents. Today, there are over 27 million vehicles on our roads but far fewer road deaths.

1.3 In 1987 a target was set to reduce road casualties by one-third by 2000 compared with the average for 1981–85. We have more than achieved this target for reducing deaths and serious injuries. Road deaths have fallen by 39% and serious injuries by 45% and we are now one of the safest countries in Europe and indeed the world. However, there has not been any such steep decline in the number of accidents, nor in the number of slight injuries, although improvements in vehicle design have helped to reduce the severity of injuries to car occupants.'

[3] He drew our attention to para 12 of the advice, which indicates that driving offences causing death are among those most frequently referred by the Attorney General to this court because he considers that the sentence at trial was unduly lenient. The Attorney General is in favour of fresh guidelines being issued. We have come to the conclusion that the following guidelines should be issued. They are based upon the advice, the terms of which in general we accept. The new guidelines shall come into force forthwith and should be applied by courts when passing sentence from the date of this judgment.

[4] The advice refers to the possibility of the maximum sentence being increased for causing death by dangerous driving by Parliament. This guidance is given on the basis of the existing maximum penalty which is ten years' imprisonment. In addition, disqualification for a minimum period of two years and endorsement of the offender's licence are obligatory and the offence carries 3–11 penalty points. The offender must also be required to pass an extended driving test before his licence can be restored.

[5] The offence of causing 'the death of another person by driving a mechanically propelled vehicle dangerously on a road or other public place' was created by s 1 of the Road Traffic Act 1988, as substituted by s 1 of the Road Traffic Act 1991. The maximum penalty for this offence was originally five years' imprisonment but this was increased to the present maximum of ten years by the Criminal Justice Act 1993.

[6] The significant distinction between the former offence of causing death by reckless driving and reckless driving is that the new offences do not require evidence of the offender's state of mind as the test is now objective. When a person is to be regarded as driving dangerously for the purposes of both offences is now contained in s 2A of the 1988 Act (inserted into that Act by the 1991 Act). That section provides that a person is to be regarded as driving dangerously if:

'(1) ... (a) the way he drives falls far below what would be expected of a competent and careful driver, and (b) it would be obvious to a competent a and careful driver that driving in that way would be dangerous.’

(My emphasis.)

A person is also to be regarded as driving dangerously if ‘it would be obvious to a competent and careful driver that driving the vehicle in its current state would be dangerous’ (see s 2A(2)).

b [7] Section 2A(3) further provides that in determining what would be expected of and obvious to a competent and careful driver regard must be had not only to the circumstances of which he could be expected to be aware, but also to any circumstances shown to have been within the knowledge of the accused. This last provision does introduce a subjective element into the offence of driving a vehicle in a dangerous state but this does not materially alter the objective nature of the offence as a whole.

c [8] Dangerous driving has to be distinguished from careless and inconsiderate driving (see s 3 of the 1988 Act) and causing death by careless driving when under the influence of drink or drugs (see s 3A of the 1988 Act). The former offence is a summary offence for which the offender is not subject to imprisonment and has a maximum penalty of a level 4 fine (currently £2,500). Disqualification is discretionary and the offence carries 3–9 penalty points. The latter offence is indictable only and subject to the same maximum penalty of ten years’ imprisonment.

d [9] There is still the offence of motor manslaughter in relation to which a sentence of life imprisonment can be imposed. It is also an offence to which s 2 of the Crime (Sentences) Act 1997 applies so that in the absence of exceptional circumstances relating either to the offender or to his offences a mandatory sentence of imprisonment for life must be imposed if the offender has a previous conviction for a ‘serious offence’.

e [10] Where death is not a consequence of the dangerous driving, then the maximum penalty is two years’ imprisonment. As that offence can still result in catastrophic injuries being caused by an accident we agree with the advice that—

f ‘Under the present structure there is an unduly large gap between the maximum of two years for dangerous driving ... and 10 years for an offence in which the same standard of driving has, by chance, resulted in death.’

g Like the panel, we therefore welcome the proposed five-year maximum for the basic offence of dangerous driving. We do not see the same need to increase the maximum of ten years’ imprisonment for death by dangerous driving, particularly as the offence of motor manslaughter still remains. That offence being reserved for situations where on the facts there was a very high risk of the driving resulting in death (see R v Pimm [1994] RTR 391).

h [11] Before referring to the guidelines, we would make the following points about sentencing for death by dangerous driving. (i) Although the offence is one which does not require an intention to drive dangerously or an intention to injure, because before an offender can be convicted of dangerous driving, his driving has to fall ‘far below’ the standard of driving that would be expected of a competent and careful driver and the driving must be such that it would be obvious to the same competent and careful driver that driving in that way would be dangerous, it will usually be obvious to the offender that the driving was dangerous and he therefore deserves to be punished accordingly. (ii) In view of the much heavier sentence which can be imposed where death results as compared with those cases where death does not result, it is clear that Parliament regarded the consequences of the dangerous driving as being a relevant sentencing consideration so that if death does result this in itself can justify a heavier sentence than could be imposed for a case where death does not result.

(iii) Where death does result, often the effects of the offence will cause grave distress to the family of the deceased. The impact on the family is a matter that the courts can and should take into account. However, as was pointed out by Lord Taylor of Gosforth CJ in R v Shepherd, R v Wernet [1994] 2 All ER 242 at 245, [1994] 1 WLR 530 at 536:

‘... we wish to stress that human life cannot be restored, nor can its loss be measured by the length of a prison sentence. We recognise that no term of months or years imposed on the offender can reconcile the family of a deceased victim to their loss, nor will it cure their anguish.’

(iv) A factor that courts should bear in mind in determining the sentence which is appropriate is the fact that it is important for the courts to drive home the message as to the dangers that can result from dangerous driving on the road. It has to be appreciated by drivers the gravity of the consequences which can flow from their not maintaining proper standards of driving. Motor vehicles can be lethal if they are not driven properly and this being so, drivers must know that if as a result of their driving dangerously a person is killed, no matter what the mitigating circumstances, normally only a custodial sentence will be imposed. This is because of the need to deter other drivers from driving in a dangerous manner and because of the gravity of the offence.

[12] Prior to the increase in the maximum period of imprisonment to ten years and when the offence was still causing death by reckless driving this court gave a guideline judgment in R v Boswell [1984] 3 All ER 353, [1984] 1 WLR 1047. The legislative changes since that time have meant the guidance in that case is out of date. However, in the case of R v Shepherd to which reference has already been made the court indicated that the list of aggravating and mitigating circumstances set out in R v Boswell were still relevant, but that where a driver had driven with selfish disregard for the safety of other road users or of his passengers or with a degree of recklessness, instead of the appropriate sentence being two years or more, sentences of upwards of five years would be appropriate. As is pointed out by the advice, the import of that decision is that bad cases should be dealt with at least twice as severely as before but without necessarily affecting sentencing in cases which previously attracted shorter custodial terms or making custodial sentences more likely in those cases where custody would not previously have been considered necessary. In practice, however, it is clear that there has been an upward trend across the range of cases, and, in particular that non-custodial sentences are rarely used.

ASSESSING THE SERIOUSNESS OF AN OFFENCE

[13] In the advice the panel expresses their view in these terms:

‘13. The key problem for a sentencer dealing with this offence is the tension between the outcome of the offence (which is inevitably the death of at least one victim) and the degree of the offender’s culpability. The Panel’s provisional view, that the offender’s culpability should be the dominant component in the sentencing exercise but that the outcome of the offence should have some effect, was strongly endorsed by the majority of respondents to the consultation paper. The Panel understands the view of a the minority, that causing death is invariably a very serious crime, but reaffirms its initial view that culpability must be the dominant factor when the offence involves no intention to kill or injure.'

b [14] As we have made clear, in accord with the view of the minority referred to in the advice, we accept that causing death is invariably a very serious crime. None the less, we do not dissent from the panel's view that culpability must be the dominant factor when assessing as precisely as possible just where in the level of serious crimes the particular offence comes.

c [15] The panel sets out a series of aggravating and mitigating factors. These are more extensive than those that were set out in R v Boswell. We adopt them but stress that they should not be regarded as an exhaustive statement of the factors. In addition it is important to appreciate that the significance of the factors can differ. There can be cases with three or more aggravating factors, which are not as serious as a case providing a bad example of one factor. They are as follows.

d Aggravating factors

'14. ... Highly culpable standard of driving at time of offence

(a) the consumption of drugs (including legal medication known to cause drowsiness) or of alcohol, ranging from a couple of drinks to a "motorised pub crawl"

e (b) greatly excessive speed; racing; competitive driving against another vehicle; "showing off"

(c) disregard of warnings from fellow passengers

(d) a prolonged, persistent and deliberate course of very bad driving

f (e) aggressive driving (such as driving much too close to the vehicle in front, persistent inappropriate attempts to overtake, or cutting in after overtaking)

(f) driving while the driver's attention is avoidably distracted, e.g. by reading or by use of a mobile phone (especially if hand-held)

g (g) driving when knowingly suffering from a medical condition which significantly impairs the offender's driving skills

(h) driving when knowingly deprived of adequate sleep or rest

(i) driving a poorly maintained or dangerously loaded vehicle, especially where this has been motivated by commercial concerns

Driving habitually below acceptable standard

h (j) other offences committed at the same time, such as driving without ever having held a licence; driving while disqualified; driving without insurance; driving while a learner without supervision; taking a vehicle without consent; driving a stolen vehicle

j (k) previous convictions for motoring offences, particularly offences which involve bad driving or the consumption of excessive alcohol before driving

Outcome of offence

(l) more than one person killed as a result of the offence (especially if the offender knowingly put more than one person at risk or the occurrence of multiple deaths was foreseeable)

(m) serious injury to one or more victims, in addition to the death(s)

Irresponsible behaviour at time of offence

(n) behaviour at the time of the offence, such as failing to stop, falsely claiming that one of the victims was responsible for the crash, or trying to throw the victim off the bonnet of the car by swerving in order to escape

(o) causing death in the course of dangerous driving in an attempt to avoid detection or apprehension

(p) offence committed while the offender was on bail.'

Mitigating factors

'22. ... (a) a good driving record;

(b) the absence of previous convictions;

(c) a timely plea of guilty;

(d) genuine shock or remorse (which may be greater if the victim is either a close relation or a friend);

(e) the offender's age (but only in cases where lack of driving experience has contributed to the commission of the offence), and

(f) the fact that the offender has also been seriously injured as a result of the accident caused by the dangerous driving.'

[16] Having referred to the aggravating factors, the panel deals with specific situations which have been considered in recent authorities. One such situation is what the panel describes as 'avoidable distractions'. The example given, supported by the case of R v Browning [2001] EWCA Crim 1831, [2002] 1 Cr App R (S) 377 is the use of mobile phones when driving. In R v Browning the defendant was a lorry driver who veered off the road and killed a man in a lay-by while sending a text message. This court upheld the custodial sentence of five years. In giving the judgment of the court Mance LJ made a statement which we would endorse. He said (at [27]):

'The use of a mobile phone to read and to compose text messages while driving is a highly perilous activity. Even the use of a handheld mobile phone by a driver whilst moving, a much too common feature of driving today, is self-evidently risky. But the risks of reading and composing text messages appear to us of a wholly different order and to be, to use the judge's word, of the most "blatant" nature.'

We would respectfully endorse those words. In that case Browning had pleaded guilty but there had to be a Newton hearing (see R v Newton (1982) 77 Cr App R 13). Browning's evidence was not accepted so he was not entitled to full credit for his plea. The sentence of five years for an offender of good character and who was remorseful was upheld. R v Browning provides a useful example of what we would regard as being the current appropriate level of sentencing.

[17] Explaining their inclusion as an aggravating factor at (h), driving when knowingly deprived of sleep or rest, the panel was right to draw attention to the observations of this court in A-G's Ref (No 26 of 1999) [2000] 1 Cr App R (S) 394. There it was said that falling asleep at the wheel usually involves a period during which a driver is conscious of drowsiness and difficulty in keeping his or her eyes open and the fact that the proper course for a driver in such a position to adopt is to stop driving and rest.

Multiple deaths

a [18] The panel then discusses the authorities in respect of multiple deaths and in particular the case of R v Pettipher (1989) 11 Cr App R (S) 321 and R v France [2002] EWCA Crim 1419, [2003] 1 Cr App R (S) 108. We agree with the conclusion of the panel that the number of deaths resulting from dangerous driving is relevant to the length of sentence. There are cases in which the defendant, if, for example, he is a coach driver who drives after being deprived of sleep or under the influence of alcohol, must be taken to appreciate that the consequence could be that there will be more than one death if he is involved in an accident. Certainly in that situation, multiple deaths will be a more seriously aggravating feature.

c [19] Even where there is no reason to suggest that the defendant is knowingly putting more than one person at risk, the fact that the consequences of dangerous driving are particularly serious, for example, involving multiple deaths is a relevant factor as to the length of sentence. That is the view that will be taken by the public. However, we are certainly not suggesting that the sentence should be multiplied according to the number of persons who sadly lose their life. It is still necessary to regard the offender's culpability in relation to the driving as the dominant component in the sentencing exercise. While the sentence is increased to reflect more than one death the sentence must remain proportionate to the nature of an offence which does not involve any intent to injure.

The offender's own injuries

e [20] The advice relies on the case of R v Mallone [1996] 1 Cr App R (S) 221 for suggesting that a sentence can be reduced because of the extent of the offender's own injuries if the injuries are serious. We agree this is a relevant consideration. The injuries can make the sentence of imprisonment a greater punishment than usual. His injuries are also in themselves a punishment and should bring home to the offender, in the most direct possible way, what can be the consequences of dangerous driving. We however, also agree with the panel that the fact that the offender has been injured should not automatically be treated as a mitigating factor and that only 'very serious, or life changing, injury' should have a significant effect on the sentence. Some indication of the scale of the effect is provided by the facts of R v Mallone. The offender had a very severe head injury, severe facial injuries, he lost the sight of his right eye and his right little finger, and there was continuing loss of use of his right arm and leg. On appeal this court reduced the sentence from five to four years but in doing so were taking into account, not only the injuries, but the fact that the trial judge had erroneously sentenced the appellant on the basis he had consumed an excessive amount of alcohol.

LENGTH OF SENTENCE

No aggravating circumstances

j [21] As in the case of sentencing for any offence a sentence of imprisonment should only be imposed if necessary and then for no longer than necessary. In these cases an immediate custodial sentence will generally be necessary. The starting point for causing death by dangerous driving should be a short custodial sentence of perhaps 12 to 18 months. That is the approach that should be adopted even when there is a plea of guilty, though the plea of guilty will justify the appropriate reduction in the length of sentence. This is in relation to an adult offender. We regard as an example of this approach the case of R v Brown [2001] EWCA Crim 2108, [2002] 1 Cr App R (S) 504. In R v Brown the defendant momentarily fell asleep while driving his van in daylight, drifted across the road and collided head-on with a car travelling in the opposite direction, killing a passenger in it. The mitigating factors were a guilty plea, previous good character with an impeccable driving record and the fact that the offender displayed genuine shock and remorse. In addition, the effect on the appellant's life and family was devastating. This court reduced the sentence to nine months' imprisonment. a [22] R v Brown makes it clear that in order to avoid a custodial sentence there have to be exceptional mitigating features. As exceptional features, the panel refer to the case of R v Jenkins [2001] EWCA Crim 242, [2001] 2 Cr App R (S) 265. In that case the defendant was 16 years old with learning difficulties who lost control of a motorcycle because of its dangerous condition and his pillion passenger, who was his best friend, was killed. He pleaded guilty because it would have been obvious to a competent and careful driver that the condition of his vehicle was dangerous. He was sentenced to detention and a training order for 12 months but the Court of Appeal, while agreeing that the custodial sentence was warranted, 'as a justifiable statement of society's abhorrence to dangerous driving and the use of dangerous vehicles on a public road', took into account that the defendant was not competent to maintain the bike and the fact that his mental condition prevented him from fully appreciating its dangerous condition. In the circumstances, there having been delay in the case coming to trial, a two-year supervision order was substituted. There obviously can be other exceptional situations and we consider it preferable not to try and anticipate what those situations will be. It is sufficient to emphasise that they have to be exceptional. b

Intermediate culpability

[23] As against that case, the panel states and we would agree, that: c

'30. An offence involving a momentary dangerous error of judgment or a short period of bad driving may be aggravated by a habitually unacceptable standard of driving on the part of the offender (factors (j) or (k) in paragraph 14 above), by the death of more than one victim or serious injury to other victims (factors (l) and (m) in paragraph 14) or by the offender's irresponsible behaviour at the time of the offence (factors (n) to (p) in paragraph 14). The presence of one or more of these features could indicate a sentence within the higher range, up to three years.' d

Accordingly, our starting point is two to three years. We do, however, qualify the panel's advice to this extent that we foresee circumstances, particularly where there is more than one of the factors present referred to above, where five years could be appropriate if, for example, there is more than one victim. Unfortunately, because of the range of the variety of facts it is not possible to provide more precise guidelines. e a by serious injury to another victim in addition to the death of the deceased. The offender pleaded guilty. He was 20 years of age and of good character. The sentencing judge noted he had driven very badly over a short distance. This court endorsed the view of the sentencing judge that personal circumstances did not weigh heavily in the balance in these cases. The public were entitled to require the courts to reflect the loss of life and to demonstrate that dangerous driving was a serious social evil, which if death results would lead to a substantial custodial sentence. The appellant should have appreciated that he was approaching a blind corner and that he could not see far enough to ensure that he could pass the articulated lorry safely. In reducing the sentence to 18 months' detention in a young offenders institution, the court was, as it said, reflecting the many mitigating features. However, it also said that the case did not display any of the aggravating features. This would not be true in relation to the present guidelines and if the guidelines had been in force, we would not have expected the court to interfere with the period of two years' detention imposed by the trial judge.

[24] The panel refer to the case of R v Braid [2002] EWCA Crim 737, [2002] 2 Cr App R (S) 509. In R v Braid the offender during daylight and in good conditions overtook a lorry while approaching a blind bend and collided head-on with an approaching car. A passenger in the car was killed and in addition the driver of the other vehicle suffered injuries which would permanently affect his mobility. This is therefore a case where factor (m) applied and culpability was aggravated f

d Higher culpability

[25] In relation to offences of higher culpability the panel states:

e '32. When the standard of the offender's driving is more highly dangerous (as would be indicated, for example, by the presence of one or two of factors (a) to (i) in the list at paragraph 14 above), the Panel suggests that the appropriate starting point would be a custodial sentence within the range from two to five years. The exact level of sentence would be determined by the dangerousness of the driving and by the presence or absence of other aggravating or mitigating factors.'

f [26] As a starting point we consider a bracket of two to five years is too wide. We suggest that sentencers should take as a starting point four to five years in relation to a contested case of this type. There will be cases which will involve higher sentences than five years because they are bad examples and cases, particularly where there is a plea, where the sentence will be less than four years where there are significant mitigating factors.

g [27] The approach that we have just indicated is consistent with the approach of this court in A-G's Ref (No 58 of 2000) [2001] 2 Cr App R (S) 102; a sustained course of dangerous driving at excessive speeds, 50 mph in a 30 mph area, was involved in that case. The offender had also consumed alcohol, although it was unclear whether this contributed to the offence. While driving on the wrong side of the road the offender collided head-on with a motorcyclist who was killed. In addition h a seven-year-old pillion passenger suffered leg injuries. The offender was an unqualified driver and he had left the scene of the crash immediately although he gave himself up to the police on the following day. On a guilty plea, this court increased the sentence to three-and-a-half years. That sentence included an allowance for double jeopardy, but for that allowance the sentence would not have j been less than four years.

Most serious culpability

[28] Here, what this panel state is as follows:

'34. The Panel suggests that custodial sentences over five years should be reserved for cases involving an extremely high level of culpability on the offender's part. This might be indicated by the presence of three or more of aggravating factors (a) to (i), although an exceptionally bad example of a single aggravating feature could be sufficient to place an offence in this category. A sentence close to the maximum would be appropriate in a case displaying a large number of these features, or where there were other aggravating factors.'

[29] The panel do not give a starting point. We feel it would be helpful if we suggest again in a contested case a starting point of six years otherwise we endorse what the panel states.

[30] The panel gave as an example the case of R v Corkhill [2001] EWCA Crim 2683, [2002] 2 Cr App R (S) 60 where an offender was sentenced to seven years' detention. The Court of Appeal agreed this was a bad case but described it as 'not among the very worse' and reduced the sentence to five years. Bearing in mind that Corkhill was 19 years old and pleaded guilty, we see it as consistent with our starting point.

[31] As an example of the most serious case justifying a total custodial sentence of the maximum of ten years we refer, as did the panel, to R v Noble [2002] EWCA Crim 1713, [2003] 1 Cr App R (S) 312. The Court of Appeal made it clear in that case, that the maximum sentence was justified not simply by the number of deaths but by the range of other aggravating factors, including driving at an excessive speed while about two-and-a-half times over the alcohol limit and then seeking to avoid responsibility by claiming one of the victims had been driving.

STARTING POINTS

(A) Death by dangerous driving

[32] We have set out four starting points; no aggravating circumstances—12 to 18 months; intermediate culpability—two to three years; higher culpability—four or five years and most serious culpability—six years or over. We make clear that starting points only indicate where a person sentencing should start from when seeking to determine what should be the appropriate sentence. There is, however, a danger in relation to the higher starting points of the sentencer, if he is not careful, double accounting. The sentencer must be careful not to use the same aggravating factors to place the sentence in a higher category and then add to it because of the very same aggravating features.

[33] In making our recommendations as to starting points, we have made the allowance we consider appropriate for the fact that those who commit offences of dangerous driving which result in death are less likely, having served their sentence, to commit the same offence again. Apart from their involvement in the offence which resulted in death, they can be individuals who would not otherwise dream of committing a crime. They, unlike those who commit crimes of violence, also do not intend to harm their victims.

(B) Careless driving under the influence of drink

[34] We have not, so far, mentioned the level of sentencing in cases of causing death by careless driving when under the influence of drink. The panel have not advised that such cases should form a separate category. We agree. The driving may not exhibit the aggravating factors set out in (a) to (i) of para 14 of the panel's advice. In some cases, the only aggravating factor will be the amount of alcohol consumed. In other cases, there may be the aggravating factor of disregarding a

- a warning from a fellow passenger or knowingly driving a poorly maintained vehicle. There may be previous motoring convictions. There will also be cases where the driving is itself of significance in determining the appropriate sentence. As was made clear in R v Locke (1995) 16 Cr App R (S) 795, it is not necessary to have an additional count of death by dangerous driving before the full culpability of the offender's driving is taken into account in determining the right sentence.
- b It will be perfectly possible for sentencing judges to fit cases of causing death by careless driving when under the influence of drink into one of the four guideline categories which we propose.

THE VIEWS OF THE VICTIMS' FAMILIES

- c [35] Here, the panel refer to the practice statement of 16 October 2001 (see Practice Direction (criminal proceedings: victim personal statements) [2001] 4 All ER 640, [2001] 1 WLR 2038). The panel also refers to the case of R v Roche [1999] 2 Cr App R (S) 105 where the court accepted that they could as an act of mercy reduce a sentence if relatives of a victim indicated that the punishment imposed on the offender was aggravating their distress. The panel also refers to the fact
- d that in that case Lord Bingham of Cornhill CJ said (at 109): '... the court is not swayed by demands for vengeance and has to be very cautious in paying attention to pleas for mercy.'

- e [36] The last case to which we should refer because it was helpfully drawn to our attention by Mr Hilliard, on behalf of the Attorney General, is A-G's Ref (No 56 of 2002) [2002] EWCA Crim 2292, [2003] 1 Cr App R (S) 476. In that case the offender who was aged 37 pleaded guilty to two counts of causing death by careless driving when over the prescribed limit. He was sentenced to two years' imprisonment on each count concurrently as well as being disqualified for three years.

- f [37] In that case a family had been driving in another vehicle at about 2.30 am in the morning on the M1 motorway. Although how the accident occurred was not precisely established, it seems that the likely cause was the fact that the offender had fallen asleep and this caused his vehicle to collide with another vehicle travelling in the same direction and that vehicle then spun off the motorway killing the front seat passenger and the rear offside passenger and
- g the rear nearside passenger. They were all members of the same family. The offender had been drinking and his blood alcohol concentration would have been, at the time of the accident, somewhere in the region of 105 mg of alcohol in 100 ml of blood. The number of persons injured and the fact that the offender had been drinking were relied upon by the Attorney General as aggravating features but there were mitigating features, namely the offender had pleaded
- h guilty and shown genuine remorse, he was a man of good character, 37 years of age in responsible employment. The fact that the case was a result of a momentary inattention and not a prolonged course of bad driving was also relied upon.

- j [38] In giving the judgment of the court Kay LJ pointed out (at [24]) that—

'sentences that would have been deemed appropriate 10 years ago now would not begin to be considered to be right. Sentences have been very substantially increased.'

Kay LJ added (at [25]):

'This was a case in which there was no prolonged course of bad driving over and above that which is inevitably present in a case of this kind, namely, that any driving with excess alcohol is serious bad driving. If you drive with excess alcohol late at night, one of the possibilities is that it will increase the chances that you will fall asleep at the wheel. Those who fall asleep at the wheel, whether from excess alcohol or otherwise, represent an enormous danger to other road users. Accordingly, it is incumbent upon all to ensure that they do not place themselves in a position where that is likely to happen.'

[39] He also referred (at [26]) to the fact that—

'falling asleep is not generally something that happens in a moment. It is normally the end product of a process of feeling tired and people do have the opportunity to stop and avoid an accident when they start to feel that they are falling asleep.'

The court did not therefore regard the case as one of momentary inattention. However, it was not the worst driving. In addition the blood alcohol level was not particularly high. However, the court went on to say, where more than one death is caused and where permanent serious injuries added to the factor of the number of deaths, those are matters that must be given some weight in the sentencing process. The fact that there were the deaths and one very serious injury was not in any way the result the driver intended and therefore the degree to which there is an increase in sentence for such factors is not generally thought to be very marked. None the less the authorities clearly establish that it is an important factor that has to be borne in mind. The court therefore took the view that a sentence in the brackets of four to five years should be imposed in a case of that sort. We respectfully agree.

DISQUALIFICATION

[40] As we have already indicated disqualification is mandatory for a minimum period of two years. The main purpose of disqualification is as the panel advised, 'forward looking and preventative rather than backward looking and punitive'. It is designed to protect road users in the future from an offender who had shown himself to be a real risk on the roads. We do, however, accept that for the offender being disqualified is a real punishment. The panel suggests the risk represented by the offender is reflected in the level of culpability which attaches to his driving so that matters relevant to fixing the length of the driving disqualification for the offence of causing death by dangerous driving will be much the same as those factors we have listed already. We agree with this suggestion.

[41] We accept the advice of the panel as to the length of bans. We do so notwithstanding the fact that the panel adopts three bans of seriousness whereas in respect of imprisonment we have adopted four categories. We consider the advice in relation to disqualification is sufficiently precise.

[42] The advice was in the following terms:

'42. While those convicted of causing death by dangerous driving are likely to regard disqualification as an onerous part of the punishment for the offence, the main purpose of disqualification is forward-looking and preventative, rather than backward-looking and punitive. A driving ban is designed to protect road users in the future from an offender who, through his conduct on a this occasion, and perhaps other occasions, has shown himself to be a real risk on the roads. In general, the Panel suggests, the risk represented by the offender is reflected in the level of culpability which attaches to his driving, so that matters relevant to fixing the length of the driving disqualification for the offence of causing death by dangerous driving will be much the same as those appearing in the list of aggravating factors for the offence itself. Shorter bans of two years or so will be appropriate where the offender had a good driving record before the offence and where the offence resulted from a momentary error of judgment. Longer bans, between 3 and 5 years, will be appropriate where, having regard to the circumstances of the offence and the offender's record, it is clear that the offender tends to disregard the rules of the road, or to drive carelessly or inappropriately. Bans between 5 and 10 years may be used where the offence itself, and the offender's record, show that he represents a real and continuing danger to other road users. Disqualification for life is a highly exceptional course, but may be appropriate in a case where the danger represented by the offender is an extreme and indefinite one. [R v Noble [2003] 1 Cr App R (S) 312] was described by the Court of Appeal as "one of those rare cases" where disqualification for life was necessary in order to protect the public.'

[43] We do not agree that the length of the ban should be tailored to take into account the anticipated date of early release of the offender. On the other hand we accept that to extend the ban for a substantial period after release can be counter-productive particularly if it is imposed on an offender who is obsessed with cars or who requires a driving licence to earn his or her living because it may tempt the offender to drive while disqualified.

[44] The balancing of these conflicting considerations is very much the responsibility of the sentencer. In doing so the balancing exercise will require the sentencer to take into account the requirement which now exists that an order must be made that the offender is required to pass an extended driving test.

[45] We can now turn to the individual cases.

ROBERT CHARLES COOKSLEY

The facts

g [46] In the Crown Court at Newport on 20 August 2002 this appellant changed his plea from not guilty to guilty on a count of causing death by careless driving when under the influence of drink. On 10 September 2002 he was sentenced to a term of four years' imprisonment, disqualified from driving for six years and ordered to take an extended re-test following a disqualification period. He appeals h by leave of the single judge. The facts are as follows. At about 8.25 pm on 1 September 2001 the appellant was driving along the A48 towards Newport when he ran into a cyclist travelling in the same direction. Immediately before the accident the driver of a car which was following the appellant's car noticed the appellant's car braking in a quick but controlled manner. The car behind the appellant's car pulled out to overtake and as it did so the front-seat passenger j noticed that the appellant's car had hit the cyclist. That car pulled up and the driver and his passenger returned to the scene of the accident. The appellant was trying to resuscitate the cyclist and his female passenger was hysterical. An ambulance and the police were called. The injured cyclist was removed from the scene in the ambulance but later died. Police officers at the scene smelt alcohol on the breath of the appellant and his passenger. The appellant's passenger told police officers that she and the appellant had started drinking at 11.00 am and they were on their way from one public house to another when the accident occurred. She said that she had told the appellant that he should not be driving but had gone along with him to avoid a row. Both she and the appellant tested positive on a roadside breath test but later at the police station the appellant refused to provide either a specimen of breath or blood for analysis. Following a plea and directions hearing, at which the appellant pleaded not guilty, the prosecution served the evidence of an expert who had made a back calculation from the roadside breath test relating to the amount of alcohol which it was alleged the appellant had consumed before the accident. In his opinion the appellant must have consumed at least nine pints of beer before the accident although the appellant admitted to consuming only four pints. The defence instructed its own expert and it suffices to note that the accuracy of the prosecution expert's evidence ultimately was not challenged and the appellant pleaded guilty. He is now aged 46 and has a number of previous convictions which include in 1994 a conviction for driving with excess alcohol and in 2001 for failing to stop after an accident.

[47] On behalf of the appellant, it is submitted that apart from the consumption of alcohol there was an absence of serious culpability. Counsel submits that there is no evidence of the appellant's car meandering or wandering across the road. There is no evidence of excessive speed and the appellant remained at the scene of the accident. Further, it is submitted that the judge failed to give sufficient credit for the appellant's guilty plea and remorse shown by him.

Our conclusions

[48] In our judgment the submissions on the lack of culpability fail to address the gravity of the case against the appellant, namely that he had consumed such a quantity of alcohol as to cause him to fail to see the cyclist in time or at all. In addition, there is the aggravating feature that he had driven notwithstanding a warning from his passenger that he should not do so. In our judgment this was a bad case of causing death by careless driving when under the influence of drink. The appellant had spent a good part of the day drinking. He was warned not to drive by his passenger. Clearly, he cannot have seen the cyclist in time to avoid the accident. For these reasons his judgment must have been seriously affected by alcohol. In our opinion this case falls into the third category of seriousness or higher culpability, and notwithstanding the appellant's guilty plea, for which only limited credit was due, and the fact that this was a case of careless driving, the sentence was not manifestly excessive.

The result

[49] This appeal must be dismissed.

IAN PAUL STRIDE

The facts

[50] This appellant appeals against a sentence of two-and-a-half years' imprisonment imposed in the Crown Court at Maidstone on 13 September 2002 following a trial at which he was convicted of causing death by dangerous driving. He was disqualified from driving for five years and until an extended re-test is taken.

[51] The appellant has been a professional lorry driver for over 20 years. On 16 December 2000 he had started work at 3 pm. He drove to a garage in Kent to a make a delivery and left that garage at 5.36 pm. After driving a distance of only 19 miles, taking him some 22 minutes, an accident occurred on the M20 motorway. Two vehicles were stationary on the hard shoulder. One of them had broken down and a Peugeot 405 had parked behind the other car in order to assist. There were approximately seven people standing on the verge of the hard shoulder at the time, some were getting into the rear of the Peugeot. As the b appellant's tanker approached, it slowly veered off the main carriageway onto the hard shoulder and into collision with the rear of the Peugeot. Tragically Richard Foord, in the back of the Peugeot at the time, was killed. The appellant told the police and maintained at trial that he had a sneezing fit causing him to leave the road.

c [52] It is apparent that the trial judge directed the jury that if the explanation for the accident might have been that the appellant had sneezed, he should be acquitted. But if the jury was sure that, as the prosecution contended, the appellant had fallen asleep he should be convicted.

d [53] The jury convicted and accordingly the judge sentenced him on the basis that the appellant had fallen asleep. It is conceded on behalf of the appellant that the judge was entitled to take that view.

e [54] The appellant is 43 and of good character. He volunteered that he had been convicted of a traffic offence approximately 20 years ago and more recently of a minor speeding offence. A number of witnesses gave evidence and wrote of his honesty, integrity and hard work. The pre-sentence report spoke of the fact that he had been traumatised by the accident. In his sentencing remarks the judge accepted that there were no aggravating features.

Our conclusions

f [55] This, as we have said, was a case where a driver fell asleep at the wheel. Usually, as we have indicated at [17], above, this will be an aggravating feature. Sleep is normally preceded by a period of drowsiness and difficulty in keeping the eyes open. But this was an unusual case. The appellant had not been driving for any lengthy period. Nor had he been working throughout the day. There was no reason why he should anticipate becoming tired, let alone falling asleep. In those circumstances we take the view that the judge was correct in declining to identify any aggravating feature and in particular we do not think this is a case g where the driver was knowingly deprived of adequate sleep or rest.

h [56] On the other hand, there was powerful personal mitigation. In those circumstances we do not think this case falls within our intermediate category of two to three years. It was a rare case of a driver momentarily and unexpectedly falling asleep at the wheel. In those circumstances we take the view that it falls within the lowest category and a sentence of 18 months' imprisonment was appropriate.

j [57] Additionally, we take the view that disqualification for driving for a period of five years was too long. Disqualification is primarily intended to provide a safeguard to the public for the future. In the light of this professional driver's good driving record we take the view that protection of the public does not require disqualification for five years and for that period we substitute a period of three years' disqualification.

The result

[58] Accordingly in this case the appeal is allowed by substituting for the period of two-and-a-half years of imprisonment a period of 18 months' imprisonment and for the disqualification of five years a period of three years and until an extended re-test is taken.

NEIL TERENCE JOHN COOK

The facts

[59] This appellant was sentenced by the Recorder of Liverpool on 27 September 2002 to a total of seven years' detention in a young offenders institution for two offences of causing death by dangerous driving. He had pleaded guilty earlier. The appellant is aged 20. The facts demonstrate that these offences were of the most serious kind.

[60] On 17 May 2002 at about 4 am the appellant was driving a Volvo motorcar. It was not his own and he was unable to identify the owner. There were five passengers in the car. He was driving the car on a dual carriageway in Liverpool in respect of which there was a 30 mph speed limit. The area was known as dangerous and there were signs along it reading 'Speed Kills' and 'Slow Down Please'. His speed was estimated at between 68 and 73 mph at the time of the accident. As he approached a sharp left hand bend he lost control. The car hit the left hand kerb, rose into the air, struck a tree and crashed through the gardens of three houses demolishing a wall and a bay window. A passenger sitting in the rear and another passenger sitting in the front passenger seat were killed immediately. One other passenger suffered a large cut on her head, a fractured forearm and a chipped vertebrae at the top of her neck. Another passenger sustained serious head injuries requiring intensive support on a respirator and a fifth passenger suffered a fractured hip.

[61] The appellant had a bad driving record which included three previous offences of driving whilst disqualified. He was driving whilst disqualified at the time of these offences.

[62] As the Recorder of Liverpool noted in his sentencing remarks the only mitigation was that he had pleaded guilty when the case first came into the Crown Court and had expressed sorrow and remorse. There was graphic evidence of the impact his driving had had upon the relatives of the deceased.

[63] It was argued on this appellant's behalf that whilst there were significant aggravating features, deriving from the manner of his driving and the fact that he was disqualified, insufficient allowance had been made for the age of this appellant and his plea of guilty. Our attention was drawn to the decision of this court in R v Corkhill [2002] 2 Cr App R (S) 60 in which a sentence of seven years' detention was reduced to five years having regard to the early plea of guilty and the appellant's youth.

Our conclusions

[64] In our judgment this case was worse. Two young people were killed and others suffered severe injuries as a result of this appellant's deliberate decision to drive at dangerous speed in order to impress his fellow passengers.

[65] Having regard to the appellant's sustained driving at speed and the fact that he was disqualified, we place this case within the most severe culpability category. The appellant drove persistently at an excessive speed in order to show off to his fellow passengers, aggravating features as identified by the panel at para 14(b). However, this appellant is entitled to some credit for his plea even though it was not entered at the earliest time. The conclusion we have reached is that a sentence of seven years for a person of the appellant's age is an

- a excessively high sentence and a sentence of six years' detention will appropriately meet the requirements of punishment and deterrence for this serious offence.

The result

[66] Accordingly, we allow the appeal and quash the sentence of seven years and instead impose a sentence of six years' detention.

- b RICHARD CRUMP

[67] On 26 September 2002 in the Crown Court at Chichester, the defendant, Richard James Crump was convicted of causing death by dangerous driving. On 29 November 2002 he was sentenced to 12 months' imprisonment suspended for two years. He was disqualified from driving for four years, ordered to take an extended driving test and ordered to pay £200 towards the costs of the prosecution. Her Majesty's Attorney General applies under s 36 of the Criminal Justice Act 1988 for leave to refer the sentence to this court for review because he considers it was unduly lenient. We grant leave.

- d The facts

[68] The facts were as follows. At about 12.30 pm on 18 January 2001 the defendant was driving his Peugeot motorcar south along South Farm Road, Worthing approaching a railway crossing. He had two passengers in his car. At the same time Hannah O'Leary, aged 86, was walking in South Farm Road in the vicinity of the railway crossing. As the defendant approached the crossing the signalman activated the warning bells and crossing lights sequence. The sequence was that yellow lights come on for three seconds and the audible warning started. After three seconds red lights start to flash. After another seven-and-a-half seconds the facing barriers start to descend. A pedestrian saw the Peugeot drive over the railway line as the barriers descended. His evidence was that the defendant had to cross into the opposite carriageway on the north side of the line and 'shimmy' his way diagonally across the crossing to get through. The pedestrian described the vehicle as travelling too fast. At the same time a taxi driven by Liberato Dichello approached the crossing from the south side as the lights flashed and the gates started to come down. He saw Mrs O'Leary step into the road off the east pavement. He stopped his vehicle short of where she was crossing so that she could cross in front of his taxi. His evidence was that she had reached about halfway across the lane when the Peugeot vehicle came over the crossing at an angle and struck her. By then the crossing gates were halfway down and the car was at an angle in order to avoid the gate. Mr Dichello thought that the car was travelling at more than 30 mph. The defendant stopped the Peugeot a short distance from the point of impact. At the scene he spoke to a police officer saying: 'I had to make a snap decision. I was confronted by a red light and she stepped out from the side of the road in front of me.' A little later when he was sitting alone in the back of a police car the defendant received a telephone call on his mobile from one of his passengers. The defendant's side of the conversation was recorded by a video system inside the police car. He said: 'Yeh, well, this is your fault. You know that don't you? Do you know that? No? [Pause.] Go on, give it loads. Go on, you can do it. Go on. Yeh, anyway.'

[69] Later when interviewed he said that he thought he was probably travelling at about 40 mph. He had not noticed the flashing lights and the warning bells and had been unaware of the crossing until one of his passengers had said 'Quick, go, there's a crossing'. He said that—'It was like a split [second] decision thing ... I wasn't expecting there to be a train crossing there and I've kind of obviously gone through it whilst its coming down at some point, not realised it, someone said "there's a barrier coming down" and then this woman just stepped out in front of me.'

Re-interviewed on 22 March 2001 Crump estimated his speed at 30 to 35 mph.

[70] As a result of the impact Mrs O'Leary sustained multiple injuries and on 14 February 2001 she died in hospital as a result of heart failure brought on by the injuries.

[71] The defendant is now aged 30. He had three previous convictions for speeding the last of which was in 1997.

The reports

[72] Before the judge there was a pre-sentence report and two medical reports. All these reports comment on the sincerity of expressions of remorse by the defendant. The medical reports show that the defendant suffers from a severe and disabling eczema. This condition requires treatment by a daily bath containing an emollient and the application of steroid ointment and moisturising creams. From time to time the defendant has to be admitted to hospital for in-patient treatment. A psychiatrist reported that the defendant showed signs of post-traumatic stress disorder which he suspected had caused the defendant to develop a dependence on prescribed sleeping tablets and anti-anxiety drugs.

[73] The judge sentenced the defendant on the basis that he had approached the crossing travelling at a speed in the mid-30s. He said that it was implicit from his direction and the jury's verdict that the defendant having seen the warning lights decided to go on and take the various risks involved in not stopping. For this reason he had to drive an 'S' course along the road in order to pass under the barrier on his side of the road. The judge concluded that only a custodial sentence was justified but that the interplay between the defendant's psychological make-up and his medical difficulties were such as to constitute exceptional circumstances enabling him to suspend the sentence.

The submissions

[74] The Attorney General contends that the following aggravating features were present. (1) The defendant failed to heed the warning bells and lights which would have been evident for some time. (2) The defendant ran the risk of his vehicle blocking the railway line if he had not managed to drive under the crossing gates. (3) The defendant had three previous convictions for speeding.

[75] The Attorney General accepts that the following mitigating factors were present. (1) Apart from road traffic offences the defendant had no other previous convictions. (2) The defendant was in poor health. He suffered from severe eczema and had experienced some symptoms of post-traumatic stress disorder after the incident. (3) The defendant was remorseful for what he had done.

[76] Mr Hilliard submitted that, on the judge's findings, this was a case of the defendant taking a deliberate risk by attempting to cross the railway crossing as the barriers were descending. He pointed to the risk of disastrous consequences which might have occurred if the defendant's vehicle had been trapped on the crossing. He submitted that the sentence of 12 months was unduly low and that the starting point should have been two-and-a-half years in prison. From this starting point some allowance could properly be made for the defendant's personal a mitigation but the mitigation was not such as to amount to exceptional circumstances enabling the court to suspend the sentence.

[77] Mr Geoffrey Mercer QC representing the defendant before us, as he did in the lower court, submitted that, ignoring the defendant's medical condition, the sentence was not unduly lenient. He submitted that there were no aggravating features and that the decision to drive over the crossing as the barriers were descending was a split-second decision amounting to no more than an error of judgment. He further submitted that, in view of the defendant's medical condition, the judge was justified in suspending the sentence of imprisonment.

Our conclusions

[78] The Attorney General should have leave.

c [79] We are of the opinion that the sentence passed was unduly lenient. In our judgment the aggravating feature in this case is the deliberate risk which the defendant took in deciding to drive across the railway crossing as the barriers were descending. In order to do so it was inevitable that he had to drive onto the wrong side of the road. There was the considerable risk that if he failed to pass under the second barrier he might cause a very serious accident involving a train. In our judgment his driving was such that it came into the second intermediate category to which we have referred; that is the two to three year bracket. In the circumstances, we accept the Attorney General's submission that the starting point was two-and-a-half years. Taking into account the defendant's considerable remorse and the other personal mitigation save for his medical condition in our view the appropriate sentence would have been two years.

e [80] However, in our judgment, the judge was entitled to suspend the sentence. He had seen the defendant give evidence. The defendant's medical condition was undoubtedly serious and difficult to treat. In the course of his sentencing remarks the judge was handed a letter from the prison authorities in which it was stated that in principle the prison medical services would be able to give the prescribed level of care which the defendant's condition required. The judge found that in reality the Prison Service would, at the least, have extreme difficulty in coping with the defendant's condition. Having carefully read the medical reports, in our view, the judge was quite entitled to reach that conclusion and, as he stated, as an act of humanity to suspend the sentence. In addition, we have been told by counsel that the effect of having this appeal hanging over his head, has caused the defendant's eczema to deteriorate. We take the view that having regard to the principle of double jeopardy it would in any event now be wrong to direct an immediate sentence of imprisonment.

g [81] Accordingly the sentence will be varied to a term of two years' imprisonment suspended for two years. The period of disqualification will remain unaltered as will the order that when the period of disqualification has expired before he drives again the defendant must take an extended test.

j Cooksley's appeal dismissed. Stride's and Cook's appeals allowed. Leave granted to Attorney General and sentence varied as indicated.

Lynne Townley Barrister.

Holder v Law Society

[2003] EWCA Civ 39

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

ALDOUS, CARNWATH LJ AND SIR CHRISTOPHER STAUGHTON

21, 24 JANUARY 2003

Solicitor – Law Society – Intervention – Compliance of Law Society’s intervention procedure with human rights legislation – Human Rights Act 1998, Sch 1, Pt II, art 1.

Human rights – Right to peaceful enjoyment of possessions – Intervention in solicitor’s practice – Compliance of Law Society’s intervention procedure with human rights legislation – Human Rights Act 1998, Sch 1, Pt II, art 1.

The Law Society intervened in the claimant’s practice as a solicitor under the provisions of the Solicitors Act 1974. The claimant applied to the court for an order directing the society to withdraw the notice of intervention. On an application by the society for summary judgment, the master dismissed the claim. The claimant appealed, on the ground, inter alia, that the society’s intervention power, either generally or as applied in the instant case, infringed his rights under art 1^a of the First Protocol to the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998), which provided that every person was entitled to the peaceful enjoyment of his possessions. The judge held that, apart from issues under the 1998 Act, the society’s intervention had been entirely justified; that whilst the power of intervention was not of itself contrary to the 1998 Act, that power could in some cases infringe the right to possession, the question essentially being one of fact and degree; and that, on the evidence in the instant case, it was not possible to conclude that there was no real prospect of the claimant establishing that his human rights had been infringed. Accordingly, he allowed the appeal and directed that the matter go to trial. The society, in reliance on the public interest exception in art 1, appealed on the ground that the judge had been wrong to find that the intervention procedure raised any issue under the 1998 Act.

Held – The intervention procedure had been recognised as draconian in some respects, but necessary for the protection of the public interest, and the courts had repeatedly emphasised the balancing exercise that the procedure involved. There was no material difference between that and the fair balance required by art 1, nor any arguable ground for thinking that the margin allowed to the legislature had been crossed, particularly having regard to the deference which was properly paid to an Act of Parliament, as compared to an administrative decision. The society also had a margin of discretion, but the court had a separate duty to consider the merits of the case, while paying due regard to the views of the society as the relevant professional body. That met any ‘fair balance’ requirement. As the judge had found that, viewed by reference to the 1974 Act itself, the society’s intervention had been entirely justified, that should have led

a Article 1 is set out at [28], below

- a him to uphold the society's view as to where the balance lay on the facts of the instant case. Accordingly, the master's order would be restored and the society would be granted summary judgment (see [31]–[33], [36], [39], below).

- Spörrong and Lonnroth v Sweden* (1983) 5 EHRR 35, Holy Monasteries v Greece [1994] EHRR 1, Giles v Law Society (1995) 8 Admin LR 105, Dooley v Law Society (15 September 2000, unreported), R (on the application of Farrakhan) v Secretary of State for the Home Department [2002] 4 All ER 289, International Transport Roth GmbH v Secretary of State for the Home Department [2002] 3 WLR 344 considered.

Decision of Peter Smith J [2002] All ER (D) 378 (Jul) reversed.

Notes

- c For circumstances in which the Law Society may intervene in a solicitor's practice, see 44(1) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 479.

For the Human Rights Act 1998, s 7, Sch 1, Pt II, art 1, see 7 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2002 reissue) 505, 525.

Cases referred to in judgments

- d Airey v Ireland (1979) 2 EHRR 305, [1979] ECHR 6289/73, ECt HR.
Buckley v Law Society (No 2) [1984] 3 All ER 313, [1984] 1 WLR 1101.
Dooley v Law Society (15 September 2000, unreported), Ch D.
Giles v Law Society (1996) 8 Admin LR 105, CA.
Holy Monasteries v Greece (1994) 20 EHRR 1, [1994] ECHR 13029/87, ECt HR.
e International Transport Roth GmbH v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2002] EWCA Civ 158, [2002] 3 WLR 344.
Parker v Camden London BC, Newman v Camden London BC [1985] 2 All ER 141, [1986] Ch 162, [1985] 3 WLR 47, CA.
Pine v Law Society [2001] EWCA Civ 1574.
R (on the application of Farrakhan) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2002] EWCA f Civ 606, [2002] 4 All ER 289, [2002] QB 1391, [2002] 3 WLR 481.
Spörrong v Sweden (1983) 5 EHRR 35, [1982] ECHR 7151/75, ECt HR.
Wilson Smith v Law Society (29 March 1999, unreported).
Wright v Law Society (4 September 2002, unreported), Ch D.
X v UK (1983) 6 EHRR 136, E Com HR.

Cases also cited or referred to in skeleton arguments

- Campbell v UK* (1992) 15 EHRR 137, ECt HR.
F v Switzerland (1987) 10 EHRR 411, ECt HR.
Potter v Law Society (20 December 1999, unreported), Ch D.
h Pybus v Office for the Supervision of Solicitors [2001] All ER (D) 164 (Dec).
R v Law Society, ex p Mortgage Express Ltd [1997] 2 All ER 348, CA.
Van Marle v Netherlands (1986) 8 EHRR 483, ECt HR.

Appeal

- j The defendant, the Law Society, appealed from the decision of Peter Smith J on 25 July 2002 ([2002] All ER (D) 378 (Jul)) allowing the appeal of the claimant, David Herman Holder, from the decision of Master Price on 30 August 2001 dismissing his application to the High Court on 26 June 2001 for an order directing the Law Society to withdraw the notice of intervention of 15 June 2001 in respect of the claimant's practice. The facts are set out in the judgment of Carnwath LJ.

Timothy Dutton QC and Nicholas Peacock (instructed by Wright Son & Pepper) for the Law Society. a

Philip Engelman and Roger Pezzani (instructed by Teacher Stern Selby) for the claimant.

Cur adv vult b

24 January 2003. The following judgments were delivered.

CARNWATH LJ.

[1] On Friday, 15 June 2001 the Law Society resolved to intervene in the practice of the claimant under the Solicitors Act 1974. On 26 June the claimant applied to the High Court for an order directing the Law Society to withdraw the notice of intervention. No further steps were taken pursuant to that application, until 2 August when the Law Society applied for summary judgment under CPR Pt 24. On 30 August Master Price made an order dismissing the claim. The appeal which was heard by Peter Smith J almost a year later, led to him allowing the appeal on 25 July 2002 and directing that the claim should go to trial. The Law Society now appeals against that order. c d

[2] In fairness to both the master and the judge, I record that, for reasons which have not been satisfactorily explained, the judge was not given a note of the master's reasoning, and may therefore have had the impression that it was dealt with more cursorily than was in fact the case. A subsequent note of the judgment, based on solicitors' notes and approved by the master, has been shown to us, from which it is clear that the matter was fully considered by the master. e

BACKGROUND

[3] I can take the material facts from the judge's findings. I do not understand them to be significantly in dispute. I record that Mr Engelman (for Mr Holder) said that his client did not admit dishonesty, although he admitted reasonable grounds to suspect dishonesty. I also note Mr Holder's evidence as to the difficult circumstances of his early life, which led to him being admitted as a solicitor relatively late at the age of 37, and to the problems he experienced thereafter in establishing himself. The judge held ([2002] EWHC 1559 (Ch), [2002] All ER (D) 378 (Jul)): f g

[9] The claimant is a solicitor who was admitted to the roll in 1994. In November 1996 he became a partner with a John Baskin and they practised under the style "Baskin & Co". The practice was not set up as a true partnership. The claimant described the structure as "sort of individual within the partnership". Despite the appearance of being in partnership, he stated that they had "separate bank accounts and separate overdraft facilities", although the accounts certified to LS were based on the average of their two branches. h

[10] Under the Solicitors Practice Rules 1990 (practice r 13) it is forbidden for a solicitor to be a sole practitioner unless and until he is more than three years qualified. The claimant in his evidence is describing an arrangement which appears to be designed to circumvent the rule by an arrangement which, to the outside world and the LS, would appear as a partnership, whereas he and Mr Baskin were, in reality, operating as individual sole traders. j

[11] From August 2000 the claimant practised on his own account.

[12] On 8 June 2001 a Mr AS Beconsall an Investigation Compliance Officer of the OSS (the Office of Supervision of Solicitors) began an inspection into the claimant's books and accounts. That inspection revealed:

(1) That in breach of rr 32 and 33 of the SAR he had not maintained any client account records since 31 March 2000 (14 months); nor could he produce client bank account statements and paying-in books (r 33). The claimant admits this. The submission by Mr Dutton QC that the absence of an accounting system of itself puts client funds at risk is well made.

(2) There was an agreed minimum cash shortfall on client account at £200,950 comprising £60,000 on the client account of SKT Charitable Trust and £140,950 nominally in the client account of Hilary Simmonds. The claimant admitted this and that he agreed it with Mr Beconsall at the time of the inspection and in my judgment does not challenge these findings in any credible way.

(3) The claimant also told Mr Beconsall that he had withdrawn money from client account for his own purposes to reduce his liabilities to moneylenders.

(4) The claimant was substantially in debt to two moneylenders, Jack Steinberg £220,000 and George Rothschild £266,000. He would obtain money from them, which he would put into the office or client account, and he would issue post-dated cheques for the amount of the loan paying 2% per month in cash as interest.

(5) He accepted in statements made to Mr Beconsall his calculation of the claimant's debts as being £680,000 at least, excluding the client accounts shortage of £200,950. The creditors include his professional liability insurers (SIF and St Paul's), VAT, PAYE, Inland Revenue and National Insurance.'

[4] The judge also made findings on the reasons for Mr Holder's problems:

[13] The reason for his serious financial problems was that he put himself massively in debt to fringe moneylenders. This he admitted both to Mr Beconsall and in his evidence. In his first witness statement he stated that he became unable to continue any longer, or repay them for some months before the intervention. Further, although he did not believe the lenders monies were client funds (first witness statement para 21) he admits that he signed letters on the headed notepaper which were to be used by the lenders in claims on the Law Society Compensation Fund saying that the monies could fall within the definition of "client monies". The compensation fund exists primarily to compensate those who have lost their money ie client monies at the hands of dishonest solicitors. A letter falsely describing the monies as clients monies when the claimant did not believe them to be so, is the LS contended serious dishonesty as it could be used to mislead the Compensation Fund to the advantage of both the claimant and those from whom he had been borrowing money ...'

[5] He rejected Mr Engelman's attempt to challenge this interpretation of the letter. He thought Mr Holder's state of mind was clear from his own evidence. Mr Holder had said (at paras 21–22 of his first statement):

'In or about latter part of 2000, I could not continue any longer and was unable to pay the two gentleman referred to. I began to receive various threats, which included reporting me to the Law Society. In those circumstances, and not knowing where to turn, and being let down by everyone, I was forced into signing letters, which the gentlemen thought they could use by claiming the funds loaned from the Compensation Fund ... I realised that the end was inevitable and started to wind down the practice. I became considerably depressed, and it was after I had considerably wound down the practice, in order to protect my clients, that I went to (solicitors) with the view to disclose everything to the Law Society.'

He added that there were still some 'active client files', and that, if the intervention were set aside, he would have 'financial assistance from my local community whom I have considerably assisted in the past to set me up again'. However there was, and is, no substantial evidence to support this hope. We were also told that Mr Holder is currently awaiting trial on charges of theft relating to his dealings in May 2001, but that fact cannot of course affect our view of the matter.

[6] Mr Becconsall's findings were set out in a report dated 14 June 2001 to David Middleton, head of the Investigation Enforcement of the Office for the Supervision of Solicitors (OSS). On the following day (Friday, 15 June) the chairman of the Compliance and Supervision Committee of the Law Society, acting under delegated powers, resolved to exercise the powers of intervention under Sch 1 to the Act, to vest the practice moneys in the society and to require the claimant to deliver practice documents to the society's agent. The stated grounds were under paras 1(1)(a) and (c). The notice was sent by recorded delivery on 15 June and arrived on Monday, 18 June. Mr Holder first learnt of the intervention on the Friday as a result of a telephone call to Mr Becconsall's office.

[7] The judge, rightly in my view, concluded that apart from issues under the Human Rights Act 1998, to which I shall come, the intervention of the Law Society was entirely justified. He said:

'[34] In the light of the above evidence the following appear to be incontrovertible.

1. The claimant was in serious breach of various of the SAC and had been for many months.

2. He had probably removed a large amount of money from his client account. Like Mr Dutton QC I view the letters from the supposed clients attached to his third witness statement with scepticism.

3. He was involved with moneylenders and had substantial debts to them which led him to make a potentially fraudulent misuse of the Solicitors Compensation Fund.

4. The claimant did not dispute in any credible way any of those allegations.

[35] It follows from the above absent a human rights claim, the intervention of the LS was in my judgment entirely justified ...'

[8] Before turning to those issues, it is necessary to note a comment made by the judge about what he thought was the apparent lack of urgency in the exercise of the powers. He said:

'[36] I should observe however, that whilst the intervention was made under the chairman's urgent emergency powers as set out above, the actual intervention did not proceed, so far as I can see, with an urgency that required an immediate intervention. I say that because the LS did not, for example, go to court to bolster the intervention powers. They made no a attempt to serve the intervention notice on the day they made the decision; they were content that it be sent in the post. Those matters show that whilst this case is serious, as any intervention by definition must be serious, and whilst there was dishonesty, they did not believe that there was an immediate potential for clients to lose money. The conclusion I draw from their report is that the dishonesty had already been complete and that was the basis for the intervention.'

THE STATUTE

c [9] The society's powers of intervention are set out in Sch 1 to the Solicitors Act 1974. The relevant grounds in this case were reason to suspect dishonesty on the part of a solicitor (para 1(1)(a)) and failure to comply with the accounts rules (para 1(1)(c)). Paragraph 6(1) confers the power, by resolution, to provide for the vesting in the society of money held by the solicitor 'in connection with his practice'. Such money is, on the making of the resolution, held by the society 'upon trust for the persons beneficially entitled'.

d [10] The society is required to serve on the solicitor, and 'any other person having possession of' money to which the resolution applies, a certified copy of the resolution, and 'a notice prohibiting the payment out of any such sums of money' (para 6(3)). It appears from the evidence of Mr Middleton (unsurprisingly), that the notice on the solicitor is normally served after notice has been served on his bank, thereby effectively freezing his accounts. However, e there appears to be no specific evidence that this happened in the present case.

[11] Paragraph 6(4) provides that the person served with a notice may within eight days of service, on not less than 48 hours' notice, 'apply to the High Court for an order directing the Society to withdraw the notice'. If the court makes such an order, it has power 'also to make such other order with respect to the matter as it may think fit' (para 6(5)).

f [12] By para 9 the society may give notice requiring the production or delivery of documents held by the solicitor in connection with his practice. Again there is provision for the solicitor to apply to the court for re-delivery of the documents (para 9(8)).

g [13] Where intervention powers have been exercised on the grounds of suspected dishonesty or breach of accounting rules the exercise of the power operates immediately to suspend any practising certificate of the solicitor for the time being in force (1974 Act, s 15(1)(a)). The solicitor may before the certificate expires apply to the society to terminate the suspension, and if the society refuses he may appeal to the Master of the Rolls (s 16).

h [14] The nature and characteristics of the intervention jurisdiction have been discussed in a number of cases, starting with Buckley v Law Society (No 2) [1984] 3 All ER 313, [1984] 1 WLR 1101 (Megarry V-C), and most recently in this court, in Giles v Law Society (1996) 8 Admin LR 105. It has been recognised that it is a 'draconian' jurisdiction, necessary to protect the public interest, but balanced by the right to apply to the court. As Sedley LJ said in Giles's case (at 118–119):

j 'The manifest purpose of sch. 1 to the Solicitors Act 1974 ... is to create an ex parte procedure leading where appropriate to intervention, the consequences of which are undoubtedly drastic and potentially terminal for a solicitor's practice. Where an intervention is persisted with, para. 6(4) of sch. 1 provides for a solicitor to be heard on an application made within eight days to the court for an order directing the Law Society to withdraw the notice prohibiting payment out of money held by solicitors save with the leave of the court. Since this is the key intervention power, at least in cases of suspected dishonesty, it is realistic to describe the sub-paragraph as conferring jurisdiction upon the court to direct the Law Society to withdraw from the intervention. On such an application it is for the court to decide whether or not to direct withdrawal on the then material before it ... it is by common consent a matter for the court's judgment (I prefer not to use the word discretion in this context) whether it should direct withdrawal—a judgment which may be significantly, though not conclusively, affected by the Law Society's own view of the facts, since on the view taken by the professional body charged with the regulation of solicitors' practices is itself a relevant evidential factor to which the judge not only can but must have regard.'

[15] The court itself conducts 'a two-stage process'. Its role was summarised by Neuberger J in Dooley v Law Society (15 September 2000, unreported):

'First it must decide whether the grounds under para 1 are made out; in this case, primarily, whether there are grounds for suspecting dishonesty. Secondly, if the court is so satisfied, then it must consider whether in the light of all the evidence before it the intervention should continue. In deciding the second question, the court must carry out a balancing exercise between the need in the public interest to protect the public from dishonest solicitors and the inevitably very serious consequences to the solicitor if the intervention continues.'

[16] Finally, it should not be thought that the protracted progress of the present proceedings is in any way typical. Where necessary the procedure can operate very quickly. By way of illustration, we were referred to one case (Wilson Smith v Law Society (29 March 1999, unreported)) where the judge gave a temporary injunction by telephone on the day before the proposed intervention to enable the matter to be considered in court the following morning. In another recent case to which I shall return (Wright v Law Society (4 September 2002, unreported)), an interim injunction was granted to preserve the position pending the full hearing a few days later. The judge recorded the speed with which all the parties had worked, including the submission of skeleton arguments by e-mail over the weekend.

THE HUMAN RIGHTS ISSUE

[17] Before the judge it was submitted by Mr Engelman (appearing then as now for Mr Holder) that the intervention power, either generally or as applied in this case, infringed Mr Holder's right to 'peaceful enjoyment of his possessions' under art 1 of the First Protocol to the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950, as applied by the Human Rights Act 1998, and that in addition there had been a breach of the claimant's right to a fair hearing under art 6. As to the latter, the judge, who as I said did not have a note of the master's judgment, considered that there had not been a fair hearing on that occasion, but he considered that the right of appeal to him was sufficient to cure any such defect.

[18] As to art 1, the judge rejected Mr Engelman's broad submission that 'under no circumstances' could the power of intervention be justified, because of its effect in destroying the practice of the solicitor. The judge said:

a [38] For reasons which I will give in this judgment I do not accept Mr Engelman's submission as widely based as it is. It seems to me that balancing the rights of the individual against the rights of the public and the state interest in seeing that the conduct of solicitors is maintained to the highest professional standards of integrity, the power of intervention is a necessary power and the power of itself is not contrary to Human Rights Act b 1998. However, I do accept an alternative submission that the power can in some cases infringe the right to possession but it is essentially a question of fact and degree in each case.'

Later in his judgment he expanded on what he saw as the 'draconian' features of the intervention power:

c [68] The effect of an intervention is admittedly draconian. It seems to me that the effect of the intervention would, in reality, render it at the very least, difficult, if not impossible, for a solicitor to collect outstanding fees and, more importantly, work in progress. In respect of the latter there are undoubtedly cases where solicitors work on an entire fee basis.
d Conveyancing transactions, for example, are regularly carried out on such a basis. Commercial or business transactions are similarly carried out on the basis of a fee quoted for doing a particular job. The result of an intervention will prevent the solicitor from carrying on the contract. It means that the solicitor will have discharged himself with the result that the solicitor will no e longer be able to carry out the duties. He will thus lose his entitlement to a fee and, according to well known principles of entire contracts, would not be able to claim a quantum meruit.

f [69] As a matter of practicality it seems to me that the claimant's evidence as to the difficulties of collection are made out. Whilst Mr Dutton QC said the LS will afford documents, or rather copies of documents, to enable collections to be made, I can well foresee (and this has been my experience in the interventions where I have been involved) that the destruction of the practice causes the clients to be scattered to the winds and the recoverability of monies made virtually impossible.'

g [19] He then considered whether such effects could be justified under art 1.
He said:

h [70] Is that necessary? In some cases it may be necessary because it might be a necessary evil to correct a much greater one. The more interesting question is, is it always necessary? In that case I am not convinced that it can be said that an intervention in the way in which the procedure is currently permitted to be exercised, is always necessary. It follows from that analysis that if the procedure was not necessary in that way, and it resulted in the interference in the right to possession of property, the procedure itself will infringe the claimant's human rights. I do not see that it can be said that j there is no other alternative. If a report for example, is prepared along the lines of the present case there would have been no difficulty in making an appointment at short notice to go to court for an order for an intervention or some lesser order if the court thought that appropriate. There would then be an independent review and the court (like a search order or a freezing order) would act on the evidence. If the evidence was made out, there would be an independent review of the procedure. Intervention in a full blown way might be required on occasions. Alternatively the court might feel a lesser intervention (such as a receiver, a manager) would be appropriate ...'

[20] He thought the appointment of a receiver would have considerable advantages over the intervention procedure:

'[71] There are considerable advantages in my view to this process vis-à-vis LS [the Law Society], the SCF [the Solicitors Compensation Fund] and the clients. First, client continuity would not be affected in the same way. Second, the receiver would be able to carry on the practice and attempt to deal with the client's cases. I accept there may be instances where that might not be possible, but an independent receiver would be able to make a rapid assessment as occurs in many other cases of receivership and/or liquidation. Mr Dutton QC suggested that the receivers would be required to indemnify the LS. I am not persuaded as to that. Receivers and managers in the case of insolvency regularly fail to obtain indemnities from their appointers but look usually only to the assets. But even if he is right, that would be deployed by the LS as an argument before the judge to justify an intervention as opposed to a receivership.

[72] Third, a receiver would be in a position to take immediate steps to preserve goodwill and work in progress for the general benefit of the creditors, the LS, the SCF and possibly the claimant. I do not see any disadvantages in that process save in an exceptional case where the LS feels immediate action is necessary. It seems to me that if a system can operate which has the same, or even better benefits, but has the possibility of preserving property, which would otherwise be destroyed or lost, that leads to two conclusions. First, that is a fairer system. Second, that the present system is not only unfair but is an infringement of the claimant's human rights.'

Accordingly he concluded:

'[79] ... On the evidence before me at the moment I cannot conclude that there is no real prospect of the claimant establishing that his human rights have been infringed. I say that because it seems to me that the procedure in the present case was not necessarily the only way to address the problem. I do not see why a receivership could not have been contemplated as an adjunct to the intervention powers in advance of the intervention or in tandem with the intervention.'

[21] The Law Society has been understandably concerned at the implications of the judgment of Peter Smith J for the exercise of its intervention powers. It intervenes in approximately 100 solicitors' practices per year, of which a substantial proportion are cases of suspected dishonesty. Furthermore, it does not consider that the alternative procedure proposed by the judge is in fact available in law, even if otherwise desirable (which it disputes).

[22] More recently, Judge Behrens in Wright's case declined to follow the reasoning of Peter Smith J. He said:

'The Law Society has to take into account the public interest in deciding whether to exercise its powers of intervention at all. The public interest requires a balance to be struck between the draconian effect of intervention and the matters referred to earlier in this judgment. Second I have considerable doubts about the jurisdiction of the court to adopt the sort of a solution envisaged by Peter Smith J in paras 70 and 71 of his judgment. Intervention in its full form is the statutory remedy entrusted by Parliament to the Law Society in order to regulate the profession. It is not, in view, open to the courts to devise a different and less draconian remedy. I cannot, for my part, see that the court would have power to appoint a Receiver in an application by the Law Society to determine whether there ought to be an intervention or not.

b Neither counsel were able to point me to any express power in any statute authorising the appointment of a Receiver or the more limited intervention referred to in Peter Smith J's judgment. It seems to me that if such a power is to exist it should be provided for by Parliament.'

c THE ISSUES IN THIS COURT

[23] Mr Dutton QC, for the Law Society, submits that the judge was wrong to find that the intervention procedure raised any issue under the 1998 Act, and in particular that he was wrong to think that there was an alternative procedure. Mr Engelman, on the other hand, repeats his submission that the intervention procedure itself offends art 1, and he supports the judge's finding of the possibility of a breach on the facts of this case.

e [24] Mr Engelman also makes a submission on art 6, which I can deal with briefly. He refers to Mr Holder's evidence of the difficulties he had, in June 2001, in obtaining legal assistance, once his accounts had been in effect frozen. Relying on the decision of the European Court of Human Rights in Airey v Ireland (1979) 2 EHRR 305, Mr Engelman submits that his client's lack of means to employ a lawyer meant that his right of access to a court was effectively denied. However, a similar argument was rejected by this court in the same legal context in Pine v Law Society [2001] EWCA Civ 1574 (15 October 2001). Sir Andrew Morritt V-C, referred to Airey's case, and to its interpretation by the Commission in X v UK (1983) 6 EHRR 136. He noted that the principle distilled by the Commission from the decision of the court in Airey's case was that—

g 'only in exceptional circumstances, namely where the withholding of legal aid would make the assertion of a civil claim practically impossible, or where it would lead to obvious unfairness of the proceedings can such a right be invoked by virtue of art 6(1) of the convention.'

[25] It had been contended for Mr Pine that—

h 'the possible consequences were so serious for the solicitor that disciplinary proceedings should be placed towards the criminal end of the spectrum of civil proceedings in deciding what is and is not fair ... (and) that it was obviously unfair to take and pursue disciplinary proceedings with such immediate and future consequences for the livelihood of a solicitor, particularly where his lack of means stems from the Law Society's own acts in connection with those proceedings, unless at the same time provision is made for the impecunious solicitor to receive legal advice and representation if he wanted it at no expense to himself.'

j [26] Sir Andrew Morritt V-C rejected this submission:

'I do not accept this submission. It is clear from the passage I have quoted from Airey's case in [9], above that, at least in proceedings in which a party may appear in person, the requirements of art 6 with respect to legal advice and representation depend on the facts of any given case.'

Having reviewed the facts of the case he said:

'The procedure was not complex. The relevant facts were within the knowledge of Mr Pine. Mr Pine was a solicitor experienced in commercial litigation. Mr Pine had ample opportunity to indicate any defences he might wish to advance. In my judgment neither the seriousness of the likely consequences nor the emotional involvement of Mr Pine, which is not apparent from his letters to have been a debilitating factor anyway, when considered in the light of the absence of legal advice or representation, gave rise to any unfairness.'

[27] I see no reason to take a different view in this case. Mr Holder was a solicitor who specialised in litigation. He had been closely involved in the investigation, and had fairly admitted most of the relevant facts. There was nothing particularly complex about the issues, and there is no evidence that he would have had any difficulty in understanding them, or presenting his case to the court.

ARTICLE 1

[28] Article 1 of the First Protocol to the European Convention on Human Rights is in these terms:

'Every natural or legal person is entitled to the peaceful enjoyment of his possessions. No one shall be deprived of his possessions except in the public interest and subject to the conditions provided for by law and by the general principles of international law.

The preceding provisions shall not, however, in any way impair the right of a State to enforce such laws as it deems necessary to control the use of property in accordance with the general interest or to secure the payment of taxes or other contributions or penalties.'

Mr Dutton did not dispute that the intervention involved an interference with Mr Holder's peaceful enjoyment of his possessions; but he of course relied on the public interest justification, which is also emphasised by the English cases on the interpretation of the 1974 Act.

[29] Mr Engelman referred to the principles laid down by the Strasbourg court for the application of the public interest test:

'... the Court must determine whether a fair balance was struck between the demands of the general interest of the community and the requirements of the protection of the individual's fundamental rights.' (See Sporrong v Sweden (1983) 5 EHRR 35 at 52 (para 69).)

'... there must be a reasonable relationship of proportionality between the means employed and the aim sought to be realised by any measure depriving a person of his possessions.' (See Holy Monasteries v Greece (1994) 20 EHRR 1 at 48 (para 70).)

He submitted that if, as the judge found, the more draconian features of the intervention procedure were not 'necessary', the requirement of 'proportionality' was not satisfied.

a [30] With respect to the submission, and to the judge, this approach ignores the 'all important' factor, when considering issues of proportionality, of the 'margin of appreciation or discretion' or 'area of judgment' allowed to the legislator and the decision-maker (see, for example, R (on the application of Farrah Khan) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2002] EWCA Civ 606 at [67], [2002] 4 All ER 289 at [67], [2002] QB 1391; and the review of the principles in International Transport Roth GmbH v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2002] EWCA Civ 158, [2002] 3 WLR 344). This aspect was not mentioned by the judge, although it was referred to in Mr Engelman's written submissions to him. In para [70] (quoted above) he appears to have approached the matter on the basis that it was for the court to determine what was 'necessary' in the public interest, and in doing so to compare other possible procedures devised by the court. In my view, this was fundamentally wrong.

b [31] In the present case, the 'margin' arises at two stages: first, the discretion allowed to the legislature in establishing the statutory regime, and, secondly, the discretion of the Law Society as the body entrusted with the decision in an individual case. (In the former case, the only remedy for exceeding the 'margin' may be a 'declaration of incompatibility' under the 1998 Act.) The intervention procedure, now contained in the 1974 Act, is long-established (dating back to 1941, in its earliest form), and has been reviewed by the court on many occasions. As appears from the cases to which I have referred, it has been recognised as 'draconian' in some respects, but necessary for the protection of the public interest; and the courts have repeatedly emphasised the 'balancing exercise' which it involves. I see no material difference between this and the 'fair balance' which art 1 requires. Nor do I see any reason why the 1998 Act should be thought to have changed anything. There has long been a right of individual petition to the Strasbourg court for breaches of the convention, but we have not been referred to any questioning of the intervention procedure under art 1. I see no arguable grounds for thinking that the margin allowed to the legislature has been crossed, particularly having regard to the deference which is properly paid to an Act of Parliament, as compared to an administrative decision (see the Roth case [2002] 3 WLR 344 at [26], [83] per Laws LJ).

c [32] Having reached that point, the Law Society's actions must be judged by reference to the procedure laid down by Parliament, not to some hypothetical alternative procedure. This makes it unnecessary to rule on Mr Dutton's submission that the alternative procedure suggested by the judge, involving an application to the court for a receiver, was not in fact available to the society. He referred to Parker v Camden London BC, Newman v Camden London BC [1985] 2 All ER 141, [1986] Ch 162, where this court held that the wide power to appoint a receiver and manager, under the Supreme Court Act 1981, s 37, could not properly be used to supplant the management powers given by Parliament to the housing authority. We do not need to decide whether that case provides guidance as to the availability of that power to support the very different functions of the Law Society. In any event, if the intervention procedure on its own had been found to be non-compliant, it might be necessary, to avoid incompatibility, to 'read in' such a power (applying the beneficial interpretation required under the 1998 Act, s 3).

d [33] The Law Society also has a 'margin of discretion', but the court has a separate duty to consider the merits of the case, in accordance with the principles I have discussed, while paying due regard, as Sedley LJ said (see Giles's case above), to the views of the Law Society, as the relevant professional body. As I have said, this meets any 'fair balance' requirement. The judge found that, viewed by reference to the 1974 Act itself, the society's intervention was 'entirely justified'. I agree. In my view, that should have led him to have upheld the society's view as to where the balance lay on the facts of this case. a

[34] As I have noted, the judge mentioned the perceived problem of collecting outstanding fees, particularly in relation to work in progress on contracts on 'an entire fee basis', and the difficulties of access to documents. Mr Engelman does not claim that Mr Holder in fact had work in progress of this kind, and there is evidence that the society has been willing to permit supervised access to the documents when required. In my view these are not factors which could possibly affect the overall judgment. b

[35] Finally, I should comment on the passage in which the judge suggested that there was no 'immediate' urgency, and his reliance on the fact that the society had been 'content' that the notice should be sent by post. The evidence of Mr Middleton, the officer responsible, was as follows: c

'Of particular relevance in this context is the substantial amount of money owed to fringe money-lenders, the fact that he is in sole charge of his client account and that substantial sums had already taken from that client account together with his admissions. There was an obvious risk that should further monies be available to Mr Holder in his client account prior to the intervention he might have sought to remove those monies prior to the intervention taking place.' d

This was in my view an entirely reasonable assessment. I do not think the judge was justified in reading anything into the fact that notice was served by post to arrive on the Monday, particularly since it was the resolution which led to money vesting in the Law Society; and it would be the notice to the bank (not to the solicitor) which would normally be the most critical step in preventing dissipation. e

[36] For these reasons, I would allow the appeal and restore the order of the master. f

SIR CHRISTOPHER STAUGHTON.

[37] I agree that this appeal should be allowed, on the ground that there was never any prospect of the Law Society's intervention being set aside. The claimant, a solicitor and sole practitioner, did not keep the accounts which the Law Society required him to keep. There was a deficit on his client account of £200,950; he owed £200,000 and £266,000 to moneylenders; and there were reasonable grounds for suspecting that he had been fraudulent in connection with his practice. If ever there was a case where it was desirable in the public interest that the Law Society should intervene in a solicitor's practice, this was that case. It is the habitual task of solicitors to have in their charge in the course of their practice large sums of their clients' money. They must be honest and reliable people. g

[38] In the exercise of its powers of intervention the Law Society must of course comply with the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998). I can imagine circumstances where the Law Society might be found not to have complied with the convention, or with the 1998 Act. After all, a solicitor whose practice is the object of an intervention loses his practising certificate, and in all probability his livelihood as well. The provisions for h a bringing an intervention to an end are very unlikely to restore the solicitor's goodwill and his prosperity. If it comes about that the intervention was mistaken or unjustified, there is a risk that the solicitor will suffer a substantial loss without recourse to any remedy. In practice this may never happen; but it is a cause for concern. However, not in this case.

b ALDOUS LJ.

[39] I also agree.

Appeal allowed.

James Brooks Barrister.

Schmidt v Rosewood Trust Ltd

[2003] UKPC 26

PRIVY COUNCIL

LORD NICHOLLS OF BIRKENHEAD, LORD HOPE OF CRAIGHEAD, LORD HUTTON, LORD HOBHOUSE OF WOODBOROUGH AND LORD WALKER OF GESTINGTHORPE

17–19 FEBRUARY, 27 MARCH 2003

Trust and trustee – Disclosure of trust documents – Isle of Man – Whether dependent upon proprietary interest of beneficiary – Whether object of mere power entitled to disclosure.

Powers of trustee – Discretionary trusts – Isle of Man – Distinctions between trusts and powers.

The settlor died intestate and letters of administration were granted to his son, the claimant. The defendant company was the sole trustee of two settlements, the subject matter of the proceedings. The claimant applied for disclosure of trust accounts and information about the trust assets by virtue of the discretionary interests or expectations which the claimant claimed that he had, and that his father had had during his life, under the two settlements. The High Court of the Isle of Man ordered, inter alia, that the defendant should provide certain information and make extensive disclosure of unredacted documents. The defendant appealed to the Staff of Government Division of the Isle of Man on the ground, inter alia, that the claimant was not a beneficiary under the two settlements, and that his father was never more than a mere object of a power who as such had no entitlement to trust documents or information. The defendant's appeal was allowed and the claimant appealed to the Privy Council. The defendant contended that a beneficiary's right to disclosure of trust documents should be classified as a proprietary right and that no object of a mere power could have any such right, because he had no proprietary interest in the trust property.

Held – It was fundamental to the law of trusts that the court had jurisdiction to supervise and, if appropriate, intervene in the administration of a trust, including a discretionary trust. The right to seek disclosure of trust documents was one aspect of the court's inherent jurisdiction to supervise, and if necessary to intervene in, the administration of trusts. The right to seek the court's intervention did not depend on entitlement to a fixed and transmissible interest. The object of a discretion (including a mere power) might also be entitled to protection from a court of equity, although the circumstances in which he might seek protection, and the nature of the protection he might expect to obtain, would depend on the court's discretion. However, no beneficiary had any entitlement as of right to disclosure of anything which could plausibly be described as a trust document. Especially when there were issues as to personal or commercial confidentiality, the court might have to balance the competing interests of beneficiaries, the trustees themselves, and third parties. Disclosure might have to be limited and safeguards might have to be put in place. In the circumstances the appeal would be allowed and the matter remitted to the High

- a Court for further consideration in light of the Board's judgment (see [51], [52], [66], [67], [69], below).

Notes

For the answering of inquiries by strangers see 48 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn) (2000 reissue) para 857.

b Cases referred to in judgment

- A-G of Ontario v Stavro (1994) 119 DLR (4th) 750, Ont HC.
 AT & T Istel Ltd v Tully [1992] 3 All ER 523, [1993] AC 45, [1992] 3 WLR 344, HL; rvsg [1992] 2 All ER 28, [1992] QB 315, [1992] 2 WLR 112, CA.
 Butt, Re, Butt v Kelson [1952] 1 All ER 167, [1952] Ch 197, CA.
- c Chaine-Nickson v Bank of Ireland [1976] IR 393, Ir HC.
Clarke v Earl of Ormonde (1821) Jac 108, 37 ER 791, [1814–23] All ER Rep 329.
Cowin, Re, Cowin v Gravett (1886) 33 Ch D 179.
Gartside v IRC [1968] 1 All ER 121, [1968] AC 553, [1968] 2 WLR 277, HL.
Gestetner Settlement, Re, Barnett v Blumka [1953] 1 All ER 1150, [1953] Ch 672, d [1953] 2 WLR 1033.
Gulbenkian's Settlement Trusts, Re, Whishaw v Stephens, [1968] 3 All ER 785, [1970] AC 408, [1968] 3 WLR 1127, HL; affg sub nom Re Gulbenkian's Settlement Trusts, Hacopian v Maun [1967] 3 All ER 15, [1968] Ch 126, [1967] 3 WLR 1112, CA.
Hartigan Nominees Pty Ltd v Rydge (1992) 29 NSWLR 405, NSW CA.
Hay's Settlement Trusts, Re [1981] 3 All ER 786, [1982] 1 WLR 202.
- e Howard de Walden (Lord) v IRC [1942] 1 All ER 287, [1942] 1 KB 389, CA.
Londonderry's Settlement, Re, Peat v Walsh [1964] 3 All ER 855, [1965] Ch 918, CA.
Manisty's Settlement, Re, Manisty v Manisty [1973] 2 All ER 1203, [1974] Ch 17, [1973] 3 WLR 341.
McPhail v Doulton [1970] 2 All ER 228, [1971] AC 424, [1970] 2 WLR 1110, HL; rvsg f in part sub nom Re Baden's Deed Trusts, Baden v Smith [1969] 1 All ER 1016, [1969] 2 Ch 388, [1969] 3 WLR 12, CA.
Mettoy Pension Trustees Ltd v Evans [1991] 2 All ER 513, [1990] 1 WLR 1587.
Morice v Bishop of Durham (1805) 10 Ves 522, 32 ER 947, [1803–13] All ER Rep 451, LC.
- g Murphy's Settlements, Re, Murphy v Murphy, [1998] 3 All ER 1, [1999] 1 WLR 282.
Nelson, Re, Norris v Nelson (1918) [1928] Ch 920n, CA.
O'Rourke v Darbishire [1920] AC 581, [1920] All ER Rep 1, HL.
Randall v Lubrano (31 October 1975, unreported), NSW SC.
Rouse v IOOF Australia Trustees Ltd (1999) 2 ITEL 289, Aust SC.
Saunders v Vautier (1841) 4 Beav 115, 49 ER 282, Rolls Ct; affd (1841) Cr&Ph 240, h 41 ER 482, [1835–42] All ER Rep 58, LC.
Smith, Re, Public Trustee v Aspinall [1928] Ch 915, [1928] All ER Rep 520.
Spellson v George (1987) 11 NSWLR 300, NSW SC.
Tillott, Re, Lee v Wilson [1892] 1 Ch 86.
Vestey's (Lord) Exors v IRC [1949] 1 All ER 1108, HL.
- j Whitrick (decd), Re, Sutcliffe v Sutcliffe [1957] 2 All ER 467, [1957] 1 WLR 884, CA.

Cases also cited in argument

- Armitage v Nurse* [1997] 2 All ER 705, [1998] Ch 241, [1997] 3 WLR 1046, CA.
Breadner v Granville-Grossman [2000] 4 All ER 705, [2001] Ch 523, [2001] 2 WLR 593.
Brooks' Settlement Trusts, Re, Lloyds Bank Ltd v Tillard [1939] 3 All ER 920, [1939] Ch 993.

Fairbairn (decd), Re [1967] VR 633, Vic SC.

Gilchrist, Ex p, Re Armstrong (1886) 17 QBD 521, CA.

Jones v Torin (1833) 6 Sim 225, 53 ER 589.

Leek (decd), Re, Darwen v Leek [1967] 2 All ER 1160, [1967] Ch 1061, [1967] 3 WLR 576; affd [1968] 1 All ER 793, [1969] 1 Ch 563, [1968] 2 WLR 1385, CA.

Millar v Hornsby (2000) 3 ITELR 81, Vic SC.

Norwich Pharmacal Co v Customs and Excise Comrs [1973] 2 All ER 943, [1974] AC 133, [1973] 3 WLR 164, HL.

Saxone Shoe Co Ltd's Trust Deed, Re, Re Abbott's Will Trusts, Abbott v Pearson [1962] 2 All ER 904, [1962] 1 WLR 943.

Talbot v Marshfield (1865) 2 Dr & Sm 549, 62 ER 728.

Tierney v King [1983] 2 Qd R 580, Qld SC.

Wynne v Humberston (1858) 27 Beav 421, 54 ER 165.

Appeal

Vadim Schmidt appealed with special leave granted on 19 September 2001 from a decision of the Staff of Government Division of the High Court of the Isle of Man (Deemster M Kerruish QC and GF Tattersall QC sitting as a Judge of Appeal) dated 26 February 2001 ((2001) 3 ITELR 734) allowing the appeal of the respondent, Rosewood Trust Ltd, from the order of Deemster Cain QC in the High Court of the Isle of Man on 19 November 1999, requiring the respondent to provide information concerning two settlements known as the Angora Trust and the Everest Trust in which the appellant claimed to be interested on his own behalf and as administrator of the estate of his late father, Vitali Schmidt.

Alan Steinfeld QC and Marcus Staff (instructed by Lane & Partners as agents for Cains, Isle of Man) for the appellant.

David Brownbill and Michael Gibbon (instructed by Saunders & Co as agents for Simocks, Isle of Man) for the respondent.

The Board took time for consideration.

27 March 2003. The following judgment of the Board was delivered.

LORD WALKER OF GESTINGTHORPE.

INTRODUCTION

[1] It has become common for wealthy individuals in many parts of the world (including countries which have no indigenous law of trusts) to place funds at their disposition into trusts (often with a network of underlying companies) regulated by the law of, and managed by trustees resident in, territories with which the settlor (who may be also a beneficiary) has no substantial connection. These territories (sometimes called tax havens) are chosen not for their geographical convenience (indeed face-to-face meetings between the settlor and his trustees are often very inconvenient) but because they are supposed to offer special advantages in terms of confidentiality and protection from fiscal demands (and, sometimes from problems under the insolvency laws, or laws restricting freedom of testamentary disposition, in the country of the settlor's domicile). The trusts and powers contained in a settlement established in such circumstances may give no reliable indication of who will in the event benefit from the settlement. Typically it will contain very wide a discretions exercisable by the trustees (sometimes only with the consent of a so-called protector) in favour of a widely-defined class of beneficiaries. The exercise of those discretions may depend on the settlor's wishes as confidentially imparted to the trustees and the protector. As a further cloak against transparency, the identity of the true settlor or settlors may be concealed behind some corporate figurehead.

b [2] All these considerations may encourage a settlor to entrust substantial funds to an apparently secure and confidential offshore shelter. But the very same features may, as this case strikingly illustrates, present problems to the close relatives of a settlor who dies unexpectedly, as did Mr Vitali Schmidt (Mr Schmidt), the co-settlor of two Isle of Man settlements called the Angora Trust and the Everest Trust.

c [3] The main issue on this appeal is the claim of Mr Schmidt's son Vadim, the appellant, to obtain trust accounts and other information from the trustees of the two settlements. The sole trustee of each settlement is Rosewood Trust Ltd (Rosewood), an Isle of Man company which is in business as a provider of corporate and trustee services. It is the respondent to the appeal. The appellant's claim for disclosure of accounts and other information has been made in two capacities, that is both personally and as the administrator of Mr Schmidt's estate. Mr Schmidt died d intestate in Moscow on 31 August 1997 and letters of administration to his estate in the Isle of Man were granted to the appellant on 17 August 1998.

e [4] Before any summary of the trusts and powers of the settlements it is appropriate to say something about the background to this litigation, and the evidence which was before the lower courts. When Mr Schmidt died (according to the appellant's evidence, unexpectedly and alone at his Moscow apartment) the appellant was 19 years of age (he was born on 28 September 1977). He was entitled to share in his father's estate together with his mother Svetlana and his paternal f grandmother, Alisa. He has deposed that he has devoted his time and resources to tracing the assets of his father's estate. His father was a senior executive director of Lukoil, which is the largest oil company in Russia and one of the largest oil companies in the world. The appellant believes that his efforts to trace his father's assets (in Liechtenstein, Austria, Cyprus and the Isle of Man) have been frustrated by some of his father's co-directors.

g [5] In June 1998 the appellant commenced proceedings (the 1998 proceedings) in the Isle of Man against Rosewood, its directors and several other defendants. In the 1998 proceedings the appellant alleged breach of trust and breach of fiduciary duty. He obtained an ex parte order made on 10 July 1998 (and varied by consent on 16 July 1998) prohibiting Rosewood and other defendants from dealing with h assets comprised directly or indirectly in the Angora Trust and the Everest Trust. The order also provided for extensive disclosure of information.

j [6] The appellant commenced the present proceedings by petition on 1 June 1999. His case, as set out in an affidavit sworn by him on 7 June 1999, is that the disclosure made to him pursuant to the ex parte order 'raised more questions than it answered', especially as parts of some disclosed documents had been obliterated. It appears that over $US105m was received by the two settlements between their creation and 1998. The appellant deposed that sums totalling about $US14.6m had been paid to him (as his father's administrator) between August and October 1998. These sums were not accepted by him by way of compromise of the claims made in the 1998 proceedings, and he believed them to represent only a fraction of Mr Schmidt's total entitlement under the two settlements. The appellant has obtained a lengthy accountants' report dated 4 June 1999 from Ernst & Young setting out alleged deficiencies and inconsistencies in the material provided. a

[7] The appellant's present proceedings seek fuller disclosure of trust accounts and information about the trust assets, not by way of discovery in the 1998 proceedings but by virtue of the discretionary interests or expectations which the appellant claims that he himself has, and that his late father had during his life, under the two settlements. The present proceedings were initially attacked by Rosewood as being an abuse of process, but that submission was rejected at first instance and was not pursued on Rosewood's appeal to the Staff of Government Division (see (2001) 3 ITEL 734). b

[8] That is only a brief summary of the background to the litigation. It has many features which might be thought to prompt further questions. However neither side has suggested that the settlements should be regarded as sham documents, or as documents entered into for illegal purposes. It is unnecessary to try to go further, at this stage, into the origins of the settlements. Indeed it would not be possible to go much further since the judgments below are very short on any findings of fact, and the record before the Board does not contain all the affidavit evidence sworn in the two sets of proceedings. It appears that Rosewood does not accept that Mr Schmidt was a settlor of either settlement. Certainly he was not named as a settlor. But (in responses filed in the High Court of the Isle of Man) Rosewood has described Pacquerette Ltd (Pacquerette), the named settlor, as 'simply a nominee' and has stated that Mr Schmidt 'was involved in the setting up' of each trust. Rosewood also stated in its answer that its involvement was 'simply to receive and pay out such funds as [Mr Schmidt] chose to channel through the Isle of Man'. In the absence of other evidence that justifies the conclusion that he was one of those who joined in causing the settlements to be made and funded, and was in substance a co-settlor. c
d
e

THE TERMS OF THE SETTLEMENTS f

[9] The Angora Trust was executed on 6 April 1992 between (1) Pacquerette and (2) Lorne House Trust Ltd (Lorne House). The Everest Trust was executed on 20 June 1995 between Pacquerette and Lorne House. Lorne House (an Isle of Man company apparently controlled by the same persons as Rosewood) retired from the trusteeship of both settlements, and Rosewood was appointed as sole trustee in its place, on 3 May 1997. g

[10] The Angora Trust and the Everest Trust are in similar but by no means identical form. The convenient course is to summarise the trusts and powers of the Angora Trust and then identify the points of difference in the Everest Trust.

[11] Clause 1 of the Angora Trust contains definitions. Some are self-explanatory but the following should be noted. (1) 'The Trust Period' and 'the Accumulation Period' are both defined as the period of 80 years from the execution of the settlement (and that period is by cl 2 the perpetuity period permitted by the law of the Isle of Man) subject to powers for the trustees to terminate either period before the expiration of 80 years. (2) 'The Beneficiaries' are defined as the Royal National Lifeboat Institution (the RNLI) and the persons listed in the second schedule. That schedule (originally copied in a redacted form, but later without redaction) contains the names of Mr Schmidt and other Lukoil senior executives. (3) 'The Protector' is defined as Mr Schmidt 'or any other person holding the office of Protector hereunder'. Clause 3 provides for the settlement to be regulated by the law of the Isle of Man, subject to a power for trustees to change the proper law. h a [12] Clauses 4, 5, 6 and 7 contain the dispositive trusts and powers affecting the trust fund. These present some difficulties of construction but their general effect is as follows. (1) Clause 4(1) contains a wide power of appointment exercisable by the trustees, with the prior written consent of the protector, by deed executed during the trust period. The objects of the powers are all or any one or more of the beneficiaries, subject to certain restrictions set out in the proviso to cl 4(1). Some of these restrictions relate to United States taxation and need not be set out in detail, but it is notable that provisos (ee) and (ff) are as follows:
j

(ee) no distribution of income shall be made to any beneficiary who has not attained the age of twenty-one years except in payment of educational or necessary medical expenses or for the alleviation of hardship.

c (ff) no distribution of capital shall be made to any beneficiary who has not attained the age of twenty-five years except in payment of educational or necessary medical expenses or for the alleviation of hardship.'

(2) Clause 7 contains a comparable power (except that the consent of the protector is not required) for the trustees to make transfers to other settlements benefiting all or any of the beneficiaries. (3) Clause 5 contains a power for the trustees to accumulate income during the accumulation period.

d [13] It is cl 4(2) and 6 which present the difficulties of construction. Clause 4(2) is in the following terms:

e '(2) Upon the death of any Beneficiary the Trustee shall hold that portion of the Trust Fund to which the deceased Beneficiary had been entitled during his lifetime UPON TRUST for such person or persons as the deceased Beneficiary had notified the Trustee in writing and in the absence of such notification for that person or those persons whom the Trustee believes to be the closest surviving relative or relatives of the deceased Beneficiary.'

f The problem here is that unless and until the trustees have exercised their power of appointment under cl 4(1) in such a way as to give any of the beneficiaries a fixed entitlement (for instance, a life interest in some fraction of the trust fund) the reference to 'that portion of the Trust Fund to which the deceased Beneficiary had been entitled during his lifetime' is inapposite.

g [14] Clause 6 is in the following terms:

'Subject as aforesaid the Trustee shall hold the Trust Fund and the income thereof so far as not effectively dealt with pursuant to the foregoing trusts and powers UPON TRUST for such purposes as are according to the laws of the Isle of Man or any subsequent forum of administration.'

h The problem here is that there is a gap. It is possible to conjecture (especially by reference to the comparable clause of the Everest Trust) that the gap should be filled by 'charitable' (or 'charitable and public') but it would be a strong thing for any court to fill the gap as part of a process of construction (as opposed to rectification).

j [15] The remaining clauses of the Angora Trust contain wide administrative and other powers and provisions, mostly in a familiar form. The following call for mention. (1) Clause 29 enables a sole corporate trustee to act, and cl 28 and 29 together provide for the remuneration of trustees. (2) Clauses 30, 31 and 32 provide for the devolution (and possible lapse) of the functions of the protector (since Mr Schmidt's death, Mr Alexander Djparidze has been appointed as protector).

(3) Clause 33 confers on the protector the power of appointing and removing trustees, and (in sub-cl (c), which also seems to have a gap)— a

‘power to require the Trustee or Trustees upon request information relating to the Trust including minutes accounts documents papers records or other information no matter how maintained or any part thereof whether specified or in general.’ b

(4) Clause 34 gives the trustees power to have the trust accounts audited and ends with the words ‘and any Beneficiary may require such an audit’. (5) Clause 38 gives the trustees power to release or restrict their own powers.

[16] The principal points of difference in the Everest Trust are as follows. (1) Clauses 1, 2 and 4 correspond to cl 1, 2 and 3 respectively of the Angora Trust except that (i) the definition of ‘the Beneficiaries’ includes any person or charity added under cl 3; (ii) the same definition refers to a second schedule which was apparently never included in the deed, but the names of Lukoil senior executives were added in manuscript at the end of the deed (the full list has never been disclosed, but it included Mr Schmidt); and (iii) the protector was named as Mr Ralif Safin. (2) Clause 3.3 confers on the trustees power exercisable by written instrument during the trust period to add to the class of beneficiaries ‘any person or persons or class or classes of person (including an individual then unborn) or charity’ other than a current trustee or (while the trustees are resident in the Isle of Man) any Isle of Man resident. Other provisions in cl 3 permit the trustees to exclude beneficiaries and permit a person (if sui juris) to exclude himself. (3) Clause 5(a) contains a wide power of appointment very similar to that in cl 4(1) of the Angora Trust, except that the provisos are different (in particular, they do not refer to United States tax nor do they refer to benefits for persons under 21 or 25 years of age). There is no cl 5(b). (4) Clause 6 contains, in default of and subject to any appointment under cl 5, (i) a discretionary trust of income in favour of the beneficiaries, subject to (ii) a proviso containing a power for the trustees to accumulate income during the accumulation period. (5) Clauses 7 and 8 correspond to cl 6 and 7 respectively of the Angora Trust, except that the apparent gap in cl 6 of the Angora Trust is in cl 7 of the Everest Trust filled by the words ‘both charitable and public as the Trustee shall from time to time determine’. (6) Clause 35 of the Everest Trust (corresponding to cl 34 of the Angora Trust) does not include the final words ‘and any Beneficiary may require such an audit’. c
d
e
f
g

[17] Each settlement contained (in its first schedule) particulars of the property initially settled. In the Angora Trust this was 50 ordinary shares in Nizam Ltd, a company incorporated in the Republic of Ireland. The first schedule to the Everest Trust has never been fully disclosed, but it included two $US1 shares in a company called Petragonis Ltd (Petragonis). The Ernst & Young report contains some further information (but, the appellant says, incomplete information) about the web of companies (incorporated in different parts of the world) apparently associated with the two settlements. For present purposes it is sufficient to identify a company called Gingernut Ltd (Gingernut) and Petragonis as to the two companies which were used as the principal vehicles for the distribution to or for the benefit of Mr Schmidt of funds from the Angora Trust and the Everest Trust respectively. These two companies were apparently the source of the sums distributed to the appellant, as Mr Schmidt’s personal representative, in 1998. h
j

[18] Before leaving the terms of the two settlements there is one further feature of the Angora Trust which calls for mention, although the weight to be attached to it is a matter for debate. An unredacted copy of the Angora Trust a found by the appellant with his father's papers shows that the second schedule originally contained eight names. Mr Schmidt's name was followed by the words 'as to a three-tenths share (30%)'. Each of the other seven names was followed by the words 'as to a one-tenth share (10%)'. All the references to fractional shares were crossed through (but so as to remain legible). In addition

b four of the names had been crossed through, and one further name had been added in manuscript (without any reference to a share). This feature, together with the other problematic points on the Angora Trust already mentioned, gives much force to the submission of Mr Steinfeld QC (for the appellant) that the settlement was 'cobbled together'. Mr Brownbill (for Rosewood) agreed that the settlement appeared to contain mistakes.

c [19] On 23 June 1992 Mr Schmidt wrote to Lorne House as trustee of the Angora Trust a letter (the Angora letter) in the following terms:

d 'I understand that I am a beneficiary of the Angora Trust. If I should die prior to the termination of the Trust I wish any portion to which I might have been entitled to be held upon trust for [and then he gave the appellant's name and date and place of birth].'

e [20] On 31 October 1995 Mr Schmidt wrote to Lorne House as trustee of the Everest Trust a letter (the Everest letter) in the following terms:

f 'The Everest Trust. While I recognise the discretionary powers vested in you as Trustees of the above Trust, it would be my wish if I were to die prior to the termination of the Trust that my share of the trust property be given to Vadim Schmidt.'

[21] There are some indications (in particular in Rosewood's answer, which was later amended in this respect) that Rosewood initially accepted the Angora letter as an effective exercise of a power conferred on Mr Schmidt by cl 4(2) of the Angora f Trust. However Rosewood's present position is that neither letter had any legal effect.

THE PROCEEDINGS BELOW

[22] The appellant's petition first came before Deemster Cain on 5 October 1999. It was supported by the appellant's affidavit of 7 June 1999 already mentioned.
g Rosewood had an opportunity to put in evidence but did not do so. The time for argument was limited and the deemster indicated that he was not going to make an order at that hearing. But he gave a short ex tempore judgment declining to dismiss the petition as an abuse of process. He indicated that in principle Rosewood as trustee must make disclosure to its beneficiaries—'each beneficiary', he said, 'is h entitled to know what the trustees have done with the money'—but that he was concerned about the confidentiality of third parties. He made the helpful suggestion that disclosure might be made, not to the appellant himself, but to the appellant's legal or accountancy advisers. He adjourned the matter to see whether the parties could agree a form of order.

j [23] The parties were unable to agree on the form of order and the matter came back to the deemster on 19 November 1999 when he made an order. The order as finally drawn up is elaborate, running to nine pages of typescript and including (in its second schedule) the names of over 60 companies (or other legal entities) established in different parts of the world. The essential provisions of the order were for Rosewood to make extensive disclosure of unredacted documents and to provide information to three named members of the firm of Ernst & Young (the inspectors) on the inspectors and their lawyers giving undertakings to hold all the disclosed documents and information in confidence, to be used only for purposes authorised by the order. It is not necessary, for present purposes, to go further into the detail of the order. a

[24] Rosewood appealed to the Staff of Government Division and the appeal was heard by Deemster Kerruish QC and Mr GF Tattersall QC (sitting as a Judge of Appeal) on several dates between January and April 2000. The court heard but rejected an application by Rosewood to adduce further evidence. It gave a reserved judgment on 26 February 2001 allowing the appeal and setting aside the order of Deemster Cain (see (2001) 3 ITELR 734). b

[25] Rosewood had initially put forward four grounds of appeal. The first, abuse of process, was not proceeded with; the second and third raised points as to the extent and efficacy of the safeguards for confidentiality embodied in the order; and the fourth related to costs. But a week before the appeal hearing Rosewood asked for permission to amend its grounds of appeal and to contend that the appellant was not a beneficiary in any sense of the word under the two settlements, and that his father, Mr Schmidt, was never more than 'a mere object of a power who as such had no entitlement to trust documents or information'. The amendment was allowed even though it necessitated an adjournment and allowed Rosewood to run a quite different case from that which it had put forward below. c

[26] Most of the judgment of the Staff of Government Division is concerned with the point of principle raised in the new ground of appeal. Since it allowed the appeal on that ground, it did not go far into the other grounds of appeal. But the court indicated (at [65]) that if it had concluded that the deemster had jurisdiction to make the order appealed from, it would have 'felt constrained to exercise [its] discretion in favour of, in principle, making an order for disclosure'. The court noted (at [66]) that it had not found it necessary to consider— d

'firstly, the privacy and confidentiality of the other beneficiaries of the settlement; secondly, the scope of the order; and thirdly the appointment of the [appellant's, ie Vadim Schmidt's] lawyers [which seems to be a mistake for "accountants"] as inspectors.' e

Her Majesty in Council gave special leave to appeal on 19 September 2001. f

ISSUES OF CONSTRUCTION g

[27] Before turning to the point of law which is the main issue on this appeal it is convenient to clear the ground by referring briefly to some preliminary issues of construction which were not argued below, but which were to some extent debated before the Board. Three of these relate to the Angora Trust, and two can be dealt with quite briefly. (1) The appellant's printed case contended that cl 4(1) contains not a power of appointment, but a discretionary trust. Mr Steinfeld rightly did not seek to develop this contention in his oral submissions, although he did not formally abandon it. It is a hopeless argument. (2) The gap in cl 6 may well have been intended to be filled by a reference to charity, but it would be a strong thing for the court to fill the gap as part of a process of construction (see for instance Re Whitrick (dec'd), Sutcliffe v Sutcliffe [1957] 2 All ER 467, [1957] 1 WLR 884). The trustees could at any time fill the gap, if they thought fit, by appointing an ultimate trust to the RNLI. But it is not necessary to pursue the point because it has no practical bearing on the outcome of the appeal. (3) The effect (if any) of cl 4(2), in conjunction with the Angora letter, is however potentially of very great importance, and it must be considered more fully. h

- a [28] Both sides agree that the Angora Trust is a badly-drafted document. It may be that the Lukoil executives who caused it to be brought into existence had an inadequate understanding of its effect. The deleted reference to fixed shares in the second schedule strongly suggests that they may not have seen the settlement as conferring on the trustees the very wide discretions which it appears to confer.
- b [29] Mr Steinfeld submitted that each of the putative settlors should be regarded as having been in some sense entitled to the funds which he caused to be brought into the settlement, and that this enabled cl 4(2) to be given a sensible meaning. The alternative, he said, would be that the settlement would become a sort of tontine for the longest-living settlor, an absurd result which cannot have been intended.
- c [30] Mr Brownbill submitted that cl 4(2) was obviously a mistake of some sort, and that it would do unacceptable violence to the language of the settlement to treat Mr Schmidt as having been entitled to a portion of the trust fund during his lifetime, when he was never more than a mere object of a discretionary power of appointment.
- d [31] Their Lordships take the view that they cannot decide this issue of construction, for two reasons. First, it is a question which is likely to be of acute concern to the other beneficiaries interested under the Angora Trust, but they are not at present parties to the proceedings. The other beneficiaries (or at any rate a representative of them in respect of whom a representation order could be made) would have to be joined and given the opportunity of making submissions on the point of construction. They would then be bound by any order deciding the point.
- e The second reason for the Board to refrain from deciding the point at this stage is that there is insufficient evidence (and no findings below) as to the surrounding circumstances (or 'matrix of fact') in which the settlement was made.
- f [32] The Board does not therefore express any view on this issue of construction, beyond stating that it (unlike the point on cl 4(1)) is arguable. Mr Steinfeld's proposed construction does do some violence to the language of cl 4(2), but the modern approach of the court is not to reject any part of a legal document as meaningless without first trying hard to give it a sensible meaning: see the observations of Lord Upjohn in Re Gulbenkian's Settlement Trusts, Whishaw v Stephens [1968] 3 All ER 785 at 791, [1970] AC 508 at 522 (on appeal from Re Gulbenkian's Settlement Trusts, Hacobian v Maun [1967] 3 All ER 15, [1968] Ch 126).
- g The appellant may take steps to have the proceedings reconstituted and to have this issue of construction determined in the High Court of the Isle of Man. But unless and until he takes that course and succeeds in his argument, it cannot be assumed that the appellant in his personal capacity is a beneficiary (in any sense) under the Angora Trust.
- h [33] In relation to the Everest Trust the appellant in his personal capacity is no more than a possible object of the very wide power to add beneficiaries conferred by cl 3.3. The Everest letter provides clear evidence of Mr Schmidt's wishes and confirms (as would in any case be fairly evident) that the appellant may have a particularly strong claim on the trustees' discretion. But neither the Everest letter
- j nor any other document put in evidence had any further effect on his status as a possible beneficiary, and ultimately Mr Steinfeld did not contend otherwise.

DISCLOSURE TO DISCRETIONARY BENEFICIARIES: THE BACKGROUND

[34] Counsel have very properly referred the Board to a considerable number of authorities, some of them going back to the early years of the nineteenth century. It is appropriate to reflect that during the long period covered by these authorities

(but especially during the second half of the twentieth century) the forms and functions of settlements have changed to a degree which would have astonished Lord Eldon LC. By the 1930s high rates of personal taxation led some wealthy individuals to make settlements which enabled funds to be accumulated in the hands of overseas trustees or companies (see for instance Lord Vestey's Exors v IRC [1949] 1 All ER 1108). This practice increased enormously with the introduction of capital gains tax in 1965. But increasingly stringent anti-avoidance measures encouraged legal advisers to devise forms of settlement under which the true intended beneficiaries were not clearly identified in the settlement. Indeed their interests or expectations were often barely perceptible. Rarely did a beneficiary take an indefeasibly vested interest with an ascertainable market value. Tax avoidance is therefore one element which has strongly influenced the forms of settlements; and once the offshore tax-avoidance industry has acquired standard forms its inclination is to use them, subject perhaps to some more or less skilful adaptation, even for clients whose aim is not to avoid United Kingdom taxation.

[35] There is another element, also linked (though less directly) to taxation, which has encouraged the inclusion in settlements of very widely defined classes of beneficiaries. After the 1939–45 war estate duty was charged in the United Kingdom at very high rates, with much less generous reliefs for agricultural and business property than those now available. A wealthy landowner or businessman might be advised that the safest way to preserve his fortune was to give most of it away, while he was still in the prime of life, to trustees of an irrevocable settlement in discretionary form under which the settlor himself was not a beneficiary. It is not surprising that a settlor in such a position should wish to cover as comprehensively as he could all possible current and future claims on his bounty, since he was being asked to make an immediate, irrevocable disposition of much of his wealth, rather than being able to review from time to time the ambulatory dispositions in his will and codicils. But his lawyers might also advise him that the most natural expressions for defining discretionary objects of his bounty (such as ‘relatives’, ‘old friends’, ‘dependants’ or ‘persons with moral claims’) were of doubtful legal efficacy. So there was a tendency to define the class in the widest possible terms. The process can be seen in a long line of cases starting with Re Gestetner Settlement, Barnett v Blumka [1953] 1 All ER 115, [1953] Ch 672. It led to Re Manisty's Settlement, Manisty v Manisty [1973] 2 All ER 1203, [1974] Ch 17, upholding the validity of an ‘intermediate’ power comparable to that in cl 3.3 of the Everest Trust (that is, a power to add as beneficiaries anyone in the world apart from a very small class of excluded persons).

[36] The Board have to consider what rights or claims to disclosure the appellant has, either personally or as his father’s personal representative, under two badly drafted settlements whose terms have been moulded by the sort of influences mentioned above. One possible reaction would be that Mr Schmidt and his colleagues have made their bed and they must lie on it; if they have deliberately entered into a web of camouflage, it is hardly for anyone claiming through them to complain that the position is not transparent. As Lord Greene MR observed, giving the judgment of the court in Lord Howard de Walden v IRC [1942] 1 All ER 287 at 289, [1942] 1 KB 389 at 397 if a taxpayer plays with fire it scarcely lies in his mouth to complain of burnt fingers. However, the Board consider that that inclination must be resisted. As already noted, it has not been suggested that the settlements are shams, or tainted with illegality. It is fundamental to the law of trusts that the court has jurisdiction to supervise and if appropriate intervene in the administration of a trust, including a discretionary trust. As Holland J said in the Australian case of a Randall v Lubrano (31 October 1975, unreported) cited by Kirby P in Hartigan Nominees Pty Ltd v Rydge (1992) 29 NSWLR 405 at 416:

‘... no matter how wide the trustee’s discretion in the administration and application of a discretionary trust fund and even if in all or some respects the discretions are expressed in the deed as equivalent to those of an absolute owner of the trust fund, the trustee is still a trustee.’

DISCRETIONARY TRUSTS AND POWERS

[37] Several of the numerous authorities referred to by counsel have been concerned with the general characteristics of interests (or rights) under discretionary trusts (on the one hand) and mere powers (of a dispositive character) conferred on trustees in their fiduciary capacity (on the other hand). It is convenient to refer to these before coming to the authorities directly concerned with disclosure of trust documents or information.

c [38] In the important case of McPhail v Doulton [1970] 2 All ER 228, [1971] AC 424 the House of Lords finally settled the vexed question of whether the test for validity, in point of certainty of objects, is the same for trusts and powers, or whether the test for trusts is more demanding. It held the test to be the same. That general question arose in the context of a provision (which the Court of Appeal took to be a power, but the House of Lords held to be a trust) for trustees to distribute income ‘to or for the benefit of any of the officers and employees or ex-officers or ex-employees of [a named company] or to any relatives or dependants of any such persons’ (with a power for the trustees to hold up income which did not, as the House of Lords held, prevent the trustees distributing the retentions as income) (see [1970] 2 All ER 228 at 228, [1971] AC 424 at 428).

e [39] That was the context in which Lord Wilberforce ([1970] 2 All ER 228 at 240, [1971] AC 424 at 448–449) made some general observations which, although fairly lengthy, need to be set out in full:

f ‘... some general observations, or reflections, may be permissible. It is striking how narrow and in a sense artificial is the distinction, in cases such as the present, between trusts or as the particular type of trust is called, trust powers, and powers. It is only necessary to read the learned judgments in the Court of Appeal ([1969] 1 All ER 1016, [1969] 2 Ch 388) to see that what to one mind may appear as a power of distribution coupled with a trust to dispose of the undistributed surplus, by accumulation or otherwise, may to another appear as a trust for distribution coupled with a power to withhold a portion and accumulate or otherwise dispose of it. A layman and, I suspect, also a logician would find it hard to understand what difference there is. It does not seem satisfactory that the entire validity of a disposition should depend on such delicate shading. And if one considers how in practice reasonable and competent trustees would act, and ought to act, in the two cases, surely a matter very relevant to the question of validity, the distinction appears even less significant. To say that there is no obligation to exercise a mere power and that no court will intervene to compel it, whereas a trust is mandatory and its execution may be compelled, may be legally correct enough, but the proposition does not contain an exhaustive comparison of the duties of persons who are trustees in the two cases. A trustee of an employees’ benefit fund, whether given a power or a trust power, is still a trustee and he would surely consider in either case that he has a fiduciary duty; he is most likely to have been selected as a suitable person to administer it from his knowledge and experience, and would consider he has a responsibility to do so according to its purpose. It would be a complete misdescription of his position to say that, if what he has is a power unaccompanied by an imperative trust to distribute, he cannot be controlled by the court unless he exercised it capriciously, or outside the field permitted by the trust (cf Farwell on Powers (3rd Edn, 1916, p 10)). Any trustee would surely make it his duty to know what is the permissible area of selection and then consider responsibly, in individual cases, whether a contemplated beneficiary was within the power and whether, in relation to other possible claimants, a particular grant was appropriate. Correspondingly a trustee with a duty to distribute, particularly among a potentially very large class, would surely never require the preparation of a complete list of names, which anyhow would tell him little that he needs to know. He would examine the field, by class and category; might indeed make diligent and careful enquiries, depending on how much money he had to give away and the means at his disposal, as to the composition and needs of particular categories and of individuals within them; decide on certain priorities or proportions, and then select individuals according to their needs or qualifications. If he acts in this manner, can it really be said that he is not carrying out the trust? Differences there certainly are between trusts (trust powers) and powers, but as regards validity should they be so great as that in one case complete, or practically complete ascertainment is needed, but not in the other? Such distinction as there is would seem to lie in the extent of the survey which the trustee is required to carry out; if he has to distribute the whole of a fund's income, he must necessarily make a wider and more systematic survey than if his duty is expressed in terms of a power to make grants. But just as, in the case of a power, it is possible to underestimate the fiduciary obligation of the trustee to whom it is given, so, in the case of a trust (trust power), the danger lies in overstating what the trustee requires to know or to enquire into before he can properly execute his trust. The difference may be one of degree rather than of principle; in the well-known words of Sir George Farwell (Farwell on Powers (3rd Edn, 1916, p 10)) trusts and powers are often blended, and the mixture may vary in its ingredients.'

[40] This passage gives a very clear and eminently realistic account of both the points of difference and the similarities between a discretionary trust and a fiduciary dispositive power. The outstanding point of difference is of course that under a discretionary trust of income distribution of income (within a reasonable time) is mandatory, the trustees' discretion being limited to the choice of the recipients and the shares in which they are to take. If there is a small, closed class of discretionary objects who are all sui juris, their collective entitlement gives them a limited power of disposition over the income subject to the discretionary trust, as is illustrated by Re Smith, Public Trustee v Aspinall [1928] Ch 915, [1928] All ER Rep 520 and Re Nelson, Norris v Nelson (1918) [1928] Ch 920n. But the possibility of such a collective disposition will be rare, and on his own the object of a discretionary trust has no more of an assignable or transmissible interest than the object of a mere power.

[41] Apart from the test for certainty being the same and the fact that an individual's interest or right is non-assignable, there are other practical similarities between the positions of the two types of object. Either has the negative power to block a family arrangement or similar transaction proposed to

- a be effected under the rule in Saunders v Vautier (1841) 4 Beav 115, 49 ER 282 (unless in the case of a power the trustees are specially authorised to release, that is to say extinguish, it). Both have a right to have their claims properly considered by the trustees. But if the discretion is exercisable in favour of a very wide class the trustees need not survey mankind from China to Peru (as Harman J, echoing Dr Johnson, said in Re Gestetner Settlement [1953] 1 All ER 1150 at 1155–1156, b [1953] Ch 672 at 688–689) if it is clear who are the prime candidates for the exercise of the trustees' discretion.

- [42] That thought was developed by Templeman J in Re Manisty's Settlement [1973] 2 All ER 1203, [1974] Ch 17, although he was mainly concerned to contrast the exercise by trustees of an intermediate power (in the sense mentioned above) with the exercise by trustees of a wide special power. He said ([1973] 2 All ER c 1203 at 1211, [1974] Ch 17 at 27) that a wide power, whether special or intermediate, does not negative or prohibit a sensible approach by trustees to the consideration and exercise of their powers. After referring to some very well-known observations by Lord Eldon LC in Morice v Bishop of Durham (1805) 10 Ves 522 at 539, [1803–13] All ER Rep 451 at 458, Templeman J continued:

- d 'Nor does an intermediate power break the principles laid down by Lord Eldon LC in the passage which I have read because, in relation to a power exercisable by the trustees at their absolute discretion, the only "control" exercisable by the court is the removal of the trustees, and the only "due administration" which can be "directed" is an order requiring the trustees to e consider the exercise of the power, and in particular a request from a person within the ambit of the power.' (See [1973] 2 All ER 1203 at 1211–1212, [1974] Ch 17 at 27–28.)

- However in Mettoy Pension Trustees Ltd v Evans [1991] 2 All ER 513 at 549, [1990] 1 WLR 1587 at 1617–1618, Warner J (after referring to Lord Wilberforce's f observations in McPhail v Doulton [1970] 2 All ER 228 at 247, [1971] AC 424 at 456–457 and to some authorities not cited in Re Manisty's Settlement) took a broader view of the court's power to intervene in the case of a fiduciary dispositive power.

DISCLOSURE TO DISCRETIONARY BENEFICIARIES: A PROPRIETARY BASIS?

- g [43] Much of the debate before the Board addressed the question whether a beneficiary's right or claim to disclosure of trust documents should be regarded as a proprietary right. Mr Brownbill argued that it should be classified in that way, and from that starting point he argued that no object of a mere power could have any right or claim to disclosure, because he had no proprietary interest in the trust property. Mr Brownbill submitted that this point has been conclusively h settled by the decision of the House of Lords in O'Rourke v Darbishire [1920] AC 581, [1920] All ER Rep 1. It is therefore useful to go straight to that case to see what it did decide.

- [44] The facts of the case were unusual. Sir Joseph Whitworth, a man of considerable wealth, had died in 1887. In 1884 he had made a will appointing j three executors and leaving his residuary estate to charity. By a codicil made in 1885 he altered his will to leave his ultimate residue to his executors for their own benefit, with a precatory expression of his wishes that it should be used for charitable purposes. Two further codicils executed in 1886 extended the scope of the first codicil's gift to the executors. Sir Joseph's intestate successors would have been Mrs Uniacke (as to realty) and Mrs Uniacke and Mrs McGowan (as to personalty). Mrs McGowan threatened to challenge the will and codicils, but in 1889 there was a compromise between all interested parties. Then in 1916, after Mrs Uniacke, Mrs McGowan and the executors had all died, Mrs Uniacke's administrator (Mr O'Rourke) sought to challenge both the will and codicils and the compromise, alleging fraud by Mr Darbishire (who was one of the executors and had been Sir Joseph's solicitor). Mr O'Rourke sought to obtain disclosure of documents containing legal advice given to Sir Joseph during his lifetime, and to his executors after his death. a

[45] The House of Lords dismissed Mr O'Rourke's appeal, primarily because he had not made out even a prima facie case that the will and codicils were invalid, or that the communications had been promoting fraud. Viscount Finlay ([1920] AC 581 at 603, [1920] All ER Rep 1 at 6) referred to Mr O'Rourke's reliance on a 'proprietary right' and Lord Sumner ([1920] AC 581 at 617, [1920] All ER Rep 1 at 12) referred to 'what has been called the "proprietary" ground'. Lord Parmoor said: b

'A cestui que trust, in an action against his trustees, is generally entitled to the production for inspection of all documents relating to the affairs of the trust. It is not material for the present purpose whether this right is to be regarded as a paramount proprietary right in the cestui que trust, or as a right to be enforced under the law of discovery, since in both cases an essential preliminary is either the admission, or the establishment, of the status on which the right is based.' (See [1920] AC 581 at 619–620, [1920] All ER Rep 1 at 13.) c

[46] It is on what was said by Lord Wrenbury that Mr Brownbill most relied. Lord Wrenbury said: d

'If the plaintiff is right in saying that he is a beneficiary and if the documents are documents belonging to the executors as executors, he has a right to access to the documents which he desires to inspect upon what has been called in the judgments in this case a proprietary right. The beneficiary is entitled to see all trust documents because they are trust documents and because he is a beneficiary. They are in this sense his own. Action or no action, he is entitled to access to them. This has nothing to do with discovery. The right to discovery is a right to see someone else's documents. The proprietary right is a right to access to documents which are your own.' (See [1920] AC 581 at 626–627, [1920] All ER Rep 1 at 17.) e

On the facts of the case, what Lord Wrenbury said was very apposite. If Mr O'Rourke was right in his claim, the executors had had no proper legal or equitable title to Sir Joseph's estate. The grant of probate to them should have been revoked and Mr O'Rourke (together with the representatives of Mrs McGowan) would have been entitled to the whole of the estate, including any documents which formed part of it. f

[47] The same can be said of the earliest authority to which the Board was referred, the decision of Lord Eldon LC in Clarke v Earl of Ormonde (1821) Jac 108, [1814–23] All ER Rep 329. Under private Acts of Parliament real estate in Ireland was vested in trustees in trust to raise money to pay the debts of Walter Marquis of Ormonde, and subject to that trust for the Marquis in fee simple. In those circumstances it is hardly surprising that Lord Eldon LC ((1821) Jac 108 at 119–120) referred to the Marquis' estate in fee simple before observing: 'But he would have the right to say to the trustees, What estates have you sold? What debts have you paid?' g

a [48] In Re Cowin, Cowin v Gravett (1886) 33 Ch D 179 a beneficiary with a vested future interest in one-eighth of a testator's residuary trust fund, subject to his mother's interest during widowhood, wished to mortgage his interest and for that reason sought inspection of the title deeds to the trust property. North J made an order for inspection but rejected the notion that the beneficiary had an absolute right. He quoted (at 185) from the then current edition of Lewin on Trusts (8th edn, 1885) p 975: 'All documents held by the trustee in that character must be produced by him to the cestuis que trust, who in equity are the true owners.' But North J clearly considered that the particular interest of an individual beneficiary might in some circumstances run counter to the collective interest of the beneficiaries as a body. He said (at 187):

c 'I do not say that he is entitled as of right, but only that he is entitled under the circumstances, because there might be a state of circumstances under which the right to production would not exist.'

Chitty J took a similar approach in Re Tillott, Lee v Wilson [1892] 1 Ch 86, noting (at 89) that a trustee is not bound to give a beneficiary information about a share in which he has no interest.

d [49] In Re Londonderry's Settlement, Peat v Walsh [1964] 3 All ER 855, [1965] Ch 918, the Court of Appeal had to consider one of the most important limitations on the right to disclosure of trust documents, that is the need to protect confidentiality in communications between trustees as to the exercise of their dispositive discretions, and in communications made to the trustees by other beneficiaries. That issue can alternatively be seen as an inquiry whether such confidential communications are indeed trust documents. The judgments of the three members of the court (Harman, Danckwerts and Salmon LJ) are not easy to reconcile. All three referred to O'Rourke v Darbishire but Harman and Danckwerts LJ found that Lord Wrenbury's general observations gave little assistance on the issue which concerned them. Only Salmon LJ ([1964] 3 All ER 855 at 862, [1965] Ch 918 at 937) expressly adopted the proprietary basis of the principle.

e [50] Lord Wrenbury's observations in O'Rourke v Darbishire have also been cited in several Australian cases, and they were referred to by Lord Lowry in AT & T Istel Ltd v Tully [1992] 3 All ER 523 at 540, [1993] AC 45 at 65. The Board does not find it surprising that Lord Wrenbury's observations have been so often cited, since they are a vivid expression of the basic distinction between the right of a beneficiary arising under the law of trusts (which most would regard as part of the law of property) and the right of a litigant to disclosure of his opponent's documents (which is part of the law of procedure and evidence). But the Board cannot regard it as a reasoned or binding decision that a beneficiary's right or claim to disclosure of trust documents or information must always have the proprietary basis of a transmissible interest in trust property. That was not an issue in O'Rourke v Darbishire.

h [51] Their Lordships consider that the more principled and correct approach is to regard the right to seek disclosure of trust documents as one aspect of the court's inherent jurisdiction to supervise, and if necessary to intervene in, the administration of trusts. The right to seek the court's intervention does not depend on entitlement to a fixed and transmissible beneficial interest. The object of a discretion (including a mere power) may also be entitled to protection from a court of equity, although the circumstances in which he may seek protection, and the nature of the protection he may expect to obtain, will depend on the court's discretion: see Lord Wilberforce in Gartside v IRC [1968] 1 All ER 121 at

134, [1968] AC 553 at 617–618 and in McPhail v Doulton [1970] 2 All ER 228 at 247, [1971] AC 424 at 456–457, Templeman J in Re Manisty's Settlement [1973] 2 All ER 1203 at 1211–1212, [1974] Ch 17 at 27–28 and Warner J in Mettoy Pension Trustees Ltd v Evans [1991] 2 All ER 513 at 549, [1990] 1 WLR 1587 at 1617–1618. Mr Brownbill's submission to the contrary effect tends to prove too much, since he would regard the object of a discretionary trust as having a proprietary interest even though it is not transmissible (except in the special case of collective action taken unanimously by all the members of a closed class). a

[52] Their Lordships are therefore in general agreement with the approach adopted in the judgments of Kirby P and Sheller JA in the Court of Appeal of New South Wales in Hartigan Nominees Pty Ltd v Rydge (1992) 29 NSWLR 405. That was a case concerned with disclosure of a memorandum of wishes addressed to the trustees by Sir Norman Rydge (who was in substance, but not nominally, the settlor). Kirby P said (at 421–422): b

‘I do not consider that it is imperative to determine whether that document is a “trust document” (as I think it is) or whether the respondent, as a beneficiary, has a proprietary interest in it (as I am also inclined to think he does). Much of the law on the subject of access to documents has conventionally been expressed in terms of the “proprietary interest” in the document of the party seeking access to it. Thus, it has been held that a cestui que trust has a “proprietary right” to seek all documents relating to the trust: see O'Rourke v Darbishire ([1920] AC 581 at 601, 603, [1920] All ER Rep 1 at 5). This approach is unsatisfactory. Access should not be limited to documents in which a proprietary right may be established. Such rights may be sufficient; but they are not necessary to a right of access which the courts will enforce to uphold the cestui que trust's entitlement to a reasonable assurance of the manifest integrity of the administration of the trust by the trustees. I agree with Professor HAJ Ford's comment, in his book (with Mr WA Lee) Principles of the Law of Trusts, 2nd ed (1990) Sydney, Law Book Co, at 425, that the equation of rights of inspection of trust documents with the beneficiaries' equitable rights of property in the trust assets “gives rise to far more problems than it solves” (at p 425): “... The legal title and rights to possession are in the trustees: all the beneficiary has are equitable rights against the trustees ... The beneficiary's rights to inspect trust documents are founded therefore not upon any equitable proprietary right which he or she may have in respect of those documents but upon the trustee's fiduciary duty to keep the beneficiary informed and to render accounts. It is the extent of that duty that is in issue. The equation of the right to inspect trust documents with the beneficiary's equitable proprietary rights gives rise to unnecessary and undesirable consequences. It results in the drawing of virtually incomprehensible distinctions between documents which are trust documents and those which are not; it casts doubts upon the rights of beneficiaries who cannot claim to have an equitable proprietary interest in the trust assets, such as the beneficiaries of discretionary trusts; and it may give trustees too great a degree of protection in the case of documents, artificially classified as not being trust documents, and beneficiaries too great a right to inspect the activities of trustees in the case of documents which are, equally artificially, classified as trust documents.” c a considered that inquiry as to an applicant's proprietary interest was 'if not a false, an unhelpful trail'. All three members of the court expressed reservations about the reasoning and conclusions in Re Londonderry's Settlement.

[53] Mahoney JA (at 435) favoured the proprietary basis but recognised that it extended to information of a non-documentary kind. Sheller JA (at 444)

[54] It will be observed that Kirby P said that for an applicant to have a proprietary right might be sufficient, but was not necessary. In the Board's view it is neither sufficient nor necessary. Since Re Cowin well over a century ago the court has made clear that there may be circumstances (especially of confidentiality) in which even a vested and transmissible beneficial interest is not a sufficient basis for requiring disclosure of trust documents; and Re Londonderry's Settlement and more recent cases have begun to work out in some detail the way in which the court should exercise its discretion in such cases. There are three such areas in which the court may have to form a discretionary judgment: whether a discretionary object (or some other beneficiary with only a remote or wholly defeasible interest) should be granted relief at all; what classes of documents should be disclosed, either completely or in a redacted form; and what safeguards should be imposed (whether by undertakings to the court, arrangements for professional inspection, or otherwise) to limit the use which may be made of documents or information disclosed under the order of the court.

[55] The proprietary basis of a beneficiary's right to disclosure was fully argued before the Staff of Government Division, which accepted ((2001) 3 ITCLR 734 at [35]) the submission (made on behalf of the appellant) that a proprietary interest, although often found, was not necessary. On this part of the case the Board agrees with the conclusion reached by the Staff of Government Division, and does not accept the criticisms of it put forward by Mr Brownbill. It has nevertheless been necessary to look at the authorities in some detail, because they lead on to part of the Staff of Government Division's judgment (at [42]–[60]) in which the court reached the conclusion that Deemster Cain had no jurisdiction to make the order for disclosure which he did make. In reaching that conclusion the court distinguished (or treated as unhelpful) a number of cases, of which the most important are Chaine-Nickson v Bank of Ireland [1976] IR 393, Spellson v George (1987) 11 NSWLR 300, Hartigan Nominees Pty Ltd v Rydge (1992) 29 NSWLR 405, A-G of Ontario v Stavro (1994) 119 DLR (4th) 750 and Re Murphy's Settlements, Murphy v Murphy [1998] 3 All ER 1, [1999] 1 WLR 282.

DISCLOSURE TO DISCRETIONARY BENEFICIARIES: THE RECENT CASES

[56] Chaine-Nickson v Bank of Ireland [1976] IR 393 was a decision of the High Court of Ireland (Kenny J). It was concerned with an application for disclosure of accounts and other information made by the beneficiary of what was described as a discretionary trust. But the report does not give an adequate summary of the trust. The only dispositive provision set out verbatim looks more like a power than a trust, as it begins 'upon trust to pay, divide or apply the whole or such part (if any) of the income and capital respectively thereof as [the trustees] shall from time to time in their absolute and uncontrolled discretion think fit'. It appears that initially the settlement infringed the rule against perpetuities and had to be corrected, but again the summary is terse.

[57] After stating the general rule that a beneficiary with a vested interest is entitled to disclosure Kenny J continued (at 396):

'However, in the case of a discretionary trust, none of the potential beneficiaries have any right to be paid capital or income. All the trust fund is held by the trustees in this case on discretionary trusts and, if the plaintiff is not entitled to the trust accounts and particulars of the investments, it follows that none of the potential beneficiaries have a valid claim to any information from the trustees. The result is that the trustees are not under an obligation to account to anyone in connection with their management of the trust fund. This logical conclusion from the defendants' argument leads to remarkable consequences. The amount of remuneration to which the trustees are entitled is specified in the settlement and the potential beneficiaries have an interest in seeing that the amount is not exceeded, for they are the persons who will ultimately benefit by payments of capital and income. The defendants' contention, however, has the result that they do not have to account for or disclose the amount of their remuneration. This seems to me to be contrary to the basic concept of a trustee being accountable for his management of the trust fund.'

[58] The Staff of Government Division seem to have regarded Chaine-Nickson's case as a special and unusual case, in that there would normally be some beneficiary who had a fixed interest in default of exercise of the trustees' discretion, and who would be in a position to require disclosure of accounts. But offshore settlements do very commonly, for reasons already noted, have no ascertained beneficiary with a fixed interest and a real economic stake in the enforcement of the trustees' fiduciary duties. The Staff of Government Division was, with respect, too ready to dismiss Chaine-Nickson's case as untypical and unhelpful. The contrary view does indeed lead to remarkable results.

[59] Spellson v George (1987) 11 NSWLR 300 was a decision of the Equity Division of the Supreme Court of New South Wales (Powell J). The plaintiff (who had recently been divorced) was suing both on his own account and on behalf of his children for information about four separate settlements made by members of his ex-wife's family, three of which had apparently been wound up. Much of the report is concerned with the plaintiff's right to sue on behalf of his children without the concurrence of their joint guardian. However there is at the end of the judgment of Powell J (at 315–316) a valuable discussion of the authorities and the underlying principle (though the clarity of the discussion is slightly marred by the expressions 'power' and 'trust' being used almost interchangeably). The whole passage merits study. The conclusion (at 316) is as follows:

'The question then is, whether a person whose status is only that of a potential object of the exercise of a discretionary power can properly be regarded as one of the cestuis que trust of the relevant trustee. I do not doubt that he can, and should, properly be so regarded, for although it is true to say that, unless, and until, the trustee exercises his discretion in his favour, he has no right to receive, and enjoy, any part of the capital or income of the trust fund, it does not follow that, until that time arises, he has no rights against the trustee. On the contrary, it is clear that the object of a discretionary trust, even before the exercise of the trustee's discretion in his favour, does have rights against the trustee (see, eg, Gartside v Inland Revenue Commissioners ([1968] 1 All ER 121 at 127, [1968] AC 553 at 605–606) per Lord Reid, ([1968] 1 All ER 121 at 134, [1968] AC 553 at 617–618) per Lord Wilberforce)—those rights, so it seems to me, are not restricted to the right to have the trustee bona fide consider whether or not to exercise his (the trustee's) discretion in his (the object's) favour, but extend to the right to have the trust property properly managed and to have the trustee account for his management, a view, I am glad to say, which appears to have been shared by both Holland J

a in Randall v Lubrano (31 October 1974, unreported) and Kenny J in Chaine-Nickson v Bank of Ireland ([1976] IR 393).'

b [60] The Staff of Government Division quoted the above paragraph (and the preceding paragraph) from Powell J's judgment and criticised him for having given no reasons (apart from referring to Randall v Lubrano and Chaine-Nickson's case) for his extension of the discretionary object's rights to a right to require the trustees to account for their trusteeship. Their Lordships regard this criticism as surprising and unwarranted. Powell J had avowedly begun with first principles ([1987] 11 NSWLR 300 at 315):

c '... the fundamental proposition that one of the essential elements of a private trust, be it a discretionary trust or some other form of trust, is that the trustee is subject to a personal obligation to hold, and to deal with, the trust property for the benefit of some identified, or identifiable, person or group of persons.'

d From there he had proceeded to the trustees' correlative duty to account. The observations of Lord Reid and Lord Wilberforce in Gartside v IRC [1968] 1 All ER 121 at 127, 134, [1968] AC 553 at 605–606, 617–618, were naturally directed to a discretionary object's rights in respect of distribution of income from the trust fund, because (in the context of construing the estate duty legislation) that is what the case was about (cf Sir Robert Megarry V-C in Re Hay's Settlement Trusts [1981] 3 All ER 786 at 793, [1982] 1 WLR 202 at 210, 'so far as relevant to the case before me').

e [61] The Hartigan Nominees case was, as already noted, a case about a settlor's letter of wishes. There was two main issues: whether the letter of wishes should be disclosed, despite its confidential nature; and how much weight trustees, in exercising their discretions, should give to a letter of wishes. Much of the discussion of well-known authorities was in the context of the second question.

f For present purposes the case is of most interest for the division of opinion in the Court of Appeal of New South Wales on whether a beneficiary's right or claim to disclosure of documents is proprietary in nature (see [52]–[54], above). In its comments on the case the Staff of Government Division mentioned only the judgment of Mahoney JA, who was in a minority on this point (although in the majority as to the outcome of the appeal). For the reasons already mentioned

g their Lordships prefer the views, as to the true basis for ordering disclosure, of Kirby P and Sheller JA.

[62] The fourth of the cases considered by the Staff of Government Division, in this part of its judgment, was A-G of Ontario v Stavro (1994) 119 DLR (4th) 750.

h In that case Lederman J had to consider an application for disclosure made by a beneficiary with a contingent interest in an unadministered estate. He referred to the argument for a proprietary basis and (echoing Sheller JA in the Hartigan Nominees case) considered (at 756) that it 'leads one astray'. The case is not directly in point, but it is in line with the prevailing view in Australia as it emerges from Spellson v George and the Hartigan Nominees case (the point has recently been left open by the Full Court of the Supreme Court of South Australia, in the context of a commercial trust resembling a unit trust, in Rouse v IOOF Australia Trustees Ltd (1999) 2 ITELR 289).

j [63] Finally there is the decision of Neuberger J in Re Murphy's Settlements [1998] 3 All ER 1, [1999] 1 WLR 282. That case was concerned with a beneficiary's right to obtain information (as to the identity of the trustees) from the settlor himself but Neuberger J discussed the position of the plaintiff as a discretionary object and stated:

‘The facts that in this case the plaintiff is merely within the class of discretionary beneficiaries (as opposed to being someone with a vested beneficial interest in the trust property) and that there is no suggestion of wrongdoing on the part of the trustees, appears to me to go to the question of whether to exercise the discretion [to exercise what the judge called the equitable jurisdiction], rather than whether the discretion exists at all.’ (See [1998] 3 All ER 1 at 10, [1999] 1 WLR 282 at 290.)

[64] The Staff of Government Division found this of no assistance, stating that it was based on a concession and that the judge did not have the benefit of any detailed analysis or submissions. However in considering whether to accept the concession Neuberger J did (like Powell J in Spellson v George) start from first principles; and his discussion ([1998] 3 All ER 1 at 10, [1999] 1 WLR 282 at 291) of the principles to be derived from the authorities, from Morice v Bishop of Durham (1805) 10 Ves 522, [1803–13] All ER Rep 457 to Chaine-Nickson’s case, appears to the Board to be illuminating and helpful.

[65] To this review of the authorities considered by the Staff of Government Division it is appropriate to add three footnotes. (1) The Board were also assisted by references to a number of leading textbooks. Of the leading English works on trusts Lewin on Trusts (17th edn, 2000) appears to favour the proprietary approach and Underhill and Hayton’s Law Relating to Trusts and Trustees (15th edn, 1995) the alternative approach. But each has a balanced survey of the cases and neither takes an extreme position. (2) Neither side made any submissions seeking to distinguish between trust documents and documents relating to the affairs of a company controlled by the trustees (see for instance Re Butt, Butt v Kelson [1952] 1 All ER 167, [1952] Ch 197). This may have represented a realistic decision made by the trustees in the light of how the two settlements were in fact administered. (3) Mr Steinfeld did not base himself on the final words of cl 34 of the Angora Trust, or on any other express provision of either settlement. Mr Brownbill made some brief submissions based on the protector’s powers to obtain documents and information. These points may conceivably bear on the exercise of the court’s discretion but they cannot in the Board’s view go to the issue of jurisdiction.

CONCLUSION

[66] Their Lordships have already indicated their view that a beneficiary’s right to seek disclosure of trust documents, although sometimes not inappropriately described as a proprietary right, is best approached as one aspect of the court’s inherent jurisdiction to supervise (and where appropriate intervene in) the administration of trusts. There is therefore in their Lordships’ view no reason to draw any bright dividing line either between transmissible and non-transmissible (that is, discretionary) interests, or between the rights of an object of a discretionary trust and those of the object of a mere power (of a fiduciary character). The differences in this context between trusts and powers are (as Lord Wilberforce demonstrated in McPhail v Doulton [1970] 2 All ER 228, [1971] AC 424) a good deal less significant than the similarities. The tide of Commonwealth authority, although not entirely uniform, appears to be flowing in that direction.

[67] However the recent cases also confirm (as had been stated as long ago as Re Cowin (1886) 33 Ch D 179) that no beneficiary (and least of all a discretionary a object) has any entitlement as of right to disclosure of anything which can plausibly be described as a trust document. Especially when there are issues as to personal or commercial confidentiality, the court may have to balance the competing interests of different beneficiaries, the trustees themselves and third parties. Disclosure may have to be limited and safeguards may have to be put in place. Evaluation of the claims of a beneficiary (and especially of a discretionary object) may be an important part of the balancing exercise which the court has to perform on the materials placed before it. In many cases the court may have no difficulty in concluding that an applicant with no more than a theoretical possibility of benefit ought not to be granted any relief.

c [68] It would be inappropriate for the Board to go much further in attempting to give the High Court of the Isle of Man guidance as to the future conduct of this troublesome matter. But their Lordships can, without trespassing on the High Court's discretion, summarise their views on the different components of the appellant's claims. (1) It seems to be common ground that during Mr Schmidt's lifetime substantial distributions were made for his benefit, all or most by allocation of funds to the two companies (Gingernut and Petragonis) which were regarded as being (in some sense) Mr Schmidt's. The appellant as Mr Schmidt's personal representative does not accept that these funds have been fully accounted for. His contention is that in respect of allocated funds Mr Schmidt ceased to be a mere discretionary object, and became absolute owner. On the face of it the appellant (as personal representative) seems to have a powerful case for the fullest disclosure in respect of these funds. (2) The appellant as personal representative would also, on the face of it, have a strong claim to disclosure of documents or information relevant to the issue whether, but for breaches of fiduciary duty (such as for instance overcharging) more funds would have been available for distribution to Mr Schmidt, and would or might have been allocated to him in practice. The Board express no view whatever as to whether the appellant has a case for overcharging or any other breach of fiduciary duty. But claims of that sort have been put forward in the 1998 proceedings, and the possibility must be noted in order to make the position clear. (3) As regards the appellant's personal claims under the Angora Trust since his father's death, his status as beneficiary of any sort depends on the issue of construction discussed at [28]–[32], above. (4) As regards the Everest Trust, the appellant is a possible object of the very wide power in cl 3.3 (see [33], above), but an object who may be regarded (especially in view of the Everest letter) as having exceptionally strong claims to be considered.

h [69] Their Lordships will therefore humbly advise Her Majesty that the appeal should be allowed, the order of Deemster Cain restored and the matter remitted to the High Court of the Isle of Man for further consideration in the light of the Board's judgment.

j [70] Rosewood must pay the appellant's costs before the Staff of Government Division and before the Board. The High Court will determine whether (and if so to what extent and out of which funds) Rosewood should be entitled to reimbursement of those costs out of the trust property. The appellant does not contend that Rosewood acted unreasonably but does contend that in this litigation it has in substance acted for its own benefit (see RSC Ord 48A, rr 3(3) and 6(2)).

Appeal allowed.

Pegram Shopfitters Ltd v Tally Weijl (UK) Ltd a

[2003] EWHC 984 (TCC)

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (TECHNOLOGY AND CONSTRUCTION COURT) b

JUDGE ANTHONY THORNTON QC

14 FEBRUARY 2003

Building contract – Adjudication – Award – Jurisdiction to make award – Parties accepting existence of construction contract but disputing its conditions – Appointment of adjudicator under statutory scheme – Meaning of ‘enables a party to give notice at any time of his intention to refer a dispute to adjudication’ – Whether adjudicator having jurisdiction – Scheme for Construction Contracts (England and Wales) Regulations 1998 – Housing Grants, Construction and Regeneration Act 1996, s 108. c

The claimant undertook refurbishment works for the defendant. A dispute arose as to the final account and the claimant referred the matter to an adjudicator under the statutory scheme contained in the Scheme for Construction Contracts (England and Wales) Regulations 1998, pursuant to s 108(1)^a of the Housing Grants, Construction and Regeneration Act 1996. The defendant disputed the adjudicator's jurisdiction on the basis, inter alia, that the contract was on JCT standard terms which met the requirements of s 108(2) of the Act so as to displace the statutory scheme with its own. That subsection provided that ‘the contract shall (a) enable a party to give notice at any time of his intention to refer a dispute to adjudication; (b) provide a timetable with the object of securing the appointment of the adjudicator and referral of the dispute to him within 7 days of such notice.’ By s 108(5) if the contract did not comply with those requirements, the adjudication provision of the statutory scheme applied. The adjudicator accepted jurisdiction under the statutory scheme and made an award in the claimant's favour. The defendant refused to pay and the claimant brought proceedings to enforce the award. An issue arose as to whether the adjudicator's award was unenforceable by reason of lack of jurisdiction. d
e
f
g

Held – Having regard to the context of the right to refer a dispute arising under a construction contract to adjudication under s 108(1), which included a dispute as to which terms were incorporated into that contract, the words ‘the contract shall (a) enable’ and ‘the contract ... shall (b) provide’ in s 108(2) of the 1996 Act meant that the contract should both contain the provisions required by s 108(2), and should contain them in a manner that enabled their applicability to be readily ascertained without dispute. If there was such a dispute, then the contract did not comply with s 108, and the statutory scheme applied in default. That was so even if it subsequently emerged from the decision of the adjudicator that the terms of the contract did in fact comply with the requirements of s 108. Without such an extended construction, effect could not be given to the underlying right of a party to refer all disputes arising under a construction contract to adjudication. It followed that, in the instant case, the adjudicator had had jurisdiction. h
j

a Section 108, so far as material, is set out at [15], below

- a Accordingly, his decision was enforceable and there would be judgment for the claimant (see [25]–[31], below).

Notes

For the jurisdiction of an adjudicator, see 4(3) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 214.

- b For the Housing Grants, Construction and Regeneration Act 1996, s 108, see 11 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2000 reissue) 289.

Case referred to in judgment

C & B Scene Concept Design Ltd v Isobars Ltd [2002] EWCA Civ 46, (2002) 82 ConLR 154, CA.

Cases referred to in skeleton arguments

Ballast plc v The Burrell Co (Construction Management) Ltd (21 June 2001, unreported), Ct of Sess.

Brogden v Metropolitan Railway Co (1877) 2 App Cas 666, HL.

- d Charnock v Liverpool Corp [1968] 3 All ER 473, [1968] 1 WLR 1498, CA.
Christiani and Neilson Ltd v The Lowry Centre Development Co Ltd (16 June 2000, unreported), QBD.

Fastrack Contractors Ltd v Morrison Construction Ltd (2000) 75 ConLR 33.

Glencot Development and Design Co Ltd v Ben Barrett & Son [2001] BLR 207.

- e Joinery Plus Ltd (in admin) v Laing Ltd [2002] All ER (D) 201 (Jan).
Macob Civil Engineering Ltd v Morrison Construction Ltd (1994) 64 ConLR 1.
Project Consultancy Group v Trustees of the Gray Trust [1999] BLR 377.
Sherwood & Casson Ltd v Mackenzie [2000] 2 TCLR 418.

Claim

- f By Pt 8 claim form dated 23 January 2003, the claimant, Pegram Shopfitters Ltd, sought the enforcement of an award of an adjudicator, Mr CD Morris, dated 16 August 2002 requiring the defendant, Tally Weijl (UK) Ltd to pay to the claimant the sum of £95,483.78, interest of £11,717.97 and the adjudicator's fees, arising out of a dispute in relation to remuneration for work carried out by the claimant for the defendant. The facts are set out in the judgment.
- g

Jeremy Hyam (instructed by Field Seymour Parkes, Reading) for the claimant.
Abdul Jinadu (instructed by Maxwell Batley) for the defendant.

h JUDGE ANTHONY THORNTON QC.

INTRODUCTION

- [1] The claimant seeks to enforce the award of an adjudicator which the defendant declines to pay on the grounds that it was decided without jurisdiction.
- j The underlying background to that decision was refurbishment works being carried out by the claimant shopfitters at a new Tally Weijl retail clothing store in Oxford Street, London W1N 9HB. The refurbishment works were carried out between June and September 2000 and, following practical completion, disputes as to the value of that work arose which the claimant referred to adjudication having elected to adopt the statutory scheme rules (Scheme for Construction Contracts (England and Wales) Regulations 1998, SI 1998/649) concerned with the appointment of, and the procedure to be adopted by, the adjudicator. The claimant sought the nomination of an adjudicator from the Association of Independent Construction Adjudicators. Mr CD Morris was nominated and he published his decision on 16 August 2002 in which he decided that the claimant should be paid £95,483.78, interest of £11,717.97 and the adjudicator's fees. No reasons were asked for prior to the publication of that decision so that the decision is unreasoned. a [2] The defendant has declined to pay the sums directed to be paid. Two jurisdictional grounds are taken by the defendant. First, it is contended that there was no construction contract in existence between the parties and, hence, no construction contract underlay or gave rise to the claimant's statutory entitlement to an adjudication as to the disputes concerning the true value of its work. Secondly, it is alleged that if there was a construction contract in existence, that contract was different in content to the construction contract found to exist by the adjudicator. In consequence, that contract incorporated different adjudication rules into any adjudication arising out of that contract to those adopted by the adjudicator and, thus, the adjudicator was appointed and the adjudication was conducted by reference to the wrong rules and in contravention of the parties' agreement as to the procedural rules that would apply. On this additional ground, therefore, the defendant contended that the adjudication was conducted without jurisdiction. b

c
d

[3] If the defendant makes good either ground of alleged lack of jurisdiction, the decision is a nullity and is unenforceable. However, the claimant contends that the adjudicator had referred to him the question of what was the true value of its work and as to what were the applicable terms incorporated into the construction contract both parties accepted was in existence. Thus, the adjudicator correctly proceeded on the basis that there was a construction contract underlying both the disputes referred to him and his appointment, that its terms did not clearly and unequivocally incorporate any adjudication procedural rules and that, in consequence, the scheme rules applied. In any case, the application of the wrong rules, if the adjudicator applied the wrong rules, did not amount to an error which undermined his jurisdiction and the resulting decision was still valid. In summary, any error as to the terms of the contract or as to the applicable procedural adjudication rules was an error of law within the adjudicator's jurisdiction and did not render the decision unenforceable. e
f
g

[4] Since the defendant failed to pay the decision as directed, these proceedings were instituted on 23 January 2003 in the form of a CPR Pt 8 claim form. The claimant seeks summary judgment for the sums directed to be paid.

THE CONSTRUCTION CONTRACT h

[5] The dispute as to the adjudicator's jurisdiction involves a consideration of whether the parties entered into a construction contract at all and, if so, what conditions of contract were incorporated into that construction contract. Since detailed evidence was adduced that was directed to these questions, I will summarise it although I leave over for further consideration whether I should make my own findings on these questions which, if the adjudicator had jurisdiction, were ones that were essentially for him to decide. j

[6] The work on site started on 9 June 2000. Prior to that, no contract documents had been prepared and no tendering process had been undertaken. The claimant had been introduced to the defendant by the project architect a short time before work started and invited to undertake the shopfitting work a which was to be undertaken at great speed and with an immediate start on site. The contract documentation would be produced and agreed and a contract entered into as work proceeded. At the first project meeting held on 15 June 2000, it was agreed, in a non-contractual sense, that the work would be subject to a form of prime cost contract and that the claimant and the consultants would produce an agreed schedule of work. It was also agreed that a letter of intent would be provided by the defendant, pending final agreement as to the terms of the contract.

[7] During June and July 2000 the claimant undertook the strip out work without any clear-cut letter of intent having been provided. The nearest that the defendant got to providing such a letter was by a letter dated 7 July 2000 in which the defendant wrote to the claimant instructing it to carry out the works subject to a term that the form of the contract would be the JCT Standard Form of Prime Cost Contract (1998 edn) (JCT PC 98). However, this was immediately responded to by the claimant in a letter dated 10 July 2002 addressed to the architect declining to enter into a contract which incorporated these conditions and instead offering its own conditions which had already been sent to the defendant.

[8] The claimant became increasingly concerned at the lack of any contractual basis for the work it was carrying out, particularly once the stripping out work was completed and the refurbishment work, involving the employment of subcontractors, had started. On 21 July 2000, the claimant faxed the defendant and asked for formal instructions and an agreement by which it could continue the work. The fax sought a particular assurance regarding payment. The claimant reiterated these concerns at a subsequent site meeting held on 27 July 2000. On the following day, the claimant sent to the defendant four marked up plans showing the partitions that it had been asked to install with a budget price included. This document was signed by an authorised representative of the defendant. This jointly signed document is relied on by the claimant as giving rise to the construction contract. It also relies on its standard conditions sent previously to the defendant which contained a term that the defendant's acceptance of any quotation would confirm its agreement to all conditions contained in that standard conditions document.

[9] The defendant, soon afterwards on 2 August 2000, sent the claimant a finalised letter of appointment which was in similar terms to that sent on 7 July 2000, thereby seeking to incorporate the JCT PC 98 terms and, if already applicable, seeking to exclude the claimant's standard terms. The letter contained a requirement that the claimant should confirm its agreement to the terms of the letter by returning the enclosed copy signed where indicated but this copy was neither signed nor returned by the claimant. No further communication of note occurred concerning the terms of the contract under which the work was being carried out.

[10] On the basis of these exchanges, the claimant contended that the contract was formed by its offer contained in its quotation of 28 July 2000 read with the earlier communication enclosing its standard conditions and the defendant's acceptance of both constituted by its signature on that quotation.

[11] The defendant contended that, at best, the joint signatures on the document of 28 July 2000 could only have related to, and given rise to, a construction contract concerning the partitions. Since the quotation made no reference to earlier communications or to the claimant's conditions, these conditions could not be regarded as applying to any of the claimant's work. In consequence, the other work could only have been subject to the letter dated 2 August 2000 and that the claimant's failure to sign and return a copy did not preclude a contract coming into being. a

[12] The claimant disputed the defendant's contentions, particularly on the ground that, since a contract was already in being, its failure to sign and return the offer contained in the letter dated 2 August 2000 was the clearest possible indication that it was not agreeing to be bound by that proposed contract and remained bound by the earlier contract. b

[13] It can be seen from this summary that it was not clear-cut or obvious which set of conditions, namely the claimant's conditions or JCT PC 98, had been incorporated into the construction contract but that there was in existence a construction contract of some kind. Thus, one of the disputes requiring resolution was as to which set of conditions had been incorporated since that the answer to that question would determine whether the basis of valuation and payment was in accordance with the claimant's rates and quotations or by reference to a prime cost. Unless a pure question of jurisdiction as to whether or not a contract existed at all arises, a court ought ordinarily not to decide a disputed question in enforcement proceedings since that question has been left, by the terms of the statutory jurisdiction of the adjudicator, for decision by the adjudicator. c
d

THE DISPUTE REFERRED TO THE ADJUDICATOR

[14] The claimant had submitted a final account to the defendant in March 2002 claiming a sum of £144,706.64 plus VAT as being outstanding. Having failed to obtain what it regarded as a proper response to this document, it served a notice of adjudication on the defendant dated 3 July 2002 to the effect that the dispute between the parties was to be settled by the process of adjudication in accordance with the provisions of the Housing Grants, Construction and Regeneration Act 1996. The notice enclosed a copy of the claimant's application to the Association of Independent Construction Adjudicators as a nominating body, for the appointment of an adjudicator. The nature of the dispute was stated to be 'Valuation and payment of Final Account'. e
f

THE JURISDICTION OF THE ADJUDICATOR

[15] The jurisdictional questions raised by the defendant in relation to the decision of the adjudicator arise out of the statutory basis for the adjudication. This is set out in ss 108 and 114 of the 1996 Act which provide: g

'(1) A party to a construction contract has the right to refer a dispute arising under the contract for adjudication under a procedure complying with this section. h

For this purpose "dispute" includes any difference.

(2) The contract shall—(a) enable a party to give notice at any time of his intention to refer a dispute to adjudication; (b) provide a timetable with the object of securing the appointment of the adjudicator and referral of the dispute to him within 7 days of such notice ... j

(5) If the contract does not comply with the requirements of subsections (1) to (4), the adjudication provisions of the Scheme for Construction Contracts apply ...

a 114. ...—(1) The Minister shall by regulations make a scheme (“the Scheme for Construction Contracts”) containing provision about the matters referred to in the preceding provisions of this Part.’

The relevant scheme is set out in the Scheme for Construction Contracts (England and Wales) Regulations 1998, SI 1998/649 (the Scheme).

b [16] It has been seen that the parties were contending for one or other of two sets of conditions as having been incorporated into the contract which both parties accepted was a construction contract. The claimant contended that its conditions were incorporated and the defendant that JCT PC 98 were incorporated. Both parties accepted that if the claimant’s conditions were incorporated, that the requirements for adjudication provided for by s 108 were not met so that the adjudication would be governed by the Scheme whereas, given the detailed provisions for adjudication contained in JCT PC 98, if those conditions prevailed, the adjudication would be governed by the contractual provisions and not by the Scheme provisions. Since these provisions, whether the Scheme or the contractual, governed all questions of appointment, timescales and procedure, it is vital to know which applied. Surprisingly, the defendant did not put in evidence the details of either set of rules and merely confined its submissions to the general proposition that the ‘right’ set of adjudication provisions had to be used for all questions of appointment and procedure for the adjudication to be correctly constituted and for the decision to be within jurisdiction and enforceable.

e NO CONSTRUCTION CONTRACT

[17] Turning to the history of the adjudication, the starting point is the reaction of the defendant on being informed that Mr Morris had been appointed as adjudicator. On receiving that information, the defendant’s solicitors wrote to him with a copy to the claimant’s solicitors on 16 July 2002 in the following terms:

f ‘If there is a construction contract between [the defendant] and the [claimant] then it is in the JCT Standard Form of Prime Cost Contract 1998. The appointment of the applicant was confirmed, at the latest, by a letter dated 2 August 2000 specifying the form of contract. As we understand it, you have been nominated by the [claimant] pursuant to the Scheme for Construction Contracts (England and Wales) Regulations 1998. However, if there is to be an adjudication then the nomination process and the rules of adjudication should follow the JCT procedure. It follows that we can neither accept your jurisdiction, nor sign the Deed of Appointment. You will note that we are copying this letter to the [claimant’s] solicitors and it may be that they will now be willing to withdraw your nomination and proceed correctly, in accordance with the contract. If [the claimant] will not withdraw your nomination and if you are minded to proceed then [the defendant] will wish to participate without prejudice to their objection to your jurisdiction and under protest.’

j [18] To this letter, the claimant’s solicitors replied to the adjudicator as follows:

‘[The claimant] refute the statements contained in this letter to the effect that they are bound by the JCT Standard Form of Prime Cost Contract. This form of contract was rejected in express terms by [the claimant] as you will see in the statement of dispute. The only agreement in writing or otherwise that exists between the parties is dated 28 July 2000 which is [the claimant's] letter of that date incorporating their conditions duly signed and returned by [the defendant]. There can be no question regarding your jurisdiction in this matter the Scheme clearly applies.'

[19] The adjudicator, although his decision did not contain reasons, set out the procedural history of the adjudication in his decision. This included the following passage:

'The [defendant] wrote on 26 July 2002 "if despite our objections you decide to proceed with the adjudication then we reserve the right to make submissions on the matters put before you without prejudice to our challenge to your jurisdiction". This sentiment was expressed in further communications and submissions made by the [defendant]. At para 2.3 of the statement of response the [defendant] states that "the [defendant] does not consent to or grant the adjudicator the authority to determine the issue of jurisdiction".'

[20] The defendant's written submissions for this summary judgment hearing clearly set out the nature of the jurisdictional challenge mounted by the defendant to the adjudicator's appointment and decision. These stated:

'3.1 The defendant's primary contention is that the adjudicator did not have the jurisdiction to adjudicate or determine the dispute purportedly referred to him by the claimant. The referral to adjudication and the nomination of the adjudicator were purportedly made pursuant to the term of the Scheme for Construction Contracts Regulations (England and Wales) 1998 ("the Scheme"). The claimant contends that the provisions of the Scheme applied by reason of their implication into its standard conditions of sale which it contend applied to the works.

3.2 The defendant denies that the claimant's conditions of sale applied to the works. The defendant avers that the Works were carried out pursuant to the terms of the JCT Prime Cost 1998 Standard Form of contract ("JCT PC 98"). JCT PC 98 complies with the provisions of ss 108(1)–(4) of the 1996 Act) therefore it follows that there is no scope for the implication therein of the provisions of the Scheme.

3.3 The defendant avers that: (i) JCT PC 98 applied to the work carried out by the claimant. Therefore, in purporting to act pursuant to the terms of the Scheme, the adjudicator was acting without jurisdiction because he failed to determine the dispute referred to him under the actual conditions between the parties.'

[21] It is clear from these extracts that: (1) Each party was contending that there was a written construction contract in being. However, whereas the claimant was contending for one based on its own conditions of sale, the defendant was contending for one based on JCT PC 98. (2) The defendant was contending that the applicable rules for the appointment of the adjudicator and for the procedure to be followed in the adjudication on appointment were those set out in JCT PC 98. The claimant was contending that since there were no standard conditions incorporated into the construction contract and that the only conditions incorporated were ones containing no rules of appointment or procedure, the statutory implication arose. This, being s 108 of the 1996 Act, provides that if the construction contract does not contain specific minimum a terms relating to the conduct of the adjudication, 'the adjudication provisions of the Scheme for Construction Contracts apply'.

[22] The adjudicator clearly understood that these were the rival contentions of the parties since his decision contains this clearly stated passage:

b '2.01 The [claimant] and [defendant] agree that there is a contract in place for the construction works carried out by the [claimant] between 8 June 2000 and 30 September 2000 at 368–370 Oxford Street, London W1N 9HB.

2.02 There is dispute between the parties as to the precise form of contract

...

2.05 Clause 108(1) of the 1996 Act specifically limits the scope of an adjudication to "a dispute arising under the contract".

c 2.06 By extension, a dispute arising about the formation of a contract is beyond the valid scope of an arbitration (sic), and no decision has been made in that regard.'

[23] The defendant now contends that there was no contract at all, that the parties' relationship was purely a non-contractual one that, in consequence, d the claimant's only entitlement to payment was for a quantum meruit and that the adjudicator lacked jurisdiction since there was no construction contract in writing in place under and by virtue of which the claimant could refer resulting disputes to adjudication.

e [24] The jurisdictional challenge that the defendant mounted before the adjudicator was mounted on the premise that there was in existence a construction contract between the parties since that challenge was to this effect:

f 'under our contract with the claimant, we are entitled to an adjudicator appointment procedure and to an adjudication in conformity with our contractual agreement. We are not required to submit to an adjudication conducted under a different procedure since that procedure would only be applicable if the terms of the construction contract contended for by the claimant, which are different from the terms that we contend for, are applicable.'

g It would be diametrically opposite to that approach for the defendant now to contend that there was no contract at all between the parties.

[25] It is not open to the defendant to advance this contention in these enforcement proceedings. As recorded by the adjudicator in his decision, the defendant accepted that there was a contract in being between the parties for the refurbishment work carried out by the claimant and based its submissions to him on that basis. This application and the adjudication should be considered on the h basis that both parties accepted that a construction contract was in place since the decision is premised on that commonly accepted understanding and it would be inequitable if the defendant was now entitled to reprobate from its position before the adjudicator. Moreover, for the purposes of these enforcement proceedings, the defendant is estopped from resiling from that position having j adopted it before the adjudicator.

ADJUDICATION RULES

[26] At first sight, the defendant's contentions pose an intractable logical puzzle. The puzzle is as to how an adjudication can start at all in the circumstances of this case. The puzzle arises in this way: both parties accept that there is a construction contract and that each party is, in consequence entitled to call for an adjudication of disputes arising under that contract. However, each party contends for different terms and different appointment procedures arising out of those terms. Thus, one of the disputes requiring resolution by the adjudicator is which terms were incorporated into the construction contract. Since an adjudicator's appointment must be made in conformity with the relevant contractual terms and since the adjudicator cannot determine his own jurisdiction, particularly where, as here, the defendant expressly states that he is not being given jurisdiction to determine his own jurisdiction, it would seem that the adjudicator is hamstrung since he cannot determine whether or not he should proceed to hear and decide the dispute in question. However, each party is none the less entitled to an immediate adjudication to resolve which terms were incorporated into the construction contract that they both accepted governed their relationship. It is clearly within the scope of an adjudicator's jurisdiction to determine whether particular documents were incorporated into the construction contract under which he was appointed and out of which the dispute arises (see C & B Scene Concept Design Ltd v Isobars Ltd [2002] EWCA Civ 46, (2002) 82 ConLR 154 particularly at [21]–[30] per Sir Murray Stuart-Smith).

[27] On a careful analysis, however, the situation is not as puzzling as it seems on first sight. It is important to take into account the precise basis of the statutory jurisdiction of the adjudicator. As already set out, this is derived from s 108(1) of the 1996 Act. That provides that 'a party to a construction contract has the right to refer a dispute arising under the contract for adjudication under a procedure complying with this section'. It follows that, since both parties agree that their relationship was governed by a construction contract, each of them has the right to refer disputes arising under that contract to adjudication. It would be surprising if that right could be thwarted because the parties could not agree as to which set of conditions had been incorporated into the contract or which set of adjudication provisions should apply. If the defendant's contentions are accepted, in a situation where it was not obvious which adjudication provisions should apply, even though it was accepted by both parties that their relationship was governed by a construction contract, it would not be possible to embark on an adjudication without first seeking a determination from the court to that question despite the statutory entitlement to an immediate and speedy adjudication.

[28] Section 108, as has been seen, provides that the construction contract shall enable a party to give notice at any time of his intention to refer a dispute to adjudication and shall provide a timetable with the object of securing the appointment of an adjudicator and referral of the dispute to him within seven days of such notice. The section continues:

'(5) If the contract does not comply with the requirements of subsections (1) to (4) [which include the provisions I have just summarised], the adjudication provisions of the Scheme for Construction Contracts apply.'

[29] If the parties enter into their construction contract in such a way that its terms are not clearly and unquestionably capable of being identified, because, as here, the negotiations consisted of a series of offers and counter-offers and no complete and composite set of contract documents was ever identified and signed, the parties have not produced a construction contract whose terms enable a party to give notice at any time of his intention to refer a dispute to adjudication nor have they provided a contractual timetable with the object of securing the appointment of an adjudicator within seven days of such a notice.

a Indeed, without an adjudication, the manner of giving notice to refer a dispute to adjudication and the means of appointing, and the timetable for the appointment of, the adjudicator that are provided for in the contract cannot be ascertained.

[30] In those circumstances, s 108 of the 1996 Act provides that the Scheme shall apply since the contract does not comply with the statutory requirement that it should enable a party to give notice at any time of his intention to refer a dispute to adjudication nor does it provide an appropriate timetable for an appointment within seven days of such a notice. A construction contract whose terms cannot be readily ascertained by both parties does not enable these essential formalities to be undertaken in the requisite timetable. A contract only enables these things to be done if it not only provides for them but also provides for them in a form that precludes any reasonable argument as to its terms concerning the adjudication which both parties have the right to demand and have instituted in a limited timetable.

[31] This conclusion arises from the use of the words 'the contract shall enable' and 'the contract shall provide' in s 108(2)(a) and (b) of the 1996 Act. These words, in the context of the mandatory requirement that a party has the right to refer a dispute arising under a construction contract, which includes a dispute as to which terms are included in the contract, to adjudication, mean that the contract shall both contain the required provisions and shall contain them in a manner and form that enables their applicability to be readily ascertained without dispute. If there is a dispute as to their applicability, the contract does not enable a party to give the requisite notice of an intention to refer a dispute to adjudication with the result that the contract does not comply with s 108(1) and that the adjudication provisions of the Scheme apply in default. This is so even if it subsequently emerges from the decision of the adjudicator that the terms of the construction contract did, in fact, comply with the requirements of s 108(1). Unless this extended construction of s 108 is applied by a court, effect cannot be given to the underlying mandatory requirement that a party has the right to refer all disputes arising under the construction contract to adjudication.

CONCLUSION

[32] It follows that the adjudicator was appointed to determine disputes arising under a construction contract and, correctly, was both appointed under the Scheme and then applied the Scheme to that adjudication. Thus, the jurisdictional challenges to his appointment and decision fail and his decision is enforceable. There is to be judgment for the claimant.

Order accordingly.

Martyn Gurr Barrister.

Sandeman Coprimar SA v Transitos y Transportes Integrales SL and others

[2003] EWCA Civ 113

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

LORD PHILLIPS OF WORTH MATRAVERS MR, RIX AND SCOTT BAKER LJJ

20, 21 JANUARY, 11 FEBRUARY 2003

Carriers – Contract – Carriage of goods – Compensation for loss of goods – International carriage of goods by road – Goods of no intrinsic value – Owner guaranteeing tax authorities for loss of goods – Liability under contract of carriage and sub-contracts – Whether guarantee payment constituting charge in respect of carriage of goods – Carriage of Goods by Road Act 1965, Schedule, art 23(4).

The claimant company imported Scotch whisky into Spain. Each bottle of spirits released onto the Spanish market bore a paper seal which indicated that excise duty had been paid. The seals, which were issued by the Spanish authorities to producers or importers, had no intrinsic value, but their recipients were required to give a guarantee to the tax authorities that they would not be used illicitly. If the seals were not used for their proper purpose, or returned within six months, the guarantor was required to pay the equivalent of the duty that would have been recovered on the bottles to which the seals should have been attached. The first defendant agreed with the claimant that it would carry a consignment of 456,000 seals from Spain to Scotland. The first defendant sub-contracted the contract of carriage to the third defendant. The third defendant consolidated the consignment of seals with other goods bound for the United Kingdom and contracted with an English company to carry the consolidated cargo from Spain to the premises of the second defendant in England. The third defendant instructed the fourth defendant to arrange the on-carriage of the seals to Scotland and the fourth defendant agreed with the second defendant that it would arrange that on-carriage. The second defendant agreed with the fifth defendant that it would transport the seals to Scotland. The seals arrived at the second defendant's premises, but never reached Scotland. The claimant commenced proceedings in respect of the loss of the seals, the greater part of its claim relating to the amount payable to the Spanish tax authorities under the guarantee. The judge held, inter alia, that while the first defendant was liable to the claimant under the Convention on the Contract for the International Carriage of Goods by Road^a (CMR) (set out in the Schedule to the Carriage of Goods by Road Act 1965), there was no privity of contract between the claimant and either the second or third defendants since the first defendant had not made out a consignment note as required by art 34 of the CMR; that the first defendant (which was insolvent and had taken no part in the proceedings) was liable for the guarantee payment because it had been aware of the nature of the seals and the consequences that would attend their loss; that the guarantee payment came within the definition of 'other charges in respect of the carriage of the goods' in art 23(4) of the CMR; and that although the second and third defendants were liable to the claimant in

^a The Convention on the Contract for the International Carriage of Goods by Road, so far as material, is set out in the annex

- a bailment, if art 23(4) were to apply to them, the guarantee payment was too remote to be recoverable from them at common law. The claimant appealed against the decision that the second and third defendants were not liable in respect of the guarantee payment, and the third defendant cross-appealed, arguing that it was not liable to the claimant at all.
- b Held – The appeal would be dismissed and the cross-appeal allowed for the following reasons—
- (1) The judge had been correct in holding that the liability to make the guarantee payment was too remote to be recoverable from the second or third defendant as damages in negligence or conversion. However, he had erred in holding that the guarantee payment fell within the definition of ‘other charges in respect of the carriage of the goods’ in art 23(4) of the CMR. The liability under the guarantee was not a duty payable in respect of the goods carried, but was rather a liability arising under a guarantee as a result of the claimant’s inability to account for the seals (see [31]–[35], [38], [39], [42], [69], below); James Buchanan & Co Ltd v Babco Forwarding and Shipping (UK) Ltd [1977] 3 All ER 1048 distinguished.
- d (2) The judge had been wrong to hold that the third defendant was liable to the claimant as bailee of the seals. The third defendant was not the first carrier, the last carrier or the carrier performing that portion of the carriage during which the loss had occurred. The claimant could not therefore contend that the third defendant remained susceptible to suit in relation to the loss of the seals after they had been transferred to a successive carrier (see [42], [48], [66], [69], below).
- e

Notes

For compensation payable by a carrier, see 5(1) Halsbury’s Laws (4th edn reissue) para 561.

- f For the Carriage of Goods by Road Act 1965, Schedule, art 23(4), see 38 Halsbury’s Statutes (4th edn) (2001 reissue) 152.

Cases referred to in judgment

- Buchanan (James) & Co Ltd v Babco Forwarding and Shipping (UK) Ltd* [1977] 3 All ER 1048, [1978] AC 141, [1977] 3 WLR 907, HL; affg [1977] 1 All ER 518, [1977] QB 208, [1977] 2 WLR 107, CA.
- g CIA Portoraffi Commerciale SA v Ultramar Panama Inc, The Captain Gregos (No 2) [1990] 2 Lloyd’s Rep 395, CA.
- Elder, Dempster & Co Ltd v Paterson, Zochonis & Co, Griffiths Lewis Steam Navigation Co v Paterson, Zochonis & Co Ltd* [1924] AC 522, [1924] All ER Rep 135, HL.
- h Gilchrist Watt & Sanderson Pty Ltd v York Products Ltd [1970] 3 All ER 825, [1970] 1 WLR 1262, PC.
- Hispanica de Petroleos SA v Vencedora Oceanica Navegacion SA, The Kapetan Marcos NL (No 2)* [1987] 2 Lloyd’s Rep 321.
- Johnson Matthey & Co Ltd v Constantine Terminals Ltd* [1976] 2 Lloyd’s Rep 215.
- j Kuwait Airways Corp v Iraq Airways Co (No 3) [2001] 1 All ER (Comm) 557, [2002] 2 AC 883, [2001] 3 WLR 1117, CA; affd [2002] UKHL 19, [2002] 3 All ER 209, [2002] 2 AC 883, [2002] 2 WLR 1353.
- Morris v CW Martin & Sons Ltd* [1965] 2 All ER 725, [1966] 1 QB 716, [1965] 3 WLR 276, CA.
- New Zealand Shipping Co Ltd v AM Satterthwaite & Co Ltd, The Eurymedon* [1974] 1 All ER 1015, [1975] AC 154, [1974] 2 WLR 865, PC.

Overseas Tankship (UK) Ltd v Morts Docks and Engineering Co Ltd, The Wagon Mound [1961] 1 All ER 404, [1961] AC 388, [1961] 2 WLR 126, PC. a Pioneer Container, The, KH Enterprise (cargo owners) v Pioneer Container (owners) [1994] 2 All ER 250, [1994] 2 AC 324, [1994] 3 WLR 1, PC.

Scruttons Ltd v Midland Silicones Ltd [1962] 1 All ER 1, [1962] AC 446, [1962] 2 WLR 186, HL.

Singer Co (UK) Ltd v Tees and Hartlepool Port Authority [1988] 2 Lloyd's Rep 164. b

Wilson v Darling Island Stevedoring and Lighterage Co Ltd (1955) 95 CLR 43, Aus HC.

Appeal and cross-appeal

Sandeman Coprimar SA (Seagram) appealed with the permission of Judge Hegarty QC sitting as a deputy judge of the Mercantile Court at Liverpool granted on 22 November 2001 from his order of 6 July 2001 that the second defendant, Bradford Cargo Terminals Ltd (BCT), was not liable for sums payable by Seagram to the Spanish tax authorities. The third defendant, Spain TIR Centro Transportes Internacionales SA (Spain-TIR), cross-appealed from a finding of liability against it. The first defendant, Transitos y Transportes Integrales SL (TTI), was insolvent and took no part in the hearing. Claims against the fourth defendant, Interserve International Freight plc, and the fifth defendant, Joda Freight, were discontinued. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court. c
d

Michael Nolan (instructed by DLA) for Seagram. e

Nigel Meeson QC (instructed by Hill Dickinson) for BCT.

Michael Coburn (instructed by Thomas Cooper & Stibbard) for Spain-TIR.

Cur adv vult

11 February 2003. The following judgment of the court was delivered. f

LORD PHILLIPS OF WORTH MATRAVERS MR.

[1] This is an appeal from the judgment delivered by Judge Hegarty QC at Liverpool on 6 July 2001 and perfected subsequently. It is brought with the permission of Judge Hegarty granted on 22 November 2001. It relates to the loss of some unusual goods in the course of international carriage by road. The appellants (Seagram) owned those goods. The judge held that three of the defendants who were involved in the carriage were responsible for the loss. In consequence of the loss of the goods, Seagram had to pay Ptas 113,324,310, equivalent to some £420,000, under a guarantee given to the Spanish tax authorities. This represented almost the entirety of their claim. The judge held that Seagram was entitled to recover this sum from the first defendants (Transitos y Transportes Integrales SL (TTI)). TTI are, however, insolvent and took no part in the hearing. The judge held that the second defendants (Bradford Cargo Terminals Ltd (BCT)) and the third defendants (Spain TIR Centro Transportes Internacionales SA (Spain-TIR)), while liable to Seagram for loss of the goods, were not liable for this sum. It is against that finding that Seagram appeal. By a cross-appeal Spain-TIR, for their part, deny that they are under any liability at all. g
h
j

[2] The facts of this case raise many and complex issues. In resolving those issues the judgment appealed against ran to 117 pages. Happily, not all those issues are raised before us. None the less this appeal illustrates the

- a problems that arise when parties to international carriage by road depart from the scheme laid down under the relevant international convention.

THE FACTS

- [3] The following facts are extracted from the judgment of Judge Hegarty. They are not contentious.
- b [4] Seagram is a company incorporated in Spain by the name Sandeman Coprimar SA. The company trades under the name Seagram Espana. Seagram imports Scotch whisky into Spain.
- c [5] Spain imposes excise duties on spirits, including whisky, which become payable when the liquor is released from a bonded warehouse or some other similar suspensive regime. Accordingly, where whisky is imported into Spain from the United Kingdom, no United Kingdom duty is payable but Spanish duty is payable on importation into Spain or release from bond. When liquor is released onto the Spanish market, each bottle bears a paper seal of a particular design and bearing a serial number. This is in the form of a strip which is affixed to both sides of the neck of the bottle and runs over the cork or the cap. The
- d technical word for this is 'precinta', which can be translated as 'tax seal'.
- [6] The presence of a tax seal on a bottle indicates that excise duty has been paid. Tax seals are issued by the Spanish authorities to producers or importers. No charge is made for these seals and they have no intrinsic value. If used illicitly, however, these seals can facilitate the evasion of duty. Those to whom they are issued are required to give a guarantee to the tax authorities to guard against this
- e eventuality. If the seals are not used for their proper purpose, namely the sealing of bottles on which duty has been paid, or alternatively returned within six months, the guarantor is called upon to pay the equivalent of the duty that would have been recovered on the bottles to which the seals should, in the normal course of events, have been attached.
- f [7] At or about the beginning of August 1994 Seagram entered into an oral agreement with TTI that TTI would carry nine cartons containing a total of 456,000 tax seals from Madrid to the premises of Chivas Brothers Ltd (Chivas) in Paisley, Scotland. On 4 August TTI entered into a sub-contract with Spain-TIR under which the latter agreed to carry nine cartons of 'precintas para botellas de licor' (seals for bottles of spirits) from Madrid to Paisley. TTI arranged for the
- g seals to be collected from Seagram's agents in Madrid and delivered to Spain-TIR's premises for the purposes of on-carriage.
- [8] Spain-TIR, in their turn, sub-contracted this carriage. They did so in the following manner. Having received the nine cartons, they consolidated these with other goods bound for the United Kingdom. They then contracted with an
- h English company, BJ Waters Ltd, to carry the consolidated cargo from their premises in Madrid to the premises of BCT in Bradford. Spain-TIR prepared a consignment note in respect of the consolidated cargo covering carriage from their depot in Madrid to BCT's premises. On this the seals were described as 'precintos botellas'.
- j [9] Spain-TIR instructed agents, a company of freight forwarders called Interserve International Freight plc (Interserve) to arrange for the on-carriage to Paisley. Interserve were, at one stage, joined as fourth defendants to the action, but the claim against them was discontinued. Interserve agreed with BCT that the latter would arrange for the on-carriage of the seals from their premises in Bradford to Paisley. They sent an unloading list to BCT prior to the arrival of the cargo, which described the seals as '9 cartons botels'. BCT agreed with Joda

Freight (Joda), a transportation company based in Keighley, that they would transport the cartons on to Chivas's premises in Paisley. Joda were joined as fifth defendants to the action. a [10] The cartons never reached Chivas. It was common ground that they had got as far as BCT. One of the issues that the judge had to resolve was whether BCT lost the cartons or whether BCT delivered them to Joda, who then lost them. The judge found that they were never delivered to Joda, but lost by BCT. There is no appeal against that finding. b

THE JUDGE'S FINDINGS

[11] English law in relation to international carriage by road was significantly altered by the Carriage of Goods by Road Act 1965. That Act gave statutory effect to the Convention on the Contract for the International Carriage of Goods by Road (CMR) (as set out in the Schedule to the 1965 Act). The effect of the CMR on the rights and liabilities of the parties lies at the root of this appeal. We have annexed the relevant provisions of the CMR to this judgment. c

[12] The scheme of the CMR, where successive carriers perform carriage covered by a single contract, is that each successively becomes party to this contract as a result of accepting the goods and the consignment note relating to them—see art 34 of the CMR. The consignment note sets out the terms of the single contract, and a copy of it travels with the goods. d

[13] In the present case TTI never made out a consignment note. In these circumstances the judge held that there was no privity of contract between Seagram and either Spain-TIR or BCT. We turn to explain the basis upon which the judge found that each of these three companies was under a liability, albeit not the identical liability, to Seagram. e

THE LIABILITY OF TTI

[14] Although TTI never made out the consignment note required by art 4 of the CMR, the contract between Seagram and TTI was none the less subject to the provisions of the CMR. Articles 1 and 4 so provide. The judge held that it followed that TTI were liable for the loss of the seals in the course of transit to their contractual destination, namely Paisley. No challenge is made to this conclusion. f

THE LIABILITY OF SPAIN-TIR

[15] The judge, after a lengthy consideration of the authorities, concluded that Spain-TIR was not brought into contractual relationship with Seagram. Accordingly, they did not rank as a 'successive carrier' under art 34 of the CMR. They took possession of the goods as sub-contractors under their contract with TTI. That contract was, itself, subject to the CMR, by virtue of art 1, but Seagram were not party to it. In these circumstances the judge held that 'whether or not TTI was expressly or by implication authorised to create a sub-bailment, Seagram is entitled to treat Spain-TIR as bailee of the seals'. g

[16] The judge held that Spain-TIR's responsibility as bailee for the care of the seals persisted until Spain-TIR delivered the seals to Paisley, in accordance with Spain-TIR's contract with TTI. The transfer of possession of the seals to BCT, under a further sub-contract, did not relieve Spain-TIR of responsibility to Seagram for the care of the seals. The judge held that it followed that Spain-TIR had the same liability as BCT for the loss of the seals. h a [17] The judge held:

j

THE LIABILITY OF BCT

‘Like Spain-TIR, BCT voluntarily accepted the custody of the seals for reward and would, therefore, appear to have owed Seagram the duties of a bailee. In my judgment, that analysis would apply even if, as contended on behalf of Seagram, the sub-bailment to BCT was not expressly or by implication authorised by Seagram.’

b

[18] The judge held that the only claim that Seagram was entitled to pursue against Spain-TIR and BCT was in bailment. Negligence on the part of BCT was to be inferred from the loss of the seals, and on this basis BCT was in breach of bailment. Furthermore, the loss of the seals by BCT amounted to a conversion of them, both at common law and by virtue of the provisions of s 2(2) of the Torts (Interference with Goods) Act 1977. Spain-TIR was in identical breach of duty.

c

THE MEASURE OF DAMAGE

[19] The judge first considered the measure of damage at common law and then went on to consider the effect of art 23 of the CMR.

d

LIABILITY AT COMMON LAW

[20] The judge held that the seals had no intrinsic value at all. In so far as Seagram were entitled to damages, this was in respect of consequential loss. English principles of remoteness applied. To be recoverable, loss had to be of a type that was reasonably foreseeable. Carriage charges thrown away fell into this category. Each of the three defendants was liable in respect of these. They amounted to Ptas 42,550, the equivalent of less than £200.

e

[21] So far as the liability to the Spanish authorities under the guarantee was concerned, the judge found that TTI were aware of the nature of the seals and the consequences that would attend their loss, so that TTI were liable to Seagram for this. The same was not true of either Spain-TIR or BCT. On the evidence neither of those companies could reasonably have appreciated either the nature of the goods that were in the cartons nor the financial consequences to Seagram of their loss.

f

g ARTICLE 23

[22] Article 23 of the CMR lays down the measure of compensation recoverable where a carrier is liable under the convention for the loss of the goods carried. The starting point under art 23(1) is that the carrier is liable for the value of the goods at the place and time at which they were accepted for carriage. In addition, under art 23(4), ‘Customs duties and other charges incurred in respect of the carriage of the goods shall be refunded’. The judge held that the sums payable under the guarantee constituted such charges provided, but only provided, that they satisfied the English law test of remoteness. In the case of TTI they did so. It followed from this finding that TTI had a contractual liability under art 23 that mirrored the common law liability found by the judge.

h

j

So far as Spain-TIR and BCT were concerned, if art 23(4) were to apply to them, it would impose no liability in respect of sums payable under the guarantee for, in their case, these were too remote.

[23] We have used the conditional tense in this last sentence, because the judge expressed the view that whether or not art 23 applied was a matter for the election by Spain-TIR and BCT, and it was open to them to exercise that election even after his judgment. This finding was based upon the permissive terms of art 28(2), which the judge held applied to each of these defendants. It was up to them whether to invoke the provisions of art 23. If they did so, they would become subject to all the provisions of that article.

THE ISSUES RAISED ON THE APPEAL

[24] The following issues arise on this appeal. (i) Was the judge correct to hold that the guarantee payment was too remote to be recovered from Spain-TIR or BCT at common law? Seagram contend that he was not. Spain-TIR and BCT support his finding. (ii) If the guarantee payment was not too remote, did it constitute part of the value of the seals? Seagram contends that it did not. Spain-TIR and BCT contend that it did. (iii) Was the judge correct to hold that the guarantee payment fell within the definition of 'other charges' under art 23(4)? Spain-TIR and BCT contend that he was not. Seagram support his finding. (iv) Was the judge correct to hold that 'other charges' under art 23(4) could only be recovered if not too remote under English law? Seagram contend that he was not. Spain-TIR and BCT support his finding. (v) Was the judge correct to hold that Spain-TIR were liable to Seagram as bailees of the seals? Spain-TIR contend that he was not. Seagram support his finding. (vi) Was the judge correct to hold that BCT were liable to Seagram as bailees of the seals? BCT contend that he was not. Seagram support his finding. (vii) Was the judge correct to indicate that Spain-TIR and BCT could elect whether to rely on art 23, but that if they did so would be bound by all its provisions? Seagram contend that Spain-TIR and BCT have no right to elect, but are bound by all the provisions of art 23. Spain-TIR and BCT contend that they enjoy a right to elect to rely on those provisions of art 23 which limit their liability.

WAS THE JUDGE CORRECT TO HOLD THAT THE GUARANTEE PAYMENT WAS TOO REMOTE TO BE RECOVERED FROM SPAIN-TIR AND BCT AT COMMON LAW?

[25] The judge cited Overseas Tankship (UK) Ltd v Morts Docks and Engineering Co Ltd, The Wagon Mound [1961] 1 All ER 404, [1961] AC 388 as laying down the following test of remoteness in the law of negligence:

'A negligent tortfeasor is not responsible for all the direct consequences of his negligence, but only for such damage as ought reasonably to have been foreseen. There are two relevant qualifications to that general principle. Firstly, the test of reasonable foreseeability in tort is generally more stringent and less favourable to the wrongdoer than the similar test in contract. Secondly, so long as the general nature of the damage in question was reasonably foreseeable, it is immaterial that the precise extent of the damage, or the precise manner in which it was caused, may not themselves have been foreseeable.'

[26] So far as the law of conversion is concerned, the judge adopted the following passage from the decision of the Court of Appeal in Kuwait Airways Corp v Iraq Airways Co (No 3) [2001] 1 All ER (Comm) 557 at 628, [2002] 2 AC 883 at 1030 (para 538):

'It appears to us that as the law now stands, in conversion cases a court has to ask whether at the time of the conversion the type of loss that occurred (as opposed to the precise manner in which it occurred) was reasonably foreseeable.'

a [27] On behalf of Seagram, Mr Nolan did not challenge these tests. He submitted, however, that the judge had misapplied them. He put his case in a number of ways. First he relied upon the fact that BCT had no idea what was in the cartons. This was of the nature of their business. All kinds of goods came into their possession, often imprecisely described. In these circumstances BCT could not be heard to say that any type of loss was unforeseeable.

b [28] There can be problems in applying a test of foreseeability to carriers who handle consolidated containers of many different varieties of goods. Some would argue that one of the objects of the CMR convention was to make such an exercise superfluous. There is, however, no such problem on the facts of this case. No carrier without specific knowledge of the nature of 'precintas' and of the guarantee that has to be given to the Spanish authorities in exchange for their release, could envisage that the loss of a number of cartons could give rise to the type of liability experienced by Seagram in this case. Mr Nolan submitted that the loss in this case was of the same type as the loss that occurs when dutiable spirits are stolen and duty has to be paid on them. We shall be dealing with this suggested analogy in a different context later in this judgment. Suffice it to say c that we do not accept it. The liability in this case was not analogous to duty payable on the goods carried.
d

[29] Mr Nolan submitted that when a number of items are lost, the owner will foreseeably suffer a financial loss in respect of each item. In this case a payment had to be made under the guarantee in respect of each seal. It followed, argued e Mr Nolan, that the loss was of a type foreseeable as the consequence of the loss of goods carried. This contention is unsound. The fact that one kind of damage occurs item by item does not render another kind of damage that also occurs item by item similar in type.

[30] Finally, Mr Nolan argued that because the guarantee payment fell within the express definition of 'other charges' in art 23(4), the payment in question was f of a type expressly contemplated by the CMR conditions. BCT contracted on CMR conditions and, therefore, could not be heard to suggest that this type of loss was not readily foreseeable. We have yet to deal with the issue of whether the guarantee payment did fall within the definition of 'other charges'. If the judge was right that it did, this was only by giving the meaning of that phrase so wide a compass that it embraced liabilities of types that were not reasonably g foreseeable. We reject the suggestion that so wide a meaning of 'charges' could embrace a single 'type' of damage when applying the common law test of remoteness.

[31] We are in no doubt that the liability to make the guarantee payment was h too remote to be recoverable from Spain-TIR or BCT as damages in negligence or conversion.

IF THE GUARANTEE PAYMENT WAS NOT TOO REMOTE, DID IT CONSTITUTE PART OF THE VALUE OF THE SEALS?

[32] The argument that the guarantee payment formed part of the value of the j seals was advanced by Spain-TIR and BCT by way of alternative to their primary case that the payment was too remote to be recoverable at all. If this alternative case had succeeded, they would have sought to invoke the limit of liability provided by art 23(3) of the CMR. Having regard to the answer that we have given to the previous question, this issue does not arise. We will, however, deal with it shortly, for the answer further supports our conclusion that the guarantee payment was too remote to be recovered. The guarantee was exacted to guard against the possibility that the seals might be misused so as to deprive the Spanish authorities of excise duty payable on liquor sold in Spain. The evidence was that, if it could be demonstrated that the seals had been destroyed, the guarantee would not be called. Thus it was not inevitable that loss of the seals would result in payment under the guarantee. For instance, if the seals had been destroyed by fire, no payment would have been exacted. This demonstrates that the liability under the guarantee formed no part of the value of the seals. It arose as a consequence of their loss by reason (i) of the undertaking given under the guarantee and (ii) of the circumstances in which the loss occurred.

WAS THE JUDGE CORRECT TO HOLD THAT THE GUARANTEE PAYMENT FELL WITHIN THE DEFINITION OF 'OTHER CHARGES' UNDER ART 23(4)?

[33] In making his finding the judge held that he was bound to follow the decision of the House of Lords in James Buchanan & Co Ltd v Babco Forwarding and Shipping (UK) Ltd [1977] 3 All ER 1048, [1978] AC 141. Mr Coburn, on behalf of Spain-TIR challenged that conclusion, arguing that the judge felt himself unduly constrained by that decision.

[34] The Buchanan case concerned the theft of a consignment of whisky that was being carried under CMR terms, from the plaintiffs' bonded warehouse in Glasgow to Teheran. Its value, in bond, was £7,000. Had it been exported from the United Kingdom no excise duty would have been payable. It was, however, stolen from a lorry park in London, while in the course of transit. In these circumstances the plaintiffs became liable under s 85 of the Customs and Excise Act 1952 to pay excise duty on the whisky in the sum of some £30,000. The plaintiffs contended that the value of the whisky included the £30,000 duty, so that it could be recovered under art 23(2) of the CMR. This contention was rejected by both the Court of Appeal ([1977] 1 All ER 518, [1977] QB 208) and the House of Lords, a result which underpins our conclusion in [32], above, were underpinning needed.

[35] For present purposes, the crucial issue was that raised by the plaintiffs as an alternative argument. Was the liability to duty recoverable as falling within 'the carriage charges, Customs duties and other charges incurred in respect of the carriage of the goods' under art 23(4)? In the absence of authority, we would have answered this question in the negative. It seems to us that one object of the CMR is to make a clear apportionment of risk arising in the course of international carriage by road, so as to facilitate insurance and avoid double insurance. A natural reading of art 23 would seem to us to impose liability on the carrier for the value of the goods when the carriage begins, subject to the art 23(3) limit, together with charges incidental to the carriage of the goods, including customs duties. Such charges, typically, are foreseeable and form an increment to the value of the goods. Article 23(6) refers to entitlement to higher compensation under arts 24 and 26. Article 26 would seem designed to enable a consignor to impose liability on the carrier for a value exceeding the art 23(3) limit and for possible consequential loss—a liability compensated for by a surcharge and which, by virtue of being declared, can be insured against by the carrier.

[36] The minority in the House of Lords resolved the issue as we would have done. The majority, however, did not. They upheld the judgment of the Court of Appeal, though not that court's reasoning, in concluding that the liability to excise duty constituted 'other charges' under art 23(4). Their reasoning can be a derived from the following passages. Lord Wilberforce ([1977] 3 All ER 1048 at 1054, [1978] AC 141 at 154) said:

b 'I find that the judgment of Master Jacob carries conviction. The duty, he says, became chargeable having regard to the way in which the goods were carried by the appellants. "In respect of" is wide enough to include the way in which the goods were carried, miscarried or lost. I think this is right—and I do not consider that it is answered by saying that the charge would not have arisen if the thieves had exported the goods or if the whisky had flowed away. No doubt this is true but the fact that an exemption might have arisen does not prevent the charge which did arise from being "in respect of the carriage". The appellants' duty was to carry the whisky to the port of embarkation—their failure to do so might, or might not, bring a charge into existence. But if it did, I think it right to say that the charge was in respect of the carriage.'

Lord Dilhorne ([1977] 3 All ER 1048 at 1057, [1978] AC 141 at 158) said:

d 'If "in respect of" is given the broad interpretation of "in consequence of", content can be given to the words in question. They will clearly cover a far wider ambit than carriage charges. While it would not be right to seek to import common law doctrines into the convention, it cannot be right, in my opinion, to construe "in respect of" as meaning "for" with the result that the article would read "carriage charges ... and other charges for carriage". They must be given a wider meaning than that and in my opinion the right meaning to give them is that in the context in which they appear they mean "in consequence of" or "arising out of".'

Lord Salmon ([1977] 3 All ER 1048 at 1059, 1060, [1978] AC 141 at 160, 161) said:

f 'Were the charges for excise duty which the respondents have been obliged to pay incurred in "respect of the carriage of the goods"? No doubt these words are flexible and somewhat imprecise, but, especially as they appear in an international convention relating to commercial affairs, they should not be construed pedantically or rigidly but sensibly and broadly. So construed, I agree with the view expressed by Master Jacob in his judgment that they are wide enough to include "in consequence of the way in which the goods were carried by the appellants". They were certainly carried in such a way as caused the respondents to be charged with £30,000 in respect of excise duty ... My Lords, in my view, the language of art 23 is capable of bearing and does bear the meaning attached to it by Master Jacob. This meaning accords with both reason and justice. An excise duty of £30,000 has become chargeable against the respondent exporters solely because of the fault of the appellant carriers' servant for which the carriers are vicariously liable. Reason and justice seem to demand that the burden of paying the £30,000 should rest on the shoulders of the carriers rather than on those of the innocent exporters.'

j [37] Each of the majority proceeded on the basis that art 23 was the only route by which liability for excise tax could be recovered. None made any reference to art 26. Their speeches extend the meaning of the words 'in respect of the carriage' to embrace 'in consequence of the miscarriage'.

[38] The decision in the Buchanan case is critically discussed in Professor Clarke's book, International Carriage of Goods by Road: CMR (3rd edn, 1997)

pp 368–373 (para 98) and in Hill & Messent on CMR: Contracts for the International Carriage of Goods by Road (3rd edn, 2000) pp 202–209 (paras 9.25–9.34). Each suggests that the approach of the majority of the House of Lords must be subject to some restriction. We shall refer to some of the observations of the authors of these works when we come to address the next issue. Nor is the decision one which lies happily with the approach to the ambit of art 23 of the courts of most of the other signatories to the convention, France being an exception. For our part we do not consider that the decision should be applied any more widely by the courts of this country than respect for the doctrine of precedent requires.

[39] The judge held:

‘I find it impossible to make any rational distinction between the statutory liability for duty which was the subject matter of that case and the liability under the guarantee in the present case.’

We do not agree. In the Buchanan case the excise duty payable was a charge on the goods carried. It was, as a matter of English law, an automatic consequence of the loss of the goods within the jurisdiction. It could be said to be similar in kind to the customs duty payable upon importation of the goods into another country. The liability under the guarantee in this case is not a duty payable in respect of the goods carried. It is a liability arising under a guarantee that arose as a result of the inability of Seagram to account for the seals. Not only is the liability a more remote consequence of the loss of the seals than is excise duty payable on whisky that is stolen, as to which see the next issue, but it does not, in our view, fall within the meaning of a ‘charge incurred in respect of the carriage of the goods’. For this reason we hold that payment under the guarantee is not recoverable under art 23(4). Was the judge correct to hold that ‘other charges’ under art 23(4) could only be recovered if not too remote under English law?

[40] The judge adopted and applied the following passage from Professor Clarke’s work (p 371 (para 98)):

‘The trouble with the broad view is that it makes it difficult for the carrier to estimate exposure to liability. Whereas there is a monetary limit on the amount of liability for loss, damage or delay to the goods, there is no limit in the CMR on the amount of compensation that can be awarded for “other charges”. Inevitably, some kind of rule is required to identify those charges which are “in consequence of” the carriage and those which are not. In the CMR the question was not anticipated and has not been answered. An answer must be found in national law, and found, it appears, in rules of causation and remoteness. In terms of causation, charges will be recoverable under English law if they were incurred as part of a reasonable response to the threat posed by the carrier’s breach of the contract of carriage. In terms of remoteness, charges will be recoverable if they are losses of a type which the carrier should reasonably have contemplated would be incurred in the event of his breach of the contract of carriage.’

[41] Hill & Messent (p 204 (para 9.31)) make a similar suggestion that the ‘width of expression’ used by the House of Lords should only be applied to expenses that were within the actual or constructive knowledge of the carrier ‘so they could be held liable without offending normal rules of remoteness’.

[42] Because we have distinguished the Buchanan case it is not necessary for us to rule whether these expressions of view are correct and we shall not do so. We sympathise with the perceived need to restrict the scope of the Buchanan case. At

- a the same time we think it unfortunate if that decision imports the application of English principles of remoteness. This does not seem appropriate, for the scheme of the CMR contemplates an identical liability imposed on a succession of carriers. On the facts of the present case, the judge found that TTI were liable in respect of the guarantee payment, but that Spain-TIR and BCT were not. Had they all been linked to a single CMR contract this would have led to problems
- b when art 38 fell to be applied.

WAS THE JUDGE CORRECT TO HOLD THAT SPAIN-TIR WERE LIABLE TO SEAGRAM AS BAILEES OF THE SEALS?

- [43] This issue arises on a cross-appeal by Spain-TIR. Only the liability for the carriage charges now turns on the issue, and that is a liability which seems likely
- c ultimately to fall on BCT. The issue is, however, an important one because, together with the seventh issue, it calls for consideration of the legal nature of a sub-bailment on terms. This takes us into deep waters.

- [44] The starting point is to review the circumstances in which Spain-TIR became involved with the carriage of the seals. This requires some elaboration
- d of the facts that we set out at the beginning of this judgment.

- [45] The head contract of carriage was between Seagram and TTI and it was, by operation of law, subject to the CMR. Spain-TIR agreed with TTI to carry the seals from Madrid to Paisley. This contract also was subject to the CMR by operation of law. TTI gave Spain-TIR written instructions which identified the sender as
- e Seagram and the consignee as Chivas. Spain-TIR issued a CMR consignment note which named the sender as Spain-TIR and the consignee as BCT. Spain-TIR sub-contracted to BJ Waters the carriage from their depot to BCT's premises in Bradford. This contract, also, was subject to the CMR by operation of law. Interserve, as Spain-TIR's agents agreed with BCT that BCT would carry the seals to their destination at Paisley. This agreement was on CMR terms, both because
- f the contract between Interserve and BCT so provided and because BCT received the seals with, and on the terms of, the consignment note prepared by Spain-TIR.

- [46] The judge recorded the concession by Mr Nolan on behalf of Seagram that Spain-TIR were entitled to invoke art 28 of the CMR and avail themselves of
- g those provisions of the CMR which fixed or limited the compensation due. The judge held that, in the light of this concession, it was not necessary for him to decide whether Spain-TIR would have been entitled to rely upon those provisions under the doctrine of 'bailment on terms'. Findings made by the judge in relation to BCT bear, however, on that question.

- [47] The judge found that TTI must be regarded as having, at least by implication, authorised Spain-TIR to sub-contract to BCT performance of the last leg of the journey. Mr Nolan conceded that BCT also were entitled to invoke
- h art 28 of the CMR. The judge went on to hold:

- j 'I would not have been prepared to hold that Seagram had expressly forbidden any sub-bailment of the seals. In those circumstances, given the likelihood of consolidation and deconsolidation and the very widespread practice of sub-contracting all or part of contracts for the international carriage of goods by road, I would have been prepared, if the matter had not been resolved by concession, to hold that Seagram had impliedly consented to a sub-bailment of the seals. It would, I think, almost inexorably have followed that its consent would have extended to a sub-bailment on the terms of the CMR, given the international nature of the carriage.' a

It necessarily follows from this that the judge would have been prepared to hold that Seagram had impliedly consented to a sub-bailment by TTI to Spain-TIR on terms of the CMR.

[48] In our judgment the judge was justified for the reasons that he gave in concluding that both Spain-TIR and BCT had taken possession of the goods as bailees on terms of the CMR. It remains to consider the implications of this. b

[49] Mr Coburn submitted that it was not open to Seagram to sue Spain-TIR for breach of bailment for two reasons. He submitted that, under principles of common law, Spain-TIR were not liable for breach of bailment because they were not in possession of the seals at the time of their loss. He further submitted that because both the contract between Seagram and TTI and the contract between TTI and Spain-TIR were governed by the CMR, the CMR applied generally to regulate the rights and liabilities of these three parties. In these circumstances, art 36 applied and Spain-TIR could not be sued by Seagram because they were not the first carrier, the last carrier or the carrier performing that portion of the carriage during which the event causing the loss occurred. c
d

[50] Turning to the position at common law, Mr Coburn submitted that where a contractual bailee of goods sub-bails them to A, who in turn sub-bails them to B, who loses them, the bailee will be liable to the owner for breach of a non-delegable duty of care, but A will have no liability, being neither in possession of the goods at the time of their loss nor party to the contract under which they were bailed. e

[51] The basis upon which the judge found Spain-TIR liable as bailees was, that having voluntarily accepted possession of the goods for onward carriage to Paisley, and entrusted to BCT part of the responsibilities that they had assumed, they were liable for the loss of the goods caused by the default of BCT. f

[52] We have difficulty with the judge's analysis, having regard to his finding that Seagram authorised Spain-TIR to sub-contract to BCT. The basis of this finding was that Seagram consented to a chain of sub-contracts that was a typical feature of CMR carriage. Why in these circumstances should a greater liability be imposed upon Spain-TIR than that incidental to being a link in the chain of successive carriers under a single CMR contract? Why should Spain-TIR not be entitled to rely on art 36? g

[53] This question requires consideration of the manner in which a sub-bailment on terms operates. The doctrine was first clearly stated by Lord Denning MR in Morris v CW Martin & Sons Ltd [1965] 2 All ER 725, [1966] 1 QB 716. That case involved the sub-bailment to the defendants, with the consent of the owner, the plaintiff, of a fur stole that had been delivered to the bailee for cleaning. The fur stole was converted by a servant of the sub-bailee. The contract between the bailee and the sub-bailee contained exempting conditions. The Court of Appeal held that the defendants, as sub-bailees for reward, owed the plaintiff the same duty to take reasonable care of the fur that was owed by the bailee. They were liable for the default of their servant. The exempting conditions did not, on their true construction, exempt from liability for the loss. In these circumstances it was unnecessary to decide whether they applied as between the plaintiff and the defendants. Lord Denning MR expressed the view that in such circumstances the owner was bound by the conditions as if he had h a expressly or impliedly consented to the bailee making a sub-bailment containing those conditions, but not otherwise.
j

[54] This doctrine was approved and applied by Steyn J in Singer Co (UK) Ltd v Tees' and Hartlepool Port Authority [1988] 2 Lloyd's Rep 164. It also received approval by members of the Court of Appeal in Hispanica de Petroleos SA v Vencedora Oceanica Navegacion SA, The Kapetan Marcos NL (No 2) [1987] 2 Lloyd's Rep 321 and CIA Portoraffi Commerciale SA v Ultramar Panama Inc, The Captain Gregos (No 2) [1990] 2 Lloyd's Rep 395.

b [55] In Johnson Matthey & Co Ltd v Constantine Terminals Ltd [1976] 2 Lloyd's Rep 215, Donaldson J adopted a different approach to the entitlement of a sub-bailee to rely, as against the bailor, upon the terms upon which the bailee had sub-bailed the goods to him. The sub-bailees in that case sought to rely upon c their standard conditions to provide a defence in respect of their loss of a consignment of silver belonging to the plaintiffs. Donaldson J first observed that it was probably possible to hold, following the approach of Lord Denning MR in Morris' case, that there had been a bailment on terms with the consent of the plaintiffs. He went on to hold, however, that such consent was unnecessary. He d explained (at 222) the basis of this:

'But the plaintiffs cannot prove the bailment upon which, in my judgment, they must rely, without referring to terms upon which the silver was received by [the first defendants] from [the second defendant]. These terms establish (a) that [the first defendants] were bailees for reward but also e (b) that the implied duties of such a bailee were qualified by exceptions. And, despite Mr. Wadsworth's vigorous argument to the contrary, I really do not see how the plaintiffs can rely upon one part of the contract while ignoring the other. Consent seems to me to be relevant only between the bailor and head bailee. If the sub-bailment is on terms to which the bailor consented, he has no cause of action against the head bailee. If it was not, the sub-bailee f is still protected, but if the bailor is damnified by the terms of the sub-bailment he has a cause of action against the head bailee.'

[56] Morris' case and the Johnson Matthey case received detailed analysis in the decision of the Privy Council, delivered by Lord Goff of Chieveley in The Pioneer Container, KH Enterprise (cargo owners) v Pioneer Container (owners) [1994] 2 All ER 250, [1994] 2 AC 324. In that case the plaintiffs engaged carriers to ship goods by sea under bills of lading which gave the carriers authority to sub-contract 'on any terms'. The carriers sub-contracted to the defendant ship owners on terms which included a Taiwanese exclusive jurisdiction clause. The issue was whether this clause was binding as between the plaintiffs and the defendants.

g [57] Lord Goff first considered the relationship between the plaintiffs and the sub-bailee. On this he found authoritative guidance in the decision of the Privy Council in Gilchrist Watt & Sanderson Pty Ltd v York Products Ltd [1970] 3 All ER 825, [1970] 1 WLR 1262. There, the defendants were stevedores who had lost two cases of clocks that they had received as sub-bailees of the shipowners, who h owed a duty to deliver them to the plaintiffs under the bills of lading. The Privy Council held that the defendants were liable to the plaintiffs, in that, as Lord Pearson observed ([1970] 3 All ER 825 at 829, [1970] 1 WLR 1262 at 1267), they—
j

'took on themselves an obligation to the plaintiffs to exercise due care for the safety of the goods, although there was no contractual relation or attornment between the defendants and the plaintiffs.'

[58] Following this decision, Lord Goff held that there was a 'collateral bailment' between the plaintiffs and the defendant shipowners. He then turned to consider the terms of this bailment. He approved the doctrine formulated by Lord Denning MR in Morris' case, adding this comment on the relevance of 'consent': a

'It must be assumed that, on the facts of the case, no direct contractual relationship has been created between the owner and the sub-bailee, the only contract created by the sub-bailment being that between the bailee and the sub-bailee. Even so, if the effect of the sub-bailment is that the sub-bailee voluntarily receives into his custody the goods of the owner and so assumes towards the owner the responsibility of a bailee, then to the extent that the terms of the sub-bailment are consented to by the owner, it can properly be said that the owner has authorised the bailee so to regulate the duties of the sub-bailee in respect of the goods entrusted to him, not only towards the bailee but also towards the owner.' (See The Pioneer Container [1994] 2 All ER 250 at 259, [1994] 2 AC 324 at 339.) b
c

[59] Lord Goff went on to state ([1994] 2 All ER 250 at 259–260, [1994] 2 AC 324 at 339–340) that this doctrine did not turn on estoppel, nor on contract: d

'Such a conclusion, finding its origin in the law of bailment rather than the law of contract, does not depend for its efficacy either on the doctrine of privity of contract, or on the doctrine of consideration. That this may be so appears from the decision of the House of Lords in Elder, Dempster & Co Ltd v Paterson, Zochonis & Co, Griffiths Lewis Steam Navigation Co v Paterson, Zochonis & Co Ltd [1924] AC 522, [1924] All ER Rep 135. In that case, shippers of cargo on a chartered ship brought an action against the shipowners for damage caused to the cargo by bad stowage, for which the shipowners were responsible. It is crucial to observe that the cargo was shipped under charterers' bills of lading, so that the contract of carriage contained in or evidenced by the bills of lading was between the shippers and the charterers. The shipowners nevertheless sought to rely, as against the shippers, upon an exception in the bill of lading which protected the charterers from liability for damage due to bad stowage. It was held that the shipowners were entitled to do so, the preferred reason upon which the House so held (see Scruttons Ltd v Midland Silicones Ltd [1962] 1 All ER 1 at 8, [1962] AC 446 at 470 per Viscount Simonds, following the opinion of Fullagar J in Wilson v Darling Island Stevedoring and Lighterage Co Ltd (1955) 95 CLR 43 at 78) being found in the speech of Lord Summer where he said ([1924] AC 522 at 564, [1924] All ER Rep 135 at 155): "... in the circumstances of this case the obligations to be inferred from the reception of the cargo for carriage to the United Kingdom amount to a bailment upon terms, which include the exceptions and limitations of liability stipulated in the known and contemplated form of bill of lading." Of course, there was in that case a bailment by the shippers direct to the shipowners, so that it was not necessary to have recourse to the concept of sub-bailment. Even so, notwithstanding the absence of any contract between the shippers and the shipowners, the shipowners' obligations as bailees were effectively subject to the terms upon which the shipowners implicitly received the goods into their possession. Their Lordships do not imagine that a different conclusion would have been reached in the Elder, Dempster case if the shippers had delivered the goods, e
f
g
h
j

a not directly to the ship, but into the possession of agents of the charterers who had, in their turn, loaded the goods on board; because in such circumstances, by parity of reasoning, the shippers may be held to have impliedly consented that the sub-bailment to the shipowners should be on terms which included the exemption from liability for bad stowage.'

b [60] Lord Goff then turned to the decision in the Johnson Matthey case. He held that the analysis of Donaldson J was unsound, being contrary to Morris' case and the Gilchrist Watt case. The exposition of the law that followed merits citation in full:

c 'In addition, the conclusion of Donaldson J that consent is relevant only between the owner and the bailee is inconsistent with the reasoning of Lord Denning MR in [Morris' case] when he expressed the opinion that the bailor is bound by the terms of the sub-bailment to which he has consented but not otherwise. Their Lordships have already expressed their agreement with the approach of Lord Denning MR on this point. Indeed, as they see it, once it is recognised that the sub-bailee, by voluntarily taking the owner's goods into his custody, ipso facto becomes the bailee of those goods vis-à-vis the owner, it must follow that the owner's rights against the sub-bailee will only be subject to terms of the sub-bailment if he has consented to them, ie if he has authorised the bailee to entrust the goods to the sub-bailee on those terms. Such consent may, as Lord Denning MR pointed out, be express or implied; and in this context the sub-bailee may also be able to invoke, where appropriate, the principle of ostensible authority. In truth, at the root of this question lies a doctrinal dispute of a fundamental nature, which is epitomised in the question—is it a prerequisite of a bailment that the bailor should have consented to the bailee's possession of the goods? An affirmative answer to this question (which is the answer given by Bell Modern Law of Personal Property in England and Ireland (1989) pp 88–89) leads to the conclusion that, if the owner seeks to hold a sub-bailee responsible to him as bailee, he has to accept all the terms of the sub-bailment, warts and all; for either he will have consented to the sub-bailment on those terms or, if not, he will (by holding the sub-bailee liable to him as bailee) be held to have ratified all the terms of the sub-bailment. A negative answer to the question is however supported by other writers, notably by [Palmer on Bailment (2nd edn, 1991) p 31 and following], where Professor Palmer cites a number of examples of bailment without the consent of the owner, and by Professor Tay in her article "The essence of bailment" (1966) 5 Syd LR 239. On this approach, a person who voluntarily takes another person's goods into his custody holds them as bailee of that person (the owner); and he can only invoke, for example, terms of a sub-bailment under which he received the goods from an intermediate bailee as qualifying or otherwise affecting his responsibility to the owner if the owner consented to them. It is the latter approach which, as their Lordships have explained, has been adopted by English law and, with English law, the law of Hong Kong. Their Lordships wish to add that this conclusion, which flows from the decisions in [Morris' case] and the Gilchrist Watt case, produces a result which in their opinion is both principled and just. They incline to the opinion that a sub-bailee can only be said for these purposes to have voluntarily taken into his possession the goods of another if he has sufficient notice that a person other than the bailee is interested in the goods so that it can properly be said that (in addition to his duties to the bailee) he has, by taking the goods into his custody, assumed towards that other person the responsibility for the goods which is characteristic of a bailee. This they believe to be the underlying principle. Moreover, their Lordships do not consider this principle to impose obligations on the sub-bailee which are onerous or unfair, once it is recognised that he can invoke against the owner terms of the sub-bailment which the owner has actually (expressly or impliedly) or even ostensibly authorised. In the last resort the sub-bailee may, if necessary and appropriate, be able to invoke against the bailee the principle of warranty of authority.' (See The Pioneer Container [1994] 2 All ER 250 at 261–262, [1994] 2 AC 324 at 341–342.)

[61] Thus far the cases that we have considered have been those in which the sub-bailee has sought to rely upon conditions which reduced his liability or, in The Pioneer Container, were beneficial to him. What if some of the terms agreed between the bailee and the sub-bailee increase the liability of the sub-bailee beyond that arising under the common law? Can the bailor enforce such conditions against the sub-bailee? Professor Palmer in his work, Bailment (2nd edn, 1991) p 1329 addresses this question:

'Occasionally, the terms of the sub-bailment will cast upon the sub-bailee a greater responsibility for the safety of the goods than would exist at common law. These terms are clearly enforceable by the intermediate party since he will enjoy a contractual relationship with the sub-bailee. Even if the sub-bailment is gratuitous the sub-bailee will apparently be bound by his promise to the intermediary, because a gratuitous bailee seems capable of enlarging his duty at common law. The more immediate question is whether such additional duties are directly enforceable by the owner against the sub-bailee. In certain circumstances such enforcement should be possible. If the terms of a sub-bailment can be invoked to reduce the common law duties that are owed by the sub-bailee to the owner, they should be relevant to establish a responsibility that is greater. The criterion would be whether such additional duties were an integral part of the owner-sub-bailee relationship, and essential to its efficacy, or were merely incidental. The sub-bailee should therefore be liable to the owner for the non-performance of any duty which represents one of the central terms or understandings upon which he was allowed to assume possession.'

This is one possible solution to the problem, but not the only one.

[62] We draw attention to the observations of Lord Goff in the passage cited above that, were it correct that consent of the bailor was a prerequisite of a bailment, any resulting bailment would be subject to 'all the terms of the sub-bailment, warts and all'. It seems to us that it must follow from this, and indeed that it should logically be the case, that where a bailor consents to and thereby authorises a sub-bailment on terms, all the terms agreed between the bailee and the sub-bailee, in so far as these are applicable to the relationship of the bailor and the sub-bailee, apply as between the bailor and the sub-bailee.

[63] It seems to us that this result also follows from the application of the principles of the law of contract. Lord Goff's authoritative analysis in The Pioneer Container traces the origin of 'bailment on terms' to principles of the law of bailment that do not turn on contract, but this does not exclude the possibility that the law of contract may have a role to play in this area. The principles of the law of bailment have always overlapped with those of the law of contract, for a bailment and contract often go hand in hand. Where a bailee has the consent, and thus the authority, of the bailor to enter into a sub-bailment on particular terms and does so, and where those terms purport to govern the relationship not merely between the sub-bailee and the bailee, but between the sub-bailee and the bailor, it seems to us that all the elements of a collateral contract binding the sub-bailee and the bailor will be present, for there will be privity, via the agency of the bailee, and no difficulty in identifying consideration, at least if the terms are capable of resulting in benefit to each of the parties. It is easier to identify a contract in such circumstances than in the circumstances which led the Privy Council to identify one in New Zealand Shipping Co Ltd v AM Satterthwaite & Co Ltd, The Eurymedon [1974] 1 All ER 1015, [1975] AC 154.

c [64] These considerations are very relevant in the present case. The judge has found that Seagram implicitly authorised the conclusion of a chain of contracts on CMR terms. The CMR conditions, which applied as between Seagram and TTI required that, if there was such a contractual chain, all links in it should be welded to a single contract by transfer of the goods and the consignment note. TTI produced no consignment note but, as each link in the chain was formed, there was agreement between the immediate parties that the contract should be on CMR terms. It seems to us that in these circumstances the sub-bailment of each party in the chain was on terms of all the CMR conditions, whether by application of the doctrine of bailment on terms or under principles of the law of contract.

e [65] Thus we consider that the judge was correct to rule that Spain-TIR and BCT not rely upon those of the CMR conditions which limited or fixed their liability without being bound by other relevant CMR conditions. On our analysis, however, no right to elect was open to them. The CMR conditions were applicable as a consequence of the seals being bailed to them on the terms of those conditions.

f [66] On this basis, we find that Mr Coburn was correct to submit that art 36 applied. It was not open to Seagram to sue Spain-TIR in that Spain-TIR was not the first carrier, the last carrier or the carrier performing that portion of the carriage during which the loss occurred. They came into possession of the goods in circumstances where they were authorised to sub-bail them on CMR terms. Seagram cannot, in these circumstances, contend that Spain-TIR remains susceptible to suit in relation to loss of the seals after they had been transferred to a successive carrier.

g WAS THE JUDGE CORRECT TO HOLD THAT BCT WERE LIABLE TO SEAGRAM AS BAILEES OF THE SEALS?

h [67] BCT did not challenge the finding that they were liable for the carriage costs of the cartons containing the seals. By their respondents' notice they contended, however, that, if liability for the guarantee payment was imposed by virtue of art 23(4), they were not liable for this because they were not bailees of the seals themselves. This argument was based upon the proposition that a person who comes into possession of goods will not be constituted bailee of them if, unknown to him, they have properties which give them an unforeseeably elevated value—see the discussion in Palmer p 436 and following. As we have held that BCT is under no liability in respect of the guarantee payment, either under the terms of the CMR or at common law, this issue does not arise. We would add that the terms of art 23 do not seem to us to give any scope for the application of the doctrine in question.

WAS THE JUDGE CORRECT TO INDICATE THAT SPAIN-TIR AND BCT COULD ELECT WHETHER TO RELY ON ART 23, BUT THAT IF THEY DID SO THEY WOULD BE BOUND BY ALL ITS PROVISIONS?

[68] We have already answered this question in [65], above. The judge approached the question on the premise that Spain-TIR and BCT fell into the category of persons for whom art 28(2) makes provision. On our analysis, any liability falling on Spain-TIR or BCT was not 'extra-contractual' within the meaning of that term in art 28(2), but arose because they were subject, whether by contract or the law of bailment, to those provisions of the CMR which both impose and restrict liability.

[69] For the reasons that we have given, Seagram's appeal will be dismissed and Spain-TIR's cross-appeal will be allowed.

Appeal dismissed. Cross-appeal allowed.

Kate O'Hanlon Barrister.

ANNEX

CONVENTION ON THE CONTRACT FOR THE INTERNATIONAL CARRIAGE OF GOODS BY ROAD

'CHAPTER I SCOPE OF APPLICATION Article 1

1. This Convention shall apply to every contract for the carriage of goods by road in vehicles for reward, when the place of taking over of the goods and the place designated for delivery, as specified in the contract, are situated in two different countries, of which at least one is a Contracting country, irrespective of the place of residence and the nationality of the parties ...

CHAPTER II PERSONS FOR WHOM THE CARRIER IS RESPONSIBLE Article 3

For the purposes of this Convention the carrier shall be responsible for the acts and omissions of his agents and servants and of any other persons of whose services he makes use for the performance of the carriage, when such agents, servants or other persons are acting within the scope of their employment, as if such acts or omissions were his own.

CHAPTER III CONCLUSION AND PERFORMANCE OF THE CONTRACT OF CARRIAGE Article 4

The contract of carriage shall be confirmed by the making out of a consignment note. The absence, irregularity or loss of the consignment note shall not affect the existence or the validity of the contract of carriage which shall remain subject to the provisions of this Convention.

Article 5

1. The consignment note shall be made out in three original copies signed by the sender and by the carrier. These signatures may be printed or replaced by the stamps of the sender and the carrier if the law of the country in which the consignment note has been made out so permits. The first copy a shall be handed to the sender, the second shall accompany the goods and the third shall be retained by the carrier ...

Article 6

1. The consignment note shall contain the following particulars:
- (a) the date of the consignment note and the place at which it is made out;
 - b (b) the name and address of the sender;
 - (c) the name and address of the carrier;
 - (d) the place and the date of taking over of the goods and the place designated for delivery;
 - (e) the name and address of the consignee;
 - c (f) the description in common use of the nature of the goods and the method of packing, and, in the case of dangerous goods, their generally recognised description;
 - (g) the number of packages and their special marks and numbers;
 - (h) the gross weight of the goods or their quantity otherwise expressed;
 - d (i) charges relating to the carriage (carriage charges, supplementary charges, customs duties and other charges incurred from the making of the contract to the time of delivery);
 - (j) the requisite instructions for Customs and other formalities;
 - (k) a statement that the carriage is subject, notwithstanding any clause to the contrary, to the provisions of this Convention ...

CHAPTER IV

LIABILITY OF THE CARRIER

Article 17

f 1. The carrier shall be liable for the total or partial loss of the goods and for damage thereto occurring between the time when he takes over the goods and the time of delivery, as well as for any delay in delivery ...

Article 23

g 1. When, under the provisions of this Convention, a carrier is liable for compensation in respect of total or partial loss of goods, such compensation shall be calculated by reference to the value of the goods at the place and time at which they were accepted for carriage.

2. The value of the goods shall be fixed according to the commodity exchange price or, if there is no such price, according to the current market price or, if there is no commodity exchange price or current market price, by reference to the normal value of goods of the same kind and quality.

h 3. Compensation shall not, however, exceed 8.33 units of account [SDRs] per kilogram of gross weight short.

j 4. In addition, the carriage charges, Customs duties and other charges incurred in respect of the carriage of the goods shall be refunded in full in case of total loss and in proportion to the loss sustained in case of partial loss, but no further damage shall be payable ...

6. Higher compensation may only be claimed where the value of the goods or a special interest in delivery has been declared in accordance with articles 24 and 26.

7. The unit of account mentioned in this Convention is the Special Drawing Right as defined by the International Monetary Fund. The amount mentioned in paragraph 3 of this article shall be converted into the national currency of the State of the Court seized of the case on the basis of the value of that currency on the date of the judgment or the date agreed upon by the Parties] ...

Article 26

1. The sender may, against payment of a surcharge to be agreed upon, fix the amount of a special interest in delivery in the case of loss or damage or of the agreed time-limit being exceeded, by entering such amount in the consignment note.

2. If a declaration of a special interest in delivery has been made, compensation for the additional loss or damage proved may be claimed, up to the total amount of the interest declared, independently of the compensation provided for in articles 23, 24 and 25 ...

Article 28

1. In cases where, under the law applicable, loss, damage or delay arising out of carriage under this Convention gives rise to an extra-contractual claim, the carrier may avail himself of the provisions of this Convention which exclude his liability or which fix or limit the compensation due.

2. In cases where the extra-contractual liability for loss, damage or delay of one of the persons for whom the carrier is responsible under the terms of article 3 is in issue, such person may also avail himself of the provisions of this Convention which exclude the liability of the carrier or which fix or limit the compensation due ...

CHAPTER VI

PROVISIONS RELATING TO CARRIAGE PERFORMED BY SUCCESSIVE CARRIERS

Article 34

If carriage governed by a single contract is performed by successive road carriers, each of them shall be responsible for the performance of the whole operation, the second carrier and each succeeding carrier becoming a party to the contract of carriage, under the terms of the consignment note, by reason of his acceptance of the goods and the consignment note.

Article 35

1. A carrier accepting the goods from a previous carrier shall give the latter a dated and signed receipt. He shall enter his name and address on the second copy of the consignment note. Where applicable, he shall enter on the second copy of the consignment note and on the receipt reservations of the kind provided for in article 8, paragraph 2 ...

Article 36

Except in the case of a counter-claim or a set-off raised in an action concerning a claim based on the same contract of carriage, legal proceedings in respect of liability for loss, damage or delay may only be brought against the first carrier, the last carrier or the carrier who was performing that portion of the carriage during which the event causing the loss, damage or delay occurred; an action may be brought at the same time against several of these carriers ...

Article 38

If one of the carriers is insolvent, the share of the compensation due from him and unpaid by him shall be divided among the other carriers in proportion to the share of the payment for the carriage due to them.'

a Cranfield and another v Bridgegrove Ltd and other appeals
[2003] EWCA Civ 656

b COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION
WARD, WALLER AND DYSON LJJ
13, 14 MARCH, 14 MAY 2003

c Claim form – Service – Extension of time for service – Rule of procedure empowering court to grant post-expiry application for extension of time for serving claim form where court ‘unable to serve’ form within prescribed period – Whether court having jurisdiction to grant extension in cases where it had failed to serve due to neglect – CPR 7.6(3)(a).

d Claim form – Service – Dispensing with service – Guidance on exercise of discretion – CPR 6.9.

e Claim form – Service – Service on company – Statutory provision permitting company to be served at its registered office – Rule of procedure requiring document to be served on solicitor if authorised to accept service and notifying serving party that he was so authorised – Inter-relationship between statutory provision and rule of procedure – Companies Act 1985, s 725(1) – CPR 6.2, 6.4.

f Claim form – Service – Service on individual at usual or last known residence – Rule of procedure requiring document to be served at individual’s usual or last known residence if no solicitor acting for that person and no address given for service – Whether service under that rule could be bad notwithstanding that conditions precedent satisfied – CPR 6.5(6).

g In the first of five appeals to the Court of Appeal raising issues on the service of claim forms, the claimants sent two such forms to the county court with a request that they be issued and served on the defendant. The court duly issued the claim forms, but forgot to serve them within the four-month period prescribed by the CPR. The claimants subsequently applied for an order extending the time for service, relying on CPR 7.6(3)(a)^a which empowered the court to grant such an extension if, inter alia, it had been ‘unable to serve’ the claim form. The district judge dismissed the application, but his decision was reversed on appeal by the circuit judge. The defendant appealed, contending that r 7.6(3)(a) applied only where the court had attempted to serve the claim form or had at least applied its mind to the question whether or not to serve. That contention was adopted by the defendant in the second appeal. In that case, the claimant’s solicitors had taken the draft claim form to the county court for issue. The court official took the view that the court should serve the claim form, but informed the claimant’s solicitors that it would be necessary to obtain a letter from the defendant’s solicitors confirming that they would accept service. Although the claimant’s solicitors received such a letter a few weeks later, they did not forward it to the court for a further three months. By that time, only four days remained before a Rule 7.6 is set out at [1], below

the expiry of the prescribed period for service, but the claimant's solicitors failed to impress upon the court the urgency of the situation. The court failed to serve the claim form within the prescribed period, but the district judge subsequently granted orders extending the time for service. Those orders were set aside by another district judge, and that decision was upheld by the circuit judge. The claimant appealed. a

In the third appeal, the claimant's solicitors should have served the claim form on the defendant personally since no solicitor had been authorised to accept service. Instead, they sent a draft claim form to the defendant's insurers a few days before the last day for service. The defendant subsequently applied to strike out the proceedings on the ground that they had never been properly served. The district judge granted the application, but his decision was reversed by the circuit judge who dispensed with service in the exercise of his discretion under CPR 6.9^b. On the defendant's appeal, the Court of Appeal was required to determine whether the case fell within the scope of that discretion. b

In the fourth appeal, the claimant was injured while working for the defendant company. He instructed solicitors who asked the company's insurers to confirm details of the solicitors nominated to accept service. Those solicitors subsequently wrote to the claimant's solicitors, confirming that they had instructions to accept service. In such circumstances, CPR 6.4(2)^c, which formed part of the rule dealing with personal service, required the document to be served on the solicitor. However, r 6.2(1)^d provided that the rules in CPR Pt 6 were to apply except where, inter alia, any other enactment made a different provision, while r 6.2(2) provided that a company could be served by any method permitted under Pt 6 as an alternative to the method of service set out in s 725(1)^e of the Companies Act 1985. Under that provision, a document could be served on a company by, inter alia, sending it by post to the company's registered office. Shortly before the expiry of the time prescribed for service, the claimant's solicitors purported to serve the claim form by sending it by first class post to the company's registered office. The district judge subsequently set aside service, holding that the claim form had not been served on the company's solicitors before the expiry of the prescribed period and that service on the company itself was not sufficient. The claimant's appeal was allowed by the circuit judge who dispensed with service under r 6.9. On the company's appeal, the issue arose as to whether there had, in fact, been valid service under s 725(1) of the 1985 Act. In resolving that issue, the Court of Appeal considered the inter-relationship between s 725(1) and the CPR, and whether, as the company contended, the claimant had elected to proceed by way of service on the company's solicitors under the CPR. c
d
e
f
g

In the fifth appeal, the claimant was injured in a road traffic accident. Since the insurance position of the other driver, H, was uncertain, the claimant's solicitors intimated a claim to the Motor Insurers' Bureau (MIB). The latter were informed by inquiry agents that H had recently left the address shown on the electoral register (the address) and that his whereabouts were unknown. MIB subsequently informed the claimant's solicitors that H had left the address. Nineteen months later, the claim form was issued. A few days before the expiry h
j

b Rule 6.9 is set out at [1], below

c Rule 6.4 is set out at [78], below

d Rule 6.2, so far as material, is set out at [77], below

e Section 725(1) is set out at [75], below

a of the four-month period for service, the claim form was sent by first class post to H at the address, purportedly in accordance with CPR 6.5(6)^f. Under that rule, a document had to be transmitted to, or left, at the usual or last known residence of the party to be served if no solicitor was acting for that party and he had not given an address for service. There was no doubt that the address was H's last known address. Nevertheless, MIB, which had been joined as second defendant, b contended on a subsequent application that the claim form had not been served on H within the prescribed period. That contention was accepted by the district judge who held that it could not be doing justice between the parties to serve at the last known address, without making further inquiry, over two years after H had vacated it. The claimant appealed.

c Held – (1) On its true construction, CPR 7.6(3)(a) was not confined to cases where the court had attempted to serve the claim form or had applied its mind to the question whether or not to serve. The words 'unable to serve' in that provision included all cases where the court had failed to serve the claim form, and accordingly the court had jurisdiction to extend time for service where it had d failed to serve in time through mere neglect. In most cases where the real cause of the failure to serve in time was court neglect, it would be appropriate to grant an extension of time if the claimant had acted promptly in making the application for an extension. There would, however, be some cases where, although court neglect had contributed to the failure to serve in time, the real cause had been the conduct of the claimant or the claimant's legal representative. In such cases, e the court would often decide not to exercise its discretion to extend the time for service, but each case would turn on its own facts. In the first appeal, the court's neglect had been the real cause of the failure to serve in time, and accordingly the defendant's appeal would be dismissed. In the second appeal, however, failures by the claimant's solicitors had been the real reason why the claim form had not f been served within the prescribed period. It followed that it would not be appropriate to extend time for service under r 7.6(3)(a), and the claimant's appeal would be dismissed (see [21], [29], [30], [37], [38], [48], [51], below).

(2) The discretion to dispense with service of the claim form under CPR 6.9 could be exercised only in exceptional circumstances, and should not be exercised in circumstances such as those in the third appeal. Unlike the document issued g by the court, the draft claim form was not stamped with the court seal, and it did not contain a statement of truth. Nor had the draft claim form been sent to the defendant or to a solicitor authorised to accept service on his behalf. It had been sent to the defendant's insurers who had no such authority. There had been significant departures from the rules as to the permitted methods of service. h They were not mere technicalities. Accordingly, the third appeal would be allowed (see [56], [60], [61], below); Anderton v Clwyd CC [2002] 3 All ER 813 applied.

(3) A claimant could serve a claim form on a defendant company either by one of the methods permitted by s 725(1) of the 1985 Act or by serving it in accordance with one of the methods permitted by the CPR. They were true j alternatives. That was made clear by CPR 6.2(2). If a defendant had not given an address for service, a claimant could choose whether to follow the s 725(1) or the CPR route for service. Moreover, although it was possible for the parties to make a binding contract whereby the claimant agreed to serve the claim form by one

f Rule 6.5, so far as material, is set out at [95], below

route rather than the other, there had been no such agreement in the fourth appeal. Rather, the parties had agreed that, if the claimant decided to effect personal service under CPR 6.4, he would serve on the company's solicitors rather than on the company. It followed that the service on the company's registered office by first class post had been good service. Accordingly, the fourth appeal would be dismissed (see [83]–[86], [89], below); Nangleman v Royal Free Hampstead NHS Trust [2001] 3 All ER 793 distinguished.

(4) If the two conditions precedent for the operation of CPR 6.5(6) were satisfied, the document had to be sent, in the case of an individual, to his usual or last known residence. The rule was plain and unqualified. There was no basis for holding that, if the two conditions were satisfied, and the document was sent to that address, that would not amount to good service. Accordingly, the fifth appeal would be allowed (see [102], [104], below).

Notes

For service on a company, see 7(2) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn) (1996 reissue) para 1146, and for extension of time for serving the claim form, rules about service generally, personal service and dispensing with service, see 37 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) paras 306, 316, 319, 325.

For the Companies Act 1985, s 725, see 8 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (1999 reissue) 588.

Cases referred to in judgment

Allison (Kenneth) Ltd (in liq) v AE Limehouse & Co (a firm) [1991] 4 All ER 500, [1992] 2 AC 105, [1991] 3 WLR 671, HL.

Anderton v Clwyd CC [2002] EWCA Civ 933, [2002] 3 All ER 813, [2002] 1 WLR 3174.

Elmes v Hygrade Food Products plc [2001] EWCA Civ 121, [2001] All ER (D) 158 (Jan).

Godwin v Swindon BC [2001] EWCA Civ 1478, [2001] 4 All ER 641, [2002] 1 WLR 997.

Ladd v Marshall [1954] 3 All ER 745, [1954] 1 WLR 1489, CA.

Montgomery Jones & Co v Liebenthal & Co [1898] 1 QB 487, CA.

Nangleman v Royal Free Hampstead NHS Trust [2001] EWCA Civ 127, [2001] 3 All ER 793, [2002] 1 WLR 1043.

Vinos v Marks & Spencer plc [2001] 3 All ER 784, CA.

Wilkey v BBC [2002] EWCA Civ 1561, [2002] 4 All ER 1177, [2003] 1 WLR 1.

Appeals

Cranfield and anor v Bridgegrove Ltd

The defendant, Bridgegrove Ltd, appealed from the decision of Judge Hull QC in Guildford County Court on 25 January 2002 allowing an appeal by the claimants, Michael David Cranfield and Barbara Priscilla Cranfield, from the decision of District Judge Darbyshire on 24 September 2001 dismissing the claimants' application for an extension of time for serving the claim forms in their proceedings against the defendant. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

Claussen v Yeates

- a* The claimant, Peter Claussen, appealed from the decision of Judge Butter QC in Central London County Court on 9 May 2001 dismissing his appeal from the order of District Judge Haselgrove on 21 September 2000 setting aside the orders of District Judge Langley on 18 April and 29 June 2000 extending the time for service of the claim form in the claimant's proceedings against the defendant,
- b* Stephen Michael Yeates. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

McManus v Sharif

- The defendant, Mrs R Sharif, appealed from the decision of Judge Hornby in Bow County Court on 28 October 2002 allowing an appeal by the claimant, Chrystalla McManus, from the order of District Judge Gregory on 9 July 2002 striking out the claimant's proceedings against the defendant. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

Murphy v Staples UK Ltd

- d* The defendant, Staples UK Ltd, appealed from the decision of Judge Armitage QC in Manchester County Court on 13 October 2002 allowing an appeal by the claimant, Lee Murphy, from the order of District Judge Hugman on 7 May 2002 setting aside the purported service of the claim form. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

Smith v Hughes and anor

- The claimant, Aidan Thomas Smith, appealed from the order of District Judge Duerden in Bury County Court on 3 December 2002 dismissing his proceedings against the defendants, David Hughes and the Motor Insurers Bureau (MIB). David Hughes took no part in the proceedings. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

Jonathan Gaunt QC (instructed by DFM Beckman) for the appellant defendant in the first appeal.

Charles Phipps (instructed by Clyde & Co, Guildford) for the respondent claimants in the first appeal.

Jalil Asif (instructed by Traymans) for the appellant claimant in the second appeal.

Hugh Hamill (instructed by Vizards Wyeth, Dartford) for the respondent defendant in the second appeal.

Stephen Stewart QC and Steven Snowden (instructed by Edward Duthie) for the appellant defendant in the third appeal.

John Ross QC and Nicholas Yell (instructed by Kenneth Elliott & Rowe, Romford) for the respondent claimant in the third appeal.

Christopher Purchas QC and Gerwyn Samuel (instructed by Branton Edwards, Manchester) for the appellant defendant in the fourth appeal.

Nigel Tozzi QC (instructed by Horwich Farrelly, Manchester) for the respondent claimant in the fourth appeal.

Gordon Exall (instructed by Graham Leigh Pfeffer & Co, Bury) for the appellant claimant in the fifth appeal.

Peter Gregory (instructed by Weightman Vizards) for the MIB.

14 May 2003. The following judgment of the court was delivered.

DYSON LJ.

INTRODUCTION

[1] The interpretation and application of CPR 6.9 (power of the court to dispense with service) and CPR 7.6 (extension of time for serving a claim form) continue to cause difficulty despite several recent attempts by this court to elucidate the relevant principles. There are before the court five appeals which raise several issues relating to these two rules. It is convenient to set out the relevant provisions at the very outset:

‘6.9 ... (1) The court may dispense with service of a document.

(2) An application for an order to dispense with service may be made without notice ...

7.6 ... (1) The claimant may apply for an order extending the period within which the claim form may be served.

(2) The general rule is that an application to extend the time for service must be made—(a) within the period for serving the claim form specified by rule 7.5; or (b) where an order has been made under this rule, within the period for service specified by that order.

(3) If the claimant applies for an order to extend the time for service of the claim form after the end of the period specified by rule 7.5 or by an order made under this rule, the court may make such an order only if—(a) the court has been unable to serve the claim form; or (b) the claimant has taken all reasonable steps to serve the claim form but has been unable to do so; and, (c) in either case, the claimant has acted promptly in making the application.’

[2] CPR 7.5(2) provides that ‘[t]he general rule is that a claim form must be served within 4 months after the date of issue’.

[3] Before we discuss the issues that arise, we need to refer to the recent decisions of this court that bear on the questions that we have to decide.

[4] In Vinos v Marks & Spencer plc [2001] 3 All ER 784, it was decided that, after the expiry of the time limit for service of a claim form, the court has no power to extend the time for service if the circumstances fall outside r 7.6(3). May LJ said (at 790 (para 20)):

‘If you then look up from the wording of the rules and at a broader horizon, one of the main aims of the CPR and their overriding objective is that civil litigation should be undertaken and pursued with proper expedition. Criticism of Mr Vinos’ solicitors in this case may be muted and limited to one error capable of being represented as small; but there are statutory limitation periods for bringing proceedings. It is unsatisfactory with a personal injury claim to allow almost three years to elapse and to start proceedings at the very last moment. If you do, it is in my judgment generally in accordance with the overriding objective that you should be required to progress the proceedings speedily and within time limits. Four months is in most cases more than adequate for serving a claim form. There is nothing unjust in a system which says that, if you leave issuing proceedings to the last moment and then do not comply with this particular time requirement and do not satisfy the conditions in r 7.6(3), your claim is lost and a new claim will be statute-barred.’

a [5] In Elmes v Hygrade Food Products plc [2001] EWCA Civ 121, [2001] All ER (D) 158 (Jan), it was held that, where a claim form is served in time but is incorrectly served (in that case on the defendants' insurers instead of on the defendants themselves), there is no power in the court under CPR 3.10(b) (remedy of errors of procedure) or CPR 6.8 (service by an alternative method) retrospectively to remedy the error by deeming good service to have been effected by an alternative method not permitted by the rules. A similar conclusion was reached in Nangleman v Royal Free Hampstead NHS Trust [2001] EWCA Civ 127, [2001] 3 All ER 793, [2002] 1 WLR 1043, where service had been incorrectly effected on the defendant rather than its solicitors: the defendant had given its solicitors' address for service (see CPR 6.5(2)).

c [6] Godwin v Swindon BC [2001] EWCA Civ 1478, [2001] 4 All ER 641, [2002] 1 WLR 997 was principally concerned with the interpretation of CPR 6.7(1) (rules for deemed service). But the court also said (at [50] per May LJ) that r 6.9 cannot be invoked to dispense with service 'when what would be done is in substance that which r 7.6(3) forbids'.

d [7] In Anderton v Clwyd CC [2002] EWCA Civ 933, [2002] 3 All ER 813, [2002] 1 WLR 3174, a different view was expressed as to the scope of r 6.9. The judgment of the court was given by Mummery LJ. He said (at [2]):

e 'Now that the disputed interpretations of the CPR have been resolved by Godwin's case and by this judgment, there will be very few (if any) acceptable excuses for future failures to observe the rules for service of a claim form. The courts will be entitled to adopt a strict approach, even though the consequences may sometimes appear to be harsh in individual cases.'

[8] He summarised the legal position (at [3]) as including the following:

f '... (b) the fact that the claim form has actually been received by, and come to the attention of, the defendant or his solicitor through the post, by fax or by means other than personal service within the period of four months allowed by r 7.5(2) is legally irrelevant to ascertaining the day of service, as deemed by r 6.7; (c) if an application for an extension of time is issued by the claimant after the end of the period of service, the court will rarely have power under r 7.6(3) to grant an extension of time and only in the most exceptional circumstances will it be proper to exercise its discretion under r 6.9 to dispense with service ...'

[9] The conclusions of the court on the scope of r 6.9 were stated as follows:

h '[55] On this point we conclude that the r 6.9 is sufficiently widely worded to entitle the court to dispense retrospectively with service of the claim form in an appropriate case (cf the obiter view of Simon Brown LJ in Elmes v Hygrade Food Products plc [2001] All ER (D) 158 (Jan)). The vast majority of applications, in which it will be appropriate to make an order to dispense with service, will be for prospective orders sought and granted before the end of the period for service. As a general rule applications made for retrospective orders to dispense with service will be caught by the reasoning in Godwin's case. There may, however, be exceptional cases in which it is appropriate to dispense with service without undermining the principle in Godwin's case that r 6.9 should not be used to circumvent the restrictions on granting extensions of time for service as laid down in r 7.6(3) and thereby validate late service of the claim form.

[56] In our judgment there is a sensible and relevant distinction, which was not analysed or recognised in Godwin's case, between two different kinds of case. a

[57] First, an application by a claimant, who has not even attempted to serve a claim form in time by one of the methods permitted by r 6.2, for an order retrospectively dispensing with service under r 6.9. The claimant still needs to serve the claim form in order to comply with the rules and to bring it to the attention of the defendant. That case is clearly caught by Godwin's case as an attempt to circumvent the limitations in r 7.6(3) on the grant of extensions of time for service of the claim form. b

[58] Second, an application by a claimant, who has in fact already made an ineffective attempt in time to serve a claim form by one of the methods allowed by r 6.2, for an order dispensing with service of the claim form. The ground of the application is that the defendant does not dispute that he or his legal adviser has in fact received, and had his attention drawn to, the claim form by a permitted method of service within the period of four months, or an extension thereof. In the circumstances of the second case the claimant does not need to serve the claim form on the defendant in order to bring it to his attention, but he has failed to comply with the rules for service of the claim form. His case is not that he needs to obtain permission to serve the defendant out of time in accordance with the rules, but rather that he should be excused altogether from the need to prove service of the claim form in accordance with the rules. The basis of his application to dispense with service is that there is no point in requiring him to go through the motions of a second attempt to complete in law what he has already achieved in fact. The defendant accepts that he has received the claim form before the end of the period for service of the claim form. Apart from losing the opportunity to take advantage of the point that service was not in time in accordance with the rules, the defendant will not usually suffer prejudice as a result of the court dispensing with the formality of service of a document, which has already come into his hands before the end of the period for service. The claimant, on the other hand, will be prejudiced by the refusal of an order dispensing with service as, if he is still required to serve the claim form, he will be unable to do so because he cannot obtain an extension of time for service under r 7.6(3). c
d
e
f
g

[59] In the exercise of the dispensing discretion it may also be legitimate to take into account other relevant circumstances, such as the explanation for late service, whether any criticism could be made of the claimant or his advisers in their conduct of the proceedings and any possible prejudice to the defendant on dispensing with service of the claim form. h

[10] The court then turned to consider the five appeals that were before it. Two are of some relevance to the issues which we have to consider. In Chambers v Southern Domestic Electrical Services Ltd, the claim form was sent by first class post to the defendant's solicitors on 12 July 2001, and it actually arrived on the next day, which was the last day for service. By virtue of r 6.7(1), service was irrebuttably deemed to have taken place on 14 July, and there were no grounds for extending the time for service under r 7.6(3). Since the claim form had been received by, and had come to the attention of, the defendant's solicitor (who was the correct person on whom to effect service) before the end of the four-month j a period for service, the court regarded the case as 'exceptional', and dispensed with service under r 6.9.

[11] In Dorgan v Home Office, the period for service expired on 11 August 2001 (a Saturday). At 4.02 pm on 10 August, the claim form was sent by fax by the claimant's solicitor. The receipt of the fax by the defendant's solicitor (again the person authorised to accept service) was recorded as commencing at 4.03 pm. b The defendant's solicitor read the fax and made a telephone call about it to the claimant's solicitor soon thereafter. The claim form was deemed to be served on 13 August (a Monday), since r 6.7(1) provides that, if a fax is transmitted before 4 pm on a business day, it is deemed to be served on that day, but in any other case, it is deemed to be served on the business day after the day on which it is transmitted. The application to dispense with service was made promptly after c the claimant's solicitor was notified that it was not accepted that there had been effective service of the claim form. The court made an order dispensing with service.

[12] The last in the series of cases to which it is necessary to refer is Wilkey v BBC [2002] EWCA Civ 1561, [2002] 4 All ER 1177, [2003] 1 WLR 1. The claim form d was delivered to the defendant's legal department at 2 pm on 28 February 2001, the last day for service. By virtue of r 6.7(1), the claim form was deemed to have been served on 1 March. This court allowed an appeal by the claimant against the decision of the judge refusing to dispense with service under r 6.9. Giving the leading judgment, Simon Brown LJ referred to Anderton v Clwyd CC [2002] 3 All ER 813 at [55]–[59]. He conveniently described cases where the claimant has e sought to serve the claim form by a permitted method of service and the form has in fact been received by the defendant before the end of the period for service as 'category 2 cases', a category, as he put it, 'not previously recognised by the authorities' (see [2002] 4 All ER 1177 at [3]).

[13] Simon Brown LJ proposed a solution to the possible problem identified in f the July 2002 edition of Civil Procedure News (29 July 2002), which, responding to Anderton's case, had commented (p 11):

'It is to be feared a disproportionate amount of time and effort may have to be expended by procedural judges dealing with applications based on this aspect of the Anderton case.'

g [14] He expressed his solution in the following terms:

[18] ... In category 2 cases which, like the present (and, as I am led to believe, like a number of other appeals now awaiting hearing in this court), h involve deemed late service before this court's decision in Anderton's case the r 6.9 dispensing power should ordinarily be exercised in the claimant's favour unless the defendant can establish either that he would suffer prejudice (apart, obviously, from the loss of his Limitation Act defence) or some other good reason why the power should not be exercised. Merely to establish that the claimant has been guilty of avoidable delay in either the i issue, or the service, of the claim form, or both, would not generally constitute such good reason. There will always have been some avoidable delay. Similarly, the fact that the claim looks unpromising would not generally be a good reason for refusing to exercise the dispensing power in a pre-Anderton category 2 case. In a post-Anderton case, however, the dispensing power should, in my judgment, ordinarily not be exercised in the claimant's favour. These cases, albeit within category 2 and therefore in one sense to be regarded as exceptional, to my mind fall foul of para [2] of the court's judgment in Anderton's case. In these cases "a strict approach" should generally be adopted. a

[19] This approach, in my judgment, will not only provide a useful guide as to how the court may be expected to exercise its discretion in these cases, but it also follows such guidance on the point as the judgment in Anderton's case affords. It would mean that the court in post-Anderton cases, quite logically, would be the readier to reject the claimant's explanation for late service and to criticise his conduct of proceedings, both of these being identified in Anderton's case [2002] 3 All ER 813 at [59] as relevant considerations. b

[20] This approach also provides a complete answer to [counsel for the defendant's] superficially persuasive argument that to apply Anderton's case as the appellants submit is appropriate, namely, as if it creates a presumption in favour of dispensing orders in all category 2 cases, would effectively destroy the deemed service rule, since virtually every case of service by physical delivery of the claim form on the last day of the permitted period would involve actual receipt in time, and thus the exercise of the dispensing power. If, as I would hold, the presumption arises in only pre-Anderton cases, the deemed service rule, and the highly desirable certainty which it provides, will continue to apply in all but the most exceptional post-Anderton cases.' c
d

THE GENERIC ISSUES e

[15] In all the cases that are before us, the time for service of the claim form expired before 3 July 2002, the date on which judgment was handed down in Anderton's case. They were all, therefore, what Simon Brown LJ called 'pre-Anderton cases'. The following generic issues arise. (a) Where the claim form is to be served by the court (see CPR 6.3), is the court 'unable to serve' it within the meaning of r 7.6(3)(a) if, simply through oversight on its part, it fails to serve it in time? (b) If the words 'unable to serve the claim form' cannot be construed to embrace the circumstances described in (a), should the court be willing in principle to dispense with service in such a case? (c) Can a claim form be served on a defendant limited company at its registered office pursuant to s 725(1) of the Companies Act 1985 where the defendant has previously notified the claimant that its solicitors will accept service under r 6.4(2)? (d) Where a claim form is purportedly served in time, by a method of service permitted by r 6.2, but on the wrong person (not being in accordance with r 6.4), are there any, and if so what, circumstances in which the court ought to be willing in principle to dispense with service? f
g
h

[16] Issues (a) and (b) arise in Cranfield and anor v Bridgegrove Ltd and Claussen v Yeates. Issue (c) arises in Murphy v Staples UK Ltd. Issue (d) arises in McManus v Sharif. In McManus's case, service was purportedly on the defendant's insurers within the four-month period: it should have been on the defendant himself. The position is more complex in Murphy's case, but as will appear, issue (d) also arises contingently in that appeal. In Murphy's case, service was purportedly effected on the defendant. There is an issue as to whether it should have been effected on the defendant's solicitor who had been authorised to accept service on the defendant's behalf. j

[17] The issue that arises in Smith v Hughes and anor is the meaning of 'usual or last known residence', being the place for service of an individual where no

- a solicitor is acting for the party to be served, and the party has not given an address for service (see r 6.5(6)).

THE MEANING OF RULE 7.6(3)(A)

- b [18] Mr Gaunt QC (whose submissions are adopted by Mr Hamill) submits that, when read in their context, the words 'has been unable to serve' do not apply to a situation where the court has not even tried to effect service. Rule 7.6(3)(a) is directed to the situation where the court has decided to adopt one of the methods of service permitted by r 6.2, and has encountered an impediment which prevents it from effecting service of the claim form. It is not a necessary condition of being unable to serve that the court should have taken all reasonable steps to serve (contrast the position under r 7.6(3)(b)). It is sufficient that the court has been prevented from serving by its chosen permitted method of service. The court must have attempted to serve, or at least applied its mind to the question whether or not to serve. Thus, Mr Gaunt accepts that the following are examples of cases where it can properly be said that the court 'has been unable to serve': (a) it has tried and failed to serve, (b) it has not attempted to serve because it wishes to serve by post, but is prevented from doing so because it has not been given the address for service by the claimant, or (c) it is prevented from serving by lack of resources.

- e [19] As a matter of ordinary language, Mr Gaunt submits, it is not possible to say that someone has been unable to serve a document if he has not even tried to serve it. As he put it, if a process server is instructed to serve a claim form, and he fails even to try to serve the document, he cannot honestly say that he has been unable to serve the document.

- f [20] He submits that the CPR are intended to be read as a coherent code, and seeks support for his submissions in the fact that the word 'unable' appears three times in the rules relating to the service of documents. First, in r 6.11, where the court, if 'unable' to serve a document must 'send a notice of non-service stating the method attempted to the party who requested service'. In this context, it is clear that the word 'unable' denotes an unsuccessful attempt to serve. Secondly, in r 7.6(3)(b), which speaks of the claimant having taken all reasonable steps to serve the claim form, but having been 'unable' to do so. This too clearly denotes an unsuccessful attempt to serve. And thirdly, in r 7.6(3)(a), Mr Gaunt submits that r 7.6(3)(a) relates back to r 6.11 where the court will have notified the party requesting service that its attempt to serve has been unsuccessful.

- g [21] We do not accept Mr Gaunt's submissions as to the meaning of r 7.6(3)(a). If they are correct, there is undoubtedly in our view a most regrettable lacuna in the CPR, and one for which there is no rational explanation. There is no sensible reason why it should have been intended to exclude from the power to extend time under r 7.6(3)(a) those cases where the court has simply failed to effect service in time. The consequences of a failure to serve the claim form in time can be disastrous for a claimant as several of the cases that are before us amply demonstrate. Service by the court is the general rule (see r 6.3). The possibility that the court will from time to time fail to serve through neglect is a real one. Why should it have been intended to give the court the power to extend time when the court has tried to serve and has been prevented from doing so by some impediment, but not where the failure to serve has occurred as a result of mere oversight?

- j [22] The answer given by Mr Gaunt and Mr Hamill is that the perceived lacuna does not in fact exist. They say that the CPR provide adequate mechanisms to alert a claimant as to the possibility that the court has failed to serve the claim form, so that there is no need to adopt a strained interpretation of r 7.6(3)(a) to cover the situation of non-service by the court through mere neglect. Thus, r 6.14(1) provides that where a claim form is served by the court, the court must send the claimant a notice 'which will include the date when the claim form is deemed to be served under rule 6.7'. If the claimant does not receive such a notice, he is put on inquiry. Alternatively, if the court has tried but failed to serve, it is required to send a notice of non-service under r 6.11. In this way, submit counsel, the CPR provide a system which should be foolproof. If a claimant does not receive a notice under r 6.11 or a notice under r 6.14(1), then he or she should be aware that the claim form may not have been served, and should make inquiry of the court to ascertain the position. In the rare case where the court mistakenly sends the claimant a notice under r 6.14(1) stating that it has served the claim form when it has not in fact done so, Mr Gaunt and Mr Hamill submit that a claimant will in principle be entitled to an extension of time under r 7.6(3)(b). If, contrary to these submissions, the CPR do not provide a foolproof system to protect claimants from court error, then they will have an unanswerable right of action against the Lord Chancellor for damages.

[23] We reject the submission that the CPR provide a claimant with sufficient protection against the possibility that the court has simply failed to serve the claim form by neglect, and that this is the reason why r 7.6(3)(a) does not deal with that situation. It may be that a competent solicitor, conscientiously acting in the interests of a claimant, is under a duty to communicate with the court if he or she does not receive a notice under rr 6.11 or 6.14(1) within a reasonable time of the date of the issue of the claim form. But that is not a sufficient reason for concluding that, if Mr Gaunt and Mr Hamill are right as to the construction of r 7.6(3)(a), there is no lacuna in the CPR. First, many claimants are litigants in person. The CPR must, so far as possible, be construed in a way which achieves justice for claimants who are unrepresented as well as those who have the benefit of legal representation. It is unreal to suppose that litigants in person will be alive to the possible significance of the absence of a notice under rr 6.11 or 6.14(1). Secondly, we reject the argument that, where a claimant is misled by the court into believing that the claim form has been served when it has not been served, he can apply for an extension of time for service under r 7.6(3)(b) on the footing that he has taken all reasonable steps to serve the claim form, but has been unable to do so. It seems to us that the obvious and natural construction of r 7.6(3) is that sub-para (a) is concerned with cases where service is to be by the court, and sub-para (b) is concerned with cases where service is to be by the claimant. We do not consider that a claimant can invoke r 7.6(3)(b) in a case where service is to be by the court. Thirdly, if it were thought that rr 6.11 and 6.14(1) provided sufficient protection against the consequences of the court's inability to serve, it is difficult to see why there should be any need for r 7.6(3)(a) at all. It is clear that it was not thought that rr 6.11 and 6.14(1) do afford sufficient protection. It was therefore necessary to give the court the power to extend time where the court has been unable to effect service of the claim form within the four-month period. And there is no reason to suppose that it was intended that the court should have this power where the court has failed to serve in some circumstances (ie those suggested by Mr Gaunt and Mr Hamill) and not in others (failure through mere neglect).

[24] We conclude, therefore, that, if the submissions of Mr Gaunt and Mr Hamill are correct, there is a serious lacuna in the CPR for which there is no

- a rational justification. It is, of course, possible that the case of failure by the court to serve by neglect was simply overlooked by the draftsman. Unless compelled to do so by clear words, we are unwilling to adopt a construction of the rule which (a) recognises the existence of a lacuna for which there is no rational justification and (b) will inevitably result in injustice to claimants for which there is no justification. Indeed, we would go further. If the argument of Mr Gaunt is correct, then the CPR permit the court, by its neglect, to deny claimants access to the court altogether. It would be truly remarkable if the CPR permitted an extension of time where the court has been unable to serve in time where the court has not been at fault, but not where there had been a failure to serve the claim form in time through mere oversight. In view of the special status of the common law right of access to the courts, the court should construe the CPR as having that effect only if compelled to do so.

[25] Since 2 October 2000, the Human Rights Act 1998 has been in force. The proceedings in Cranfield and anor v Bridgegrove Ltd are ones to which the 1998 Act applies. The 1998 Act does not, however, apply to the case of Claussen v Yeates. We shall consider the true meaning of r 7.6(3)(a) first without regard to the 1998 Act.

- [26] In our judgment, the words 'has been unable to serve' do not bear the restricted meaning for which Mr Gaunt and Mr Hamill contend. At first sight, there seems to be force in the submission that it is a misuse of language to say that someone has been unable to do something which he has not even attempted to do. But the word 'unable' does not necessarily connote that there has been a failed attempt. Indeed, this seems to be conceded by Mr Gaunt, since he accepts that 'unable to serve' includes the case where the court has decided that it will not attempt to serve, for example, because it does not have the address for service, or it does not have the resources required to effect service. In our judgment, Mr Gaunt is right to accept that it is not a misuse of language to say that someone has been unable to do X when he has not even attempted to do X. Mr Phipps draws attention to CPR PD 44 (para 13.8) which provides:

'If a summary assessment of costs is appropriate but the court awarding costs is unable to do so on the day, the court must give directions as to a further hearing before the same judge.'

- g In this situation, the court is 'unable' to do something which it does not even attempt to do, because it knows that it will not be able to do it. There is no question of a failed attempt. The court simply does not do it. This may be because the court believes that it will not be possible to do it within court hours. Or it may be that the court does not do it because it does not wish to do it. The judge may want to leave court early that day because he has another engagement, or because he is tired. The important point is that, for whatever reason, the court is not able to do the summary assessment of costs on the day.

- [27] The fact that 'unable' does not necessarily connote that there has been a failed attempt is important. Once the focus shifts from a failed attempt, it becomes clear that the real emphasis is on what happens. If it is not a misuse of language to say that the court was unable to do X because (for whatever reason) it did not wish to do X, then we do not consider that it is a misuse of language to say that the court was unable to do X because it simply failed to do X. In each case, the court could have done X, but did not do it.

[28] Nor do we consider that the contextual points made by Mr Gaunt assist his interpretation. We accept that there is a clear link between rr 6.11 and 7.6(3)(a). But we do not consider that the reference in r 6.11 to a notice of non-service 'stating the method attempted' assists in the interpretation of r 7.6(3)(a). Indeed, since Mr Gaunt concedes that the court 'has been unable to serve' even where it has not attempted service, for example because it does not have the address for service, it is impossible to see how even on his argument r 6.11 assists in the resolution of the question at issue. Nor does r 7.6(3)(b) assist in the interpretation of r 7.6(3)(a).

[29] We conclude, therefore, even without regard to the 1998 Act, the words 'has been unable to serve' in r 7.6(3)(a) include all cases where the court has failed to serve, including mere oversight on its part. It is therefore unnecessary to consider the position under the 1998 Act. If it had been necessary to do so, we would not have hesitated to adopt what might be considered to be a linguistically strained interpretation in order to read r 7.6(3)(a) in a way which is compatible with art 6 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Pt I of Sch 1 to the 1998 Act), so as to ensure that litigants are not denied access to the courts, where it is the fault of the courts that the claim form has not been served in time.

[30] The court does, therefore, have the jurisdiction to extend time for service under r 7.6(3)(a) where the court fails through neglect to serve in time. It must in all cases decide how to exercise the discretion conferred by the rule. We suggest that in most cases where the real cause of the failure to serve in time is court neglect, it will be appropriate to grant an extension of time if the claimant has acted promptly in making the application (see r 7.6(3)(c)). But there will be some cases where, although court neglect has contributed to the failure to serve in time, the real cause has been the conduct of the claimant or the claimant's legal representative. In such cases, the court will often decide not to exercise its discretion to extend the time for service. But each case will turn on its own facts.

THE SCOPE OF RULE 6.9

[31] The decisions in Anderton v Clwyd CC [2002] 3 All ER 813, [2002] 1 WLR 3174 and Wilkey v BBC [2002] 4 All ER 1177, [2003] 1 WLR 1 have clarified the relationship between rr 6.9 and 7.6. In pre-Anderton cases, the court may exercise its discretion to dispense with service retrospectively where the claim form, although deemed by r 6.7(1) to be served out of time, has in fact been received by the defendant or his legal adviser 'by a permitted method of service' within the four-month period (see Anderton's case (at [58])). In the post-Anderton cases, the court will ordinarily not exercise its discretion to dispense with service even in such a case (see Wilkey's case). It is clear from these two decisions that the basic rule is that the power to dispense with service should not be used to undermine the principle enunciated in Godwin v Swindon BC [2001] 4 All ER 641, [2002] 1 WLR 997 that service should not be dispensed with retrospectively to circumvent the restrictions on granting extensions of time laid down in r 7.6(3). The exception recognised in Anderton's case (confined to pre-Anderton cases) is where the claim form has been received within the four-month period by a 'permitted method of service'. Mummery LJ used this phrase, or an equivalent phrase, three times in [57] and [58] of the judgment. Rule 6.2 provides:

'(1) A document may be served by any of the following methods—(a) personal service, in accordance with rule 6.4; (b) first class post; (c) leaving the document at a place specified in rule 6.5; (d) through a document exchange in accordance with the relevant practice direction; or

- a (e) by fax or other means of electronic communication in accordance with the relevant practice direction.'

[32] In Anderton's case, the court did not have to consider whether the exception might also apply in a case where there has been some comparatively minor departure from the permitted method of service. An example of what might fairly be described as a minor departure is where the claim form has been sent by second class post (instead of first class post), and has been sent to the right person at the right address and has been received within the four-month period. We do not think that we are bound by Anderton's case and Wilkey's case to hold that a court could not properly exercise its discretion to dispense with service in such a case. In our view, it is not appropriate to attempt to provide an exhaustive guide to the circumstances in which it is proper to dispense with service of a claim form retrospectively under r 6.9, whether in pre-Anderton cases, or in post-Anderton cases. We hope that what we say at [49] and [50], below in relation to Claussen v Yeates, at [56]–[60], below in relation to McManus v Sharif, and at [87] and [88], below in relation to Murphy v Staples UK Ltd will provide guidance as to the correct approach to be adopted at least in circumstances similar to those that occurred in those cases. We wish to underline the exceptional nature of the power to dispense with service in such cases. The court was at pains to emphasise this point in both Anderton's case and Wilkey's case. The principle in Godwin's case is important, and must not be subverted. It will be subverted unless the power to dispense with service retrospectively is confined to truly exceptional cases.

e CRANFIELD V BRIDGEGROVE LTD

[33] The claimants are the tenants of property at Brinscombe Crescent, Godalming. They hold under two leases, both of which were due to expire on 28 September 2001. They carry on the business of a general store at the premises, where they employ approximately 20 employees. On 20 November 2000, the defendant gave notice under s 25 of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1954 terminating the tenancies on 28 September 2001. The notices stated that an application for a new tenancy would not be opposed. On 12 February 2001, the claimants' solicitors sent two claim forms to the Guildford County Court with a request that they be issued and served on the defendant at the address provided. On 15 February, the court issued the two claim forms. The court sent formal notices to the solicitors that the forms had been issued on 15 February. These notices were in the Form N209, which is a standard form containing inter alia the following words:

- h 'The court sent it [the claim form] with a copy of your witness statement(s) to the defendant by first class post on [] and it will be deemed served on []. The defendant has until [] to reply.'

In both notices, these words were struck out, and the following words added in manuscript: 'your application is with the District Judges for directions'. These notices were received by the solicitors on 17 February.

j [34] The time for service of the claim forms expired on 15 April 2001. On 23 August, solicitors acting on behalf of the respondent wrote to the claimants' solicitors stating that no proceedings had been served. Accordingly, they said, the leases would terminate on 28 September and the respondent would then require vacant possession. Mr Falvert-Smith was dealing with the matter on behalf of the claimants. He immediately telephoned the court. What he was told was confirmed in the court's letter dated 24 August, which stated that the claim forms had not been served:

'The copies of the claim form that were to be served were put on the Court file by mistake. Please accept the Court's apologies for this mishap. The Court will send out the service copies today. I apologise for any inconvenience caused.'

On the same day, the claimants' solicitors sent copies of the claim form to the respondents' solicitors, and on the following day the court sent the service copies to them too.

[35] On 18 September 2001, the claimants applied for an extension of time for service of the claim forms until 15 October on the grounds that—

'the failure to effect service of the claim form was due to an error of the court and not as a result of any neglect or default on the part of the claimants. In the circumstances, the claimants have taken all reasonable steps to serve the claim form within the time limited by CPR 7.5.'

On 24 September, District Judge Darbyshire dismissed the applications. He applied r 7.6(3), and considered that it could not be said that the court or the claimants had been 'unable' to serve within the requisite time for service. He was bound by Vinos v Marks & Spencer plc [2001] 3 All ER 784, and therefore compelled to dismiss the applications. No application was made to dispense with service.

[36] On 25 January 2002, Judge Hull QC allowed the claimants' appeal. He noted that, by reason of the decision in Godwin v Swindon BC [2001] 4 All ER 641, he had no power to dispense with service under r 6.9. He then turned to r 7.6(3)(a) and construed 'unable' as including circumstances in which the court had simply failed to serve by incompetence or oversight. Accordingly, he held that the court had been unable to serve the claim forms. Next, he considered whether the claimants had acted promptly in making their applications. He said that the solicitors were instructed promptly, and that they acted promptly on discovering that the claim forms had not been served. He thought that it was 'going too far' to expect the solicitors to badger the court and seek confirmation that service had been effected, and effected in time. He said that they were entitled to assume that all was well, and that all had been done in accordance with the rules. He then considered the exercise of his discretion, and concluded that the obvious prejudice to the claimants that would result if he did not extend time outweighed any prejudice that the defendant would suffer if he did extend time. For these reasons, he allowed the appeal.

[37] For the reasons expressed earlier in this judgment, Judge Hull construed r 7.6(3)(a) correctly. Mr Gaunt has criticised the conduct of the claimants' solicitors, and submitted that the real cause of the problem was their assumption that the court would have served the claim form, although they did not receive a notice under rr 6.10 or 6.14(1). But the defendant was only given permission to appeal on the point of construction, and not the judge's exercise of discretion. In any event, we should say that we see no basis on which the exercise of discretion could be challenged. In our judgment, this was a case where the real cause of the failure to serve in time was the court's neglect. That conclusion is not undermined by the fact that it is possible to argue that the claimants' solicitors were at fault in failing to appreciate that there might be a problem, and in failing to ascertain the position before the time for service had expired.

[38] We therefore dismiss this appeal.

CLAUSSEN V YEATES

a [39] Mr Claussen was injured in a road accident on 7 October 1996. He instructed solicitors, Traymans, on 29 October. Liability has never been seriously in issue, and the defendant's insurers have made a voluntary interim payment of damages in respect of the value of the claimant's moped. Finalisation of the claimant's case on quantum was delayed because his recovery was protracted, and the prognosis was not clear. The defendant's insurers were kept informed by the claimant's solicitors about the progress of the claim. On 29 July 1999, Traymans sent a number of reports and documents to the insurers, and made a Pt 36 offer. The insurers replied on 6 August that they wished to have their own medical examination of the claimant, and an appointment was made for 23 September. On 24 August, Mr Mutti (the partner at Traymans dealing with the case on behalf of the claimant) wrote asking whether the insurers would nominate solicitors to accept service. By letter dated 27 August, the insurers nominated A E Wyeth and Co (Wyeth), but did not provide their address.

c [40] On 30 September, Traymans notified the insurers that proceedings would be issued, and said that there would then be four months in which to resolve the matter before it became necessary to serve particulars of claim. A draft claim form was then prepared for issue, and a trainee solicitor took it to the Central London County Court on 5 October 1999. She had been instructed by Mr Mutti to retrieve the claim form after it had been issued, so that it could be served by Traymans. The claim form, which was issued on 5 October, gave the defendant's address as 'Stephen Michael Yeates c/o A E Wyeth & Co, solicitors, DX 31904, Dartford'. In view of the address 'c/o Wyeth', the court official took the view that the court should serve the claim form, and that a letter from Wyeth would be needed confirming that they would accept service. The trainee solicitor was, however, given a sealed copy of the claim form by the court.

d [41] On 5 October, Mr Mutti wrote to Wyeth at their Dartford address, saying: 'Proceedings were issued on the 5th October 1999, but we do not propose to serve them at present, as we anticipate that this matter is likely to settle.' Wyeth replied on 20 October stating that service would be accepted at their London office, and asking for a copy of the sealed summons in 'confirmation of the commencement of the proceedings'. At the request of Wyeth, on 9 November Traymans sent them at that address a copy of the claim form as issued. On 15 November, Wyeth wrote asking Traymans to 'ensure that when service is effected and if you intend to ask us to accept service on the defendant's behalf, the appropriate documentation is sent to this firm's London office'.

e [42] Thereafter, little happened until a date (which the judge was prepared to assume was 1 February 2000) when a letter was sent by Traymans to the court addressed to the court manager with the correct title and number of the action. It stated:

f 'Please find enclosed Notice of Issue of Legal Aid Certificate, Particulars of Claim and Claimant's Schedule of Loss in respect of this case which was issued in October of last year. Could you please place a copy on your file and serve the Defendant via his solicitors in due course. We attach a copy of a letter from the Defendant's solicitors confirming that they will accept service.'

j [43] This was the first time that Traymans had provided the court with the confirmation that it had sought on 5 October 1999 that Wyeth would accept service. The last date for service was 5 February. Traymans also wrote on 1 February to Wyeth saying that they had lodged the documents with the court which 'no doubt will serve these in due course', and enclosing copies. Nothing happened until 4 April when Traymans tried to find out the position, and learnt that Wyeth had not heard from the court. Mr Mutti telephoned the court, and was told that the matter had been 'put on hold awaiting a letter confirming that Wyeth would accept service'. Mr Mutti pointed out that such a letter had been enclosed with his letter of 1 February. The member of the court staff confirmed that this was shown on the computer record. The file and letters of 1 February and 5 April (in which Traymans said that the time for service had passed) were placed before District Judge Langley, who on 18 April made an order that the time for service of the claim form, particulars of claim and response pack be extended to 26 May. a

b

[44] On 19 June, Traymans wrote to the court and to Wyeth to find out whether the claim form had been served. On learning that it had not been served, they wrote to District Judge Langley expressing their concern, and asking her to look into the matter urgently. On 29 June, she ordered that the time for service be extended to 31 July 2000. c

[45] On 2 August, Wyeth issued an application that the orders dated 18 April and 29 June be set aside, and that the claim form and the purported service of it be set aside. On 21 September, District Judge Haselgrove acceded to this application. The claimant appealed to the judge. In a reserved judgment given on 9 May 2001, Judge Butter QC dismissed the appeal. d

[46] Before Judge Butter, it was common ground between the parties that, in the light of Vinos v Marks & Spencer plc [2001] 3 All ER 784, there was no residual discretion to extend time or to cure procedural irregularities. Accordingly, the claimant had to bring himself within r 7.6(3) in order to obtain an extension of time. There was no application to dispense with service. The central parts of the judgment are these: e

[12] The defendant contended that upon a proper construction of r 7.6(3)(a) it was necessary for the court to have attempted to serve but been unable to do so, that in the present case the court had done nothing because it was waiting for information which it had made plain that it required, that in any event Traymans could themselves have served the claim form, that although arguably the responsibility for service lay with the court after 1 February 2000 the court was given less than four days to do so, and that it could not fairly be said that the claimant had taken all reasonable steps to serve the form. f
g

[13] The following additional matters may be noted. Traymans were entitled to insist that they would serve the claim form. They must have been aware that there was no question of the court serving it without the confirmation which the court required. Their trainee solicitor was given a sealed copy of the form on 5 October 1999 and a copy of this was in fact sent by Traymans to Wyeth on 9 November though, in the light of the contemporaneous correspondence, counsel for the claimant has not sought to argue that this constituted service. (Particulars of claim would have had to be served within 14 days unless time was extended.) On 1 February 2000, Traymans' letter to the court did not refer to the fact that the claim form had not been served and did not convey any sense of urgency. The court receives many thousands of letters and other documents every week and it is entirely unrealistic to assume that the court will almost immediately effect service. h a There is no evidence as to what consideration was given to the documents handed in on 1 February but the position is that it would not have been appropriate for the court to serve the form after 5 February as time had not been extended. Although the claimant's representatives seek to rely upon the fact that no notice of non-service was sent by the court (under r 6.11), it should be borne in mind that where service is effected, the court will send out a certificate of service under r 6.14 in relation to this claim form, and notification of receipt of an acknowledgment of service in relation to the particulars of claim under r 10.4. In the present case no step appears to have been taken by Traymans between 1 February and 4 April 2000. No application was at any stage issued in accordance with r 7.6(4) and CPR PD 7.8, despite the requirement among other things of the need for evidence, though it may be that District Judge Langley was or would have been entitled to dispense with the filing of an application notice pursuant to r 23.3(2).
j

d [14] In overall terms, District Judge Haselgrove accepted the submissions of the defendant summarised in [12], above. I consider that he was right to accept them. The natural interpretation of r 7.6(3)(a) is that the court has attempted to serve the claim form but has been unable to do so. If support for this view is needed, it is to be found in the wording of r 6.11 which requires this court if unable to serve to "state the method attempted". Whatever sympathy one may have for the claimant, the interpretation put forward by his counsel involves an unnaturally strained interpretation upon the wording of the rule. The claimant therefore fails in respect of r 7.6(3)(a). e District Judge Haselgrove was in my view also correct in concluding that the claimant did not satisfy the requirements of r 7.6(3)(b) where the emphasis is on the claimant as distinct from the court. Here the claimant took no step at all after 5 October 1999 to serve the claim form and I do not see that he can come within r 7.6(3)(b) by saying that he handed documents to the court on f 1 February 2000. It is unnecessary for me to decide the point but I should say that I have considerable reservations as to whether the claimant can be said to have complied with r 7.6(3)(c) and (4).'

g [47] For the reasons that we have already given, Judge Butter misinterpreted r 7.6(3)(a). It was open to him to extend the time for service if he considered that court neglect was the real cause of the failure to serve the claim form in time, and that, applying the overriding objective, an extension of time was appropriate in all the circumstances. Since the judge did not exercise his discretion under r 7.6(3)(a), it is necessary for us to do so now.

h [48] In our view, it was failures by Traymans that were the real reason why the claim form was not served within the four-month period in this case. They knew that the court would not serve the claim form until it received a letter from Wyeth confirming that they would accept service. Mr Mutti received such a letter early during the four-month period. No explanation has been given as to why that letter was not sent to the court until 1 February. If it had been sent j shortly after it had been received by Traymans in October 1999, there is no reason to suppose that the court would not have effected service long before 5 February 2000. Nor does Mr Mutti explain why, having waited until 1 February to send the letter from Wyeth, he wrote to the court asking them to serve the defendant 'in due course'. He should have impressed on the court the urgency of the situation (which was entirely of his own making), and asked it to make sure that the claim form was served by 5 February. We would agree with the comment of Judge Butter that, since the court receives many thousands of letters every week, 'it is entirely unrealistic to assume that the court will almost immediately effect service'. In these circumstances, we do not consider that the conduct of the court was the real reason why the claim form was not served in time. We do not, therefore, think that this is a case in which it would be right to extend time for service under r 7.6(3)(a). a

[49] Mr Asif submits in the alternative that we should make an order under r 6.9 dispensing with service. He says that the case is analogous to the category 2 cases recognised in Anderton v Clwyd CC [2002] 3 All ER 813, [2002] 1 WLR 3174. He relies in particular on the fact that on 9 November 1999, Traymans sent a copy of the claim form as issued to Wyeth. Thus a copy was sent by a permitted method of service to the person authorised to accept service at the address given for service. He submits, therefore, that the case falls within the scope of the category 2 cases identified in Anderton's case at [58], and that, since this is a pre-Anderton case, it is one in which it is appropriate in principle to make an order under r 6.9. We cannot accept this submission. In the two cases which succeeded in Anderton's case, what was sent was the original claim form that had been issued by the court, and it was clear that the claim forms were purportedly being served, albeit that they were deemed to be served out of time. The recipient knew that, on the assumption that what was sent amounted to valid service, time started to run from the date of service of the claim form for certain purposes. Thus, for example, unless the claim form stated that particulars of claim were to follow, the time for acknowledgement of service was 14 days after service of the claim form (see r 10.3(1)(b)). b
c
d
e

[50] But in the present case, Traymans did not purport to serve the claim form by sending the copy to Wyeth on 9 November. There was no question of time starting to run from the date of service of that copy. On the contrary, Traymans made it clear that they were not proposing to serve the claim form on 9 November, and this was well understood by Wyeth (see their letter of 15 November). Traymans knew that they would eventually be asking the court to serve the claim form in due course, and that is precisely what they asked the court to do on 1 February. Nor did Traymans purport to serve the claim form on 1 February 2000. By their letter of that date, they made it clear that the claim form would be served by the court 'in due course' ie at some unspecified future date. In our view, this case does not fall within the exceptional category of cases identified in Anderton's case ([2002] 3 All ER 813 at [58]). It would be quite inappropriate to make an order dispensing with service here. f
g

[51] For these reasons, the appeal is dismissed. h

MCMANUS V SHARIF

[52] The claimant suffered substantial injuries on 26 February 1998 when the defendant's car mounted the pavement and collided with her. Shortly thereafter, the claimant instructed solicitors, Ronald Prior & Co (Priors). On 14 May 1998, Priors wrote to the defendant's insurers, KGM Motor Policies at Lloyds (KGM) inviting them to admit liability. On 2 June, KGM replied confirming that 'for the purposes of negotiations liability is not in dispute'. During the following two years, negotiations proceeded, and the insurers made a modest interim payment, and met various expenses that were incurred by the claimant. But no final settlement was reached. j a [53] The limitation period was due to expire on 26 February 2001. Priors issued a claim form (without particulars of claim or accompanying documents) on 19 February 2001. They requested that the service copy be remitted to them for service, and this was done. The last day for service of the claim form was, therefore, Tuesday 19 June. On Friday 15 June, Priors sent KGM 'by way of service' an unsigned and unsealed copy of the claim form together with b particulars of claim and a schedule of losses. These documents were received by KGM on 18 June. In their letter dated 15 June which enclosed the documents, Priors wrote:

'The writer has left the sealed Claim Form at home, as he was working on this case last night. We therefore enclose copy Claim Form, and will fax the c sealed version on Monday.'

In fact, what they sent was not a copy of the claim form that had been issued, but a draft claim form. By r 6.4(1), the claim form and particulars of claim should have been served on the defendant personally: no solicitor had been authorised to accept service so as to bring r 6.4(2) into play, and there had been no prior d agreement between the parties that service would be effected on KGM. By letter dated 22 June, KGM informed Priors that they 'would like you to serve our insured direct'. On 25 June, Priors purported to effect personal service of all the papers on the defendant at her home address.

[54] KGM instructed solicitors on behalf of the defendant. On 3 July 2001, they wrote to Priors pointing out that they had not indicated that they were e willing to accept service, and that the defendant should have been served personally. No further steps were taken in the proceedings until the defendant's solicitors issued an application on 21 February 2002 to strike out the claim on the grounds that proper service of the proceedings had never been effected on the defendant. The application was heard by District Judge Gregory on 26 June. It f was conceded on behalf of the claimant that there had not been proper service. Counsel appearing for the claimant sought to rely on an alleged agreement that the defendant would meet the claim and that he was thereby estopped from seeking the protection of the CPR to avoid liability. In a reserved judgment given on 9 July, this submission was rejected by District Judge Gregory. Since no other g argument had been put forward on behalf of the claimant, the district judge felt constrained to accede to the defendant's application and strike out the claim. As he saw it, the claimant had not complied with r 7.5, and, in view of Vinos v Marks & Spencer plc [2001] 3 All ER 784 and Elmes v Hygrade Food Products plc [2001] All ER (D) 158 (Jan), had little or no prospect of obtaining an extension of time under h r 7.6. The attention of District Judge Gregory was not drawn to r 6.9 at the date of the hearing (which pre-dated Anderton's case), and no application was made to him for an order to dispense with service. The district judge refused permission to appeal. He was not made aware of the decision in Anderton's case. On 31 July, Judge Bradbury granted permission to appeal limited to the issue of whether District Judge Gregory should have considered r 6.9 and exercised his discretion
j to dispense with service of the claim form. It is evident that, in giving permission to appeal, Judge Bradbury was heavily influenced by Anderton's case.

[55] On 28 October 2002, Judge Hornby allowed the claimant's appeal. The appeal proceeded as if District Judge Gregory had held that he had no jurisdiction to dispense with service under r 6.9, so that it was appropriate for Judge Hornby to decide whether to dispense with service for himself. The judge cited extensively from Anderton v Clwyd CC [2002] 3 All ER 813, and referred in particular to [57] and [58] of the judgment. We should set out the whole of his conclusion: a

‘In the light of Anderton’s case it is clear in my judgment that the court has a discretion to exercise which can be exercised retrospectively in exceptional circumstances without undermining the principle in Godwin v Swindon BC [2001] 4 All ER 641, [2002] 1 WLR 997. Plainly, the exercise of such discretion must have regard to the overriding principles of CPR Pt 1. In the instant case the arguments seem to me to be finely balanced. On the one hand it is said that by serving the defendant’s insurers the claimant does not fall within the exception described in [58]. The claimant knew the defendant’s name and address, that she or her solicitors should be served within the four-month period. No applications were made under rr 7.6, 6.8 or 6.9. The claimants were risking disaster by serving on the last day. The defendants would be wrongfully deprived of the Limitation Act 1980. On the other hand, the defendant’s insurers were aware of the claim within three months as contrasted by the facts in Anderton’s case and had admitted liability 18 days later. They looked after the defendant’s interests throughout and were in substantial proactive negotiations. Medical reports had been disclosed and offers of settlement made. It was submitted that to draw a distinction between the defendant’s insurers and her legal advisers was a technical point devoid of merit when the defendant’s interests were fully protected by her insurers throughout. Moreover, applying the principles of CPR Pt 1, if the claim were to be struck out the claimant, whose claim was substantial, was not guaranteed success against her first solicitors. She would be proceeding against a party who had formerly represented her. There was likely to be considerable delay overall and much extra expense. The added complexities caused by the different nature of the claim were a factor and a reallocation of further court resources to new proceedings should be borne in mind. I remind myself that the district judge impliedly indicated that if he had had a discretion he would probably have exercised it in favour of the claimant in all the circumstances. I have weighed up carefully the rival arguments which I have outlined briefly above. Both counsel put their arguments admirably. After careful consideration and reminding myself of the way the Court of Appeal considered the cases of Chambers and Dorgan in Anderton’s case I am persuaded that the balance just tips in favour of the claimant and that my discretion should therefore be exercised in favour of the claimant for the reasons advanced by Mr Yell and set out fully in this judgment. Accordingly, this appeal shall be allowed.’ b
c
d
e
f
g

[56] In our judgment, Judge Hornby should not have made an order under r 6.9 in this case. He took too liberal a view of the scope of the discretion conferred on the court by the rule. He did not pay sufficient regard to the fact that, even in category 2 cases (of which this is an example), the discretion may be exercised only in exceptional circumstances, and the court should be very slow indeed to dispense with service retrospectively in circumstances which fall outside those mentioned in Anderton’s case ([2002] 3 All ER 813 at [58]) to which we have referred at [9], above. h
j

[57] The circumstances of the present case fell outside the scope of Anderton’s case (at [58]) in a number of respects. First, what was purportedly served was not the claim form issued by the court or a photocopy of that document, but a draft claim form. Thus, unlike the document issued by the court, it was not stamped a with the court seal, and it did not contain a statement of truth. Rule 7.5 provides that, after a claim form has been issued, 'it must be served on the defendant' (my emphasis).

[58] Secondly, Priors made it clear to KGM that they understood that they were not serving the claim form, because they said that they would fax it on 18 June. Thirdly, the draft claim form was not sent to the defendant or a solicitor authorised to accept service on behalf of the defendant as permitted by r 6.4. It was sent to the defendant's insurers, who had no authority to accept service on behalf of the defendant. This is not a mere technical point. Mr Ross QC makes the point that in Anderton's case, the court referred to the fact that the claim form had in fact been received by the defendant or 'his legal adviser' by a permitted method of service as critical to whether the circumstances were exceptional so as to bring the r 6.9 power into play after the time for service has expired. He submits that the term 'legal adviser' (which does not appear in the CPR) must have been deliberately chosen in preference to the terms 'legal representative' or 'solicitor' (which do appear), and must have been intended to include, for example, insurers who are conducting the defence as KGM were in the present case. We do not agree. In Anderton's case, the court referred three times to the receipt of a claim form 'by a permitted method of service'. In our view, when using the term 'legal adviser', the court was clearly referring to a solicitor, since personal service on a defendant under the CPR is only permitted if it is effected on the defendant, or on a solicitor authorised to accept service (see rr 6.4 and 6.5). We note that in Anderton's case (at [3]), the court spoke of the claim form having been received by, and come to the attention of 'the defendant or his solicitor'. It is clear that the terms 'legal adviser' and 'solicitor' were used interchangeably. In any case, we do not think that an insurer, whose interest does not necessarily coincide with that of the insured defendant, can properly be described as the defendant's legal adviser, even where no solicitor has been appointed to act on his behalf.

f [59] Thirdly, the draft claim form was not sent to an address given for service in accordance with r 6.5.

[60] We do not rule out the possibility that the power to dispense with service of the claim form should be exercised in circumstances which do not fall squarely within those described in Anderton's case: see further discussion at [87] and [88], below. But wherever the boundary for the exercise of this exceptional jurisdiction is to be drawn, we have no doubt that it should not be exercised in a case such as this. There were significant departures from the rules as to the permitted mode of service. They were not mere technicalities.

h [61] For these reasons, we would allow this appeal.

MURPHY V STAPLES UK LTD

j [62] The claimant suffered personal injuries as the result of an accident at work on 22 November 1998. He was employed by the defendant as a part-time shelf stacker, and was injured when the bottom of a ladder that he was descending slipped from under him. He instructed Horwich Farrelly (Horwich) to act as his solicitors soon after the accident. On 28 May 1999, Horwich wrote to the defendant's insurers asking them to 'confirm details of solicitors nominated to accept service of proceedings on behalf of your insured'. On 2 June 1999, the defendant's insurers replied saying that their inquiries into liability were continuing, but that if Horwich wanted to issue proceedings at this stage, their solicitors, Branton Edwards (Branton), would accept service. On 9 June, Branton wrote to Horwich confirming that they had instructions to accept service, asking for an advance copy of the claimant's medical report, and suggesting the possibility of a jointly instructed expert. a

[63] Thereafter, Horwich continued to prepare the claimant's claim. On 21 November 2001 (one day before the expiry of the limitation period), the claim form was issued. On 15 March 2002, Horwich purported to serve the claim form by first class post together with particulars of claim, schedule of damages and medical reports. This was done by serving the defendant at its registered office. The accompanying letter recited the fact that Horwich had been in correspondence with the defendant's insurers and Branton, and continued: 'we would respectfully suggest that the enclosed documentation be forwarded immediately' to Branton. On the same day, Horwich sent to Branton by first class post copies of all the documents that were purportedly served on the defendant, including a copy of the claim form that had been issued by the court. The accompanying letter informed Branton that the documents had been 'served today on your client's registered office'. b
c

[64] Although the defendant apparently did forward the original documents to Branton, they had not been received by that firm by 26 March when Branton wrote to Horwich stating that the purported service was defective because it should have been effected on them, and not on the defendant. On 3 April 2002, Branton issued an application to set aside the purported service of the claim form on the grounds that it was not in accordance with r 6.5. There was no cross-application to dispense with service under r 6.9, and no evidence was filed on behalf of the claimant. In a judgment given on 7 May 2002, Deputy District Judge Hugman acceded to the defendant's application, and ordered that service be set aside. The district judge referred to Godwin v Swindon BC [2001] 4 All ER 641, [2002] 1 WLR 997 and Nangleman v Royal Free Hampstead NHS Trust [2001] 3 All ER 793, [2002] 1 WLR 1043, and held that the only question before him was whether there had been service on Branton on or before 21 March. Service on the defendant itself would not suffice. He concluded that service had been effected on the defendant at its registered office, and that the sending of 'courtesy' copies of the documents to Branton on 15 March or some subsequent date prior to 26 March did not amount to service on Branton. d
e
f

[65] In view of Godwin's case and Nangleman's case, counsel for the claimant did not seek to persuade Deputy District Judge Hugman to extend the time for service retrospectively. Despite the absence of an application, the deputy district judge considered whether to dispense with service. He said, however, that this was an 'ordinary case, where the service of a claim form is something which is physically achieved'. To dispense with service would 'fly in the face of the Court of Appeal's views'. He refused, therefore, to dispense with service. g
h

[66] The claimant appealed with the permission of Judge Holman. The appeal was heard by Judge Armitage QC who gave a reserved judgment on 13 October 2002. The claimant applied for permission to adduce evidence before the judge. This evidence comprised a statement by David Spencer dated 20 May 2002 to which was appended a number of documents which showed some important aspects of the procedural history. Mr Spencer is a solicitor with Horwich who has had the conduct of this litigation on behalf of the claimant. j

[67] Before Judge Armitage, the claimant did not challenge the decisions by Deputy District Judge Hugman that (a) the claim form had been served on the defendant, and (b) the sending of 'courtesy' copies on Branton did not amount to service on the solicitors. As regards r 6.9, Judge Armitage said that on the a material available to the deputy district judge, and in the light of the law as it stood at the time, the decision not to dispense with service was clearly correct. In the light of Anderton v Clwyd CC [2002] 3 All ER 813, however, an issue arose as to whether the decision under r 6.9 was correct.

b [68] Judge Armitage first had to decide whether to admit the evidence of Mr Spencer. He approached this question by applying the principles in Ladd v Marshall [1954] 3 All ER 745, [1954] 1 WLR 1489. He said that he found the failure to adduce any evidence on behalf of the claimant before Deputy District Judge Hugman 'difficult to understand'. He concluded that it had not been demonstrated that the evidence could not have been obtained with reasonable diligence. He decided not to admit the evidence.

c [69] Judge Armitage then addressed the various points made by Mr Halliday, counsel then appearing on behalf of the claimant, in support of the submission that service should be dispensed with under r 6.9. He rejected the submission that he should infer that the claimant had a strong case on liability. A point was made based on the fact that an expert plastic surgeon had been jointly instructed by the parties in 1999. The judge considered that this was 'not the same as negotiations to settle or upon quantification, subject to liability or after admission, but does indicate a significant awareness of the likely issues on damages'. The third point relied on by Mr Halliday was that there had been an interim payment and a substantial offer in relation to liability. This was demonstrated by the evidence of Mr Spencer, but, having refused to admit this evidence, Judge Armitage refused to take it into account. The fourth point made by Mr Halliday was that the solicitors had been instructed on behalf of the defendant 30 months before service was effected. The judge dismissed this as a 'thoroughly bad point'. The problems arose because the claimant's solicitors left service until the last moment, and then failed to look at their file to see upon whom service was to be effected.

f [70] Judge Armitage took the next two points together. These were that the defendant and its solicitors were aware of the contents of the claim form and the other documents before the date for service had expired. As to this, the judge said:

g 'On any view both the defendants and their solicitors had actual knowledge of the existence and content of the claim form within a few days of the deadline for service, possibly before, but possibly after it. Albeit not good service the defendants and their insurer's solicitors had actual knowledge of the claim and its content.'

h [71] The remaining substantive points went to the question of where the balance of prejudice lay. Judge Armitage said:

j 'In my judgment that balance comes down heavily in favour of allowing the action to proceed. The defendants will suffer the prejudice of losing a cast iron defence to a claim of which they had fair and timely notice. Service was procedurally ineffective, but was not demonstrably actually ineffective. The defendant's ability to contest the claim (on liability and quantum) on its merits, is unaffected by the claimant's decision to proceed at the very last moment. There is no evidence to suggest that that decision was made on tactical grounds, that is to say with the intention of causing problems for the defendants in their defence to the claim.'

[72] Judge Armitage summarised his conclusion in these terms:

‘In my judgment the circumstances are exceptional. This was a technical error. It was easily avoidable, but has no more than technical consequences for the defendants compared with potentially very grave consequences for the claimant. Any relevant delay was insignificant. The claimant and/or his solicitors have not performed their obligations under the rules as to time, as to service or in this appeal with any great credit. They have been fortunate in what may be seen as the merciful decision of the Court of Appeal in Anderton’s case. Although not wrong at the time it was made, I allow the claimant’s appeal against the district judge’s order on the basis that the decision was wrong having regard to the subsequent declaration of the court’s powers concerning dispensing with service of a claim form, by the Court of Appeal in Anderton’s case.’

Accordingly, he allowed the claimant’s appeal.

[73] Permission to appeal to this court was given on the question whether in a pre-Anderton case, the category of ‘exceptional’ cases where service may be dispensed with retrospectively under r 6.9 is restricted to cases where there has been an unsuccessful attempt to serve at the address for service.

[74] But we need first to deal with the point raised by Waller LJ during the course of argument that the sending of the claim form by first class post to the defendant’s registered office on 15 March constituted good service pursuant to s 725(1) of the Companies Act 1985, such that there was no need to invoke r 6.9 at all. Mr Tozzi QC adopted this as part of his submissions. Mr Purchas QC protested that it had been conceded below that there had not been service on the defendant in accordance with r 6.5, and the suggestion that service had been effected under s 725(1) had not been raised, and that it was too late for the point to be taken now. But we decided that it would be unsatisfactory to determine this appeal on a false basis. Any prejudice caused to the defendant by the fact that the point was taken so late could be met by an appropriate order for costs, and giving the defendant time to submit further submissions in writing on the new point. Since the end of the hearing we have received written submissions from both parties on the point.

[75] Mr Tozzi submits as follows. Section 725(1) of the 1985 Act provides: ‘A document may be served on a company by leaving it at, or sending it by post to, the company’s registered office.’

[76] Section 7 of the Interpretation Act 1978 provides:

‘Where an Act authorises or requires any document to be served by post ... then, unless the contrary intention appears, the service is deemed to be effected by properly addressing, pre-paying and posting a letter containing the document and, unless the contrary is proved, to have been effected at the time at which the letter would be delivered in the ordinary course of post.’

[77] Rule 6.1 provides that the rules in CPR Pt 6 apply to the service of documents ‘except where—(a) any other enactment, a rule in another Part, or a practice direction makes a different provision’. Rule 6.2(1) provides the methods by which service may be effected, viz by personal service in accordance with r 6.4, by first class post, by leaving the document at a place specified in r 6.5, through a document exchange, or by fax or other electronic communication. Rule 6.2(2) provides:

a 'A company may be served by any method permitted under this Part as an alternative to the methods of service set out in—(a) section 725 of the Companies Act 1985 (service by leaving a document at or posting it to an authorised place); (b) section 695 of that Act (service on overseas companies); and (c) section 694A of that Act (service of documents on companies incorporated outside the UK and Gibraltar and having a branch in Great Britain).'

b [78] Rule 6.4 contains the following provisions relating to personal service:

'(1) A document to be served may be served personally, except as provided in paragraph (2).

c (2) Where a solicitor—(a) is authorised to accept service on behalf of a party; and (b) has notified the party serving the document in writing that he is so authorised, a document must be served on the solicitor, unless personal service is required by an enactment, rule, practice direction or court order.

(3) A document is served personally on an individual by leaving it with that individual.

d (4) A document is served personally on a company or other corporation by leaving it with a person holding a senior position within the company or corporation.'

e [79] Rule 6.5 deals with the address for service. Rule 6.5(2) requires a party to give an address for service within the jurisdiction. Rule 6.5(4) provides that '[a]ny document to be served (a) by first class post ... must be sent or transmitted to, or left at, the address given by the party to be served'. Rule 6.5(6) provides that where—

f '(a) no solicitor is acting for the party to be served; and (b) the party has not given an address for service, the document must be sent or transmitted to, or left at, the place shown in the following table.'

The table shows the place for service according to the nature of the party to be served. It includes as the place for service of a company registered in England and Wales either the '[p]rincipal office of the company' or '[a]ny place of business of the company within the jurisdiction which has a real connection with the claim'.

g [80] In this case, service was effected using the statutory procedure. Mr Tozzi submits that the fact that service by post pursuant to the 1985 Act overlaps with service by first class post under r 6.2(1)(b) is immaterial. Service by first class post is a permitted method of service. Accordingly, service on the company at its registered office was good service. The case of Nangleman v Royal Free Hampstead NHS Trust [2001] 3 All ER 793 can be distinguished, since the defendant in that case was not a company. Alternatively it was wrongly decided.

h [81] The submissions on behalf of the defendant may be summarised as follows. A defendant company may be served under s 725(1) of the 1985 Act, under the CPR or in such other way as may be agreed between the parties: see Kenneth Allison Ltd (in liq) v AE Limehouse & Co (a firm) [1991] 4 All ER 500 at 506, [1992] 2 AC 105 at 116–117 per Lord Bridge of Harwich, with whom Lords Lowry, Templeman and Jauncey agreed. Lord Bridge said:

j 'I do not see any difficulty in holding that the kind of ad hoc agreement in question is legally effective. If one party, knowing that another wishes to serve process upon him, requests or authorises the other to do so in a particular way which is outside the rules and the other does so, then, unless the rules themselves prohibit consensual service, the party so served cannot be heard to say that the service was not valid. Thus, I have no doubt that, if the circumstances of the present case had come before the court in 1898, the validity of the service would have been affirmed. The crucial question is whether subsequent changes in the Rules of the Supreme Court have introduced just such a prohibition of consensual service outside the rules as was unsuccessfully contended for in Montgomery Jones & Co v Liebenthal & Co [1898] 1 QB 487. a

b

[82] This presupposes that r 6.2(2) and s 725(1) provide alternative, and not concurrent, methods of service. Where a choice or election is made as to the method of service to be employed, then both parties are bound by it. Once the CPR is engaged by an effective election, the parties know when the court timetable will start to run, because the claimant will have served a certificate of service specifying the deemed date of service. In this way, certainty is achieved. On the facts of the present case, the claimant by his solicitors elected to proceed by way of service on the defendant's solicitors under the CPR, rather than under s 725(1). At no time prior did the claimant seek to resile from the election. The defendant also relies on Nanglegan's case. c
d

[83] Our conclusion on this issue is as follows. A claimant may serve the claim form on a defendant company either by leaving it at, or by sending it by post to, the company's registered office, or by serving it in accordance with one of the methods permitted by the CPR. They are true alternatives. That is made clear by r 6.2(2). There are differences between the two methods. For example, service under s 725(1) may be by second class post. Rule 6.1 provides for service by first class post. Service under s 725(1) is deemed to have been effected at the time at which the letter would be delivered 'in the ordinary course of post' (see s 7 of the 1978 Act) unless the contrary is proved. Rule 6.7 provides that, where service is by first class post, the document is irrebuttably deemed to have been served on the second day after it was posted. Another difference is that service under s 725(1) must be by leaving the document at, or posting it to, the registered office. Rule 6.2(1) provides for five permitted methods of service. e
f

[84] If a defendant has not given an address for service, a claimant may choose whether to follow the s 725(1) or the CPR route for service. In Nanglegan's case, it was held that, where a defendant elects to give his address for service, and nominates his solicitor to accept service, r 6.5(4) requires personal service to be effected upon the nominated solicitor, and not on the defendant. As Thorpe LJ put it ([2001] 3 All ER 793 at 797, [2002] 1 WLR 1043 at 1047): 'There will be many instances in which a defendant does not want service either at his residence or at his place of business.' But in that case, the court was not concerned with the interplay between s 725(1) and the CPR, which expressly recognise alternative methods. g
h

[85] We accept that it is possible for the parties to make a binding contract whereby the claimant agrees to serve the claim form by the CPR route rather than under s 725(1) or vice versa. But we do not consider that the effect of the letters dated 28 May, 2 and 9 June 1999 was to deny to the claimant the option of serving under s 725(1) of the 1985 Act. In our judgment, the true effect of these letters was not a binding promise by the claimant to serve on the solicitors under r 6.4(2). Rather, it was that the parties agreed that, if the claimant decided to effect personal service under r 6.4, then they would serve on the defendant's solicitors rather than on the company under r 6.4(4). The Kenneth Allison case is j a authority for the proposition that an ad hoc agreement for service not permitted by the CPR is legally effective. We do not consider that it assists in the resolution of the issue which arises here.

[86] Our conclusion, therefore, is that the service on the company's registered office by first class post on 15 March 2002 was good service.

b [87] In these circumstances, it is not necessary to decide whether Judge Armitage was right to dispense with service under r 6.9. However, in view of the importance of giving some guidance as to the scope of r 6.9 in cases such as this, we shall express our opinion on this issue on the footing that (contrary to the view just expressed) service should have been on the defendant's solicitors under r 6.4(2). In our judgment, on that hypothesis, the circumstances identified by the judge did not make this an 'exceptional' case within the letter or the spirit of c Anderton v Clwyd CC [2002] 3 All ER 813, [2002] 1 WLR 3174 and Wilkey v BBC [2002] 4 All ER 1177, [2003] 1 WLR 1. But we wish to emphasise the following features. It is clear that a copy of the claim form as issued was sent to Branton on 15 March 2002. In other words, a copy of the right document was sent to the right person at the right address and, if r 6.7 applied, it was deemed to have been served d before the expiry of the four-month period. Moreover, Branton were informed by Horwich that the original documents had been served on the defendant's registered office that same day. The only flaw in the process was that Horwich sent a copy of the issued claim form, rather than the original document itself. In this regard, it is to be noted that, if Horwich had sent the issued claim form to e Branton by fax, that would have been good service. A document received by fax is a copy document. The circumstances revealed by this case do not precisely satisfy the criteria in Anderton's case: Branton received a document served by one of the permitted methods of service (ie by first class post on the right person at the right address), but it was a copy of the document that should have been served.

f [88] In these very unusual circumstances, had it been necessary to do so, we would have decided that it was right to dispense with service under r 6.9. It is possible that the relationship between service under s 725(1) and service under the CPR was not fully understood, and that the importance of serving on the party to be served the original claim form that has been issued (rather than a g copy) was not appreciated. But in future the significance of these points will have to be taken into account. Errors of this kind will generally not be regarded as good reasons for making an order under r 6.9. In stipulating a strict approach for the future in such circumstances, we have been guided by what was said in Anderton's case and Wilkey's case.

h [89] But for the reasons that we have given, this appeal is dismissed.

SMITH V HUGHES

j [90] The claimant was injured in a road traffic accident on 18 December 1997. It seems that he was driving the car of his mother, Mrs E Smith. They both instructed the same firm of solicitors, Graham Leigh Pfeffer & Co (GLP). In his statement dated 30 September 2002, Ian Wolstenholme, a legal executive employed by GLP, explains that the insurance position of Mr Hughes was somewhat uncertain. By a letter dated 30 March 1998, Budget Insurance Services (Budget) said that Mr Hughes was not insured. Thereupon, GLP intimated a claim to the Motor Insurers Bureau (MIB), and entered into correspondence with London & Edinburgh Insurance Co (L & E) who were agents for the MIB.

[91] In April 1999, inquiry agents instructed by the MIB reported that Mr Hughes had left the address shown on the electoral register in about February 1999, and that his then current whereabouts were unknown. That address was 45 Whitworth Close, Birchwood, Warrington, Cheshire. On 19 May 1999, GLP wrote to the MIB, sending a completed application form, which, it is assumed, was an application form for an MIB agreement to be put in place in connection with this claim. On 25 May, the MIB wrote to GLP a letter in respect of the claim by Mrs Smith, saying that the inquiry agent had established that Mr Hughes had left his address in about February, adding that (a) they were awaiting confirmation from the police whether a formal accident report was 'available to clarify the insurance position and liability'; and (b) 'your client' (ie Mrs Smith) had not provided any description of the circumstances of the accident which would be required before any consideration could be given to the claim. a
b
c

[92] The insurance position remained uncertain. But in about November 1999, Budget confirmed that Mr Hughes was not insured, and the Norwich Union, having merged with L & E, took over the conduct of the case on behalf of the MIB.

[93] The claim form was issued on 14 December 2000. So far as GLP were concerned, they continued to receive contradictory signals from Budget and the Norwich Union, and the insurance position remained unclear. On 10 April 2001, the claim form, particulars of claim and all relevant associated documentation were sent by first class post to Mr Hughes at 45 Whitworth Close, Birchwood, Warrington, Cheshire. The documents were not returned by the Post Office to GLP. On 15 August 2001, the MIB was joined as second defendant. On 21 August 2002, MIB made an application requesting that the court decide as a preliminary issue whether the MIB could have any liability to the claimant. The basis of the application was its contention that the claim form had not been served on Mr Hughes within the four-month period for service. d
e

[94] The application was heard by District Judge Duerden, who gave judgment on 3 December 2002. He decided that the claim form had not been served on Mr Hughes on 12 April 2001, and dismissed the claim against both defendants. One of the issues of fact that he had to resolve was whether a letter similar to that sent by the MIB to GLP on 25 May 1999 in respect of Mrs Smith's claim had been sent by them to GLP in respect of the claimant's claim. Mr Wolstenholme asserted in his statement that the letter dated 25 May sent in respect of Mrs Smith's claim was sent to another member of the GLP legal team, and that no similar letter was received in relation to this claim, nor was a copy of the inquiry agent's report ever received by GLP. District Judge Duerden said that he was satisfied on balance that there was one person, whose reference was MBT, who was dealing with both claims. f
g
h

[95] Having made that finding, the district judge turned to the question of service. He referred to r 6.5 (which deals with address for service), and in particular r 6.5(6) which provides that, where no solicitor is acting for the party to be served, and the party has not given an address for service, if the document is to be served on an individual, it must be sent or transmitted to, or left at his or her 'usual or last known residence'. There was no doubt in this case that Mr Hughes' last known residence was the address to which the claim form was sent on 10 April 2001. It was not suggested by the MIB that there was any other subsequent known address for Mr Hughes. District Judge Duerden referred to r 6.8 which provides: j a (1) Where it appears to the court that there is a good reason to authorise service by a method not permitted by these Rules, the court may make an order permitting service by an alternative method.

(2) An application for an order permitting service by an alternative method—(a) must be supported by evidence; (b) may be made without notice.

b (3) An order permitting service by an alternative method must specify—(a) the method of service; and (b) the date when the document will be deemed to be served.'

[96] He said that it was 'reasonably incumbent' on a solicitor faced with a letter in the terms of the MIB letter dated 25 May 1999 to 'contemplate' an application for service by an alternative method under r 6.8. The most obvious alternative method would have been by service on the MIB. GLP failed to take this course even though 'they knew that sending it to the last known address of the first defendant would not result in service'. The conclusion of District Judge Duerden is encapsulated in the following passage:

d 'However generous a reading one makes of the rules and however persuasive the Court of Appeal's decision in Anderton's case may be and I do not seek for a moment to detract from that; I do recognise it as a very useful decision in procedural matters as it accentuates the need for certainty but however persuasive that may be, to purport to serve at the last known address two years and some after the defendant has vacated it without making further inquiry cannot be doing justice between the parties. It cannot be expected that the first defendant will get to know of those proceedings and that is the purpose of service.'

In the result, he held that Mr Hughes had not been served.

f [97] On behalf of the claimant, Mr Exall submits as follows. Service on the last known residence of an individual is good service. The rules are clear and there are no grounds for construing them in any other way. Alternatively, he relies on rr 6.10 and 6.14 and the fact that the claim form was not returned undelivered to support the presumption that service had taken place. Rule 6.14(2) provides that, where the claim form is served by the claimant, he must file a certificate of service within seven days of service of the claim form. Rule 6.10 provides that, where a rule requires a certificate of service, the certificate must state (a) that the document has not been returned undelivered, and (b) where service is by post, the date of posting.

g [98] Mr Exall submits that the district judge should have applied the fundamental principle to be derived from Anderton v Clwyd CC [2002] 3 All ER 813, [2001] 1 WLR 3174 namely that the rules for service are designed to provide certainty. In r 6.7, this is achieved by providing rules for the time when service is deemed to be effected which are not rebuttable by evidence as to when the documents are actually received. So too in relation to the address for service, certainty is achieved by a rule which permits service on a person's last known residence. This is a sensible pragmatic rule designed to deal with the situation which occurs where a defendant does not give an address for service as required by r 6.5(2). Moreover, the potential injustice to a defendant who has been served at his last known residence is, to some extent at least, mitigated by r 13.5(2). This provides that if a claimant who has entered judgment subsequently has good reason to believe that the particulars of claim did not reach the defendant before the claimant entered judgment, he must file a request for the judgment to be set aside, and apply to the court for directions. a

[99] In any event, Mr Exall submits that the district judge fell into error in relation to the facts of the case itself. The evidence did not establish that Mr Hughes was not living at the address in April 2001. It was not reasonable to infer from the fact that he left the address in February 1999 that he was not living there in April 2001. All the more so in view of the fact that the documents were not returned undelivered by the Post Office to GLP. b

[100] On behalf of the MIB, Mr Gregory supports the reasoning of the district judge. He submits that District Judge Duerden was entitled to hold that GLP, as solicitors to the claimant, were fixed with the knowledge of the contents of the letter of 25 May 1999. GLP cannot realistically have believed that the address 45 Whitworth Close could fairly be described as Mr Hughes' 'usual' residence, or his 'last known residence', since it was known that this was not his residence, and had not been his residence since February 1999. Accordingly, if they sent the documentation to that address on 10 April 2001, GLP did so in the knowledge that it would not be received by Mr Hughes. Mr Gregory submits that it is implicit in r 6.5 that there is a reasonable belief on the part of the person purporting to serve the documentation that it will come to the attention of its intended recipient at the address served. There is nothing in Anderton's case which compels the conclusion for which the claimant contends. c d

[101] It seems that there is some doubt as to the meaning and effect of r 6.5(6) where service is effected on an individual at his last known residence. The notes to the White Book (Civil Procedure (Autumn 2002 edn)) vol I, p 133 include the following: e

'The CPR do not make it clear whether service by post to a defendant's last known address at which he no longer resides, and the defendant does not in fact receive the claim, is good service.' f

[102] In our judgment, the position is clear. There are two conditions precedent for the operation of the provisions of r 6.5(6), namely that (a) no solicitor is acting for the party to be served, and (b) the party has not given an address for service. If those conditions are satisfied, then the rule states that the document to be sent must be sent or transmitted to, or left at, the place shown in the table. In the case of an individual, that means at his or her usual or last known residence. The rule is plain and unqualified. We see no basis for holding that, if the two conditions are satisfied, and the document is sent to that address, that does not amount to good service. The rule does not say that it is not good service if the defendant does not in fact receive the document. If that had been intended to be the position, the rule would have said so in terms. Nor can we see any basis for holding that, if the claimant knows or believes that the defendant is no longer living at his or her last known residence, service may not be effected by sending the claim form, or leaving it at, that address. That would be to fly in the face of the clear words of the rule. The rule is intended to provide a clear and straightforward mechanism for effecting service where the two conditions precedent to which we have referred are satisfied. g h j

[103] As we have said, there is no suggestion in this case that 45 Whitworth Close was not Mr Hughes' last known residence. If the MIB had disputed the claimant's claim that this was Mr Hughes' last known residence, then difficult questions might have arisen. In particular, is the rule concerned with the claimant's actual knowledge, or is it directed at the knowledge which, exercising a reasonable diligence, he or she could acquire? We incline to the latter view, but, as we have said, the point does not arise on this appeal.

[104] But for the reasons that we have given, in our judgment District Judge Duerden misinterpreted r 6.5(6), and the appeal must be allowed.

First, second and fourth appeals dismissed, but third and fifth appeals allowed.

Melanie Martyn Barrister.

Masterman-Lister v Brutton & Co

Masterman-Lister v Jewell and another

[2002] EWCA Civ 1889

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

KENNEDY, POTTER AND CHADWICK LJJ

12–15 NOVEMBER, 19 DECEMBER 2002

Practice – Parties – Capacity – Claimant suffering brain damage as result of road traffic accident – Claimant compromising action – Claimant seeking to sue solicitors advising him to compromise – Claimant seeking to re-open issue of capacity – Whether claimant a ‘patient’ under the rules of the court – Whether burden of proof on claimant to show inability of managing or administering his affairs – Test to be applied to determine whether capacity in issue – Time at which issue of capacity to be raised – RSC Ord 80, r 10 – CPR Pt 21.

The claimant was born in 1963. In 1980, he was involved in a serious road traffic accident and suffered severe brain damage. The defendants were instructed to issue a claim. In 1987, the claimant accepted an offer to compromise the action. The claimant had attempted to work after the accident, but was only able to perform menial tasks and had not worked since 1989. He lived with his parents until 1992, when he purchased his own house. In late 1993, the claimant, having been told by the defendants that his claim could not be re-opened issued a writ for damages for negligence and/or breach of contract in relation to the defendants’ conduct of his litigation. The statement of claim was not served until May 1996, and the defendants in their defence asserted that the claim was statute-barred. In 1997, the claimant was advised by a consultant in neuropsychiatric rehabilitation that he was, and had been since the accident a patient within the meaning of s 94(2) of the Mental Health Act 1983, namely a person who was incapable by reason of mental disorder of managing and administering his property and affairs. The claimant then sought to reopen the settlement of his personal injury action on the basis that it had never received the approval of the court, as was required at the relevant time pursuant to RSC Ord 80, r 10. That rule which defined the term ‘patient’ was replaced by CPR 21.1(2)(b). A trial of a preliminary issue, in relation to both actions was ordered, as to whether the claimant had been a ‘patient’ within the meaning of RSC Ord 80 and/or CPR Pt 21 at any time since September 1980. The judge ruled that the court should only take over the individual’s function of decision making when it was shown on the balance of probabilities that the individual did not have the capacity sufficiently to understand, absorb and retain information, including advice, relevant to the matters in question sufficiently to enable him or her to make decisions based upon such information. He then considered the evidence and concluded that since 1983 at the latest, the claimant had been fully capable of managing and administering his property and affairs and therefore was not a ‘patient’ for the purposes of either the Act, Ord 80 or CPR Pt 21. The claimant appealed. On appeal issues arose as to the burden of proof; the test for determining capacity to litigate and compromise; and the time at which the issue of capacity should be raised.

Held – (1) The burden of proof rested on those asserting incapacity. The fact that there was evidence that as a result of a head injury sustained in an accident it was agreed that the claimant was incapable of managing his property and affairs did not mean that he could rely on the presumption of continuance. Although there was no requirement in Ord 80 of CPR Pt 21 that a judicial officer had to consider medical evidence or be satisfied as to incapacity before a person could be treated as a patient, following the implementation of the Human Rights Act 1988, in order that a party was not deprived of his civil rights by being treated as a patient, the court should always, as a matter of practice, at the first convenient opportunity, investigate the question of capacity whenever there was any reason to suspect that it might be absent. That meant that, even where the issue did not seem to be contentious, a district judge who was responsible for case management would almost certainly require the assistance of a medical report before being able to be satisfied that incapacity existed (see [17], below).

(2) For the purposes of Ord 80 and Pt 21, the test to be applied to determine a person's capacity was issue-specific. What had to be considered was whether the party to legal proceedings was capable of understanding, with the assistance of such proper explanation from legal advisers and experts in other disciplines as the case might require, the issues on which his consent or decision was likely to be necessary in the course of those proceedings. If the party had capacity to understand that which he needed to understand in order to pursue or defend a claim there was no reason why the law, whether substantive or procedural, should require the interposition of a next friend or litigation friend. Moreover, a person should not be held unable to understand the information relevant to a decision if he could understand an explanation of that information in broad terms and simple language. Furthermore, he should not be regarded as unable to make a rational decision merely because the decision which he did, in fact, make was a decision which would not be made by a person of ordinary prudence (see [26], [27], [55], [62], [64]–[69], [75], [78], below); White v Fell (12 November 1987, unreported) considered.

(3) Normally no problem arose as to when the issue of capacity should be raised. It raised itself. However, if the claimant lacked capacity and, without any fault on anyone's part, no-one recognised that fact, the court could regularise the position retrospectively. Under CPR 21.3(4) any step taken before a child or patient had a litigation friend was to be of no effect, unless the court otherwise ordered. Provided everyone had acted in good faith and here had been no manifest disadvantage to the party subsequently found to have been a patient at the relevant time the court could not refuse to regularise the position. To do otherwise would be unjust and contrary to the overriding objective of the CPR, but in any given case the ultimate decision had to depend on the particular facts. Nevertheless, finality in litigation was also important, and the rules as to capacity were not designed to provide a vehicle for re-opening litigation which having apparently been properly conducted had for long been understood to be at an end (see [30], [31], below).

(4) In the instant case, the judge had used the correct approach and had been entitled, on the evidence, to come to the conclusion that the claimant had been fully capable of managing and administering his property and affairs (see [54], [84], below).

Notes

For mental disorder and legal incapacity see 30 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 1421, and for limitation of action in cases of legal incapacity see 28 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 867. a

For the Limitation Act 1980, ss 28, 38, see 24 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (1998 reissue) 727, 741.

For the Mental Health Act 1983, ss 1(2), 94(2), see 28 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2001 reissue) 834, 962. b

Cases referred to in judgment

Ball v Mannin (1829) 3 Bli NS 1, 6 ER 569.

Banks v Goodfellow LR 5 QB 549, [1861–73] All ER Rep 47. c

Beall v Smith (1873) 9 Ch App 85.

Beaney, Re [1978] 2 All ER 595, [1978] 1 WLR 770.

C (adult: refusal of treatment), Re [1994] 1 All ER 819, [1994] 1 WLR 290.

CAF, Re (23 March 1962, unreported).

Cumming, Re (1852) 1 De GM&G 537. d

Durham v Durham (1885) 10 PD 80.

F v West Berkshire Health Authority (Mental Health Act Commission intervening) [1989] 2 All ER 545, [1990] 2 AC 1, [1989] 2 WLR 1025, HL.

Gibbons v Wright (1954) 91 CLR 423, Aust HC.

Hart v O'Connor [1985] 2 All ER 880, [1985] AC 1000, [1985] 3 WLR 214, PC. e

Harwood v Baker (1840) 3 Moo PCC 282, 13 ER 117, PC.

Imperial Loan Co v Stone [1892] 1 QB 599, CA.

K Re, Re F [1988] 1 All ER 358, [1988] Ch 310, [1988] 2 WLR 781.

Leather v Kirby [1965] 2 All ER 441, [1965] 2 QB 367, [1965] 2 WLR 1318, CA.

Manches v Trimborn (1946) 115 LJKB 305. f

Mason v Mason [1972] 3 All ER 315, [1972] 3 WLR 405.

MB (an adult: medical treatment), Re [1997] 2 FCR 541, CA.

Molton v Camroux (1849) 4 Exch 17, 154 ER 1107, Ex Ch.

Park's Estate, Re, Park v Park [1953] 2 All ER 408, [1954] P 89, [1953] 3 WLR 307, affd; [1953] 2 All ER 1411, [1954] P 112, [1953] 3 WLR 1012, CA. g

S (FG), Re [1973] 1 All ER 273, [1973] 1 WLR 178.

W (Enduring Power of Attorney), Re [2001] 4 All ER 88, [2001] Ch 609, [2001] 2 WLR 957, CA.

W v L [1973] 3 All ER 884, [1974] QB 711, [1973] 3 WLR 859, CA.

White v Fell (12 November 1987, unreported).

Winterwerp v Netherlands (1979) 2 EHRR 387, [1979] ECHR 6301/73, ECtHR. h

Appeal

The claimant, Martin Joseph Masterman-Lister, appealed with permission of Wright J from his decision on 15 March 2002 ([2002] EWCA Civ 1889, [2002] All ER (D) 297 (Dec)) in relation to a preliminary issue, set out [1], below, ordered to be determined by Master Murray on 29 March 2000, arising out of two claims brought by the claimant against (i) Brutton & Co and (ii) Gordon Jewell and Home County Dairies in respect of personal injury resulting from a road traffic accident on 9 September 1980. The facts are set out in the judgment of Kennedy LJ. j

- a Brian Langstaff QC, Patricia Hitchcock and Anna Beale (instructed by Stewarts) for the appellant.
- Robin De Wilde QC and Nick Brown (instructed by Blake Lapthorn, Portsmouth) for Brutton & Co.
- Richard Methuen QC and Hugh Hamill (instructed by Clarke Willmott, Southampton) for Mr Jewell and Home Counties Dairies.
- b Robert Francis QC for the Official Solicitor.

Cur adv vult

19 December 2002. The following judgments were delivered.

c KENNEDY LJ.

[1] This is an appeal by the claimant from a decision of Wright J ([2002] EWHC 417 (QB), [2002] All ER (D) 247 (Mar)) in relation to a preliminary issue namely:

- d ‘Whether the claimant has been a patient within the meaning of RSC Order 80 and/or Part 21 of the CPR at any time since the 8th September 1980 and, if so, what are the period or periods when the claimant has been a patient between the 8th September 1980 to date.’

On 29 March 2000 Master Murray ordered the trial of that issue in relation to both of the claimant’s actions, and after a lengthy hearing in January and February 2002 the judgment was delivered on 15 March 2002.

e

BACKGROUND

[2] For this section of my judgment I am indebted to the judgment of the trial judge. The claimant was born on 24 July 1963, and on 9 September 1980, when riding a motorcycle to his work as an engineering apprentice, he collided with a milk float driven by Mr Jewell, an employee of Home Counties Dairies. The claimant sustained very severe injuries, including a serious head injury. He was in hospital for over three months and when he returned to work in June 1981 he was only able to perform routine clerical work, which he continued to perform until March 1989 when he resigned. He has barely worked since that date.

- f
- g [3] The claimant’s parents consulted a solicitor, Mr Wilks of Brutton & Co, soon after the accident, and on 24 December 1980 proceedings were commenced against Mr Jewell and Home Counties Dairies. It took some time to gather together the medical reports and the information in relation to financial loss, so the statement of claim was not served until 7 September 1985. The defence denied liability and alleged contributory negligence which counsel for the claimant had advised could be assessed as high as 50%. In October 1985 there was a payment into court, which was not accepted, but on 11 September 1987 the payment into court was increased to £70,000. Two days previously the claimant, his father and his solicitor had attended a lengthy conference with his counsel in London. At that time counsel had valued the claim at £117,000 on full liability, and recommended serious consideration of any payment into court representing half of that sum.
- h
- j

[4] Nevertheless the claimant was not happy with the offer of £70,000, and on 13 September 1987 he wrote to Mr Wilks. As the judge said, the letter asked three relevant and sensible questions as to the effect of delaying an acceptance. The claimant’s father said in evidence that the letter, although physically written by the claimant, was largely dictated to him by his father, and that seems to be borne out by the entry for that day in the claimant's diary, but the entry also says that he and his father 'discussed all the possibilities of my court case' including 'accepting their present offer or waiting a while'.

[5] On 15 September 1987 there was a conference at the offices of Brutton & Co in Fareham attended by Mr Wilks, the claimant, both his parents, and Mr Boot, a financial director of the claimant's father's company and a family confidante. The payment into court was fully discussed. The attendance note of the solicitor records that the claimant, with the advice of his parents, instructed the solicitor to tell the other side that if a further £10,000 was paid into court the claimant would accept it. Mr Wilks did as instructed. The defendants' solicitors took instructions from their clients, and were authorised to pay a further £6000 provided there was acceptance within 24 hours. The claimant's father was telephoned and was, it seems, delighted. The claimant was markedly less enthusiastic but after considering the offer overnight he agreed to accept it, and the action was therefore settled for £76,000 and costs.

[6] For a time the claimant remained at home but in 1992, three years after he had given up work, he used £55,000 of his capital to buy a house. There he lives alone relying for income on state benefits. It was common ground before the judge that because of his physical and mental disabilities he is very unlikely ever to be able to obtain worthwhile remunerative employment.

[7] In late 1993 the claimant, having been told by Brutton & Co that his claim could not be reopened, consulted his brother-in-law Mr Knowles, who is a solicitor, and on 17 December 1993 a writ was issued against Brutton & Co for damages for negligence and/or breach of contract in relation to their conduct of his litigation. The statement of claim was not served until 21 May 1996, and not surprisingly the defence which was served on 6 February 1997 asserts that the claim is statute-barred.

[8] In June 1997 the claimant was examined by Dr Martyn Rose, a consultant in neuro-psychiatric rehabilitation. His view was and is that ever since the time of his admission the claimant has been a 'patient', within the meaning of s 94(2) of the Mental Health Act 1983, that is to say a person who 'is incapable, by reason of mental disorder, of managing and administering his property and affairs'. The claimant then sought to reopen the settlement of his claim in the original proceedings on the basis that it has never received the approval of the court, as then required by RSC Ord 80, r 10 (now CPR 21.10). Thus in March 2000 Master Murray ordered the trial of the same preliminary issue in relation to both actions.

RSC ORD 80

[9] The present CPR did not become effective until April 1999, so in this case we are primarily concerned with the previous provisions relating to litigants under a disability which were to be found in RSC Ord 80. Within that Order, r 1 read:

'In this Order—

"the Act" means the Mental Health Act 1983;

"patient" means a person who, by reason of mental disorder within the meaning of the Act, is incapable of managing and administering his property and affairs;

"person under disability" means a person who is an infant or a patient.'

a Before I look more closely at that definition of a patient it is worth noting some of the consequences of being a patient. Rule 2(1) provides: 'A person under disability may not bring, or make a claim in, any proceedings except by his next friend'. Rule 2(3) provides: 'A next friend or guardian ad litem of a person under disability must act by a solicitor'. Rule 10 provides:

b 'Where in any proceedings money is claimed by or on behalf of a person under disability, no settlement, compromise or payment and no acceptance of money paid into court, whenever entered into or made, shall so far as it relates to that person's claim be valid without the approval of the Court.'

The claimant was an infant when he began his action against Mr Jewell and Home Counties Dairies in December 1980. That disability was recognised and c his father agreed to act and did act as next friend, so the proceedings were properly instituted. On 24 July 1981 the claimant reached the age of 18, and on 17 August 1981 he served notice of adoption in relation to his action. At that stage it had not occurred to anyone that the claimant might still be under a disability because he might be a patient for the purposes of RSC Ord 80, r 1. At no time d prior to 1987 did any doctor raise that possibility, although Professor McLellan now says that it was implicit in his reports of October 1984 and September 1997. The claimant's solicitor, Mr Wilks, was an experienced personal injuries lawyer, and the possibility did not occur to him; nor did it occur to Mr Walker, the experienced personal injuries counsel who was instructed, and Mr Langstaff QC, who has appeared for the claimant before us, has made it clear that the lawyers e originally instructed are not now being criticised for failing to recognise that the claimant might be a patient. Nonetheless, Mr Langstaff contends, as it was contended by Mrs Cox QC, as she then was, in the court below that at all times from the accident onwards the claimant was a patient who could only litigate or continue to litigate by his next friend, and who could only settle a claim with the f approval of the court.

What does the definition mean?

[10] Mental disorder is defined in s 1(2) of the 1983 Act, and it seems to be common ground that if at any material time the claimant was incapable of managing and administering his property and affairs that was by reason of mental g disorder within the meaning of the Act. So what is meant by being 'incapable of managing and administering his property and affairs?' The same wording can be found in s 94(2) in Pt VII of the 1983 Act which deals with the powers of the Court of Protection to manage the property and affairs of patients. Section 94(2) provides:

h 'The functions of the judge under this Part of this Act shall be exercisable where, after considering medical evidence, he is satisfied that a person is incapable, by reason of mental disorder, of managing and administering his property and affairs; and a person as to whom the judge is so satisfied is referred to in this Part of this Act as a patient.'

j Although the grounds of appeal begin with the assertion in para 1(a) that the judge erred in law in that he applied the wrong test for capacity, and various criticisms are made of the way in which he formulated the test, it emerged after Mr Langstaff had concluded his submissions as to the law that there is no criticism of the judge's formulation. What is criticised is his application of the law as he found it to be to the evidence in the case. Nevertheless permission to appeal was given by the trial judge because there is an important issue of law involved in relation to which there has been no previous decision of this court, and for that reason we have had the benefit of submissions from Mr Robert Francis QC on behalf of the Official Solicitor, so I do need to look at the legal position with some care. a

Capacity at different times and in different contexts b

[11] Although as I have said, we are primarily concerned with whether or not the claimant was a patient for the purposes of RSC Ord 80, r 1 in September 1987, it is also necessary to consider his capacity at other times and in other contexts since that date.

[12] First, it has to be recognised that someone who is treated as a patient for the purposes of RSC Ord 80, r 1, who litigates by a next friend, is not necessarily and may never become accepted by the Court of Protection as a patient pursuant to s 94(2) of the 1983 Act. As is clear from the wording of s 94(2) the jurisdiction of the Court of Protection is only exercised when, after considering medical evidence, a nominated judge is satisfied as to the person's incapacity. Under Ord 80, r 1 no judicial officer has to consider medical evidence or be satisfied as to incapacity before a person can be treated as a patient. So the judge was in error when he indicated [2002] All ER (D) 247 (Mar) at [29] that where a person was so treated there was a 'consequent involvement of the Court of Protection'. However that error had no effect whatsoever on the judge's conclusions and I need say no more about it. c
d
e

[13] Secondly, the issue of incapacity arises in relation to the claimant's ability to sue his former solicitors during the six years after September 1987, and the relevant provision is to be found in s 28(1) of the Limitation Act 1980 which reads—

'... if on the date when any right of action accrued for which a period of limitation is prescribed by this Act, the person to whom it accrued was under a disability, the action may be brought at any time before the expiration of six years from the date when he ceased to be under a disability or died (whichever first occurred) notwithstanding that the period of limitation has expired.' f
g

Section 38(2) and (3) provide:

'(2) For the purposes of this Act a person shall be treated as under a disability while he is an infant, or of unsound mind.

(3) For the purposes of subsection (2) above a person is of unsound mind if he is a person who, by reason of mental disorder within the meaning of the Mental Health Act 1983, is incapable of managing and administering his property and affairs.' h

Section 38(4) deals with circumstances when a person is to be conclusively presumed to be of unsound mind, generally speaking when detained in hospital. j

[14] Thirdly, the question arises of the claimant's capacity in relation to the commencement and conduct of the two actions which are before us. It is Mr Langstaff's contention that the claimant is a patient as defined by CPR 21.1(2)(b) which provides:

a “patient” means a person who by reason of mental disorder within the meaning of the Mental Health Act 1983 is incapable of managing and administering his own affairs.’

The wording, it will be noted, differs slightly from the wording in RSC Ord 80, r 1, in that the title of the 1983 Act is set out in full, and the words ‘property and affairs’ are replaced by ‘own affairs’. Mr Francis submits that the change may have some significance.

Capacity is important

[15] Quite apart from personal injury litigation it is clear that the issue of capacity is important to the Official Solicitor who, we are told, acts at any one time for about 1700 ‘patients’ in civil and family proceedings. An unknown number of other persons also act as litigation friends. In the Court of Protection 15,000 applications to register enduring powers of attorney are received each year on the ground that the donees have reason to believe that the donors are incapable of managing their property and affairs, and at any given time the Court of Protection has jurisdiction over a large number of estates of patients.

Business affairs, presumptions and the burden of proof

[16] There is no definition in the 1983 Act or in the Rules of the Supreme Court or in the Civil Procedure Rules to assist as to the meaning of ‘incapable of managing and administering his ... affairs’ but in F v West Berkshire Health Authority (Mental Health Act Commission intervening) [1989] 2 All ER 545 at 554, [1990] 2 AC 1 at 59, per Lord Brandon of Oakbrook, it was held that Pt VII of the 1983 Act, which includes s 94(2), does not extend to physical care and/or treatment. It includes ‘only business matters, legal transactions and other dealings of a similar kind’.

[17] It is common ground that all adults must be presumed to be competent to manage their property and affairs until the contrary is proved, and that the burden of proof rests on those asserting incapacity. Mr Langstaff submitted that where, as in the present case, there is evidence that as a result of a head injury sustained in an accident the doctors who have been consulted agree that for a time the claimant was incapable of managing his property and affairs he can rely on the presumption of continuance. That I would not accept. Of course, if there is clear evidence of incapacity for a considerable period then the burden of proof may be more easily discharged, but it remains on whoever asserts incapacity. Furthermore it has to be recognised that when a person is treated as a patient, whether or not as a result of an order of the court, he is thereby deprived of civil rights, in particular his right to sue or defend in his own name, and his right to compromise in litigation without the approval of the court. They are important rights, long cherished by English law and now safeguarded by the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998). In Re Cumming (1852) 1 De GM&G 537, Knight Bruce LJ said at 557:

‘It is the right of an English person to require that the free use of his property, and personal freedom, shall not be taken from him on the ground of alleged lunacy, without being allowed the opportunity of establishing his sanity or denying his insanity before a jury as a contesting party, not merely as a subject of inquiry.’

Neither RSC Ord 80 nor CPR 21.1 seem to meet that requirement, which is underlined by arts 6 and 8 of the convention. In Winterwerp v Netherlands (1979) 2 EHRR 387, [1979] ECHR 6301/73, a Dutch national detained in hospital complained that his detention had divested him of his capacity to administer his property, and thus there had been determination of his civil rights and obligations without the guarantee of a judicial procedure, as laid down in art 6(1) of the convention. That complaint was accepted by the European Court of Human Rights, but neither Ord 80 nor CPR 21.1 contains any requirement for a judicial determination of the question of whether or not capacity exists. Mr Francis submits, and I accept, that this is a matter which should be considered by the Rules Committee, and meanwhile courts should always, as a matter of practice, at the first convenient opportunity, investigate the question of capacity whenever there is any reason to suspect that it may be absent (eg significant head injury) other than in cases where there has already been an order pursuant to s 94(2) of the 1983 Act. That means that, even where the issue does not seem to be contentious, a district judge who is responsible for case management will almost certainly require the assistance of a medical report before being able to be satisfied that incapacity exists. In this respect, an admission said to have been made by a person alleged to lack capacity cannot be regarded as being of great weight because of his or her alleged incapacity. The judge may consider that he would be assisted by seeing the person alleged to lack capacity, a view expressed by Wright J in this case. In my view it would be wrong to attempt to compel that person to attend, but the judge can always make his view clear, and in most cases that indication, together with a reminder as to the burden of proof, should suffice.

If capacity is in issue how should it be decided?

[18] In 1962 Wilberforce J in Re CAF (23 March 1962, unreported), held that, when considering a person's capacity to manage and administer his property and affairs, it is necessary to have regard to the complexity and importance of that person's property and affairs. This has been a matter of some debate in Australia, where there has been a suggestion that the test might be that of ability to deal in a reasonably competent fashion with the ordinary affairs of man, but in White v Fell (12 November 1987, unreported) where the issue of capacity arose in the context of limitation, Boreham J said at page 9–10 of the transcript:

"The expression "incapable of managing her own affairs and property" must be construed in a common sense way as a whole. It does not call for proof of complete incapacity. On the other hand, it is not enough to prove that the plaintiff is now substantially less capable of managing her own affairs and property than she would have been had the accident not occurred. I have no doubt that the plaintiff is quite incapable of managing unaided a large sum of money such as the sort of sum that would be appropriate compensation for her injuries. That, however, is not conclusive. Few people have the capacity to manage all their affairs unaided ... It may be that she would have chosen, and would choose now, not to take advice, but that is not the question. The question is: is she capable of doing so? To have that capacity she requires first the insight and understanding of the fact that she has a problem in respect of which she needs advice ... Secondly, having identified the problem, it will be necessary for her to seek an appropriate adviser and to instruct him with sufficient clarity to enable him to understand the problem and to advise her appropriately ... Finally, she needs

- a sufficient mental capacity to understand and to make decisions based upon, or otherwise give effect to, such advice as she may receive.'

So the whole test was related to the individual plaintiff and her immediate problems. That was the approach adopted by Wright J in the present case, and before us everyone has accepted it to be the right approach. Mr Francis submits that the change in the wording from RSC Ord 80 to CPR 21.1 emphasises the b need to focus on the litigation under consideration rather than the whole of the claimant's business affairs and, although it could be argued that a different approach has to be taken in relation to s 28(1) of the 1980 Act, the words used relate the disability to the specific right of action.

- c [19] An application to the Court of Protection under Pt VII of the 1983 Act is different. There the judge must consider the totality of the property and affairs of the alleged patient, and no doubt if it is shown that he lacks the capacity to manage a significant part of his affairs the court will be prepared to act, exercising control in such a way that the patient continues to have control in relation to matters which he can handle.

- d [20] The decision of Boreham J in White's case ([2002] All ER (D) 247 (Mar)) gives a clear indication of how he thought that capacity should be judged in the context of personal injuries litigation, and Wright J followed the same path. He said (at [29]) that the court should only take over the individual's function of decision-making—

- e '... when it is shown on the balance of probabilities that such person does not have the capacity sufficiently to understand, absorb and retain information (including advice) relevant to the matters in question sufficiently to enable him or her to make decisions based upon such information.'

- f [21] Mr Langstaff does not take issue with that approach, but he submits that, when the decision has to be made in relation to a claimant in existing or contemplated personal injuries litigation, what has to be considered is not only the part which a litigant must play in litigation up to the time when judgment will be delivered, but also his capacity thereafter to manage any proceeds of litigation. In this respect the focus must be on the capacity or ability of the individual and
- g not upon the actual outcome. A litigant who meets the criteria for capacity should still be regarded as a patient even if it can be shown that he has in fact made wise decisions and taken good advice. What he has done is relevant but not determinative in considering whether the criteria are or were satisfied at the relevant time.

- h [22] There is no reported English decision directly concerned with the capacity to litigate and compromise but the courts have considered capacity in other contexts, for example the capacity to make a will (Bankes v Goodfellow [1870] LR 5 QB 549). In the limitation case of Leather v Kirby [1965] 2 All ER 441 at 444, [1965] 2 QB 367 at 384, Lord Denning MR found that the plaintiff had no insight
- j at all into his mental state. 'He was not capable of instructing a solicitor properly. He certainly was not capable of exercising any reasonable judgment on a possible settlement.' Accordingly the action should have been started by a next friend. It was not, but that was put right at the trial when at the suggestion of the judge a next friend was appointed.

[23] In Re Beancy [1978] 2 All ER 595 at 601, [1978] 1 WLR 770 at 774 the court was concerned with the validity of a gift made by a donor suffering from senile dementia, Mr Martin Nourse QC, sitting as deputy judge of the Chancery Division, said: a

'The degree or extent of understanding required in respect of any instrument is relative to the particular transaction which it is to effect. In the case of a will the degree required is always high. In the case of a contract, a deed made for consideration or a gift inter vivos, whether by deed or otherwise, the degree required varies with the circumstances of the transaction. Thus, at one extreme, if the subject-matter and value of a gift are trivial in relation to the donor's other assets a low degree of understanding will suffice. But, at the other, if its effect is to dispose of the donor's only asset of value and thus for practical purposes to pre-empt the devolution of his estate under his will or on his intestacy, then the degree of understanding required is as high as that required for a will, and the donor must understand the claims of all potential donees and the extent of the property to be disposed of.' b

[24] In Re C (adult: refusal of treatment) [1994] 1 All ER 819 at 822, [1994] 1 WLR 290 at 292 a paranoid schizophrenic sought an injunction to prevent the amputation of his infected leg without his written consent, and Thorpe J said: c

'For the patient offered amputation to save life, there are three stages to the decision: (1) to take in and retain treatment information, (2) to believe it and (3) to weigh that information, balancing risks and needs.' d

[25] In the subsequent medical treatment case of Re MB (an adult: medical treatment) [1997] 2 FCR 541 at 553-554, Butler-Sloss LJ said: e

'A person lacks capacity if some impairment or disturbance of mental functioning renders the person unable to make a decision whether to consent to or to refuse treatment. That inability to make a decision will occur when f

(a) The patient is unable to comprehend and retain the information which is material to the decision, especially as to the likely consequences of having or not having the treatment in question.

(b) The patient is unable to use the information and weigh it in the balance as part of the process of arriving at the decision.' g

[26] Mr Langstaff's formulation of that test for present purposes was that there must be: (1) understanding, and (2) retention of matters relevant to the decision, followed by (3) evaluation. Mr Francis submitted that a person's ability to manage his or her property and affairs requires an ability to make and communicate, and where appropriate give effect to, all decisions required in relation to them. So the mental abilities required include the ability to recognise a problem, obtain and receive, understand and retain relevant information, including advice; the ability to weigh the information (including that derived from advice) in the balance in reaching a decision, and the ability to communicate that decision. Mr Francis further submits that the court should have regard to the complexity of decisions under consideration but not to the court's own valuation of the gravity of those decisions because it is not for the court to decide in a non-medical treatment case what is or is not serious in the life of the person before it. To that extent he is critical of the use by Wright J of the word 'sufficiently' at [29] of his judgment and also of the judge's failure specifically to h
j

- a refer to the ability to weigh information in the balance. Whilst I agree with the approach put forward by Mr Francis, I do not accept his criticisms of the trial judge. In my judgment the judge's use of the word 'sufficiently' was appropriate on each occasion, and the concept articulated by the judge of having sufficient information to enable one to make decisions based on that information is simply another way of referring to the ability to weigh information in the balance.
- b [27] What, however, does seem to me to be of some importance is the issue-specific nature of the test; that is to say the requirement to consider the question of capacity in relation to the particular transaction (its nature and complexity) in respect of which the decisions as to capacity fall to be made. It is not difficult to envisage claimants in personal injury actions with capacity to deal with all matters and take all 'lay client' decisions related to their actions up to and
- c including a decision whether or not to settle, but lacking capacity to decide (even with advice) how to administer a large award. In such a case I see no justification for the assertion that the claimant is to be regarded as a patient from the commencement of proceedings. Of course, as Boreham J said in White's case, capacity must be approached in a common sense way, not by reference to each
- d step in the process of litigation, but bearing in mind the basic right of any person to manage his property and affairs for himself, a right with which no lawyer and no court should rush to interfere.

Causation and other matters

- e [28] Where a lack of capacity to manage property and affairs is demonstrated the court will have to determine whether the incapacity is due to mental disorder as defined in the 1983 Act. As indicated in [10], above that is not a problem in this case, and I therefore decline to comment on the way in which mental illness was defined in W v L [1973] 3 All ER 884 at 890, [1974] QB 711 at 719.
- f [29] The conclusion that in law capacity depends on time and context means that inevitably a decision as to capacity in one context does not bind a court which has to consider the same issue in a different context. A person may be a patient for purposes of RSC Ord 80, r 1 or CPR 21.1, but not for the purposes of s 94(2), and any medical witness asked to assist in relation to capacity therefore needs to know the area of the alleged patient's activities in relation to which his advice is sought. The final decision as to capacity, it is agreed, rests with the court but, in
- g almost every case, the court will need medical evidence to guide it.

When should the issue of capacity be raised?

- [30] Normally no problem arises as to when the issue of capacity should be raised. It raises itself. A responsible solicitor acting for a claimant or defendant
- h has doubts about the capacity of his client, and seeks a medical opinion. If the opinion suggests that the client lacks the necessary capacity then the solicitor arranges for the appointment of a litigation friend. Sometimes the doubts may arise in relation to an opponent acting in person, and then it may be appropriate to bring the issue of capacity before the court. Maybe, as suggested by
- j Mr Methuen QC, for Mr Jewell and Home Counties Dairies, it would help if the initiating court forms (N1 and N9) or the personal injuries protocol were to contain some material drawing attention to the issue of capacity, and it certainly seems desirable for some change to be made so that a person cannot, as at present, become a patient for the purposes of CPR 21.1 without knowing what is going on. That could be achieved by requiring that, unless the court otherwise orders, anyone intending to become a litigation friend without a court order served upon the intended patient notice of his intention to act as litigation friend, and a copy of the certificate of suitability, so that the intended patient is then in the same position that he would be in were there to be an application for a litigation friend to be appointed by order of the court (see CPR 21 PD 3.3(2)). But what if, as is said to have been the case here, the claimant did lack capacity but, without any fault on anyone's part, no one recognised that fact? RSC Ord 80 and CPR 21 are worded in such a way as to indicate that in that event the litigation is ineffective and decisions made in the course of litigation are invalid—see, for example, Ord 80, rr 2(1) and 10, CPR 21.2(1) and 21.10(1), but CPR 21.3(4) does suggest a solution. It provides: 'Any step taken before a child or patient has a litigation friend shall be of no effect unless the court otherwise orders.'

[31] So a court can regularise the position retrospectively, and that was also possible under the RSC (see Leather v Kirby [1965] 2 All ER 441, [1965] 2 QB 367). Provided everyone has acted in good faith and there has been no manifest disadvantage to the party subsequently found to have been a patient at the relevant time I cannot envisage any court refusing to regularise the position. To do otherwise would be unjust and contrary to the overriding objective of the CPR, but in any given case the ultimate decision must depend on the particular facts. In the context of litigation rules as to capacity are designed to ensure that claimants and defendants who would otherwise be at a disadvantage are properly protected, and in some cases that parties to litigation are not pestered by other parties who should be to some extent restrained. However, finality in litigation is also important, and the rules as to capacity are not designed to provide a vehicle for reopening litigation which having apparently been properly conducted (whatever the wisdom of the individual decisions in relation to it) has for long been understood to be at an end.

THE FACTS—CRITICISMS

[32] I turn now to what is really at the heart of the claimant's case, namely the way in which the judge applied the law to the evidence. Mr Langstaff, and Miss Hitchcock in reply, make a number of criticisms, which I can summarise as follows: (1) The judge failed to have sufficient regard to and failed to address the agreed consequences of the serious head injury, namely serious memory deficit, dysexecutive syndrome and pain. The medical evidence, it is said, was not properly analysed. (2) The judge failed to focus on the ability of the claimant to make decisions at the relevant time, and instead looked at outcomes, at decisions made with the benefit of close parental support. (3) The judge failed to distinguish between, on the one hand the acknowledged ability of the claimant to deal with lesser problems such as handling relatively small sums of money, and on the other hand his contested ability to make appropriate decisions in relation to, for example, large sums. (4) The judge failed to give sufficient weight not only to the claimant's medical witnesses but also to his lay witnesses, namely his parents, Mr Vetterlein and Mr Chidgey. (5) The judge gave too much weight to the claimant's diaries and too little weight to other evidence indicative of impaired decision-making capacity. In order to evaluate these criticisms it is necessary to look first at what was common ground, the outline history, and the extent to which the experts disagreed before turning to look at the evidence and the judge's evaluation.

Common ground and medical reports

[33] The accident in which the claimant was injured having happened in September 1980 when he was 17 years of age, the claimant returned to work after about nine months. His orthopaedic injuries and his frontal lobe injury meant that it was impossible for him to return to work as an engineering apprentice, but he was given routine clerical work, and his claim for damages for personal injuries against the driver of the milk float and that driver's employers was pursued. That meant that the claimant was in reasonably regular contact with his then solicitor, Mr Wilks, an experienced personal injuries lawyer, and was examined by a number of doctors. With the possible exception of Professor McLellan no one is known to have voiced any misgivings about his capacity to manage his own affairs, including in particular the litigation upon which he was then embarked.

[34] In September 1987 that litigation was brought to an end in circumstances to which I have already referred. The claimant was then working for British Aerospace and living at home. In 1989 he gave up his job and in 1992 he moved to his own house. He then began the present proceedings, and in June 1997 he was examined by Dr Martyn Rose, to whose reports I have already referred (see [8], above). Over the next four-and-a-half years the claimant was examined by a total of six consultants, including Dr Rose. Dr Moffatt, a neurologist, and Dr Powell, a clinical psychologist, were, like Dr Rose, instructed by the claimant's present solicitors. Broadly speaking their expertise was matched by that of Dr Jacobson, a neuro-psychiatrist, Dr Roberts, a neurologist, and Dr Leng, a neuro-psychologist, all of whom were instructed by solicitors acting for the defendants. In preparation for the trial the doctors were paired off by reference to their areas of expertise, and in January 2002 each pair of doctors produced a joint report indicating what could and could not be agreed. The reports indicate a large measure of agreement as to the nature of the head injury and its effects, and I quote short extracts from each joint report:

(1) Dr Rose and Dr Jacobson

'Dr Jacobson considers that the claimant regained capacity because the aggravating effects of depression on cognitive functions lessened as his depression improved. Dr Jacobson notes that the bulk of cognitive recovery after brain injury occurs in the first two years, with small diminishing degrees of further recovery in year three, and the time point of regaining capacity at up to three years is marked by resolution of depression and reaching a plateau of cognitive recovery.

Dr Rose does not accept that the claimant regained capacity. Neither does he believe that before 1984 capacity was caused by fluctuating moods. He believes that Mr Masterman-Lister's cognitive abilities will always have been significantly effected to the point of rendering him a patient within the meaning of the 1983 Mental Health Act, and that the fluctuating mood will have simply added to the level of incapacity.'

The report then goes on to deal with the significance of the claimant's diaries and other evidence in relation to the claimant's life since 1980, about which the doctors were not agreed.

(2) Dr Moffatt and Dr Roberts

They agreed that:

'He sustained a severe brain injury in a road accident on 9 September 1980 due to concussion and anoxic brain damage or both. He has been left with little in the way of physical disabilities or impairment of his general intellectual functions as a result, but has remained with an unreliable memory, his abilities to organise his life and affairs are affected, and his personality changed.

The tests carried out earlier after the head injury and more recently by four neuro-psychologists have all confirmed a memory impairment without evidence of general intellectual deterioration. All three neuro-psychologists who have tested him recently have found some impairment of functions generally accepted to be subserved by the frontal lobes of the brain.'

They disagreed 'about the extent to which the brain injury has affected his ability to manage his affairs since the accident.' Again there was consideration of the diaries, and the evidence from other sources.

(3) Dr Leng and Dr Powell

After expressing similar views as to the head injury and its effects their joint report states:

'We agree that his neuro-psychological test performance is not so bad that the results speak for themselves and utterly rule out his having capacity.

Conversely his neuro-psychological test performance is not so preserved that it can be taken for granted that he has capacity.

Rather, the neuro-psychological test results should be seen as one strand of evidence, certainly raising the issue of capacity but needing to be considered in conjunction with all other sources of evidence.

In other words, at this level of deficit of test performance, some patients will have capacity, and some will not, depending on the entirety of evidence and on the precise circumstances.

We fully understand that ultimately it is a decision for the court as to whether he is capable of managing his own affairs, but we have formed our own view of all the material and Dr Leng leans to the view that he does have capacity and Dr Powell leans to the view that he does not.

In brief, Dr Leng feels that the diary entries and letters seem to demonstrate sufficient capacity to manage his own affairs, and that there is no reason to suppose that he was not also so capable at the time of accepting the offer of settlement (i.e. by the time the settlement was accepted his recovery had long since plateaued). On the other hand, Dr Powell feels that the diaries were not compiled with the intent of collecting evidence on capacity, but even so, the diaries and letters do yield evidence of rigidity of thinking, poor judgment, immaturity, cognitive deficit and vulnerability, which when taken in conjunction with the deficit of mind evident on tests, indicates that he needs the Court of Protection to safeguard his interests.'

[35] The last joint report, in particular, highlights the point that in this case the medical evidence on testing does not speak for itself. Test results are one strand of evidence, to be considered by the court with all other sources, and as to the conclusion which should be reached it is clear that the experienced consultants were not agreed. They were all called to give evidence at the trial, and it can be a seen from the transcripts of evidence that their positions remained very much as they had been before the trial began.

The medical evidence at trial

b [36] Mr Langstaff drew our attention to passages in the transcripts of the evidence of Dr Powell and Dr Moffatt which emphasised the importance of the memory deficit and its impact upon the decision-making process. He pointed out, rightly, that Dr Roberts accepts that as a result of his head injury the claimant is vulnerable. He said so in his letter of 14 March 2001. Dr Roberts would like to see the claimant 'contributing to a discussion of his financial needs with other trustees, who will not allow him to have full control'. But it is important to see how that letter goes on. Dr Roberts continued:

c 'It is not my view that this makes him incapable of understanding and managing his life otherwise without supervision. The question is clearly one of degree, which is not appropriately assessed by judging everyone with some impairment of frontal lobe function as incapable of managing their affairs.'

d [37] Dr Powell in his report of 5 June 2001 said that the claimant:

e 'Needs supervision in managing any large sum of money. Therefore, by definition, he was incapable of deciding for himself whether the offer he was made in settlement of his claim was fair or not.'

f That, as Mr Langstaff concedes, is a total non-sequitur.

g [38] Mr Langstaff submitted that Dr Roberts' conclusion that for many years the claimant has not been a patient within the meaning of RSC Ord 80, r 1 is attributable to the doctor's rejection of the paternalism of the Court of Protection, and he further submitted that Dr Leng and Dr Jacobson relied not on clinical examination or medical assessment of injury, but rather on their view of the diaries even though Dr Leng described the entries as shallow, repetitive, banal and immature. Mr Langstaff submitted that at the end of the day the judge had a lot of evidence of incapacity coming not only from the doctors but also from the claimant's parents and friends, which was met only by reference to the diaries. I am afraid that I regard that as a misrepresentation of the position. Each of the doctors was plainly attempting to assist the court by evaluating the position overall, recognising that at the end of the day it was for the judge, in the light of the all of the evidence, to reach a conclusion. This was not a case where there was a strong case for the claimant which called for an answer. It was, on the contrary, a case where capacity had to be assessed in relation to a spectrum, and that is neatly illustrated by one answer given by Dr Moffatt when asked about the distinction between his evidence and that of Dr Roberts. He said:

h 'I suppose really at the end of the day the distinction is ... Dr Roberts seems to suggest that a form of benign paternalism is easily sufficient to support this man and ... I would plump for the more Draconian approach.'

Non-medical evidence at trial

j [39] The claimant did not give evidence but his parents did, and so did two of his friends, Mr Vetterlein and Mr Chidgey. The court also heard from Professor McLellan and Mr Wilks. Mr Langstaff invited our attention to the evidence of Mr Vetterlein where he describes the claimant as being unable to weigh up the pros and cons. He said of the plaintiff 'you can almost see the cogs not meshing' and he spoke of the claimant's failure to make progress with applications for benefits. Similarly, Mr Chidgey said that the claimant is 'not able to cope with complex situations or things were there is more than one element ... he also has a tendency to see what he can see very much in black and white.' Mr Langstaff submitted that the evidence of Mr Vetterlein and Mr Chidgey and the other lay evidence was important evidence which the judge failed sufficiently to analyse. a [40] In addition to the oral evidence the judge had before him a mass of documentary evidence, including in particular the claimant's diaries kept throughout the relevant period, and his letters. From those sources Mr Langstaff drew our attention to seven entries which, he submitted, demonstrated the claimant's lack of capacity in relation to matters of substance: b

(1) On 1 November 1987, soon after his claim was settled, the claimant wrote in his diary that he would give every single penny he had away to be able to go out with a girl with whom he was then infatuated. c

(2) On 29 December 1987 the claimant took a different girl to a shop and bought her a music centre. We were told that it cost £336.70. d

(3) On 25 April 1989 the claimant recorded receiving a very troubling letter from the Vegan Society which was in financial difficulty. He went to the building society where his money was invested, and drew £500, £125 for a life membership and £375 as a donation.

(4) On 25 September 1990 the claimant was interviewed at Lymington Police Station after taking part in an anti-hunt demonstration during the course of which a van had been burnt. Part of the police record of the interview reads: e

"He tried to explain that the two girls had nothing to do with the arson but were unfortunate in that they happened to be with him. He offered to pay all of any subsequent claim for compensation." f

It was submitted to us that his offer was indicative of financial irresponsibility. It could, of course, have been a very sensible and responsible attempt to avert a prosecution.

(5) In a letter to a friend written in July 1994 the claimant explained how he had caused trouble at a site office of some builders. The police had to be called and the claimant told the duty sergeant that his brother-in-law was a London solicitor and that he had numerous dealing[s] with legal matters before. Whatever view one takes of the conduct as recorded it is difficult to see how it can be said to demonstrate any lack of capacity. g

(6) In another letter written in December 1994 the claimant describes breaking the release valve of a pressure cooker, and going to buy a replacement. He lost it on the way home and got another one next day. He then found the one that he had lost, and found a spare one at home. h

(7) On 28 April 1996 in another letter the claimant records being criticised by a girl friend because he had overstocked his freezer with some items (i.e. vol-au-vent cases and vegan sausages). Plainly he was not keeping proper control of the contents of his freezer, as he acknowledged. j

[41] Mr Langstaff also reminded us that after leaving British Aerospace the claimant was at times unrealistic when seeking employment, regarding himself, for example, as capable of using ladders.

The judge's approach

- a [42] Having dealt with matters of law the judge turned to the evidence, and he began with the medical evidence, pointing out what was agreed. There was, as the judge recorded ([2002] All ER (D) 247 (Mar) at [32]), a 'significant impairment of executive function ... compounded by a very serious deficit of memory'. To some extent the claimant could compensate for his defective memory by using
- b his diary and keeping lists, but the judge went on to point out:

'The dysexecutive syndrome itself involves changes in personality such as obsessiveness, immaturity, rigidity of thinking, eccentricity and emotional outbursts. The effect of this syndrome is to impair his ability to organise his life and to plan many of his everyday functions. On the other hand, it is again

c accepted on all sides that the nature of the damage to Martin's brain is such that his pre-accident level of intelligence is very largely preserved. It is further agreed that Martin's condition has remained essentially unchanged since about 1983.'

- [43] The judge then listed (at [33]) ten factors identified by Dr Powell and
- d Dr Rose as indicative of lack of capacity. I need not recite the list. That paragraph ends:

'Dr Powell adds that when these deficits are coupled with self centred thinking and a rigidity of approach his relationships with other people and with the problems of life "don't mesh". I have to observe, however, that not e all these matters will engage, even indirectly, with business and similar matters.'

[44] The failure to 'mesh' was of course the point made by Mr Vetterlein, whose evidence together with that of Mr Chidgey illustrated those effects of the dysexecutive syndrome which the judge recognised to be agreed.

- f [45] The judge then considered the equivocal test performances, and Dr Powell's acceptance that the claimant was very much a borderline case. Dr Rose was more emphatic, but the judge found that to be attributable to his approach to the concept of protection, the purpose of which he regarded as being to protect individuals from making foolish mistakes. That was borne out by a
- g passage from the evidence of Dr Rose to which our attention was invited. The judge also noted that Dr Rose did not take into account when assessing capacity the availability of advice, although he did consider whether the claimant understood the need to obtain advice. The judge (at [35]) then made reference to the evidence of Dr Jacobson, Dr Moffatt and Dr Roberts, who all believed that the claimant's brain injuries 'may have contributed to his obsessive and rigid
- h behaviour, but have not determined his interests'. Dr Rose did not agree. He considered that the claimant's eccentricities are the direct result of the brain injuries. The judge then compared the experience of the medical witnesses in relation to that issue, and for that reason preferred the view of the majority.

- i [46] The judge then went on to look at Dr Roberts' suggestion that when dealing with a large sum the claimant would benefit from reliable trustees and found, for the reasons which he gave (at [36]), that Dr Roberts 'was thinking in terms of wisdom and not understanding' so the evidence of Dr Roberts did not assist the claimant's case.

[47] The judge (at [37]) then looked at the differing ways in which the doctors looked at the diaries, and concluded thus:

'Having spent many days reviewing the diaries and the letters I am satisfied that this material taken in conjunction with the other evidence as to how Martin has functioned over the past twenty years is of very considerable assistance to me in reviewing the opinions expressed by the doctors and in assessing to what extent their differing views have been justified in practice.'

After that the judge looked at the medical evidence obtained in relation to the original action, and the evidence of Professor McLellan, before turning to look at non-medical evidence.

[48] Mr and Mrs Lister the judge found to be 'enormously protective' of the claimant and that led them both, to some degree at least, to exaggerate his difficulties. The judge gave an example of exaggeration which I need not repeat, and went on to outline the nature of the parents' concerns, including those related to veganism and animal rights. Before us there is no criticism of that review. The judge's reference to the evidence of Mr Vetterlein and Mr Chidgey does not include those passages in their evidence to which I have referred earlier in this judgment, but, as I have indicated, the judge was alive to the points illustrated by their evidence because he referred to them when dealing with the medical evidence.

[49] The judge then considered the evidence of Mr Wilks, including his evidence that the claimant spent one-and-a-half hours providing a witness statement, and the fact that the claimant was to be called as a witness if his claim had not been settled. Mr Wilks dealt in detail with his contact with his client, and with the way in which the settlement was arrived at. Notably the claimant's father is recorded (at [58]) as accepting that had he not been available—

'... Martin would very probably have accepted the offer of investment advice that Mr. Wilks had made to him, and failing him, would probably have consulted his bank manager.'

The judge examined the evidence as to how the claimant managed his bank account, and his credit card, and noted no change for the worse when the claimant left home and moved into his own house.

[50] The judge also noted that on a number of occasions from 1983 onwards the claimant was involved in civil litigation, often with the assistance of his solicitor brother-in-law Mr Knowles without there being any suggestion of lack of capacity. In 1992 when buying his house the claimant arranged his own bridging loan.

[51] As to the £500 to the Vegan Society on which Mr Langstaff still relies, the judge pointed out that the society is a consuming passion of the claimant and added: 'I cannot see that such an act of generosity could be possibly be interpreted as irrational, or in any way supporting a suggestion that he was unfit to manage his affairs.' The claimant has more than once been on the council of the society.

[52] The judge gave an example of the claimant acting responsibly to protect young girls, and in the final section of his judgment reviewed the claimant's letters, including a most impressive letter to his nephew which, as the judge said, was a letter that any adult could be proud of writing. Miss Hitchcock invited our attention to other letters. I have read those, but the point made by the judge is a valid one. Any adult might also be proud of the claimant's achievement with the Samaritans.

[53] The judge said (at [74])—

a '... the evidence of the last 20 years enables me to arrive with confidence at certain conclusions. So far as the ordinary incidents of life are concerned such as feeding and caring for himself and the ordinary incidents of day to day living, Martin is perfectly capable of looking after himself with a minimum of outside assistance. When greater problems present themselves b he is able to recognise that such problems exist, and his reasoning faculties enable him to deal with a good many of them himself. Where more formidable problems arise he recognises that they exist, is able to recognise that he needs external advice to deal with them and is able to go to appropriate sources for such advice—generally his mother and father, but his sources are by no means limited to them ... while the mental disorders c identified by the various medical experts in the present proceedings are of such a nature that, if present to a sufficiently severe degree, are undoubtedly capable of rendering a sufferer incapable of managing his property and affairs, the conclusion that I have come to on all the evidence before me is that the degree and extent to which Martin suffers from such disabilities falls far short of that standard.'

d MY CONCLUSION

[54] I have gone through the judgment at some length in order to demonstrate that there is no substance in the criticisms that are now being made. As Mr de Wilde QC for Brutton & Co pointed out, there were other achievements of the claimant to which the judge did not refer (ie learning to drive, learning to e type and obtaining two passes at O-Level). But the judge did spell out and give proper weight to the medical evidence as to the effects of the head injury. He was fully alive to the fact that what he was investigating was capacity not outcomes, although of course outcomes can often cast a flood of light on capacity, as they did in this case. The judge was also alive to the distinction between management f of day-to-day affairs and the management of more serious problems. That very distinction is highlighted in the part of para [74] of the judgment which is quoted above. In the judgment every witness, medical and lay, was considered. Of course not everything they said was recited, but no significant point seems to have been overlooked, and for the reasons which he gave the judge was fully entitled to evaluate the contemporaneous evidence from the diaries and the g letters as he did. Indeed there is so little in the seven points identified by Mr Langstaff that the selection in no way undermines the judge's approach. In the course of his judgment the judge dealt with fiscal control, including the odd items of relatively large expenditure. The loss of a pressure cooker valve and the overstocking of a freezer may well be examples of the claimant's problem with h his memory, but they are also examples of mishaps which can occur to those who do not have his handicaps. Certainly neither they nor the unrealistic job application can be regarded as matters casting doubt upon the judge's conclusion that since 1983 at the latest the claimant has been fully capable of managing and administering his property and affairs. That, as it seems to me, is a sufficient j answer to the preliminary issue, and I would therefore dismiss this appeal.

POTTER LJ.

[55] I agree. Having seen in draft the judgment of Chadwick LJ, I am also indebted to, and agree with, his exegesis of the position under RSC Ord 80, as now embodied in CPR 21, against the background of the general law in relation to mental capacity.

CHADWICK LJ.

[56] I agree that these appeals must be dismissed for the reasons set out by Kennedy LJ. But the issues raised are of general importance—as well as being of great importance to the claimant and his parents—and I have thought it appropriate to add some observations of my own.

[57] English law requires that a person must have the necessary mental capacity if he is to do a legally effective act or make a legally effective decision for himself. Illustrations of the requirement are found in relation to the making of testamentary dispositions (Harwood v Baker (1840) 3 Moo PCC 282, Banks v Goodfellow LR 5 QB 549, [1861–73] All ER Rep 47), the execution of voluntary deeds (Ball v Mannin (1829) 3 Bli NS 1, 6 ER 569, Re Beane [1978] 2 All ER 595, [1978] 1 WLR 770), the entry into marriage (Durham v Durham (1885) 10 PD 80, Re Park's Estate [1953] 2 All ER 408, [1954] P 89), the consent to a decree of divorce (Mason v Mason [1972] 3 All ER 315, [1972] 3 WLR 405) and the consent to or refusal of medical treatment (Re C (adult: refusal of treatment) [1994] 1 All ER 819, [1994] 1 WLR 290, Re MB (an adult: medical treatment) [1997] 2 FCR 541, [1997] Fam Law 542). In such cases, the disposition or consent, if made or given without the necessary mental capacity, is void and of no effect. The position is otherwise in the case of a bargain made for consideration. There the rule is that a contract made by a person without the necessary mental capacity is voidable against the other party; but only if it is shown that the other party knew of the lack of capacity—see Molton v Camroux (1848) 2 Exch 487, (1849) 4 Exch 17, Imperial Loan Co v Stone [1892] 1 QB 599, Hart v O'Connor [1985] 2 All ER 880, [1985] AC 1000.

[58] The authorities are unanimous in support of two broad propositions. First, that the mental capacity required by the law is capacity in relation to the transaction which is to be effected. Second, that what is required is the capacity to understand the nature of that transaction when it is explained. Those two propositions find expression in the passage from the judgment of Mr Martin Nourse QC in Re Beane [1978] 2 All ER 595 at 601, [1978] 1 WLR 770 at 774 to which Kennedy LJ has referred. But they can be traced from much earlier authority. In Ball v Mannin (1829) 3 Bli NS 1 at 12 and 22, 6 ER 569, the House of Lords upheld a direction to the jury that what was required was that a person should be (at 21) 'capable of understanding what he did by executing the deed in question when its general import was fully explained to him'. In Harwood v Baker (1840) 3 Moo PCC 282 at 290, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council explained that—

'... in order to constitute a sound disposing mind, a Testator must not only be able to understand that he is by his Will giving the whole of his property to one object of his regard; but that he must also have capacity to comprehend the extent of his property, and the nature of the claims of others, whom, by his Will, he is excluding from all participation in that property ...'

In Manches v Trimborn (1946) 115 LJKB 305, Hallett J pointed out that the answer to the question whether the mental capacity necessary to render the consent of the party concerned a real consent was present in any particular case would depend on the nature of the transaction. The cases were reviewed by the High Court of Australia in Gibbons v Wright (1954) 91 CLR 423. Sir Owen Dixon CJ, in a passage at 438, to which Mr Nourse QC referred in Re Beane ([1978] 2 All ER 595 at 601, [1978] 1 WLR 770 at 774), stated the principle in these terms—

a '... the mental capacity required by the law in respect of any instrument is relative to the particular transaction which is being effected by means of the instrument, and may be described as the capacity to understand the nature of that transaction when it is explained.'

The same test was applied by this court in Re Park's Estate [1953] 2 All ER 1411 at 1430, [1954] P 112 at 127. Singleton LJ said:

b 'Was the deceased on the morning of May 30, 1949, capable of understanding the nature of the contract into which he was entering, or was his mental condition such that he was incapable of understanding it? In order to ascertain the nature of the contract of marriage a man must be mentally capable of appreciating that it involves the responsibilities normally attaching to marriage. Without that degree of mentality, it cannot be said that he understands the nature of the contract.'

[59] In Re K, Re F [1988] 1 All ER 358 at 361, [1988] Ch 310 at 313, Hoffmann J treated as 'well established' the proposition that—

d '... capacity to perform a juristic act exists when the person who purported to do the act had at the time the mental capacity, with the assistance of such explanation as he may have been given, to understand the nature and effect of that particular transaction'.

e He cited Re Beaney [1978] 2 All ER 595, [1978] 1 WLR 770 as authority. That passage was approved by this court in Re W (Enduring Power of Attorney) [2001] 4 All ER 88, [2001] Ch 609.

f [60] The broad propositions are not in doubt. The question of difficulty in any particular case is likely to be whether the party does have the mental capacity, with the assistance of such explanation as he may be given, to understand the nature and effect of the particular transaction. In Re C (adult: refusal of treatment) [1994] 1 All ER 819, [1994] 1 WLR 290, Thorpe J rejected what had been described as 'the minimal competence test'—the capacity to understand in broad terms the nature and effect of the proposed treatment—in favour of a more specific test. As he put it ([1994] 1 All ER 819 at 824, [1994] 1 WLR 290 at 295):

g '... the question to be decided is whether it has been established that C's capacity is so reduced by his chronic mental illness that he does not sufficiently understand the nature, purpose and effects of the proffered amputation.'

h [61] Hoffmann J addressed the same point in Re K, Re F [1988] 1 All ER 358, [1988] Ch 310. He allowed an appeal against the decision of the Master of the Court of Protection refusing registration to an enduring power of attorney on the ground that the donor, although capable of understanding the nature of the power, was herself incapable by reason of mental disorder of managing her property and affairs at the time that she executed the power. He held ([1988] 1 All ER 358 at 362, [1988] Ch 310 at 315) that—

j '... there is no logical reason why, though unable to exercise her powers, [the donor] could not confer them on someone else by an appropriate juristic act. The validity of that act depends on whether she understood its nature and effect, and not on whether she would hypothetically have been able to perform all the acts which it authorised.'

But he went on to consider what was meant by understanding the nature and effect of the power. He said ([1988] 1 All ER 358 at 363, [1988] Ch 310 at 316):

‘... I do not think that it would be sufficient if he realised only that it gave cousin William power to look after his property. Counsel as amicus curiae helpfully summarised the matters which the donor should have understood in order that he can be said to have understood the nature and effect of the power: first, if such be the terms of the power, that the attorney will be able to assume complete authority over the donor’s affairs; second, if such be the terms of the power, that the attorney will in general be able to do anything with the donor’s property which the donor could have done; third, that the authority will continue if the donor should be or become mentally incapable; fourth, that if he should be or become mentally incapable, the power will be irrevocable without confirmation by the court. I do not wish to prescribe another form of words in competition with the explanatory notes prescribed by the Lord Chancellor, but I accept the summary of counsel as amicus curiae as a statement of the matters which should ordinarily be explained to the donor whatever the precise language which may be used and which the evidence should show he has understood.’

[62] The authorities to which I have referred provide ample support for the proposition that, at common law at least, the test of mental capacity is issue specific: that, as Kennedy LJ has pointed out, the test has to be applied in relation to the particular transaction (its nature and complexity) in respect of which the question whether a party has capacity falls to be decided. It is difficult to see why, in the absence of some statutory or regulatory provision which compels a contrary conclusion, the same approach should not be adopted in relation to the pursuit or defence of litigation.

[63] Litigation is conducted in accordance with rules of court. It is no surprise, therefore, that the Rules of the Supreme Court (RSC) have made provision, since first promulgated in the First Schedule to the Supreme Court of Judicature Act 1875, for the conduct of actions by and against persons of unsound mind. Order XVIII of those rules provided that, in all cases where persons of unsound mind not so found by inquisition might have sued or been sued before the Supreme Court of Judicature Act 1873, they might sue in any action by their next friend ‘in manner practised in the Court of Chancery’ before the 1873 Act and might defend any action by their guardian ad litem. The practice in the Court of Chancery before 1873 was explained in the judgment of James LJ in Beall v Smith (1873) 9 Ch App 85 at 91–92:

‘The law of the Court of Chancery undoubtedly is that in certain cases where there is a person of unsound mind, not so found by inquisition, and therefore incapable of invoking the protection of the Court, that protection may in proper cases, and if and so far as may be necessary and proper, be invoked on his behalf by any person as his next friend ... It is not by reason of the incompetency, but notwithstanding the incompetency, that the Court of Chancery entertains the proceedings.’

[64] The RSC were made under the power conferred by s 99(1) of the Judicature Act 1925 (now found in s 84(1) and (2) of the Supreme Court Act 1981). The power is to regulate and prescribe practice and procedure. There is no reason to think that the rule-making body intended—or had power—to alter the substantive law as to the test of mental capacity applicable in relation to the a pursuit or defence of legal proceedings; and, as I have said, no reason to think that that test was not the issue-specific test long recognised by the common law.

[65] RSC Ord 80, r 2(1) provided that a person under disability might not bring proceedings except by his next friend and might not defend proceedings except by his guardian ad litem. Subject to anything to be inferred from the use of the defined phrase 'person under disability', there is nothing in that sub-rule which
b alters the general law. The pursuit and defence of legal proceedings are juristic acts which can only be done by persons having the necessary mental capacity; and the court is concerned not only to protect its own process but to provide protection to both parties to litigation which comes before it. A defendant is entitled to expect that he will not be required to defend proceedings brought c against him by a person of unsound mind acting without a next friend. Order 80, r 2(2) was facilitative: it provided that anything which in the ordinary conduct of the proceedings is required or authorised to be done by a party to proceedings shall or may, if the party is a person under a disability, be done by his next friend or guardian ad litem.

[66] RSC Ord 80, r 3(2) provided that (save in particular cases) an order
d appointing a person as next friend or guardian ad litem was not necessary. That, as it seems to me, is of some significance. The rule-making body plainly contemplated, and intended, that the question whether a party was required to act through a next friend or guardian ad litem (as the case might be) should, in the ordinary case, be determined by the party himself or by those caring for him; perhaps with the advice of a solicitor but without the need for inquiry by the e court. Order 80, r 2(3) required that a next friend or guardian ad litem must act by a solicitor; and r 3(8)(i) required that, in such a case, the solicitor was to file a certificate certifying that he believed the party to be a patient, with his grounds of belief. But there was no requirement, as such, in the rules for the filing or consideration of medical evidence. If the rule were to work in practice, the test f of mental capacity should be such that, in the ordinary case, the need for a next friend or guardian ad litem should be readily recognised by an experienced solicitor.

[67] RSC Ord 80, r 10(1) provided that, where in any proceedings money was claimed by a person under disability, no settlement or compromise of the claim should be valid without the approval of the court. That requirement supplements
g the general law as to bargains with persons of unsound mind—as explained in Imperial Loan Co v Stone [1892] 1 QB 599 and Hart v O'Connor [1985] 2 All ER 880, [1985] AC 1000. Absent that rule, a defendant sued by a person whom he knew to be of unsound mind—because, for example, the claimant was an adult acting by a next friend—could not safely compromise the claim by a payment. There h was a risk that the compromise would be set aside. In that context, the rule may be seen as facilitative; it enables a binding compromise to be made. It is also, when read in conjunction with Ord 80, r 12, protective of the claimant's interests—in that the court is concerned both to approve the compromise and to give directions as to how the money paid under the compromise shall be dealt j with.

[68] RSC Ord 80, rr 10 and 12 must be read in the context of r 2. The hypothesis underlying rr 10 and 12, as it seems to me, is that the claimant who is under a disability will bring his claim by a next friend, as r 2 requires; so that the defendant, and the court, will be on notice that rr 10 and 12 are engaged. To my mind it is not self-evident that rr 10 and 12 have any application where the claimant brings a claim in contravention of r 2—so that, in the eyes of the defendant and the court, he is asserting that he is not under a disability. If rr 10 and 12 were intended to apply in such a case (which I doubt) then it would be open to question whether the rule making body had power to change the substantive law expounded in Imperial Loan Co v Stone and Hart v O'Connor. The question does not arise on this appeal; and will not arise in these proceedings if (as I would hold) the appeal should be dismissed. It is unnecessary to decide it. But it may well be that an important assumption which underlies the present appeal—that, if the claimant were under disability in September 1987, the compromise into which he entered must be set aside—would prove, on examination, to be ill-founded.

[69] As I have said, subject to anything to be inferred from the use of the defined phrase 'person under disability', there is nothing in RSC Ord 80 which purports to alter the substantive law as to the test of mental capacity applicable in relation to the pursuit or defence of legal proceedings; and no reason to think that the rule making body intended—or had power—to make such an alteration. 'Person under disability' is defined to mean 'a person who is an infant or a patient': and 'patient' means 'a person who, by reason of mental disorder within the meaning of the [Mental Health Act 1983], is incapable of managing and administering his property and affairs.' It is plain that the lack of capacity which brings a person within the definition of 'patient' for the purposes of the rules must be attributable to mental disorder as defined by the Act; but it is necessary to consider what, if any, further relevance the 1983 Act may have in relation to the test of mental capacity applicable to the pursuit or defence of legal proceedings.

[70] The jurisdiction formerly exercised by the Crown as parens patriae in relation to persons who, by reason of unsound mind, were unable to manage their property or affairs ceased to be exercisable on the coming into force, on 1 November 1960, of the Mental Health Act 1959 and the revocation of the last warrant by which that jurisdiction had been assigned to the Lord Chancellor and the judges of the Chancery Division—see the observations of Lord Brandon of Oakbrook in F v West Berkshire Health Authority (Mental Health Act Commission intervening) [1989] 2 All ER 545 at 552–553, [1990] 2 AC 1 at 57–58. Since 1960 the position has been governed by the provisions of the 1959 Act (subsequently repealed and replaced by the 1983 Act) and the common law—[1989] 2 All ER 545 at 553, [1990] 2 AC 1 at 58.

[71] At the time when the RSC were made s 103(1)(h) of the 1959 Act (now s 96(1)(i) of the 1983 Act) conferred power on the judges nominated for the purposes of Pt VIII of that Act (now Pt VII of the 1983 Act), and on the Master, Deputy Master and nominated officers of the Court of Protection, to give directions for the conduct of legal proceedings in the name of a patient or on his behalf. In that context 'patient' means a person in respect of whom the judge exercising the power is satisfied, after considering medical evidence, that he is incapable, by reason of mental disorder, of managing and administering his property and affairs—see s 101 of the 1959 Act (now s 94(2) of the 1983 Act). Where such directions are given, the person authorised under the Act is entitled to be next friend or guardian ad litem—see RSC Ord 80, r 3(3). But what if the Court of Protection has not become involved?

[72] The relationship between the jurisdiction of the Court of Protection to order and give directions for, or to authorise, legal proceedings in the name or on behalf of, a patient within the meaning of s 101 of the 1959 Act (as it then was) on the one hand and rules of court providing for the appointment of a next friend or guardian ad litem for a person under disability on the other hand was considered a by Ungood Thomas J in Re S (FG) [1973] 1 All ER 273, [1973] 1 WLR 178. He pointed out that persons under disability, for the purposes of the rules of court, could include persons incapable of managing and administering their property and affairs who were not 'patients' for the purposes of the 1959 Act. The reason was that the rules of court did not contain or impose the requirement of judicial satisfaction after the consideration of medical evidence. So there is no reason b why the test of mental capacity, when applied to the power to pursue or defend legal proceedings, should necessarily lead to the same conclusion as it will when applied in order to determine whether the same person is or is not a patient within the 1983 Act. Although the test is probably the same test—see the observation attributed to Sir Raymond Jennings QC and approved by Wilberforce J in In re CAF (23 March 1962, unreported) but noted in Heywood & Massey: Court of Protection Practice (13th edn, 2002) para 2.006—the 'property and c affairs' in relation to which the test falls to be applied are likely to be different. It is, I think, rare for a judge of the Court of Protection to be asked to exercise the power to give directions or authority in relation to the conduct of legal proceedings (under s 96(1)(i) of the 1983 Act) in isolation; it will be more usual for d that power to be invoked in conjunction with, or following, the appointment of a receiver under s 99(1)—see s 99(2) of the Act. In that context 'property and affairs' will extend to the whole of the person's property and affairs; not just to the affairs encompassed by the litigation.

[73] In F v West Berkshire Health Authority (Mental Health Act Commission intervening) [1989] 2 All ER 545, [1990] 2 AC 1 it was held that, although the expression 'the affairs of patients'—taken by itself and without regard to the context in which it appears—was capable of extending to medical treatment, it must be construed, in the context of Pt VII of the 1983 Act, as including only 'business matters, legal transactions and other dealings of a similar kind'—see Lord Brandon's observations ([1989] 2 All ER 545 at 554, [1990] 2 AC 1 at 59). In e my view the expression 'property and affairs' should be given the same meaning in the context of RSC Ord 80. It is pertinent to have in mind that the relevant inquiry, in the context of that rule, is whether a person has the mental capacity which the law requires in a person who is to be permitted to pursue or defend legal proceedings without the interposition of a next friend or guardian ad litem f (as the case may be). The answer to that inquiry does not turn on whether or not the person has the requisite mental capacity to make some other legally effective decision.
g

[74] The point is illustrated by the outcome in Re C (adult: refusal of treatment) [1994] 1 All ER 819, [1994] 1 WLR 290. C had been admitted to a secure hospital
h as a patient under Pt III of the 1983 Act. He was subsequently diagnosed as suffering from gangrene in the foot. Acting by his next friend he sought an injunction to restrain the hospital from amputating. Thorpe J held that C had the requisite mental capacity to make a decision to refuse treatment. As he put it, ([1994] 1 All ER 819 at 824, [1994] 1 WLR 290 at 295):

i 'Although his general capacity is impaired by schizophrenia, it has not been established that he does not sufficiently understand the nature, purpose and effects of the treatment he refuses. Indeed, I am satisfied that he has understood and retained the relevant treatment information, that in his own way he believes it, and that in the same fashion he has arrived at a clear choice.'

Nevertheless, it was never in doubt that C was a patient for the purposes of the procedural rule which required that his suit could not have been brought except with the interposition of a next friend. There is no inconsistency between the requirement that a party to legal proceedings comply with RSC Ord 80 and a decision that he has an understanding of the nature, purpose and effects of the medical treatment which is under consideration in those proceedings. The test is issue specific; and, when applied to different issues, it may yield different answers. a

[75] For the purposes of RSC Ord 80—and, now, CPR 21—the test to be applied, as it seems to me, is whether the party to legal proceedings is capable of understanding, with the assistance of such proper explanation from legal advisers and experts in other disciplines as the case may require, the issues on which his consent or decision is likely to be necessary in the course of those proceedings. If he has capacity to understand that which he needs to understand in order to pursue or defend a claim, I can see no reason why the law—whether substantive or procedural—should require the interposition of a next friend or guardian ad litem (or, as such a person is now described in the CPR, a litigation friend). b

[76] That approach seems to me consistent with the approach adopted by this court in Leather v Kirby [1965] 2 All ER 441, [1965] 2 QB 367, a decision on whether a claimant was of ‘unsound mind’ for the purposes of what was then s 22 of the Limitation Act 1939 (now replaced by s 28 of the Limitation Act 1980). A person is of ‘unsound mind’ for the purposes of the 1980 Act if he is ‘a person who, by reason of mental disorder within the meaning of the Mental Health Act 1983, is incapable of managing and administering his property and affairs’ (see s 38(3)). The language is the same as that used in RSC Ord 80, r 1; and there is good reason why the test should be the same in each context—see the observations of Danckwerts LJ in Leather v Kirby ([1965] 2 All ER 441 at 445, [1965] 2 QB 367 at 385). In upholding the trial judge’s decision that the claimant was of unsound mind—so as to prevent the relevant period of limitation from running against him—Lord Denning MR, said ([1965] 2 All ER 441 at 444, [1965] 2 QB 367 at 384): c

‘After a time he was to some extent able to appreciate (from being told by others) something of what had happened to him, and indeed to his scooter. But he could not concentrate on it for any length of time. Not long enough to be able to appreciate the nature and extent of any claim that he might have. In particular he had no insight at all into his own mental state. He was not capable of instructing a solicitor properly. He certainly was not capable of exercising any reasonable judgment on a possible settlement.’ d

The features which Lord Denning MR identified in that passage are features which, as it seems to me, would lead, plainly, to a conclusion that the claimant was a person under a disability for the purposes of RSC Ord 80. e

[77] The same approach was adopted by Boreham J in White v Fell (12 November 1987, unreported). In that case, also, it was necessary to decide whether the claimant had been incapable of managing her property and affairs in the context of a Limitation Act defence. The judge identified three features to which he thought it appropriate to have regard. First, the need for the claimant to have ‘insight and understanding of the fact that she has a problem in respect of which she needs advice’. Second, the need to be able to instruct an appropriate adviser ‘with sufficient clarity to enable him to understand the problem and advise her appropriately’. Third, the need ‘to understand and make decisions based upon, or otherwise give effect to, such advice as she may receive’. f a Boreham J accepted that the claimant was 'now quite incapable of managing unaided a large sum of money such as the sort of sum that would be appropriate compensation for her injuries'. Further, he accepted that, if she succeeded in her claim for compensation 'as almost inevitably she will', she would need to 'take, consider and act upon appropriate advice'; but that she might choose not to take advice. He accepted that 'she may not understand all the intricacies of litigation, b or of a settlement, or of a wise investment policy'. But he was satisfied that, nevertheless, the claimant had not been shown to be incapable of managing her affairs. She had had the necessary understanding to take the decisions which she needed to take in relation to a claim for compensation.

[78] Wright J held that he should follow that approach in the present case. He rejected the submission, advanced on behalf of the claimant, that a finding of c incapacity was required 'if the effect of the injury to his brain renders [the claimant] vulnerable to exploitation or at the risk of the making of rash or irresponsible decisions' (see [2002] EWHC 417 (QB) at [24], [2002] All ER (D) (Mar) at [24]). I think that he was right to do so. The courts have ample powers d to protect those who are vulnerable to exploitation from being exploited; it is unnecessary to deny them the opportunity to take their own decisions if they are not being exploited. It is not the task of the courts to prevent those who have the mental capacity to make rational decisions from making decisions which others may regard as rash or irresponsible.

[79] The judge found assistance in recommendations made by the Law e Commission in 1995, in Pt III of its report Mental Incapacity (Law Com no 232). The report drew attention (at paras 3.16 and 3.17) to the need that a person should be able both: (i) to understand and retain the information relevant to the decision which has to be made (including information about the reasonably f foreseeable consequences of deciding one way or another or of failing to make any decision), and (ii) to use that information in the decision-making process. I think that he was right to have regard to those recommendations. I think he was right, also, to have in mind the qualifications (expressed in paras 3.18 and 3.19 of the report) that a person should not be held unable to understand the information g relevant to a decision if he can understand an explanation of that information in broad terms and simple language; and that he should not be regarded as unable to make a rational decision merely because the decision which he does, in fact, make is a decision which would not be made by a person of ordinary prudence.

[80] It had appeared from the grounds of appeal annexed to the appellant's notice in these appeals that the appellant would contend that the judge 'erred in law in that he applied the wrong test for capacity and in formulating the test'; had h 'uncritically followed the narrow approach applied by Boreham J in White v Fell' had failed to address 'the robust criticisms of this test' made on behalf of the appellant; and had failed 'to take into account the importance of risk and vulnerability'. When giving permission for an appeal to this court the judge expressed the view that there was an important point of law involved.

j [81] It was a matter of some surprise, therefore, that counsel for the appellant disclaimed any intention to advance a fundamental attack on the judge's approach as a matter of law. The furthest he sought to go was to submit that the judge ought to have taken into account, when deciding whether the claimant had had the requisite capacity to pursue a claim in legal proceedings, the fact that (as alleged) the claimant would plainly not have had the requisite capacity to manage and administer a large award of damages.

[82] It might have been thought that an obvious difficulty in the way of that submission, in the present case, was the fact that the claimant had taken what were accepted to be sensible decisions in the management of the not inconsiderable sum which he had received under the compromise in 1987. But it was said that the question whether he had capacity to take those decisions was not to be answered solely by reference to outcomes. I accept that as conceptually correct. For the same reason that—as the Law Commission pointed out—a person is not to be regarded as unable to make a rational decision merely because the decision which he does make is one which would not be made by a person of ordinary prudence, so he is not to be regarded as having capacity merely because the decision appears rational. But, to my mind, outcomes are likely to be important (although not conclusive) indicators of the existence, or lack, of understanding. a
b
c

[83] More pertinently, I reject the submission that a person who would be incapable of taking investment decisions in relation to a large sum received as compensation is to be held, for that reason, to be incapable of pursuing a claim for that compensation. I accept that capacity to pursue a claim requires capacity to take a decision to compromise that claim; and that capacity to compromise requires an understanding of what the effects of a compromise will be—in particular, an understanding that it will be necessary to deal with the compensation monies in a way which will provide for the future. But that does not, as it seems to me, require an understanding as to how that will be done. As Hoffmann J pointed out in Re K, Re F [1988] 1 All ER 358 at 362, [1988] Ch 310 at 315, there is no logical reason why a person who understands that something needs to be done, but who does not have the requisite understanding to do it for himself, should not confer on another the power to do what needs to be done. d
e

[84] In my view the judge identified correctly the principles which he had to apply in addressing the issue which was before him. Kennedy LJ has explained why the criticism that the judge failed to apply those principles to the facts must be rejected. I agree. The application of those principles led the judge to a conclusion which he was entitled to reach. For my part, I find it of particular significance that, in this case, two experienced solicitors acting for the claimant in litigation did not recognise the need for the appointment of a next friend; and that no criticism is made of either in that respect. These appeals should be dismissed. f
g

Appeal dismissed.

Dilys Tausz Barrister.

a Inter Lotto (UK) Ltd v Camelot Group plc
[2003] EWHC 1256 (Ch)

CHANCERY DIVISION

LADDIE J

b 20, 21 MAY, 6 JUNE 2003

Trade mark – Registration – Effect of registration – Whether owner of registered trade mark having statutory right to use mark overriding another person's common law passing off rights – Trade Marks Act 1994, s 9(1).

c Trade mark – Infringement – Effect of infringement – Whether infringement of trade mark in itself constituting wrongdoing of sufficient depravity to engage doctrine of ex turpi causa.

d The claimant was engaged in the business of operating lotteries. It alleged that, since August 2001, it had promoted and organised the running of lotteries in relation to which it had used the trade mark 'HOT PICK'. It also claimed to have built up a reputation and goodwill in the mark. The defendant managed another lottery under an operating licence. By its terms, all intellectual property rights relating to that lottery were owned by the licensor and licensed to the defendant.

e On 17 October 2001 the defendant caused the licensor to apply to register the name 'HOTPICKS' as a trade mark (the HOTPICKS mark). The claimant alleged that in July 2002 the defendant launched a new lottery game under or by reference to the HOTPICKS mark. It brought proceedings against the defendant for, inter alia, passing off, alleging that HOTPICKS was confusingly similar to HOT PICK, that

f the defendant's activities had resulted in confusion in the market place and that the claimant was entitled to rely on the goodwill built up by its alleged use of the HOT PICK mark from August 2001 until the defendant started using the HOTPICKS mark in July 2002. On the determination of a preliminary issue, the defendant contended that its ownership of the HOTPICKS mark gave it a statutory right to use it, and that that right overrode any common law passing off rights which the g claimant might have. In so contending, it relied on s 9(1)^a of the Trade Marks Act 1994 which provided that the proprietor of a registered trade mark had exclusive rights in the trade mark which were infringed by use of the trade mark in the United Kingdom without his consent. The defendant also contended that all use of the claimant's mark after the registration date was to be treated as unlawful, and that

h accordingly the claimant was precluded, under the doctrine of ex turpi causa, from relying upon any reputation or goodwill generated by such unlawful use in support of its passing off claim. The defendant therefore contended that 17 October 2001, not July 2002, was the cut-off date for assessing the claimant's reputation and goodwill for the purposes of its passing off claim.

j Held – (1) Section 9(1) of the 1994 Act did not give the owner of a registered trade mark a right to use that mark which overrode another person's passing off rights. The contention to the contrary involved a misreading of that provision and a basic flaw in the appreciation of what was achieved by registration.

a Section 9(1) is set out at [31], below

Section 9(1) did not stipulate that the proprietor of the registered mark had an exclusive right to use the mark. It stipulated that he had the exclusive rights in the trade mark which were infringed by the use of the trade mark without his consent. In other words, registered trade marks, like all other statutory intellectual property rights, did not give a right to the proprietor to use, but rather the right to exclude others from using in a manner that was prohibited by the Act. If the legislature had intended to bestow on the owner of a registered trade mark an entitlement to override the rights of others, it could and should have done so expressly. It followed in the instant case that the defendant had not acquired, by registration, any entitlement to use the HOTPICKS mark, but only the right to prevent others infringing (see [35], [39], [40], below); Re Lyle & Kinahan Ltd's Application (1907) 24 RPC 249 applied.

(2) Trade mark infringement did not without more amount to wrongdoing of such a level of depravity as to engage the doctrine of ex turpi causa. Although there might be cases where the nature of the infringement was so flagrant and clearly and knowingly wrongful that a court might refuse to allow a claimant to rely on his goodwill and reputation, the only wrongdoing alleged in the instant case was the fact of the wrongdoing. It followed that the relevant date for assessing the claimant's reputation and goodwill for its claim in passing off was the date upon which the defendant started using the mark in relation to its lottery product, not the date of the application for registration (see [45], [47], below).

Notes

For rights conferred by registered trade mark and for circumstances in which a claimant might be to disentitled to protection in a passing off action, see 48 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn) (2000 reissue) paras 79, 339.

For the Trade Marks Act 1993, s 9, see 48 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2001 reissue) 119.

Cases referred to in judgment

Bile Bean Manufacturing Co v Davidson (1906) 23 RPC 725, Ct of Sess.

Burberrys v JC Cording & Co Ltd (1909) 26 RPC 693.

Faulder & Co Ltd v O and G Rushton Ltd (1903) 20 RPC 477, CA.

Fisons Ltd v EJ Godwin (Peat Industries) Ltd [1976] RPC 653.

ICL Ltd v Berk Pharmaceuticals Ltd [1981] FSR 1.

Leather Cloth Co Ltd v American Leather Cloth Co Ltd (1865) 11 HL Cas 523, 11 ER 1435, HL.

Lyle & Kinahan Ltd's Application, Re (1907) 24 RPC 249, CA.

Millington v Fox (1838) 3 My & Cr 338, 40 ER 956.

Mitchell v Henry (1880) 15 Ch D 181, CA.

Montgomery v Thompson [1891] AC 217, HL.

Newman v Pinto (1887) 4 RPC 508, CA.

Orr Ewing v Registrar of Trade-Marks (1879) 4 App Cas 479, HL.

Perry v Truefitt (1842) 6 Beav 66, 49 ER 749.

Saville Perfumery Ltd v June Perfect Ltd and FW Woolworth & Co Ltd (1941) 58 RPC 147, HL.

Cases referred to in skeleton arguments

Anheuser-Busch Inc v Budejovicky Budvar NP (t/a Budweiser Budvar Brewery) [1984] FSR 413, CA.

- a* Ansul BV v Ajax Brandbeveiliging BV Case C-40/01 (2003) Transcript (judgment), 11 March 2003.
- Arthur Martin (Sales) Ltd v Electra Mechanics (1975) Ltd* (1986) 13 IPR 122, NZ HC.
- Barlow and Jones v Jabez Johnson & Co* (1890) 7 RPC 395, CA.
- Barnsley Brewery Co Ltd v RBNB* [1997] FSR 462.
- British Telecommunications plc v One In A Million Ltd* [1998] 4 All ER 476, [1999] 1 WLR 903, CA.
- b* Bryant v Heyde (1886) 7 NSW 72, NSW SC.
- Cadbury Schweppes Pty Ltd v Pub Squash Co Pty Ltd* [1981] 1 All ER 213, [1981] 1 WLR 193, PC.
- Campomar Sociedad Ltda v Nike International Ltd* (2000) 169 ALR 677, Aust HC.
- c* Denny (Henry) & Sons Ltd v United Biscuits (UK) Ltd [1981] FSR 114.
- Eli Lilly & Co Ltd v Chelsea Drug Chemical Co Ltd* [1966] RPC 14.
- General Electric Co v The General Electric Co Ltd* [1972] 2 All ER 507, [1972] 1 WLR 729, HL.
- Harris v Ogg* (1884) 5 NSW 114, NSW SC.
- Intercontext v Schmidt* [1988] FSR 575.
- d* Johnson & Son (Loughborough) Ltd v W Puffer & Co Ltd (1930) 47 RPC 95.
- Kearny Developments Ltd v Tarmac Construction Ltd* [1995] 3 All ER 534, CA.
- Lecouturier v Rey* [1910] AC 262, HL.
- Levi Strauss & Co v Tesco Stores Ltd* [2002] EWHC 1556 (Ch), [2003] RPC 319.
- Luxembourg v Linster* Case C-287/98 [2000] ECR I-6917, ECJ.
- e* McGregor-Doniger Inc v Sterling McGregor Ltd [1981] FSR 299.
- New South Wales Dairy Corp v Murray Goulburn Co-operative Co Ltd* (1989) 14 IPR 26, Aust Fed Ct; aff'd (1990) 18 IPR 385, Aust HC.
- Nicholson & Sons Ltd's Application* (1931) 48 RPC 227, CA.
- Parkinson (Sir Lindsay) & Co Ltd v Triplan Ltd* [1973] 2 All ER 273, [1973] QB 609, [1973] 2 WLR 632, CA.
- f* Penney (JC) Co Inc v Penneys Ltd [1975] FSR 367, CA.
- Pontiac Marina Pte Ltd v CDL Hotels International Ltd* [1998] FSR 839, Singapore CA.
- Sen Sen Co v Britten* [1899] 1 Ch 692.
- Silhouette International Schmied GmbH & Co KG v Hartlauer Handelsgesellschaft mbH* Case C-355/96 [1998] All ER (EC) 769, [1999] Ch 77, [1998] 3 WLR 1218, [1998] ECR I-4799, ECJ.
- g* Star Industrial Co Ltd v Yap Kwee Kor (t/a New Star Industrial Co) [1976] FSR 256, PC.
- Sunshine Leisure Products (NZ) Ltd v Great Outdoors Co Ltd* [1986] 2 NZLR 183, NZ HC.
- h* Thorne (R) & Sons Ltd v Pimms Ltd, Re Pimms' Trade Mark (1909) 26 RPC 221.
- Upper Assam Tea Co v Herbert & Co* (1889) 7 RPC 183, CA.
- Van Zeller v Mason, Cattley & Co* (1907) 25 RPC 37.
- Whirlpool Trade Mark* [1997] FSR 905, India SC.
- j* Zino Davidoff SA v A & G Imports Ltd, Levi Strauss & Co v Tesco Stores Ltd, Levi Strauss & Co v Costco Wholesale UK Ltd Joined cases C-414–C-416/99 [2002] All ER (EC) 55, [2002] Ch 109, [2002] 2 WLR 321, [2001] ECR I-8691.

Preliminary issue.

By order of Patten J on 19 March 2003, the court was required to determine a preliminary issue, set out at [9], below, in proceedings for, inter alia, passing off brought by the claimant, Inter Lotto (UK) Ltd, against the defendant, Camelot Group plc. The facts are set out in the judgment.

Geoffrey Hobbs QC and Philip Roberts (instructed by McDermott Will & Emery) for Inter Lotto.

Michael Silverleaf QC and Michael Hicks (instructed by Jones Day Gouldens) for Camelot.

Cur adv vult

6 June 2003. The following judgment was delivered.

LADDIE J.

[1] This is the judgment on the trial of a preliminary issue ordered by consent by Patten J on 19 March 2003. The claimant, Inter Lotto (UK) Ltd (Inter Lotto), is engaged in the business of running lotteries on behalf of a number of charities. The defendant is Camelot Group plc (Camelot). It also runs lotteries. In particular it manages the National Lottery under an operating licence from the National Lottery Commission (NLC).

[2] By claim form dated 9 January of this year, Inter Lotto brought proceedings for trade mark infringement and passing off against Camelot. For present purposes it is only the passing off claim which is of interest. In substance Inter Lotto alleges that continuously since 4 August 2001 it has promoted and organised the running of lotteries throughout the country in relation to which it has used the trade mark 'HOT PICK'. It claims to have built up a reputation and goodwill in that mark. It alleges that from about 7 July 2002, Camelot launched a new lottery game under or by reference to the trade mark 'HOTPICKS'. It alleges that HOTPICKS is confusingly similar to HOT PICK and that the defendant's activities have resulted in confusion in the market place and constitute passing off.

[3] Camelot raises a number of defences. For example it says that Inter Lotto did not use HOT PICK as a mark for a lottery and, if it did, it did not start promoting the mark until much later than it claims and that, for various reasons which are not relevant to the current application, Camelot's activities have not and will not cause any or any significant damage to Inter Lotto. However, central to the current application are the defences arising out of Camelot's use of a registered trade mark. By the terms of its operating licence, all intellectual property rights relating to the National Lottery are owned by NLC and licensed to the operator, Camelot. On 17 October 2001 Camelot caused NLC to apply to register the name HOTPICKS as a trade mark under application number 2283392 (the '392 mark'). It was advertised for opposition on 7 August 2002. Inter Lotto opposed on 7 November 2002. That opposition in the Trade Marks Registry is currently stayed pending the outcome of the current application. A number of other trade mark applications were made and, in some cases, opposed. They can be ignored for present purposes.

[4] Camelot was exclusively licensed by NLC to use the '392 mark on 24 April 2002. It pleads that its use of the registered trade mark gives it a number of defences. The only ones relevant to this application are pleaded as follows:

'11. In the premises: (a) by reason of the provisions of s 9 of the Trade Marks Act 1994 and the NLC licences, the defendant has at all material times had the exclusive rights in [the '392 mark] ... (c) by reason of the provisions a of ss 9, 10(1), 10(2) and 30 of the 1994 Act and the provisions of the NLC licences, upon the premises of the particulars of claim (namely that the word HOTPICKS so resembles the words HOT PICK when used in relation to lotteries as to give rise to confusion), the claimant's use of the words HOT PICK in relation to its lottery game is and always has been unlawful and may therefore not be relied upon by the claimant in support of any action for passing off against the defendant which is the lawful user of the trade marks the subject of [the '392 mark] ...

b 13. ... By reason of the facts and matters set out in para 11 above, no goodwill or reputation in the words HOT PICK can accrue to the claimant and the claimant may not rely upon any use it may have made of the words HOT PICK in relation to any case made against the defendant.'

c [5] The effect of these pleas may be summarised as follows. Because of the exclusive rights which will exist in NLC's trade mark, all use of Inter Lotto's mark after the date of registration is to be treated as unlawful. As a result, Inter Lotto cannot rely upon any reputation or goodwill generated by such unlawful use (ie after 17 October 2001) in support of its passing off case. This was the way in which Mr Silverleaf QC put his client's case:

e 'The claimant's use of its mark is unlawful and cannot found an action. If the defendant is entitled to the benefit of a valid trade mark registration, it has the exclusive right to use the mark. It follows that the claimant's use of the same mark is unlawful. On this basis alone the claim for passing off should fail: ex turpi causa non oritur actio. There has to be a nexus between the illegality and the claim for passing off: ICL Ltd v Berk Pharmaceuticals Ltd [1981] FSR 1. However, it is difficult to think of a closer nexus than that the use relied upon in support of a passing off claim is an infringement of a trade mark registration. The effect of an unlawfully acquired reputation has been raised before and it has been held that such a reputation is incapable of supporting a claim for passing off.'

f [6] The point is emphasised in a supplementary skeleton argument served by Mr Silverleaf shortly before the hearing. In response to a large number of authorities cited in the claimant's skeleton argument by Mr Hobbs QC, who appears for Inter Lotto, Mr Silverleaf expressed his client's position as follows:

g 'The defendant's case is based upon the proposition that a valid trade mark registration which is of such scope as to prevent the specific user relied upon by the claimant to support its claim for passing off entitles the defendant to restrain the claimant from infringing his registration and is therefore a bar to the passing off claim.'

h [7] Thus, because Inter Lotto's use of its mark after 17 October 2001 was unlawful, it was, per se, incapable of giving rise to any goodwill and reputation which a court would be prepared to protect. The date of registration of Camelot's mark therefore acts as a guillotine. Only rights accrued before then can be taken into account in support of Inter Lotto's case of passing off.

j [8] Inter Lotto's case is that it can rely on all the goodwill built up by its alleged use of the HOT PICK mark from 4 August 2001 until Camelot commenced using HOTPICKS in July 2002. It is not disputed that, absent the special defence which is central to this application, it is the date when the defendant started using its mark which is relevant for determining the passing off claim. On the other hand

Mr Hobbs accepts that if Camelot's plea is good in law, so that it can only rely on the reputation and goodwill generated in the period prior to the date of application to register the '392 mark, that is to say prior to 17 October 2001, this could have a significant impact on his client's passing off claim since it would need to demonstrate the development of sufficient reputation and goodwill in a few months at the very early stages of its use of the HOT PICK mark. Mr Hobbs argues that the defendant's plea is bad in law. Inter Lotto can rely on the later and more extensive use which it alleges.

[9] It is against that background that the parties agreed to the making of the consent order requiring the determination of the following preliminary issue:

'Is 17 October 2001 (the date on which the NLC applied under application number 2283392 to register the designation HOTPICKS as a trade mark) the relevant date at which the claimant's reputation and goodwill for its claim in passing off falls to be assessed?'

[10] Before considering the arguments advanced by the parties, it is necessary to have a clear understanding of what is in issue. I have already referred to the relevant pleadings in the defence and passages in Mr Silverleaf's skeleton arguments. However the nature of Camelot's case changed significantly during the course of the hearing.

[11] It is possible to formulate a defence to the passing off action in two ways. First, it could be said that Inter Lotto has no enforceable goodwill and reputation. If that is the case, the claim will fail. Inter Lotto will have no rights which it can assert. The sword is taken from its hand. Second, it could be said that, even if Inter Lotto does have enforceable goodwill and reputation, Camelot cannot be restrained because it has an overriding entitlement to do the acts of which complaint is made. In such a case Camelot would have a personal shield. As can be seen from the pleadings and extracts from its skeleton arguments above, the plea advanced on behalf of Camelot was of the first type. The numerous authorities relied on by Mr Hobbs addressed the second type of defence. Because they did so, Mr Silverleaf said they were irrelevant and did not deal with the point he was raising. However, during the course of his speech he changed position. He asserted that Camelot's ownership of the '392 mark provided it with an entitlement to use it. He said that his client had a 'better' claim than Inter Lotto to the marks in suit. He said that the issue was one of priority of rights and 'hierarchy'. His client's right to use its registered trade mark overrode any common law rights Inter Lotto might have.

[12] Although this second type of defence is not what is pleaded by Camelot, Mr Hobbs did not object to Mr Silverleaf raising it. He says that both defences are bad in law.

[13] At the forefront of his argument Mr Hobbs relies on s 2(2) of the Trade Marks Act 1994:

'No proceedings lie to prevent or recover damages for the infringement of an unregistered trade mark as such; but nothing in this Act affects the law relating to passing off.'

[14] At its simplest, Mr Hobbs argues that there are here on the assumed facts, two distinct rights; NLC's and Camelot's in NLC's mark and Inter Lotto's in its reputation and goodwill built up by use. Although they may, in some circumstances, overlap, they are not the same and one is not superior to the other. There is no hierarchy. Each has to be considered on its own merits. The a existence of Camelot's registration does not interfere with his client's right to sue to protect the goodwill and reputation which it has built up by activity in the market place. Mr Silverleaf argues that Mr Hobbs has misconstrued the section.

[15] This application concerns some important but quite basic issues of intellectual property law. Each side argues that its position is supported by or consistent with s 2(2) of the 1994 Act when construed in its historical context. For b that reason, the history of trade mark and passing off causes of action is a convenient starting point.

THE ORIGINS AND DEVELOPMENT OF PASSING OFF AND TRADE MARK RIGHTS

[16] An erudite discussion of the development of the law of passing off and trade marks is to be found in Wadlow The Law of Passing-Off (2nd edn, 1995)
c pp 9–31 (paras 1.05–1.15). For present purposes, the following summary is sufficient.

[17] Two or more centuries ago, the cause of action in passing off was dependent upon proof of fraud. With time, this requirement disappeared, at least in one form of the action, and it became dependent upon proof, inter alia, of d misrepresentation. An early example of this is Millington v Fox (1838) 3 My & Cr 338, 40 ER 956. As Wadlow points out, by 1842 the term 'passing off' was in use and the principles of the cause of action were defined by Lord Langdale MR in Perry v Truefitt (1842) 6 Beav 66 at 73, 49 ER 749 at 752 in terms which are familiar to the modern practitioner:

e 'I think that the principle on which both the Courts of law and of Equity proceed, in granting relief and protection in cases of this sort, is very well understood. A man is not to sell his own goods under the pretence that they are the goods of another man; he cannot be permitted to practise such a deception, nor to use the means which contribute to that end. He cannot f therefore be allowed to use names, marks, letters, or other indicia, by which he may induce purchasers to believe, that the goods which he is selling are the manufacture of another person. I own it does not seem to me that a man can acquire property in a name or mark; but whether he has or not a property in the name or the mark, I have no doubt that another person has not a right to use that name or mark for the purposes of deception, and in g order to attract to himself that course of trade, or that custom, which, without that improper act, would have flowed to the person who first used, or was alone in the habit of using the particular name or mark.'

[18] Much the same thing was said by Parker J in a well-known passage in Burberrys v JC Cording & Co Ltd [1909] 26 RPC 693 at 701:

h 'The principles of law applicable to a case of this sort are well known. On the one hand, apart from the law as to trade marks, no one can claim monopoly rights in the use of a word or name. On the other hand, no one is entitled by the use of any word or name, or indeed in any other way, to represent his goods as being the goods of another to that other's injury. If an
j injunction be granted restraining the use of a word or name, it is no doubt granted to protect property, but the property, to protect which it is granted, is not property in the word or name, but property in the trade or good-will which will be injured by its use.'

[19] The ambit of the cause of action may well have expanded but not in a way which has any impact on the issues I have to consider. The above passages are of significance because they are early examples of the courts highlighting one of the crucial differences between passing off and trade mark rights. Under the former, the claimant acquires no property in his name or mark. The cause of action is dependent on deception of the customer. Misappropriation of the name or mark by the defendant may be the means by which that deception has been facilitated, but that does not mean that the claimant owns the mark. a [20] In a series of case in the middle of the nineteenth century, Lord Westbury held that there was a right of property in trade marks. Wadlow describes this as follows (p 18 (para 1.09)): b

‘While the common law still required fraud, equity did not confine itself to relaxing the standard of dishonesty required before it would intervene. In a series of cases Lord Westbury L.C. “surprised the profession” [see Newman v Pinto (1887) 4 RPC 508 per Fry LJ] by holding that there was a right of property in trade marks which was transmissible and enforceable even against innocent infringement. Perhaps Lord Westbury would also have recognised property in trade names, and if so the whole of the law of passing-off as it was then understood could have been re-interpreted in terms of infringement of property rights as opposed to misrepresentation. That, however, was not to happen. The law of trade marks was put on a statutory basis, the law of passing-off continued in terms of misrepresentation, and the idea of passing-off protecting a property right was largely rejected or forgotten until the twentieth century. In retrospect, passing-off and trade mark infringement may be seen as separate torts which to some extent evolved out of the same historical authorities, just as copyright and breach of confidence cannot always be distinguished in early cases on piracy of unpublished literary works.’ c
d
e

[21] The statutory basis of trade mark law referred to by Wadlow started with the Trade Marks Registration Act 1875. As its name suggests, it was designed to put in place a registration system for trade marks. To encourage traders to use this, it provided at s 1: f

‘... from and after the first day of July one thousand eight hundred and seventy-six a person shall not be entitled to institute any proceeding to prevent the infringement of any trade mark as defined by this Act until and unless such trade mark is registered in pursuance of this Act.’ g

[22] The provisions of the 1875 Act were amplified by the Trade Marks Registration Amendment Act 1876. As far as I am aware, at the time no one suggested that the provisions of these Acts had any impact on the cause of action in passing off which were not based on a claim to a property right in the name or mark. h

[23] Once these Acts were passed, infringement proceedings could only be brought in respect of new marks which were registered. However, in respect of trade marks which were in use before the 1875 Act but in respect of which registration had been refused, the common law action for infringement of the unregistered mark continued (see Orr Ewing v Registrar of Trade-Marks (1879) 4 App Cas 479). In the meantime, passing off actions were unaffected. An argument to the contrary appears to have been dismissed in Mitchell v Henry (1880) 15 Ch D 181. In any event the provisions of s 1 of the 1875 Act were, in substance, repeated in s 42 of the Trade Marks Act 1905: j a 'No person shall be entitled to institute any proceeding to prevent or to recover damages for the infringement of an unregistered trade mark unless such trade mark was in use before the thirteenth of August one thousand eight hundred and seventy-five, and has been refused registration under this Act. The Registrar may, on request, grant a certificate that such registration has been refused.'

b [24] Furthermore, an entirely new provision was added in s 45:

'Nothing in this Act contained shall be deemed to affect rights of action against any person for passing off goods as those of another person or the remedies in respect thereof.'

c [25] One of the leading textbooks of the day, Kerly The Law of Trade Marks and Trade Names (3rd edn, 1908) expressed the view that the latter section merely stated expressly what was already the law. Other textbooks of the time said the same thing. Kerly illustrated the point by referring to the 'Stone Ales' case, Montgomery v Thompson [1891] AC 217. Thompson had a registered 'Stone Ale' as a trade mark. He sued a competitor, Mr Montgomery. The mark was removed from the register. Notwithstanding that, Thompson succeeded in an action to restrain Mr Montgomery from using the mark in relation to his beer. The cause of action in passing off was independent of the trade mark rights. A very similar case was Faulder & Co Ltd v O and G Rushton Ltd (1903) 20 RPC 477. Kerly discussed the differences between a trade mark infringement action and a passing off action (p 343):

e '... where an injunction is granted to restrain the use of a mark calculated to pass off the defendant's goods as those of the plaintiff, by reason of its resemblance to his unregistered mark, it should be so limited as to leave it open for the defendant to use any part, or the whole, of the plaintiff's unregistered mark, if he can do so, in any manner which is not calculated to lead to deception.'

f [26] That passage is as applicable today as it was in 1908. Because the action in passing off protects the reputation and goodwill of a trader, not his names, marks or get up per se, a rival trader can, in theory, use those names, marks or get up as long as he does so in a way which does not lead to deception. See, for example, Fisons Ltd v EJ Godwin (Peat Industries) Ltd [1976] RPC 653. In this respect there is a difference between passing off and trade mark rights as explained by Lord Greene MR in Saville Perfumery Ltd v June Perfect Ltd and FW Woolworth & Co Ltd (1941) 58 RPC 147 at 162:

g h 'I now turn to the claim based on passing-off. It does not necessarily follow that a trader who uses an infringing mark upon goods is also guilty of passing-off. The reason is that in the matter of infringement, as I have already pointed out, once a mark is used as indicating origin, no amount of added matter intended to show the true origin of the goods can affect the question. In the case of passing-off, on the other hand, the defendant may escape liability if he can show that the added matter is sufficient to distinguish his goods from those of the plaintiff. Such proof may be very difficult, but theoretically at any rate the result may be as I have stated.'

j [27] Thus, the effect of s 45 of the 1905 Act was to confirm what was already the law, namely that the rights created by registration of a trade mark were different to those protected by passing off proceedings and, for that reason, the legislation relating to the former had no impact on the latter. a

[28] In the Trade Marks Act 1938, ss 42 and 45 were brought together and re-enacted as s 2:

‘No person shall be entitled to institute any proceeding to prevent, or to recover damages for, the infringement of an unregistered trade mark, but nothing in this Act shall be deemed to affect rights of action against any person for passing off ... or the remedies thereof.’ b

[29] It is not suggested that this changed the law. The provision in the 1994 Act is, in substance, identical. Once again, neither Mr Silverleaf nor Mr Hobbs suggested that it changed the law. c

[30] Consistent with this history, s 2(2) of the 1994 Act is an unpromising start for the defendant. Its argument is that the existence of the ‘392 trade mark registration gives rise to a per se overriding of Inter Lotto’s ability to protect its reputation and goodwill by means of passing off proceedings. If correct, the rights created under trade mark legislation would ‘affect the law relating to passing off’ or, at the least, affect its practical application. However there is nothing to suggest that the legislature had in mind the problem in this case, namely a clash of competing rights. What the section and its predecessors were primarily concerned with was whether the owner of a registered trade mark was capable of owning and enforcing, at the same time, rights to sue in passing off. The section, consistent with cases like Montgomery v Thompson [1891] AC 217, confirms that a trader who has built up a reputation and goodwill in his business is entitled to protect it by passing off proceedings, whether or not he has also acquired trade mark registrations in respect of any names or marks used in relation to that business. As far as I can tell, no one appears to have argued that the exclusive right given by registration overrode passing off rights. There is no reason to believe that that type of argument was in the mind of the legislature when s 45 of the 1938 Act and its equivalent in later Acts were being drafted. For this reason I think it is necessary to look more closely at the two defences raised by Camelot. d
e
f

DOES CAMELOT HAVE A RIGHT TO USE THE ‘392 MARK WHICH OVERRIDES
INTER LOTTO’S RIGHTS? g

[31] Camelot’s argument is based upon the provisions of s 9(1) of the 1994 Act:

‘The proprietor of a registered trade mark has exclusive rights in the trade mark which are infringed by use of the trade mark in the United Kingdom without his consent. The acts amounting to infringement, if done without the consent of the proprietor, are specified in section 10.’ h

[32] Mr Silverleaf says that, in the light of this provision, the owner of (or licensee under) a registered trade mark has a statutory right to use it. This cannot be taken away. Passing off rights are ‘inferior’ and cannot be used to impugn or restrict that entitlement. He says the matter is purely hierarchical. The person with the better title succeeds. He also prays in aid ss 22 and 27 of the 1994 Act which provide that a registered trade mark is personal property and also treat applications for trade marks in the same way. He says that if a trade mark is a property which entitles the owner to exclude others from infringing it, it must carry with it the right to stop others from preventing the owner from using it himself. j a [33] To understand the impact of this argument, it is useful to bear in mind some of the other differences between the right to protect reputation and goodwill by passing off proceedings and the rights acquired under a trade mark registration. The essential characteristic of the former is that it is built up by use. If the use stops, the reputation and goodwill will wither and die. Once it is dead, passing off proceedings will not avail the claimant. If there has only been a small amount of use, the reputation and goodwill may be insufficient to justify protection and, even if it is, if the use ceases such reputation and goodwill as was generated is likely to dissipate quickly. On the other hand it is possible and common to obtain registrations for marks which have never been used. Although the 1994 Act requires the applicant for a registered trade mark to state that the mark is being used or that he has a bona fide intention to use it the only encouragement to keep to the latter intention is to be found in s 46. This provides that a mark may be taken off the register if it is not used for a continuous period of five years. It is not necessary for present purposes to determine whether removal after such a period of non-use is mandatory or, as was the case under the 1938 Act, discretionary. Another, but related, difference is that the proprietor chooses in respect of what goods or services he wants to register his mark. Even if the mark is used by the proprietor in relation to some goods or services, it is possible and common to register marks in respect of a much wider group of goods and services on which it will never be used.

e [34] The practical application of Mr Silverleaf's argument can be explained by reference to a notional example. A trader starts to use a trade mark 'X'. He uses it extensively in relation to particular goods and builds up a valuable reputation and goodwill. At the same time another trader applies to register 'X' as a trade mark which he does not use in respect of the same class of goods. At the outset, each trader is ignorant of the existence of the other. After four-and-a-half years, the second trader decides to start using his registered mark. He learns of the first trader and sues for infringement. The second trader sues for passing off. f Mr Silverleaf argues that not only does the second trader succeed on the infringement proceedings, but the first trader cannot succeed in passing off. The result is that the second trader is entitled to take all the goodwill and reputation which the first trader had built up. Indeed, if Mr Silverleaf's argument is correct, it is difficult to see why he limited himself to saying that the guillotine on Inter g Lotto's reputation comes down on 17 October 2001. Even if Inter Lotto had built up an enormous reputation and goodwill before that date, according to this argument, Camelot is 'entitled' to use its registered trade mark.

h [35] In my view Mr Silverleaf's argument is untenable. It involves a misreading of s 9(1) of the 1994 Act and a basic flaw in the appreciation of what registration achieves. The section does not stipulate that the proprietor of the registered mark has an 'exclusive right to use' the mark. It stipulates that he has the 'exclusive rights in the trade mark which are infringed by use of the trade mark in the United Kingdom without his consent'. In other words, registered trade marks, like all other statutory intellectual property rights do not give a right j to the proprietor to use, but give him the right to exclude others from using. The types of activities which can be prohibited by the existence of a registered trade mark are those which are set out in s 10 of the 1994 Act. None of this gives rise to an entitlement to the proprietor to use.

[36] The point is explained particularly clearly in Professor Cornish's admirable book Intellectual Property (3rd edn, 1996) pp 5-6 (para 1-04):

‘One characteristic shared by all types of intellectual property to date is that the rights granted are essentially negative: they are rights to stop others doing certain things—rights in other words to stop pirates, counterfeiters, imitators and even in some cases third parties who have independently reached the same ideas, from exploiting them without the licence of the rightowner. Some aspects of intellectual property confer positive entitlements, such as the right to be granted a patent or register a trade mark upon fulfilling the requisite conditions; but these are essentially ancillary. The fact that intellectual property gives a right to control the activities of others has a number of implications, often inadequately understood. The rightowner does not need the right in order to exploit a market for its goods or services: a patent is not a pre-condition to exploiting one’s own invention. By way of corollary, the right gives no liberty to ignore the rights of other individuals (including their intellectual property) or to override public liabilities ...’

[37] This is true across the whole field of intellectual property. The exclusive rights given in a copyright work do not mean that the owner of that copyright is entitled to use his work even though it infringes some prior author’s rights. Similarly in the field of patents, it has never been the law that the owner of an improvement patent has an entitlement to use his invention even in breach of the prior patent in respect of which his invention is an improvement. Indeed, patent legislation contains express provisions to allow the owner of an improvement patent, in very limited circumstances, to obtain a compulsory licence, for which he will have to pay, under the master patent. Furthermore, how far does this entitlement go? Does it allow the owner of a statutory intellectual property right to override public health laws, the law of libel and so on?

[38] Mr Silverleaf did not shy away from this problem. I put to him in the course of argument a hypothetical case where the registered trade mark consists of a fancy label or the shape of a container. In the first it involves the wholesale unlicensed copying of someone else’s copyright drawings and in the latter it is a breach of someone else’s registered design or unregistered design right. I asked if the proprietor of the registered mark is entitled to override these conflicting rights. His answer was Yes.

[39] In my view Mr Silverleaf’s proposition is bad in law. His client has acquired no entitlement to use the ‘392 mark by registration. It has only acquired the right to prevent others infringing. A number of the cases cited by Mr Hobbs support that view. I need only refer to one of them, Re Lyle & Kinahan Ltd’s Application (1907) 24 RPC 249 at 262 per Buckley LJ:

‘The registration of a Trade Mark does not confer any right at all of the description there pointed to, but it does confer a right, and the only right is the right to prevent anybody else from using that Trade Mark as a mark for their goods, but it does not give the registered owner of the Trade Mark any right to use that Trade Mark if the Trade Mark would deceive. I conceive that if at the date when application is made to register a Trade Mark there is no ground of objection upon the footing that it will be calculated to deceive, and if subsequently by alterations in the character of the business of the two parties respectively the use of the Trade Mark will be calculated to deceive and a passing-off action were brought by one party against the other, it would be no defence at all on the part of the owner of the registered Trade Mark to say—“Deception or no deception I am entitled to do it because that a is my registered Trade Mark.” That could not be advanced for one moment. In other words, the registration of a Trade Mark does not confer any right to do that which could not have been done irrespective of the Trade Mark, in the sense of doing any acts which would be competition in business. The only right which it confers is a right to restrain others from using that Trade Mark.’

b [40] Had the legislature intended to bestow on the owner of a registered trade mark (or any other intellectual property right) an entitlement to override the rights of others it could and should have done so expressly. An example of this is to be found in the Trade Marks Act 1938 which provided that use of a registered trade mark could not amount to an infringement of another registered trade mark (see s 4(4)). A similar provision is to be found in the 1994 Act (see s 11(1)).

c However even that limited and express statutory right may be open to challenge since it is said by the claimant to be inconsistent with the provisions of the First Council Directive (EEC) 89/104 (to approximate the laws of the member states relating to trade marks) (OJ 1989 L40 p 1) (the Trade Mark Directive).

d Furthermore Mr Silverleaf’s argument is difficult to reconcile with s 48(1) which provides:

‘Where the proprietor of an earlier trade mark or other earlier right has acquiesced for a continuous period of five years in the use of a registered trade mark in the United Kingdom, being aware of that use, there shall cease to be any entitlement on the basis of that earlier trade mark or other right ...

e (b) to oppose the use of the later trade mark in relation to the goods or services in relation to which it has been so used ...’

[41] This proceeds on the basis that the owner of the earlier right (for example Inter Lotto as owner of its rights to protect its goodwill) is entitled to sue the proprietor of the later trade mark if the use of the latter has not been continuous or has not been for five years or if the owner of the earlier mark was ignorant of the later use of the registered trade mark. In other words the owner of the registered trade mark does not have an entitlement to use his mark in the face of earlier competing rights owned by someone else.

g IS INTER LOTTO PRECLUDED FROM RELYING ON REPUTATION AND GOODWILL BUILT UP ON THE BACK OF USE OF THE TRADE MARK WHICH, IN THE CIRCUMSTANCES PRESUMED FOR THIS APPLICATION, CONSTITUTED INFRINGEMENT OF THE ‘392 MARK?

[42] Mr Silverleaf’s argument is encapsulated in the extract from his skeleton argument set out in [5] and [6], above. Taken at face value, this would produce

h strange and far-reaching results. First, if a trader cannot rely upon goodwill or reputation built up on trade which is ‘unlawful’ in the sense used by Mr Silverleaf, it would follow that it should be incapable of being relied on against any competitor. Thus it would be a defence to a passing off action to show that the claimant’s use infringed a third party’s trade marks. Since there has been an

j explosion of registration of marks, both national and Community, covering ever wider classes of goods and services, in many cases it would be open to the defendant to run this point. Furthermore, if infringement of a trade mark makes the use ‘unlawful’ and, for that reason, undeserving of protection in a court of law, why should the unlawfulness be limited to infringement of trade mark? If the use relied on by the claimant could be said to infringe someone else’s copyright, design rights or be libellous why should he be any more entitled to rely on his goodwill and reputation than if his unlawfulness consisted of infringement of a registered trade mark?

[43] In the course of argument Mr Silverleaf addressed some of these points. First he said that this defence would only be open to the proprietor of the infringed right. Second he said that the weakness in the claimant's ability to rely on its reputation and goodwill only arises once the owner of the infringed right has lodged a claim of infringement. As far as I could tell, both of these were arguments of expediency. There was no discernible principle which would justify cutting down the ex turpi rule in this way. As Mr Hobbs said, if Mr Silverleaf were right, the claimant's goodwill and reputation would be simultaneously lawful and protectable against third parties but unlawful and not protectable against the owner of the registered trade mark.

[44] There is nothing in this defence either. The underlying principle of ex turpi causa is that the behaviour of the party has been so heinous that the court will not assist it. In the case of trade marks and passing off, occasionally the courts have held that the claimant's rights have been built up or supported fraudulently. In those cases the court will not support the claim. Examples include Bile Bean Manufacturing Co v Davidson (1906) 23 RPC 725 and Leather Cloth Co Ltd v American Leather Cloth Co Ltd (1865) 11 HL Cas 523 at 542, 11 ER 1435 at 1443–1444 in which Lord Kingsdown said:

‘Nobody doubts that a trader may be guilty of such misrepresentations with respect to his goods, as to amount to a fraud upon the public, and to disentitle him on that ground, as against a rival trader, to the relief in a court of equity which he might otherwise claim. What would constitute a misrepresentation of this description, may in particular cases be a reasonable subject of doubt, and it was in the present case the ground of the difference between the two judgments under consideration. The general rule seems to be that the mis-statement of any material fact calculated to deceive the public, will be sufficient for the purpose.’

[45] Relevant considerations include the following. First, whether or not a party's behaviour has been so bad as to merit exclusion from protection by the court is an issue of fact. Second, the wrongdoing has to be substantial and go to the heart of the right sued on. In my view it is unarguable that trade mark infringement without more amounts to wrongdoing of such a level of depravity as to engage the doctrine. Calling Inter Lotto's actions ‘unlawful’ as Mr Silverleaf did on many occasions, does not alter its character. There may be cases where the nature of the infringement is so flagrant and clearly and knowingly wrongful that a court might refuse to allow the claimant to rely on his goodwill and reputation. For example, a trader who sells through street markets counterfeit versions of sound recordings and DVDs bearing a famous trade mark might not be allowed to rely on his sales to maintain a passing off action against another counterfeiter who has come onto the market after him. But there is nothing like that here. The only wrongdoing alleged is the fact of infringement of the ‘392 mark (assuming, of course, that it is infringed). As I have said, the argument is that there is a per se disentitlement from relying on Inter Lotto's goodwill and reputation as and from the date on which Camelot applied to register the ‘392 mark. It should be borne in mind that there is no suggestion of dishonesty or flagrancy here, not least because it appears that Inter Lotto was using its mark months before Camelot applied to register its mark and a year before Camelot started to use it.

a [46] Mr Silverleaf says that it is absurd that Inter Lotto should be allowed to sue his client for passing off. He says that Inter Lotto is trying to say that Camelot cannot use its registered mark. First, this is a mischaracterisation of Inter Lotto's case. It is only saying that Camelot cannot use its mark in a way which will lead to deception and confusion. If Camelot can avoid those problems, it can continue to use the '392 mark. Second, whatever the impact of the '392 registration on b Inter Lotto, I can see nothing absurd or even surprising in Inter Lotto being able to prevent its reputation and goodwill (assuming for this purpose that the allegations made in its pleadings are borne out at the trial) being appropriated by Camelot.

c [47] It follows that the preliminary issue is answered in the negative. The relevant date for assessing Inter Lotto's reputation and goodwill for its claim in passing off is the date upon which Camelot started using that mark in relation to its lottery product.

d [48] I should mention that both Mr Hobbs and Mr Silverleaf made reference to the provisions of the Trade Mark Directive in the course of their submissions. Each said that his arguments were consistent with, or not inconsistent with, that legislation. For the reasons set out above, the answer to the preliminary question is clear as a matter of domestic law. In those circumstances it is not necessary to consider the Community legislation.

Order accordingly.

Celia Fox Barrister.

R v G and another

[2002] EWCA Crim 1992

COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION

DYSON LJ, SILBER J AND JUDGE BEAUMONT QC

16, 17 JULY 2002

Criminal law – Damage to property – Recklessness whether property would be destroyed or damaged – Recklessness – Arson – Test to be applied in deciding whether defendant reckless – Whether defendant's act had created obvious risk that property would be destroyed or damaged – Whether obviousness of risk to be determined according to characteristics of particular defendant – Whether age of defendant to be taken into account in determining obviousness of risk – Whether failure to take account of defendant's age breaching right to fair trial – Criminal Damage Act 1971, s 1 – Human Rights Act 1998, Sch 1, Pt I, art 6(1).

The defendants, aged 11 and 12 respectively, set fire to bundles of newspapers, threw them under a large bin, and left them to burn. The bin was set alight and the fire spread to a shop and adjoining buildings. Damage estimated at £1m was caused. In interview, the defendants said that they had thought that the newspapers would burn themselves out, and that it had never crossed their minds that there was a risk that fire would spread to the buildings. They were charged with arson being reckless as to whether or not property would be destroyed or damaged, contrary to s 1(1) and (3) of the Criminal Damage Act 1971. At the start of the trial the judge ruled, on the basis of previous binding authority, that the test that the jury had to apply in deciding whether the defendants had been reckless as to whether the property would be destroyed or damaged was whether they had done an act which had in fact created an obvious risk that property would be destroyed or damaged, and whether, when they had done the act, they had either not given any thought to the possibility of there being such a risk, or had recognised that there was some risk involved and had nevertheless gone on to do it. He further ruled that the question whether there was an obvious risk of the property being damaged had to be assessed by reference to the reasonable man, and not to a person endowed with the characteristics of the defendants. He directed the jury in accordance with that ruling, telling them that no allowance was made by the law for the youth of the defendants, for their lack of maturity, or for their own inability, if such the jury found it to be, to assess what was going on. The defendants were convicted, and appealed against their convictions on the grounds (i) that the judge had erred in his ruling as to the correct test to be applied, and that he should have held that that test did not apply to children; and/or (ii) that if that test would otherwise apply to children, it was incompatible with art 6^a of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998).

Held – (1) The test to be applied in a case of reckless arson was whether the defendant had done an act which had in fact created an obvious risk that property would be destroyed or damaged, and whether, when he had done the act, he had a either not given any thought to the possibility of there being such a risk, or had recognised that there was some risk involved and had nevertheless gone on to do it. That test was objective, in that the question whether there was an obvious risk of the property being damaged had to be assessed by reference to the ordinarily prudent person, no other qualities or characteristics being relevant. The judge had, accordingly, directed the jury correctly (see [20], [23], below); R v Caldwell [1981] 1 All ER 961 applied.

^a Article 6 is set out at [24], below

b (2) A provision which defined the mental element that was a necessary ingredient of an offence was plainly a matter of substantive law, not a matter of procedure, since it was part of the very definition of what constituted the offence. Article 6 of the convention was not concerned with the fairness of provisions of substantive law. Accordingly, the fairness of the test to be applied in cases of reckless arson, in so far as it applied to children, was not justiciable under art 6; Z v UK [2001] 2 FCR 246 considered.

Notes

d For destroying or damaging property see 11(1) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 594.

For the Criminal Damage Act 1971, s 1, see 12 Halsbury's Statutes (2000 reissue) 522.

For the Human Rights Act 1998, Sch 1, Pt I, see 7 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2002 reissue) 554.

e Cases referred to in judgment

Ashingdane v UK (1985) 7 EHRR 528, [1985] ECHR 8225/78, ECt HR.

Barbera v Spain (1988) 11 EHRR 360, [1988] ECHR 10588/83, ECt HR.

Elliott v C (a minor) (1983) 77 Cr App R 103, DC.

R v Caldwell [1981] 1 All ER 961, [1982] AC 341, [1981] 2 WLR 509, HL.

f R v Coles (1995) 1 Cr App R 157, CA.

R v Cunningham [1957] 2 All ER 412, [1957] 2 QB 396, [1957] 3 WLR 76, CCA.

R v Lawrence [1981] 1 All ER 974, [1982] AC 510, [1981] 2 WLR 524, HL.

R v Miller [1983] 1 All ER 978, [1983] 2 AC 161, [1983] 2 WLR 539, HL.

R v Reid [1992] 3 All ER 673, [1992] 1 WLR 793, HL.

g R v Stephen Malcolm R (1984) 79 Cr App R 334, CA.

R v Stephenson [1979] 2 All ER 1198, [1979] QB 695, [1979] 3 WLR 193, CA.

Salabiaku v France (1988) 13 EHRR 379, [1988] ECHR 10589/83, ECt HR.

Z v UK (2001) 10 BHRC 384, ECt HR.

h Appeal

The appellants, AG and SR, appealed with leave from their conviction on 23 March 2001 in the Crown Court at Aylesbury before Judge Maher and a jury, of a single offence of arson, causing damage to property being reckless as to whether such property would be damaged, contrary to s 1(1) and (3) of the Criminal Damage Act 1971. The facts are set out in the judgment of Dyson LJ.

j

Andrew Jefferies (assigned by the Registrar of Criminal Appeals) for G.

Alan Newman QC and Isobel Ascherson (assigned by the Registrar of Criminal Appeals) for R.

Richard Whittam and Basil Hillman (instructed by the Crown Prosecution Service) for the Crown.

17 July 2002. The following judgment of the court was delivered.

DYSON LJ.

[1] On 23 March 2001 in the Crown Court at Aylesbury before Judge Maher and a jury, the appellants were convicted of a single offence of arson, causing damage to property being reckless as to whether such property would be damaged, contrary to s 1(1) and (3) of the Criminal Damage Act 1971. On 20 April, they were each sentenced to a one-year supervision order. At the time of the offences, AG was 11 years of age, and SR 12. They appeal against their convictions with the leave of the single judge.

b

[2] In R v Caldwell [1981] 1 All ER 961 at 967, [1982] AC 341 at 354, Lord Diplock (with whom Lords Keith of Kinkel and Roskill agreed) said that a person charged with an offence under s 1(1) of the 1971 Act is 'reckless as to whether any such property would be destroyed or damaged' if—

c

'(1) he does an act which in fact creates an obvious risk that property will be destroyed or damaged and (2) when he does the act he either has not given any thought to the possibility of there being any such risk or has recognised that there was some risk involved and has none the less gone on to do it.'

d

We shall refer to this as 'the Caldwell test'. Earlier in his speech, Lord Diplock had made it clear that his exposition of the requirements of recklessness was made by reference to the 'ordinary prudent individual'. The defendant in that case was an adult.

e

[3] At the start of the trial the judge ruled that he had to direct the jury to apply the Caldwell test, and that whether there was an obvious risk of the property being damaged was to be assessed by reference to the reasonable man, and not a person endowed with the characteristics of the defendants. The judge summed up in accordance with this ruling. He said that 'the ordinary reasonable bystander is an adult ... He has got in his mind that stock of everyday information which one acquires in the process of growing up'. A little later he said: 'no allowance is made by the law for the youth of these boys or their lack of maturity or their own inability, if such you find it to be, to assess what was going on.'

f

g

[4] The appeal raises one issue only, and it is an important issue. It is argued on behalf of both appellants that the judge was wrong to rule that the Caldwell test was the correct test to apply. He should have held that it (a) does not apply to children; and/or (b) if it would otherwise apply to children, it is incompatible with art 6 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998). He should, therefore, have held that, at least in the case of a defendant who is a young child, art 6 requires it to be a necessary condition of recklessness that the relevant risk be obvious to the particular defendant, and not merely to the ordinary reasonable bystander. Before we examine the arguments in more detail, we should briefly set out the facts.

h

j

[5] On the night of 21 August 2000, the appellants were out camping. At about 3.45 am on 22 August, they got into the yard at the back of the Co-op shop in NP where they opened up bundles of newspapers. They set some of them alight, and threw the burning newspapers under a large wheelie-bin where they left them to burn. The bin was set alight, and the fire spread to the shop. The shop and some a adjoining buildings caught fire. Approximately £1m damage was caused. At their first interview, the boys denied any involvement. In their second interview, they admitted what had happened, and said that they thought that the lit newspapers would burn themselves out on the concrete floor. They said that it never crossed their minds that there was a risk that the fire would spread to the building.

b THE AUTHORITIES

[6] We start with an examination of the relevant authorities. First, R v Caldwell [1981] 1 All ER 961, [1982] AC 341 itself. Lord Diplock, with whom Lords Keith and Roskill agreed, gave the leading speech. He said:

c 'My Lords, I see no warrant for making any such assumption in an Act whose declared purpose is to revise the then existing law as to offences of damage to property, not to perpetuate it. "Reckless" as used in the new statutory definition of the mens rea of these offences is an ordinary English word. It had not by 1971 become a term of legal art with some more limited esoteric meaning than that which it bore in ordinary speech, a meaning which surely includes not only deciding to ignore a risk of harmful consequences resulting from one's acts that one has recognised as existing, but also failing to give any thought to whether or not there is any such risk in circumstances where, if any thought were given to the matter, it would be obvious that there was. If one is attaching labels, the latter state of mind is neither more nor less "subjective" than the first. But the label solves nothing. It is a statement of the obvious; mens rea is, by definition, a state of mind of the accused himself at the time he did the physical act that constitutes the actus reus of the offence; it cannot be the mental state of some non-existent, hypothetical person. Nevertheless, to decide whether someone has been "reckless" as to whether harmful consequences of a particular kind will result from his act, as distinguished from his actually intending such harmful consequences to follow, does call for some consideration of how the mind of the ordinary prudent individual would have reacted to a similar situation. If there were nothing in the circumstances that ought to have drawn the attention of an ordinary prudent individual to the possibility of that kind of harmful consequence, the accused would not be described as "reckless" in the natural meaning of that word for failing to address his mind to the possibility; nor, if the risk of the harmful consequences was so slight that the ordinary prudent individual on due consideration of the risk would not be deterred from treating it as negligible, could the accused be described as "reckless" in its ordinary sense if, having considered the risk, he decided to ignore it.' (See [1981] 1 All ER 961 at 966, [1982] AC 341 at 353-354.)

h [7] A little later, appears the passage that we have already set out at [2], above.

i [8] R v Caldwell was concerned with an offence under s 1(1) of the 1971 Act. In R v Lawrence [1981] 1 All ER 974, [1982] AC 510, the House of Lords had to consider recklessness for the purpose of an offence of reckless driving. Lord Diplock dealt with the question of recklessness and said ([1981] 1 All ER 974 at 982, [1982] AC 510 at 526-527):

'I turn now to the mens rea. My task is greatly simplified by what has already been said about the concept of recklessness in criminal law in R v Caldwell. Warning was there given against adopting the simplistic approach of treating all problems of criminal liability as soluble by classifying the test of liability as being either "subjective" or "objective". Recklessness on the part of the doer of an act does presuppose that there is something in the circumstances that would have drawn the attention of an ordinary prudent individual to the possibility that his act was capable of causing the kind of serious harmful consequences that the section which creates the offence was intended to prevent, and that the risk of those harmful consequences occurring was not so slight that an ordinary prudent individual would feel justified in treating them as negligible. It is only when this is so that the doer of the act is acting "recklessly" if, before doing the act, he either fails to give any thought to the possibility of there being any such risk or, having recognised that there was such risk, he nevertheless goes on to do it. In my view, an appropriate instruction to the jury on what is meant by driving recklessly would be that they must be satisfied of two things: first, that the defendant was in fact driving the vehicle in such a manner as to create an obvious and serious risk of causing physical injury to some other person who might happen to be using the road or of doing substantial damage to property; and, second, that in driving in that manner the defendant did so without having given any thought to the possibility of there being any such risk or, having recognised that there was some risk involved, had none the less gone on to take it. It is for the jury to decide whether the risk created by the manner in which the vehicle was being driven was both obvious and serious and, in deciding this, they may apply the standard of the ordinary prudent motorist as represented by themselves. If satisfied that an obvious and serious risk was created by the manner of the defendant's driving, the jury are entitled to infer that he was in one or other of the states of mind required to constitute the offence and will probably do so; but regard must be given to any explanation he gives as to his state of mind which may displace the inference.'

[9] All subsequent attempts in cases under s 1(1) of the 1971 Act to distinguish R v Caldwell, and to persuade the court not to apply the Caldwell test have failed. Thus, in Elliott v C (a minor) (1983) 77 Cr App R 103, the Divisional Court applied the test to the case of a 14-year-old girl who was in a remedial class at school. The court held that the phrase 'creates an obvious risk' means that the risk must have been obvious to a reasonably prudent person, and not necessarily to the defendant. The justices had found that the risk that the fire that had been started by the defendant would cause damage would not have been obvious 'having regard to the age and understanding of the defendant, her lack of experience of dealing with inflammable spirit, and the fact that she must have been tired and exhausted at the time' (see (1983) 77 Cr App R 103 at 117). They therefore dismissed the information. The Divisional Court allowed the prosecutor's appeal on the ground that the justices had failed to apply the Caldwell test. Robert Goff LJ expressed his unhappiness about this result. Nevertheless, he said (at 118–119):

'Here again, it would be unrealistic if I were to disguise the fact that I am well aware that the statement of principle by Lord Diplock in R. v. CALDWELL has been the subject of comment, much of it critical, in articles written by jurists; and that I have studied certain of these articles with interest. I find it striking that the justices, in reaching their conclusion in the present case, have done so (no doubt in response to an argument advanced on the defendant's behalf) by imposing upon Lord Diplock's statement of principle a qualification similar to one considered by Professor Glanville

Williams in his article "Recklessness Redefined" in [1981] C.L.J. 252, 270-271.

This is that a defendant should only be regarded as having acted recklessly by virtue of his failure to give any thought to an obvious risk that property would be destroyed or damaged, where such risk would have been obvious to him if he had given any thought to the matter. However, having studied Lord Diplock's speech, I do not think it would be consistent with his reasoning to impose any such qualification. I say that not only because this qualification does not appear in terms in his conclusion which I have already quoted, but also because, when considering earlier in his speech Professor Kenny's definition of recklessness (which he rejected as being too narrow), Lord Diplock expressly adverted to the fact that that definition presupposed that "if thought were given to the matter by the doer before the act was done, it would have been apparent to him that there was a real risk of its having the relevant harmful consequences." It seems to me that, having expressly considered that element in Professor Kenny's test, and having (as I think) plainly decided to omit it from his own formulation of the concept of recklessness, it would not now be legitimate for an inferior court, in a case under this particular subsection, to impose a qualification which had so been rejected by Lord Diplock himself. It follows that for that reason alone I do not feel able to uphold the reasoning of the magistrates in the present case.'

[10] The case of R v Stephen Malcolm R (1984) 79 Cr App R 334 concerned a defendant who was 15 years of age. It was accepted on his behalf that R v Caldwell [1981] 1 All ER 961, [1982] AC 341 prevented the court from asking the question whether the defendant was aware of the risk. But it was argued (at 340) that the court could ask the question whether a 'person of the age of the defendant and with his characteristics which might be relevant to his ability to foresee the risk, would have appreciated it'. The judgment of the court was given by Ackner LJ. He held that it was not open to this court to accept this suggested modified departure from the full rigour of the Caldwell test. He did not think (at 341) that this 'via media' was for one moment in the mind of Lord Diplock'. Ackner LJ did not disguise his regret in reaching this conclusion.

[11] Another attempt to distinguish R v Caldwell was made in R v Coles [1995] 1 Cr App R 157. But before we consider that case, we need to refer to the House of Lords' decision in R v Reid [1992] 3 All ER 673, [1992] 1 WLR 793. This was a reckless driving case. The summing up had contained a direction using the very words stated by Lord Diplock in R v Lawrence [1981] 1 All ER 974 at 982, [1982] AC 510 at 526 as being 'an appropriate instruction' on what is meant by driving recklessly. It was submitted that the definition of recklessness in R v Lawrence was incorrect, and that their Lordships should depart from it. This they refused to do. They endorsed the reasoning in R v Caldwell and R v Lawrence that responsibility in the criminal law should extend beyond those who appreciate the risks they run to those who culpably fail to do so. But there are passages in the speeches on which Mr Newman relies as indicating a possible softening of Lord Diplock's formulation in R v Lawrence. In particular, Lord Keith said ([1992] 3 All ER 673 at 675, [1992] 1 WLR 793 at 796):

"The substance of Lord Diplock's formulation of a specimen jury direction is accordingly apt, in my opinion, to cover the generality of cases. But I do not rule out that in certain cases there may be special circumstances which require it to be modified or added to, for example where the driver acted under some understandable and excusable mistake or where his capacity to appreciate risks was adversely affected by some condition not involving fault on his part. There may also be cases where the driver acted as he did in a sudden dilemma created by the actions of others. The specific certified question as to whether the jury should always be directed in the ipsissima verba of Lord Diplock's formulation I would answer in the negative. In some cases when the only relevant issue is one of disputed fact it may not be necessary to use it all. In others it may require to be modified or adapted to suit the circumstances of the case.'

[12] We would also refer to the speech of Lord Goff of Chieveley ([1992] 3 All ER 673 at 690, [1992] 1 WLR 793 at 813) and the speech of Lord Browne-Wilkinson ([1992] 3 All ER 673 at 696, [1992] 1 WLR 793 at 819).

[13] But it is important to emphasise that these are no more than dicta which, as was said by Stewart Field and Mervyn Lynn in their article 'Capacity, Recklessness and the House of Lords' [1993] Crim LR 127, are 'a possible signpost to future refinement of the test for Caldwell/Lawrence recklessness'. Moreover, various of the speeches indicated that what was said about recklessness in R v Reid was directed only at the offence of reckless driving. Thus Lord Ackner: [1992] 3 All ER 673 at 683, [1992] 1 WLR 793 at 805. Lord Goff ([1992] 3 All ER 673 at 685, [1992] 1 WLR 793 at 807) said that the case was not directly concerned with the meaning of the word 'reckless' in s 1(1) of the 1971 Act. Lord Browne-Wilkinson ([1992] 3 All ER 673 at 675 at 694, [1992] 1 WLR 793 at 816–817) said that he did not accept that the constituent elements of recklessness must be the same in all statutes. He identified three factors which could lead to the conclusion that recklessness in the offence of reckless driving did not bear the same meaning as recklessness in s 1 of the 1971 Act.

[14] We can now return to R v Coles (1995) 1 Cr App R 157. The appellant in that case was 15 years of age. The defence wished to call expert evidence from a psychologist on the capacity of the appellant to foresee the risks involved in his actions, and submitted that the test of recklessness should be subjective. The trial judge refused to allow the evidence and rejected the submission as to the correct test for recklessness. The defendant pleaded guilty and appealed to this court. The appeal was dismissed. Hobhouse LJ gave the judgment of the court. He reviewed the authorities, including R v Reid. He said that the request by the defence to substitute in the first leg of the Caldwell direction 'a defendant aged 11 with low intellectual functioning' for the usual reference to the 'reasonable prudent man' was 'misconceived'. It showed confusion between actus reus and mens rea (see (1995) 1 Cr App R 157 at 163). The first leg provided an objective criterion which the defendant's act must satisfy, and his mental state was irrelevant on that point. The appellant then sought to argue that the facts required a qualification to the second leg of the Caldwell direction so as to require the jury to consider the culpability of the particular defendant having regard to his capacity to foresee the relevant risk (see (1995) 1 Cr App R 157 at 163). Hobhouse LJ accepted that proof of an obvious risk was not necessarily proof of recklessness: the jury must listen to the defendant's explanations, which might show that he did not fall within either of the two state of mind in the second leg of the Caldwell direction (see (1995) 1 Cr App R 157 at 165). The matter was not, however, free of authority. R v Miller [1983] 1 All ER 978, [1983] 2 AC 161 was authority for the view that for proof of recklessness, there is no need to prove any actual appreciation on the part of the defendant of the relevant risk (see (1995) 1 Cr App R 157 at 166). The qualification suggested to the Caldwell test was the a same as had been rejected in Elliott v C (a minor) (1983) 77 Cr App R 103. As regards R v Reid, Hobhouse LJ noted that in that case a further attempt had been made, in the context of reckless driving, to depart from the formulations of Lord Diplock in R v Caldwell and R v Lawrence, and said ((1995) 1 Cr App R 157 at 168):

b 'The essence of the argument being advanced was the same as the underlying argument advanced before us—that it is inconsistent with a proper approach to criminal responsibility to exclude a subjective qualification of the Caldwell formulation. The House of Lords in reasoned judgments rejected those arguments. Even if it were open to this court to do so, it is not appropriate that this Court should accede to an invitation to reformulate the law of recklessness when it has so recently been confirmed, after full consideration, by a decision of the House of Lords.'

A CONSIDERATION OF THE PROBLEM WITHOUT REFERENCE TO ART 6 OF THE CONVENTION

d [15] Mr Newman QC submits as follows. The Caldwell test is not binding on us in this case because the facts here are materially different from the facts in R v Caldwell. The ratio of R v Caldwell is that the test propounded by Lord Diplock only applies to defendants who are adults who have no relevant disability. That is why he referred repeatedly in his speech to the 'ordinary prudent individual'. He did not have in mind young children, who although in general terms are old enough to have criminal responsibility, may not be of sufficient age to be able to have the understanding and foresight of an adult. Nor did he have in mind e persons, of whatever age, who suffer from some relevant mental or physical disability. In short, the House of Lords only had to consider the case of the ordinary prudent individual, and the application of the Caldwell test is confined to such persons.

f [16] The central question that arises is: to whom must the risk mentioned in the first leg of the test be 'obvious'? Mr Newman submits that it must be obvious either to the defendant in the particular case, or to a reasonably prudent person endowed with the age and other characteristics of the defendant that are relevant to his or her being able to appreciate the existence of the risk. He says that it is irrational to take what is obvious to a reasonably prudent adult as the yardstick g by which to measure what is obvious to a young child or a person with relevant disabilities. Lord Diplock could not have intended this.

[17] Mr Newman makes the point that the Caldwell test has been subjected to frequent and sustained criticism, particularly in academic writings. One example will suffice. In the current edition of Smith and Hogan's Criminal Law (10th edn, h 2002) pp 81–82 the authors say:

j 'The test works harshly in these cases of young people. In the case of adults, it will do so in the case of those who lack the capacities of the ordinary prudent person. In [R v Stephenson [1979] 2 All ER 1198, [1979] QB 695] a tramp sheltered in a hollow in a haystack. Feeling cold, he lit a fire in the hollow. The haystack was destroyed. Any reasonable person would have been aware of the risk but Stephenson was suffering from schizophrenia and may not have been aware of it. Because this was not clearly left to the jury, the court—pre-Caldwell—quashed his conviction. Even if he had stopped to think it is possible that, because of his condition, he might not have realised that there was a risk of damage. Stephenson appears to be overruled by Caldwell. How far are we to go in ignoring abnormalities? Is a blind man to be held to have recklessly damaged property because he was unaware of a risk which would have been obvious to a sighted person? And what about temporary handicaps – the person who strikes a match, being unaware because of his heavy cold, that the premises reek with petrol fumes? Caldwell, as interpreted in Elliott v C and R v Stephen Malcolm R, appears to be a slippery slope to intolerable injustice with no obvious exit. If it would have appeared to the reasonably prudent person that there was an obvious risk, it is immaterial that a person with expert knowledge not possessed by the defendant would have known that there was no, or no serious, risk. A person may act, reckless to whether life is endangered, without there being in fact any danger to life.’

[18] We readily acknowledge the force of the criticisms that have been made of the Caldwell test. They were adverted to in Elliott v C (a minor) (1983) 77 Cr App R 103 and R v Stephen Malcolm R (1984) 79 Cr App R 334. The Caldwell test has been criticised and has not been applied in a number of Commonwealth jurisdictions. All this we accept. The question for us is whether it is open to us to hold that the Caldwell test should not have been applied in this case. We are in no doubt that it is not.

[19] First, it seems to us that in R v Caldwell, Lord Diplock was propounding a test at a high level of generalisation, which he intended to apply at least to all cases under s 1 of the 1971 Act. He considered the definition of recklessness given by Professor Kenny in the first edition of his Outlines of Criminal Law (1901) in the context of offences which are committed ‘maliciously’ and which was approved in R v Cunningham [1957] 2 All ER 412, [1957] 2 QB 396, viz:

‘In any statutory definition of a crime “malice” must be taken ... as requiring either (i) an actual intention to do the particular kind of harm that in fact was done, or (ii) recklessness as to whether such harm should occur or not (i.e. the accused has foreseen that the particular kind of harm might be done, and yet has gone on to take the risk of it).’

[20] This test unquestionably does focus on the state of mind of the particular defendant who is before the court. But Lord Diplock rejected this as the test to be applied to recklessness in s 1(1) of the 1971 Act. The passage which we have already quoted at [6], above, refers three times to the ‘ordinary prudent individual’. Although Lord Diplock criticised the use of the labels ‘subjective’ and ‘objective’, it is clear that he opted for what it is convenient to call the ‘objective’ test. There is nothing in his speech to indicate that he considered that any qualities or characteristics were relevant other than that the person should be ordinarily prudent. A number of characteristics may affect a person’s ability to see a risk for what it is: he may be too young, or too old; he may be of poor intelligence or suffer from some relevant psychological condition; or from physical disabilities which impair his ability to appreciate the existence of a risk. If Lord Diplock had considered that any of these factors was relevant to the obviousness of the risk, he would have said so. He would not have repeatedly referred to the ordinary prudent individual.

[21] But secondly, even if we entertained some doubt as to the intended scope of the Caldwell test, we are in any event bound by previous authority to reject Mr Newman’s submissions. It is true that the decision in Elliott’s case is not binding on this court. But the carefully considered judgments of Robert Goff LJ and Glidewell J are of great persuasive force. We bear in mind that Robert a Goff LJ said (at 116–117) that he allowed the appeal simply because he felt constrained to do so by R v Caldwell, although the result was one about which he was unhappy. The decisions in R v Stephen Malcolm R (1984) 79 Cr App R 334 and R v Coles (1995) 1 Cr App R 157 are binding on this court. Mr Newman submits that these decisions are simply wrong and should not be followed.

b [22] We do not feel able to accept this submission. It seems to us that Professor Elliott put the matter accurately in his article 'Endangering Life by Destroying or Damaging Property' [1997] Crim LR 382 at 387:

c 'Thus, in the absence of further recourse to the House of Lords, it is still the law that a defendant charged with criminal damage who gives no thought to an obvious risk is prima facie reckless. He is allowed to explain his failure to give thought, which may in rare cases be held to be non-culpable, but evidence of lack of capacity to see the risk will not prevent a finding of recklessness. The objective criterion which his conduct must satisfy is that it suggests to an ordinary prudent individual the possibility of a non-negligible risk of the relevant harm occurring.'

d We should add that we do not consider that R v Reid [1992] 3 All ER 673, [1992] 1 WLR 793 requires us to arrive at a different result. First, R v Reid was analysed in R v Coles with the result to which we have earlier referred. We are bound by R v Coles, and that is sufficient reason for saying that R v Reid does not advance Mr Newman's argument. Secondly, in R v Reid their Lordships made it clear that they were dealing with reckless driving, and not with s 1(1) of the 1971 Act.

e Thirdly, both Elliott's case and R v Stephen Malcolm R were cited in R v Reid. No mention is made of either decision in any of the speeches in R v Reid. If the House of Lords considered that those decisions were wrong, it is most surprising that they did not say so.

f [23] In our judgment, it is for the House of Lords to decide whether the time has come to revisit the Caldwell test. Although we see great force in the criticisms of the first leg of the Caldwell test that have been made, it is not open to this court to depart from it. Accordingly, we reject the first route by which Mr Newman seeks to challenge the convictions in this case.

ARTICLE 6 OF THE CONVENTION

g [24] Article 6 of the convention provides:

h '1. In the determination of his civil rights and obligations or of any criminal charge against him, everyone is entitled to a fair and public hearing within a reasonable time by an independent and impartial tribunal established by law. Judgment shall be pronounced publicly but the press and public may be excluded from all or part of the trial in the interest of morals, public order or national security in a democratic society, where the interests of juveniles or the protection of the private life of the parties so require, or to the extent strictly necessary in the opinion of the court in special circumstances where publicity would prejudice the interests of justice.

j 2. Everyone charged with a criminal offence shall be presumed innocent until proved guilty according to law.

3. Everyone charged with a criminal offence has the following minimum rights:

(a) to be informed promptly, in a language he understands and in detail, of the nature and cause of the accusation against him;

(b) to have adequate time and facilities for the preparation of his defence;

(c) to defend himself in person or through legal assistance of his own choosing or, if he has not sufficient means to pay for legal assistance, to be given it free when the interests of justice so require; a

(d) to examine or have examined witnesses against him and to obtain the attendance and examination of witnesses on his behalf under the same conditions as witnesses against him;

(e) to have the free assistance of an interpreter if he cannot understand or speak the language used in court.' b

[25] Mr Newman advances the following propositions: (a) to judge the moral and legal culpability of a child by reference to the understanding and life experience of an adult is irrational and, therefore, unfair; (b) the Caldwell test is disproportionately harsh given the serious consequences that can potentially flow from a conviction of an offence under s 1(1) of the 1971 Act (detention for life); and (c) the Caldwell test effectively renders an offence under s 1(1) an offence of strict liability in the case of a child, because a child is incapable of advancing a defence based on his or her immaturity and lack of understanding. c

[26] He contends that art 6 is not restricted to ensuring procedural fairness. In any event, it is not helpful to classify provisions as procedural on the one hand and substantive on the other hand. Whether a provision is substantive or procedural in form is often a 'matter of chance', since it depends on how the national legislature has chosen to frame the provision. Mr Newman illustrates his point by the following example: d

'... if, instead of containing the word "reckless" in the offence-creating provision, there had been a separate provision of law which stated: "as regards criminal trials, children are presumed to have the same mental development and experience in life as adults" such provision would have been labelled "procedural" rather than "substantive" ...' e

The European Court of Human Rights does not attach importance to such labelling, but looks at 'the proceedings ... as a whole' and asks whether they comply with art 6 (see Barbera v Spain (1988) 11 EHRR 360 at 384–385 (para 68)). f

[27] In our judgment, Mr Newman's submissions are misconceived. We fully accept that art 6 should be given a broad and purposive interpretation. But it seems to us that it is clear, even without the assistance of Strasbourg jurisprudence, that on any natural reading of it, art 6 is not concerned with the fairness of provisions of substantive law. It contains three distinct elements: access to a court; provisions regarding the organisation and constitution of the court; and minimum standards of fairness concerning the conduct of proceedings. Mr Newman argues that the phrase 'a fair hearing', which appears in the body of the article, is sufficient to include the fairness of substantive law. But if the article is read as a whole, we have no doubt that this phrase does not bear the weight for which Mr Newman contends. g

[28] The distinction between procedural and substantive law is clear and important. It is not a matter of mere 'labelling'. A provision which defines the mental element or mens rea that is a necessary element of an offence is plainly not a matter of procedure. It is a matter of substantive law since it is part of the very definition of what constitutes the offence. There is a difference in kind between the requirement for, and definition of, a mental element of an offence (substantive), and the means by which the existence of such a mental element may be proved (procedural). h a [29] It is a matter for the contracting state to choose how to define the essential elements of an offence. Thus, it has been established that an offence of strict liability, as opposed to one requiring a mental element, does not violate art 6(2). In Salabiaku v France (1988) 13 EHRR 379 at 387 (para 27), the European Court of Human Rights said:

b 'As the Government and the Commission have pointed out, in principle the Contracting States remain free to apply the criminal law to an act where it is not carried out in the normal exercise of one of the rights protected under the Convention and, accordingly, to define the constituent elements of the resulting offence. In particular, and again in principle, the Contracting States may, under certain conditions, penalise a simple or objective fact as such, irrespective of whether it results from criminal intent or from negligence. Examples of such offences may be found in the laws of the Contracting States.'

d [30] The European Court of Human Rights has made it clear on a number of occasions that art 6 is not concerned with the fairness of substantive law. The case of Z v UK (2001) 10 BHRC 384 is a recent and important example. The applicants' claims against a local authority for negligently failing to protect them against abuse at the hands of their parents had been struck out in the United Kingdom courts as disclosing no cause of action. They complained, inter alia, that there had been a breach of art 6 because they had been denied access to a court. It was held by the European Court of Human Rights that there had been no breach. The court recognised the distinction between substantive law (which is not a matter for art 6) and procedural law (which is). Thus they said (at 405–406 (para 87)):

f 'The court recalls its constant case law to the effect that: "Article 6(1) extends only to contestations (disputes) over (civil) 'rights and obligations' which can be said, at least on arguable grounds, to be recognised under domestic law; it does not itself guarantee any particular content for (civil) 'rights and obligations' in the substantive law of the Contracting States" ... It will however apply to disputes of a "genuine and serious nature" concerning the actual existence of the right as well as to the scope or manner in which it is exercised.'

g [31] Later they said (at 408 (para 98)):

h 'As it has recalled above in para 87 it is a principle of convention case law that art 6 does not in itself guarantee any particular content for civil rights and obligations in national law, although other articles such as those protecting the right to respect for family life (art 8) and the right to property ... may do so.'

[32] Finally, they said (at 408–409):

j '100. In the present case, the court is led to the conclusion that the inability of the applicants to sue the local authority flowed not from an immunity but from the applicable principles governing the substantive right of action in domestic law. There was no restriction on access to the court of the kind contemplated in Ashingdane v UK (1985) 7 EHRR 528.

101. The applicants may not therefore claim that they were deprived of any right to a determination on the merits of their negligence claims. Their claims were properly and fairly examined in light of the applicable domestic legal principles concerning the tort of negligence. Once the House of Lords had ruled on the arguable legal issues that brought into play the applicability of art 6(1) of the convention ... the applicants could no longer claim any entitlement under art 6(1) to obtain any hearing concerning the facts. As pointed out above, such a hearing would have served no purpose, unless a duty of care in negligence had been held to exist in their case. It is not for this court to find that this should have been the outcome of the striking out proceedings since this would effectively involve substituting its own views as to the proper interpretation and content of domestic law.

[33] The position is quite clear. So far as art 6 is concerned, the fairness of the provisions of the substantive law of the contracting states is not a matter for investigation. The content and interpretation of domestic substantive law is not engaged by art 6. It may, however, be engaged by other articles of the convention. Thus, for example, if the penalty for an offence under s 1(1) of the 1971 Act were fixed at the current maximum of life imprisonment, then there would be an overwhelming case for saying that it amounted to 'inhuman or degrading treatment punishment' contrary to art 3.

[34] On the other hand, the means by which a person's substantive civil rights are vindicated by the courts of the contracting states, and the means by which those courts try a person charged with a substantive criminal offence are susceptible to scrutiny under art 6. We are in no doubt that the fairness of the Caldwell test, in so far as it is applied to children, is not justiciable under art 6.

[35] Mr Newman has been unable to cite any decision of the European Court of Human Rights which supports the proposition that art 6 is concerned with fairness of substantive law. We do not consider that the decision in Barbera v Spain (1988) 11 EHRR 360 affords any support for Mr Newman's contrary submissions. That was a case which concerned allegations of bias in the court and procedural unfairness. There was no complaint that the substantive offences on which they faced trial were themselves unfair. It was in that context that what the court said at para 68 (at 384–385) must be considered. They said:

'As a general rule, it is for the national courts, and in particular the court of first instance, to assess the evidence before them as well as the relevance of the evidence which the accused seeks to adduce. The Court must, however, determine—and in this it agrees with the Commission—whether the proceedings considered as a whole, including the way in which prosecution and defence evidence was taken, were fair as required by Article 6(1). For this purpose it will consider in turn the various grounds of complaint before it.'

[36] For these reasons, these appeals must be dismissed.

Appeals dismissed.

Lynne Townley Barrister.

Cinderella Rockerfellas Ltd v Rudd

[2003] EWCA Civ 529

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

POTTER, CHADWICK AND TUCKEY LJJ

3, 4 FEBRUARY, 11 APRIL 2003

Rates – Rateable occupation – Rateable hereditament – Chattels enjoyed with land – Vessel used as floating nightclub – Vessel permanently secured to land – Vessel's owner licensed to use land for such purpose – Whether rateable.

The company operated and occupied a nightclub situated upon a floating vessel which at all material times was moored and berthed on a river under licence. The vessel was moored to the quay and held in position over the riverbed by means of ropes and chains secured to capstans on the quayside. On an appeal by the company against two entries in the valuation list relating to the vessel, the local valuation tribunal directed that the entries should be deleted on the ground that the vessel was not rateable. The valuation officer appealed to the Lands Tribunal, which held, applying the principle that although a chattel was not a rateable hereditament by itself, it might become rateable together with land if placed on a piece of land and enjoyed with it in such circumstances and with such a degree of permanence that the chattel and the land could together be regarded as one unit of occupation, that the vessel was rateable. The company appealed, contending that the absence of vertical connection to the riverbed effectively prevented the presence of the floating vessel from being regarded as itself a method of occupation of the land beneath, and that the absence of any adaptation of the vessel or its integration and enjoyment with the adjacent land preserved its separate character as a chattel.

Held – The principle that a chattel placed upon a piece of land, enjoyed with that land and enhancing its value, could with that land form a rateable hereditament while remaining in law a chattel, was apt to apply in a case where the chattel was a floating vessel placed upon land covered with water. The question whether the chattel had a direct physical connection to that part of the land which lay vertically beneath it was highly relevant to, and would generally be definitive of, the question whether the chattel occupied and/or was enjoyed with land comprised within the hereditament identified. However, a permanently moored vessel, moored in position over part of a riverbed licensed to the owner for that purpose, even without such a physical connection, could in appropriate circumstances be enjoyed with the riverbed beneath and enhance its value. In the instant case, by means of horizontal connection to the adjacent quay which together with the riverbed formed part of the same hereditament, the vessel was permanently secured in a position above and within a part of the riverbed which was licensed to the company for the very purpose for which it was used. In those circumstances the Lands Tribunal had been entitled to find that the vessel was rateable, and the appeal would, accordingly, be dismissed (see [42], [43], [62]–[65], below).

London CC v Wilkins (Valuation Officer) [1956] 3 All ER 38, Field Place Caravan Park Ltd v Harding (Valuation Officer) [1966] 3 All ER 247 applied. Assessor for

Glasgow v Gilmartin 1920 SC 488, Assessor for Glasgow v RNVR Club (Scotland) 1974 SC 67, Comr of Rating and Valuation v Yiu Lian Machinery Repairing Works Ltd [1985] 2 HKC 517 considered. a

Notes

For the non-domestic rating of moorings, artificial watercourses, towing-paths and harbours, see 39(1) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 629. b

Cases referred to in judgments

- Anderson Grice & Co Ltd v Angus Assessor* [1962] RA 590, LVAC.
Cory v Bristow (1877) 2 App Cas 262, [1874–80] All ER Rep 136, HL.
Earby's Case (1633) 2 Bulst 354, 80 ER 1180. c
Electric Telegraph Co v Salford Overseers (1855) 11 Exch 181, 156 ER 795.
Felgate (Valuation Officer) v Lotus Leisure Enterprises Ltd [2000] RA 89.
Field Place Caravan Park Ltd v Harding (Valuation Officer) [1966] 3 All ER 247, [1966] 2 QB 484, [1966] 3 WLR 198, CA.
Glasgow (Assessor for) v Gilmartin 1920 SC 488, LVAC.
Glasgow (Assessor for) v RNVR Club (Scotland) 1974 SC 67, LVAC. d
Laing (John) & Son Ltd v Kingswood Assessment Committee [1949] 1 All ER 224, [1949] 1 KB 344, CA.
Lancashire Telephone Co v Manchester Overseers (1884) 13 QBD 700; aff'd (1884) 14 QBD 267, CA.
London CC v Wilkins (Valuation Officer) [1956] 3 All ER 38, [1957] AC 362, [1956] 3 WLR 505, HL. e
Menzies (John) & Co Ltd v Assessor for Edinburgh 1937 SC 784, LVAC.
Renfrewshire (Assessor for) v Mitchell 1965 SC 271, Ct of Sess.
Ryan Industrial Fuels Ltd v Morgan (Valuation Officer) [1965] 3 All ER 465, [1965] 1 WLR 1347, CA.
Smith's Dock Co Ltd v Tynemouth Corp [1908] 1 KB 315, DC. f
Thomas (Valuation Officer) v Witney Aquatic Co Ltd [1972] RA 493.
Westminster City Council v Southern Rly Co [1936] 2 All ER 322, [1936] AC 511, HL.
Whenman v Clark [1916] 1 KB 94, CA.
Woodbury (Valuation Officer) v The Yard Arm Club Ltd [1990] 1 EGLR 237; aff'd sub nom Westminster City Council v Woodbury (Valuation Officer) [1991] 2 EGLR 173, CA. g
Yiu Lian Machinery Repairing Works Ltd v Comr of Rating and Valuation [1982] HKC 55, HK Lands Trib; aff'd sub nom Comr of Rating and Valuation v Yiu Lian Machinery Repairing Works Ltd [1985] 2 HKC 517, Hong Kong CA. h

Appeal

Cinderella Rockerfellas Ltd, owner and occupier of a nightclub situated on a floating vessel known as the Tuxedo Royale, moored and berthed on the River Tyne at Hillgate Quay, Gateshead, Tyne and Wear, appealed with permission granted by Peter Gibson LJ on 4 September 2002 from the decision of the Lands Tribunal (George Bartlett QC, President) dated 13 June 2002 ([2002] RA 131) allowing two consolidated appeals by the respondent valuation officer, Peter James Rudd, from the decision of the Tyne and Wear Valuation Tribunal that two entries in the valuation list relating to the vessel should be deleted on the ground that the vessel was not rateable. The facts are set out in the judgment of Potter LJ. j

- a* David Widdicombe QC and Robert Walton (instructed by Richmonds, Newcastle-upon-Tyne) for the company.
Timothy Mould (instructed by the Solicitor of Inland Revenue) for the valuation officer.

Cur adv vult

- b* 11 April 2003. The following judgments were delivered.

POTTER LJ.

INTRODUCTION

- c* [1] This is an appeal by Cinderella Rockerfellas Ltd (the appellants) the operators and occupiers of a nightclub situated upon a floating vessel, the Tuxedo Royale (the vessel) which at all material times was moored and berthed on the River Tyne at Hillgate Quay, Gateshead. They appeal against the decision of the Lands Tribunal (George Bartlett QC, President) dated 13 June 2002 ([2002] RA 131) whereby the Lands Tribunal allowed two consolidated appeals by the valuation officer against decisions of the Tyne and Wear Valuation Tribunal.
- d* The latter tribunal had, on appeals by the appellants, directed that two entries 'River and riverbed occupied by floating nightclub, moorings, car park and premises' and "'Tuxedo Royale', Hillgate Quay, Gateshead, Tyne and Wear' should be deleted on the ground that the vessel was not rateable.
- e* [2] The appeal thus raises the question of the rateability of floating vessels in the English law of rating and, incidentally, whether it diverges from Scottish law.

THE FACTS

- [3] The material facts as agreed between the parties before the Lands Tribunal were as follows. I have indicated in square brackets certain additional matters not mentioned in the agreed facts but which were not in dispute on the appeal.
- f* [4] The vessel was built in 1964. It is 350 feet long, 54 feet in the beam and has a gross registered tonnage of 5888. Then known as Sol Express, it operated as a passenger and drive-on vehicle ferry until 1988 when it was modified for its present use and renamed. It was moored at Hillgate Quay from 1989 to 1999 under licence granted to the appellants by the Crown Estate Commissioners (the commissioners). The first licence, dated 26 January 1990 (the 1990 licence), granted for a period of five years from 26 November 1988 the right to place and maintain on and over the foreshore and bed of the River Tyne adjoining Hillgate Quay, in the position indicated on the plan and annexed licence, the vessel or such replacement vessel as might be approved by the licensor. [The plan attached
- g* showed the vessel in position in the river beside the quay within a rectangular marked area closely drawn around the vessel indicating the extent of the foreshore and river bed licensed.] By cl 2(11) the vessel was not to be used for any purpose 'save as an entertainment complex comprising restaurants, bars and disco function rooms exhibitions and like users'. Clause 3(4) stipulated:
- h*
- j* 'Nothing herein is to be construed as conferring on the Licensee the right to the exclusive use of any part of the said foreshore or bed of the River Tyne and the Commissioners shall be at liberty to grant such interest rights and easements in or over the same as the Commissioners shall think fit provided only that the placing and maintenance of the Vessel in accordance with this Licence is not thereby prevented.'

[5] Thereafter there was no interference by the licensor with the appellants' use of the parts of the foreshore or bed of the river to which the licence related and the commissioners granted no additional rights during the term of the 1990 licence. By licence dated 23 November 1994 the commissioners granted rights to the respondents in similar terms to those in the 1990 licence save that cl 3(4) was omitted. The vessel was used in compliance with cl 2(11) throughout the period of both licences.

[6] The 1.52 acres of land which contained the Hillgate Quay frontage on its northern boundary was the subject of a lease for ten years from 26 November 1983 originally made between Gateshead Borough Council (the council) and a company called Riverzest Ltd, which became vested in the appellants. The lease included the right to use the frontage for the purpose of berthing a vessel previously known as the SS Caledonian Princess or any other vessel in the appellants' ownership which the council might authorise in writing as an alternative to the named vessel. There was a prohibition against using the quay structure for any other purposes and a requirement that the vessel should be used as a restaurant, licensed premises, hotel, disco and conference centre. Clause 3(g) required the lessee to use the surface of the quay area for the parking of customers' private vehicles in properly marked out parking areas.

[7] By a lease dated 21 November 1994 the council granted the appellants a further 12-year term from 26 November 1993 upon terms not materially different from those in the previous lease. Again, at all material times, the quay structure, vessel and quay areas were used within the purposes provided by the leases.

[8] The vessel was moved to the quay and held in position over the river bed by means of ropes and chains secured to capstans on the quayside. It was subject to tidal movement. It remained secured at its berth from 1989 to 1999, only being moved from its position once for the purpose of demonstrating that it could be moved away from its mooring. On that occasion it was moved by being towed by tugs. In 1999 it was moved to the River Tees for similar use, before being replaced at Gateshead by a similar vessel.

[9] The main accommodation on the vessel consisted of bars, offices, a restaurant, a café/diner and adjoining discotheque, a main discotheque holding up to 700 people, a kitchen, toilets, two private function suites, storage areas and a cellar on the lower deck. Access to the vessel was by means of four metal gangways on the quay. [The gangways were strongly constructed of steel, totally enclosed and capable of moving on the quayside as the vessel rose and fell with the tide.] The car park was used as a private car park for the purposes of the appellant's business use of the vessel. The vessel generated its own electricity and there was no mains connection. It was not connected to a public sewer, but instead had tanks that were emptied and serviced by a private contractor. There was a water supply to the quay and from there to the vessel by means of a hose. There was a telephone connection.

[10] The vessel had a full justices' on-licence and an entertainment licence granted by the local authority. It was registered in the Registry of British Ships. Permission to moor it at Hillgate Quay was granted by the Port of Tyne Authority, subject to requirements relating to lighting, the need for a competent ship keeper on constant duty and other matters.

THE DECISION OF THE LANDS TRIBUNAL

[11] The Lands Tribunal resolved the issue whether the vessel was rateable by applying the principle stated by Lord Denning MR in Field Place Caravan Park Ltd

a v Harding (Valuation Officer) [1966] 3 All ER 247 at 250, [1966] 2 QB 484 at 497–498 in which, basing himself upon London CC v Wilkins (Valuation Officer) [1956] 3 All ER 38, [1957] AC 362, Lord Denning MR stated:

b ‘The correct proposition today is that, although a chattel is not a rateable hereditament by itself, nevertheless it may become rateable together with land, if it is placed on a piece of land and enjoyed with it in such circumstances and with such a degree of permanence that the chattel with the land can together be regarded as one unit of occupation.’

[12] Applying that principle, the Lands Tribunal held that the vessel was rateable for the reasons set out in its decision ([2002] RA 131 at [21]):

c ‘The fact that the Tuxedo Royale is a vessel is no bar to rateability. In the normal way a vessel, as a mobile chattel, is not rateable. As the Sol Express the whole function of the vessel lay in its mobility, its ability to move and to transport passengers and vehicles. Moored under the Tyne Bridge, on the other hand, it was the immobility of the Tuxedo Royale that enabled it to perform its new role as a nightclub. The fact that it had been designed to propel itself across the sea and to transport passengers and goods ceased to have any significance other than to add to its attractiveness in its new and wholly different role. Its moorings were intended to ensure that the vessel stayed in position, eliminating all movement except for the small amount that would inevitably arise from the tidal nature of the river. The occupation by the ratepayers of the vessel, the river bed and quay had the same characteristics in terms of permanence and exclusiveness as in the case of a nightclub contained in a building on dry land. The vessel, is, in my judgment, undoubtedly rateable.’

f [13] In coming to its decision, the Lands Tribunal referred to its own previous decision in Felgate (Valuation Officer) v Lotus Leisure Enterprises Ltd [2000] RA 89 and observed that the vessel was rateable for the same reasons that a vessel called the Lotus was rateable in that case.

THE RELEVANT LAW

g [14] The unit of property which is the subject of rating is ‘the hereditament’. By s 64(1) of the Local Government Finance Act 1988—

h ‘A hereditament is anything which, by virtue of the definition of hereditament in section 115(1) of the [General Rate Act 1967], would have been a hereditament for the purposes of that Act had this Act not been passed.’

[15] Section 115(1) of the 1967 Act provided:

j ‘... “hereditament” means property which is or may become liable to a rate, being a unit of such property which is, or would fall to be, shown as a separate item in the valuation list.’

[16] Section 64(4) of the 1988 Act provides:

‘A hereditament is a relevant hereditament if it consists of property of any of the following descriptions—(a) lands ...’

[17] 'Land' is not defined in the 1988 Act. However, by virtue of s 5 of and Sch 1 to the Interpretation Act 1978, 'land' in an Act of Parliament passed after 1978 includes land covered by water. a [18] Section 41(1) and (2) of the 1988 Act requires the valuation officer for a billing authority, such as the respondent in this case, to compile and maintain local rating lists on 1 April 1990 and on 1 April every fifth year afterwards.

[19] By s 42(1)— b

'A local non-domestic rating list must show, for each day in each chargeable financial year for which it is in force, each hereditament which fulfils the following conditions on the day concerned—(a) it is situated in the authority's area, (b) it is a relevant non-domestic hereditament ...'

[20] From the origins of rating in 1601 as provided for in the Poor Relief Act 1601, the liability to be rated rested upon the occupier of the property concerned: see Earby's Case (1633) 2 Bulst 354, 80 ER 1180. The position is still the same, save for specific statutory provision first made in 1966 for rates to be chargeable on certain unoccupied properties. A ratepayer's liability in respect of occupied hereditaments now arises from the express provision contained in s 43(1) of the 1988 Act: c

'A person (the ratepayer) shall as regards a hereditament be subject to a non-domestic rate in respect of a chargeable financial year if the following conditions are fulfilled in respect of any day in the year—(a) on the day the ratepayer is in occupation of all or part of the hereditament, and (b) the hereditament is shown for the day in a local non-domestic rating list in force for the year.' d

[21] Earby's Case also decided that assessments under the 1601 Act 'ought to be made according to the visible estate of the inhabitants there, both real and personal'. Although largely ignored in practice by rating authorities, the rateability of inhabitants for personal property (ie chattels) was only abolished by the Poor Rate Exemption Act 1840. Since that date therefore, the liability of the occupier has been limited to hereditaments in the nature of land, and no chattel is rateable per se. e

[22] A ship is a floating chattel. Prior to 1840 ships were rated in the parish which was regarded as their home. Thereafter they ceased to be rated. However, a line of decisions including such cases as Cory v Bristow (1877) 2 App Cas 262, [1874–80] All ER Rep 136 and Smith's Dock Co Ltd v Tynemouth Corp [1908] 1 KB 315 held that the owners of vessels or floating structures used for commercial purposes while fixed in position on a long-term basis over moorings on the river bed could for rating purposes be treated as the occupiers of those moorings and the part of the river bed in which they were situated. f

[23] In parallel, a line of authority developed in relation to structures and other chattels on or connected with land held in occupation whereby, albeit not part of that land, such chattels were rated with it on the basis that they were enjoyed with the land and enhanced its value. These authorities related to such chattels as telegraph posts and wires (see Electric Telegraph Co v Salford Overseers (1855) 11 Exch 181, 156 ER 795), telephone wires (see Lancashire Telephone Co v Manchester Overseers (1884) 13 QBD 700), showcases and kiosks at a railway station (see Westminster City Council v Southern Railway Co [1936] 2 All ER 322, [1936] AC 511) and a number of cases concerned temporary huts and structures erected by builders upon construction sites. The principle underlying those g a decisions was examined and made clear in London CC v Wilkins (Valuation Officer) [1956] 3 All ER 38, [1957] AC 362. In that case it was claimed that four builders' moveable huts, erected as temporary structures on a site for 18 months, only one of which was moved from one part of the site to the other during that period, were chattels and therefore not rateable. The House of Lords held that the question whether or not the structures had lost their character as chattels was not b decisive as the test of rateability, nor was the conscious intention of the contractors to attach or not to attach them to the soil. These were no more than factors which fell to be considered and the test of rateability was whether there was evidence that the structures, occupied for a period which was not transient, were enjoyed with the land and enhanced its value. Viscount Kilmuir LC stated ([1956] 3 All ER 38 at 44, [1957] AC 362 at 373–374):

c '... the test of rateability is whether there is evidence that the structures were enjoyed with the land and enhanced its value. In considering this, the intention of the erector and the other elements of annexation, period, size, quality, amenities and purpose are all material. All these factors are d important, but intention, and certainly what I may call the "conscious element" in intention, is no more than one factor and its importance is not overriding. The question is eminently one of fact ...'

[24] Lord Radcliffe said ([1956] 3 All ER 38 at 46–47, [1957] AC 362 at 378):

e 'No one supposes, of course, that a man is rateable in respect of the enjoyment of chattels as he is in respect of the occupation of land. But, on the other hand, I think that that is a long way from saying that the presence of chattels on land can never be a relevant factor either in determining the assessment of the rateable value of a hereditament or in determining f whether there is a rateable occupation or not ... I think it equally well established that a structure placed on another person's land can with it form a rateable hereditament, even though the structure remains in law a chattel and as such the property of the person who placed it there. It has been habitual practice to treat gas and water pipes, drains and sewers, telegraph posts placed in, and telegraph or telephone wires placed over, land as being themselves rateable subjects. Yet I do not think that there is any foundation g for supposing that when the undertaker, equipped either with the licence of the owner of the soil or with statutory powers, affixes his apparatus to a building or lays it in or on the soil the law regards him as thereby making it part of the freehold.'

h [25] Later he stated ([1956] 3 All ER 38 at 47, 48, [1957] AC 362 at 380):

i 'When the owners of pipes, cables, posts, etc., are rated as occupiers they are rated in respect of those things themselves, by means of which they occupy land, not merely in respect of the land that is occupied; just as in Cory v. Bristow ((1877) 2 App Cas 262, [1874–80] All ER Rep 136), it was the moorings themselves that were treated as the rateable hereditament ... In my opinion, the present case really centres round the question whether the sheds, erected on a building site by a building contractor for the purpose of his operations, involve such a degree of permanency in his occupation as to make it a rateable one. I have no doubt that, in considering this, it is at any rate relevant to ascertain to what extent and in what way these constructions have been made a fixed part of the site on which they stand, for the more casually they are attached the less likely it is that the occupation of them will be found to be a permanent one. In this sense it may be of some importance to inquire whether they are chattels or not; but to make the whole issue of rateability depend on the bare issue, for instance, whether a particular structure has or has not foundations in the ground which give it a measure of lateral as well as subjacent support would be to use a legal distinction for a purpose for which it was never intended.'

[26] In Field Place Caravan Park Ltd v Harding (Valuation Officer) [1966] 3 All ER 247, [1966] 2 QB 484 the Court of Appeal considered the rateability of a residential caravan site. The caravans were on wheels and retained their mobility although they were jacked up to keep them stable. The Court of Appeal upheld the decision of the Lands Tribunal confirming the entries of the caravans in the valuation list. In giving the leading judgment, Lord Denning MR having considered the observations of Viscount Kilmuir LC and Lord Radcliffe in Wilkins' case, stated the proposition applicable to the facts of the case before him as set out at [11], above.

[27] In the light of certain submissions made for the appellants to which I refer below, it is pertinent to observe that in relation to the Scottish case of Assessor for Glasgow v Gilmartin (1920) SC 488 in which it was held that a small hut which could be moved on wheels was not rateable in Scottish law, Lord Denning MR observed that the provisions of the relevant Scottish Acts were different from the relevant English provisions. Salmon LJ also observed ([1966] 3 All ER 247 at 254, [1966] 2 QB 484 at 503):

'To my mind that decision turned entirely on the statute which governed the law of rating in Scotland and which had no application to any of the matters we have to consider. In my judgment the fact that the structure in question happens to be a caravan on wheels rather than a hut or bungalow is material only to a consideration of the question whether or not the occupation of the caravan dweller is transient. That question does not arise in this case, because it is conceded that it would be impossible to say that the occupation of these caravan dwellers was so transient as to be incapable of constituting rateable occupation. As was pointed out in [Westminster City Council v Southern Railway Co [1936] 2 All ER 322, [1936] AC 511], in rating, as distinct perhaps from tax law, the courts look to the substance and not the form.'

[28] The effect of those authorities was considered by the Lands Tribunal in Woodbury (Valuation Officer) v The Yard Arm Club Ltd [1990] 1 EGLR 237 in relation to a vessel, the Hispaniola, moored in the River Thames to two steel piles called dolphins fore and aft, each embedded in the river bed. The vessel was connected to the dolphins by steel horns which permitted it to rise and fall with the tide but prevented forward, rearward or lateral movement. The vessel was also anchored to the river bed fore and aft, a subsidiary chain going to the embankment wall. The vessel was used as a restaurant and was permanently connected to all main services for that purpose. Access to the vessel from the embankment was via a metal canopied gangway. The vessel and its moorings were owned by the club authorised to operate it, whereas the river bed was owned by the Port of London Authority which had granted the club a licence to place and retain the vessel with its piles etc in the position which it occupied. By s 178(1) of the Port of London Act 1968, land vested in the port authority (which included the bed of the river a beneath the vessel) was exempt from rating or inclusion in any valuation list. The decision of the Lands Tribunal turned upon that last point. Giving judgment the President (VG Wellings QC) stated (at 239):

b 'I cannot accept that the dolphins and the vessel are land. They and the anchors which rest on the river bed are chattels. Nevertheless, on the facts of the present appeal it is clear, and I hold, that the club by means of the vessel, its dolphins and anchors is in occupation of that part of the river bed over which it is moored and permanently so. That part of the river bed together with the vessel would thus be a rateable hereditament or part of a rateable hereditament if section 178 of the Port of London Act 1968 had no application: see Cory v Bristow ((1877) 2 App Cas 262, [1874–80] All ER Rep 136). In other words, the relevant parts of the river bed, together with the chattels, that is to say the vessel, the dolphins and the anchors constitute a unit of occupation: see per Lord Denning MR in Field Place Caravan Park v Harding ([1966] 3 All ER 247 at 250, [1966] 2 QB 484 at 498). However on the authority of Whenman v Clark ([1916] 1 KB 94), that unit of occupation is not rateable because of the operation of section 178 of the Port of London Act 1968.'

e [29] Mr Wellings also considered an alternative submission that, by reason of the connection by the horizontal chains and gangways to the river wall, the vessel was rateable together with the part of the river wall in question which was owned by the Greater London Council. Counsel for the club answered that submission by saying that chattels could only be rateable if they were in, on or over rateable land and that the relation between the land and the chattels must be vertical and not horizontal. Mr Wellings observed:

f 'I think that that observation is correct, but whether it is so or not, it appears to me that it is not possible for the vessel to occupy part of the river bed, as I have held it to do, and part of the river wall as well. Moreover, I agree with [counsel for the club] that, if paramountcy comes into question, it is the river bed which is the more important because the vessel derives its stability therefrom and without that stability could not be used as a floating restaurant ...'

g [30] On appeal, Lloyd LJ in upholding the decision of the Lands Tribunal observed ([1991] 2 EGLR 173 at 175):

h 'I confess that, like the Lands Tribunal, I find some difficulty in the concept of lateral occupation by a chattel, if indeed occupation by a chattel is the right test. But for reasons which will appear, I do not find it necessary to resolve that difficulty ... Such authority as there is seems to suggest that the Hispaniola does not occupy the Victoria Embankment in any relevant sense, though I accept, of course, that it was attached to the embankment fore and aft by chains and that it was permanently connected to all the main services ... Similarly, in Thomas (Valuation Officer) v Witney Aquatic Co Ltd ([1972] RA 493), the hereditament was described as "lake, club house and premises" with a rateable value of £250. The club house was floating on the surface of the lake. It was argued, first, that "lake" was not an adequate description of the land beneath the water and, second, that the ratepayers were not in rateable occupation of the club house, as it was a chattel. Both arguments were rejected. It was held that the club house was enjoyed with the lake and so with the land beneath the lake and was therefore part of the rateable hereditament so described. So the educated reader would, prima facie, at any rate, take "the premises" as a reference to the land comprising the river bed and not the embankment. If that is so, then [counsel for the rating authority] is in difficulty, for by section 178(1) of the Port of London Act of 1968 the river bed is not rateable.'

[31] In concurring, Mann LJ said (at 177):

'... if it be supposed that the bed of the river is occupied by means of the Hispaniola being held above it by the embedded dolphins, then that occupation would not be a rateable occupation of the bed because of section 178 of the 1968 Act. The correctness of the supposition does not fall for decision. However, on the facts as found, I am of the view that it would be a correct identification of the only land which could be said to be enjoyed through the vessel. In common with Lloyd LJ and with Mr Wellings, I doubt whether one can occupy land by means of a chattel which is not on, under or above that land.'

[32] The decision in Thomas (Valuation Officer) v Witney Aquatic Co Ltd [1972] RA 493 referred to by Lloyd LJ was a decision of the Lands Tribunal in respect of a club house floating upon a lake over which the ratepayer had rights of use for sporting and boating activities and to maintain a floating club house which was moored to three steel barges in turn moored to the land. The club house was also made fast to the land by two wire hawsers and kept at a fixed distance from the land by two gangways, being moved in winter months to an island in the lake. The disputed hereditament was described as 'lake, club house and premises'.

[33] In finding that the floating club house was a chattel enjoyed with the land and therefore rateable as part of the hereditament, the tribunal relied on the words of Lord Russell of Killowen in Westminster City Council v Southern Railway Co [1936] 2 All ER 322 at 326, [1936] AC 511 at 529:

'Subject to special enactments, people are rated as occupiers of land, land being understood as including not only the surface of the earth but all strata above or below. The occupier, not the land, is rateable; but, the occupier is rateable in respect of the land which he occupies.'

[34] The tribunal added (at 505):

'The expression "land" is in my opinion wide enough to include water lying on the surface of the earth, so that the lake in the present case is capable of being part of the hereditament, if it satisfies the other tests of rateability, and in those circumstances I consider that the word "lake" would be a proper description of that part of the hereditament.'

[35] In Felgate (Valuation Officer) v Lotus Leisure Enterprises Ltd [2000] RA 89, to which I have already referred in [13], above, the valuation officer had entered in the rating list a floating restaurant called the Lotus moored at Millwall Dock as 'dock bed, floating restaurant, moorings and premises'. The Lands Tribunal was concerned to decide whether such rateable hereditament had been correctly identified. The vessel was a steel hull without means of propulsion or steering with a superstructure erected to contain the restaurant. It was permanently moored in position connected to the dock wall by three hawsers at the bow and two at the stern, each looped over bollards. There were two further connections a to the dock wall by means of steel hawsers and the vessel was connected to all main services. Access was by means of four wooden and steel gangways resting on rollers to allow for the vertical movement of the water in the dock. The vessel was permanently in position save that it was moved on two occasions each year from its mooring by a tug to the other side of the dock for the purpose of undertaking essential maintenance in an operation which lasted no more than a few hours.

b [36] It was submitted for the valuation officer that the owners were the occupiers of a hereditament comprising the part of the dock bed over which the vessel was moored and the water beneath the Lotus. Field Place Caravan Park Ltd v Harding (Valuation Officer) [1966] 3 All ER 247, [1966] 2 QB 484 was relied on. It was submitted for the owners that there could be no occupation of the bed of a river or a dock by a vessel floating above it without some kind of permanent fixture to the bed concerned. The President of the Lands Tribunal (George Bartlett QC) conducted a wide-ranging review of the relevant authorities, including that of the Scottish Lands Valuation Appeal Court in Assessor for Glasgow v RNVR Club (Scotland) 1974 SC 67 and that of the Hong Kong Court of Appeal in Comr of Rating and Valuation v Yiu Lian Machinery Repairing Works Ltd [1985] 2 HKC 517. In the former case a ship used as a club and moored to a quay in the Clyde in physical circumstances remarkably similar to this case, was held not to be 'heritable' in nature and therefore not rateable under Scottish law. In the latter case, floating dry docks in Hong Kong harbour were held to be not sufficiently connected with a piece of land to be rateable under the wording of the relevant Ordinance in Hong Kong.

e [37] Applying the principle laid down in the Field Place Caravan Park case, George Bartlett QC said as follows ([2000] RA 89 at 100–101):

f '25. Applying this principle, therefore, whether the vessel is rateable depends on whether it is placed on a piece of land and enjoyed with it in such circumstances and with such a degree of permanence that the chattel with the land can together be regarded as one unit of occupation. "Enjoyed with" the land means no more than that the chattel, although not forming part of the realty, must have some real connection with the land on which it rests (see Ryan Industrial Fuels Ltd v Morgan (Valuation Officer) [1965] 3 All ER 465, [1965] 1 WLR 1347)).

g 26. The fact that the vessel is floating does not in my judgment prevent it from forming part of a hereditament. Solicitor for the respondent company accepts that this is so and does not suggest that the tribunal was wrong in Woodbury (Valuation Officer) v The Yard Arm Club Ltd ([1990] 1 EGLR 237) in treating The Hispaniola as part of a hereditament extending upwards from the bed of the river. The crucial point, on his argument, is that the vessel here is not attached fore and aft to dolphins and to anchors in the bed of a river but is secured to moorings on the dock side. This distinction does not seem to me to be significant.

j 27. The relevant circumstances are in my judgment these. Although it is a vessel, the essential function of The Lotus is to remain stationary and attached to the dock side to provide a static, landbased facility as a restaurant. Apart from the fact that it floats, it is not designed for movement and has no means of propulsion. It has in fact remained stationary for over six years with the exception of the occasions, twice a year for a few hours, when it is towed across the dock for maintenance purposes. It enjoys all main services.

Its presence excludes the potential use for a similar purpose by anyone else of the dock bed beneath it or the dock side alongside it. It is enjoyed with the dock bed and the dock side in that it is supported by the dock bed in conjunction with the water above it and it is secured to moorings on the dock side. a

28. In these circumstances I am satisfied that the valuation officer is correct in identifying as a rateable hereditament the dock bed, the floating restaurant and its moorings. Physically the hereditament consists in my view of the dock bed immediately beneath the vessel, the space above it that is filled with water, the vessel itself and its moorings on the dock side. The fact that there is water immediately beneath the vessel is only of relevance, it seems to me, to the extent that the vessel could become more mobile if it were not secured ... The occupation of the respondent company fulfils all the ingredients of rateable occupation. Actual use is made of the dock bed for the support of the vessel through the medium of the water above it; the occupation is plainly of benefit to the respondent company; in view of the fact that the vessel is continuously secured in position (apart from the few hours when it is moved for maintenance) and has remained in the same position for a number of years, the occupation is undoubtedly permanent; and in my judgment, it is also exclusive. The harbour authority can no doubt be said to use all the dock bed and the space above it, including the area beneath the vessel, in that it controls the volume of water within the dock, but this does not interfere with the use that the respondent company makes of the dock bed, which is exclusive for their purposes, and, in my view, is plainly paramount. b
c
d
e

THE SUBMISSIONS OF THE PARTIES

[38] For the appellants, Mr Widdicombe QC accepts that the principle which fell to be applied by the Lands Tribunal in this case, was that propounded by the House of Lords in London CC v Wilkins (Valuation Officer) [1956] 3 All ER 38, [1957] AC 362 and Lord Denning MR in the Field Place Caravan Park case to the effect that chattels may be rateable with land and together form a rateable hereditament if they are enjoyed with the land and enhance its value. However, he points out that the context in which the principle was propounded was one in which the House of Lords and the Court of Appeal were concerned with chattels/structures which were physically placed upon land but insufficiently attached to become fixtures. Mr Widdicombe also accepts that in principle (though only in rare cases), the test propounded may be apt to extend to a floating structure or vessel. However, he submits that that can only be so in a case where such structure or vessel is immovable and physically connected to the land with which it is said to form a rateable hereditament. f
g
h

[39] Mr Widdicombe submits that a floating ship is a chattel so far conceptually removed from 'lands' that, if it is to be treated as part of a rateable hereditament a high degree of connection and/or adaptation should be sought before so regarding it. He submits that in this case no such element is present. He submits that the absence of vertical connection to the river bed effectively prevents the presence of the floating vessel from being regarded as itself a method of occupation of the land beneath; and the absence of any adaptation of the vessel or its integration and enjoyment with the adjacent land, preserves its separate character as a chattel, enjoyed as such. j

a [40] In this respect Mr Widdicombe places heavy reliance upon the Scottish and Hong Kong cases to which I have already referred and submits that the Lands Tribunal fell into error in distinguishing them.

b [41] Mr Mould for the respondents submits that the Lands Tribunal was right to apply the principle succinctly stated by Lord Denning MR in the Field Place Caravan Park case and, by applying that principle, to find that the vessel was rateable property for the reasons which it gave.

c [42] Mr Mould submits that the principle that a chattel placed upon a piece of land, enjoyed with that land and enhancing its value, can with that land form a rateable hereditament, while remaining in law a chattel, is apt to apply in a case where the chattel is a floating vessel placed upon land covered with water: see the Interpretation Act 1978 (see [17], above), the observation of Lord Russell in Westminster City Council v Southern Railway Co [1936] 2 All ER 322 at 366, [1936] AC 511 at 529 and the decisions of the Lands Tribunal in Thomas (Valuation Officer) v Witney Aquatic Co Ltd [1972] RA 493 (see [32]–[34], above) and Felgate (Valuation Officer) v Lotus Leisure Enterprises Ltd [2000] RA 89 (see [35]–[37], above).

d [43] Mr Mould accepts that, in relation to the question whether the chattel (a) occupies and/or (b) is enjoyed with land comprised within the hereditament identified, the question whether the land has a direct physical connection to that part of the land which lies vertically beneath it, is highly relevant and will generally be definitive. However, he submits that, in the case of a permanently moored vessel, moored in position over a part of the river bed licensed to the owner for that purpose, even without such a physical connection it is appropriate circumstances possible to provide an affirmative answer to the question whether the vessel is enjoyed with the river bed beneath and enhances its value. In this case, by means of horizontal connection to the adjacent quay which together with the river bed formed part of the same hereditament, the vessel was permanently secured in a position above and within a part of the river bed which was licensed to the appellants for the very purpose for which it was used and was in fact used for no other purpose. In those circumstances the Lands Tribunal was entitled to find that the four conditions of rateable occupation were in fact satisfied.

g DISCUSSION

h [44] The four conditions of rateable occupation as set out in John Laing & Son Ltd v Kingswood Assessment Committee [1949] 1 All ER 224 at 232, [1949] 1 KB 344 at 357 and approved in Wilkins' case are: (i) actual occupational possession (which involves actual as opposed to intended user of the land in question); (ii) occupation or possession which is exclusive (ie if the occupier can exclude all other persons from using the land in the same way as he does); (iii) occupation or possession which is of some value or benefit to the occupier/possessor; (iv) occupation or possession which has a sufficient quality of permanence: see generally Ryde on Rating and the Council Tax (2003) pp 58–59 (paras 61–62).

j [45] The cases culminating in Wilkins' case and the Field Place Caravan Park case which developed the principle that chattels may be rateable if enjoyed with the land and enhancing its value have also made clear that the placing of a valuable chattel in or on land may itself be all that is required by way of occupation of the lands to render the chattel and the land together a rateable hereditament.

[46] Assuming for a moment that condition (i) can be satisfied, in the sense that the Lands Tribunal was entitled to hold that the vessel could properly be regarded as occupying the river bed beneath (see further below), there seems to me no room for doubt that conditions (ii)–(iv) were satisfied in this case. a [47] So far as condition (ii) is concerned, when a person occupies land in respect of which he has no title to the exclusive occupation or possession but his occupation is exclusive in fact, then he is rateable in respect of that occupation. It seems to me that the question is identical to that enunciated by Lord Russell in the Westminster City Council case [1936] 2 All ER 322 at 328, [1936] AC 511 at 532, namely whether the person sought to be rated has the enjoyment of the land 'to the substantial exclusion of all other persons'. As made clear in that case, the relevant question is: what in fact is the occupation in respect of which the person is said to be rateable. In that respect, it is immaterial whether the title to occupy is attributable to a lease or a licence (see [1936] 2 All ER 322 at 329, [1936] AC 511 at 533). The substance of the document granting the right of occupation is highly material; however, what is material is not so much the precise terms of the grant but whether the occupation is in fact greater or lesser than the terms convey. It is also the position that the reservation by the grantor of a right which is never exercised and could not be fully exercised without destroying the grant is to be disregarded (see [1936] 2 All ER 322 at 353, [1936] AC 511 at 567 per Lord Wright MR). b

c
d

[48] The factual position in this case, as already indicated, was that the vessel between 1990 and 1999, under successive licences from the commissioners, occupied a fixed position in the river, immediately above the area of the foreshore and river bed the subject of the licence. While the licence stated that its terms were not to be construed as giving exclusive use of the disputed area to the appellants, the liberty of the commissioners to grant elsewhere any rights or easements over the relevant land was limited by the proviso that it should not thereby prevent the placing and maintenance of the vessel in accordance with the licence. Nor, as the agreed facts stated, were any other or 'rival' rights granted by the commissioners during the entire period that the vessel was moored in position under the terms of the licence. In these circumstances it is clear that if the vessel could be properly regarded in occupation of the river bed beneath, it was de facto in exclusive occupation. e
f

[49] So far as condition (iii) is concerned, it is plain that the occupation was of great value and benefit to the appellants as occupiers. Equally, so far as condition (iv) was concerned, there was a period of occupation of some nine years with a single brief interruption on some unspecified date when the vessel was temporarily removed from its mooring by tugs. I therefore return to consider condition (i). g

[50] Throughout a period of nine years, the vessel was placed in position over the licensed area of river bed beneath. While the principle stated in London CC v Wilkins (Valuation Officer) [1956] 3 All ER 38, [1957] AC 362 and Field Place Caravan Park Ltd v Harding (Valuation Officer) [1966] 3 All ER 247, [1966] 2 QB 484 dealt with structures which were physically placed upon dry land, and there were not in this case any moorings within the river bed by which the vessel could be said to occupy the river bed (cf Cory v Bristow (1877) 2 App Cas 262, [1874–80] All ER Rep 136), it does not seem to me that the interposition of water between the vessel and the river bed of itself acted in any significant manner to deprive the appellants of occupation of the area of the river bed the subject of the licence. The 'permanent' presence of the vessel was sufficient to constitute de facto exclusive occupation of that part of the river bed. That view seems to me entirely consistent with the observations of Lloyd and Mann LJ in the case of the h
j

a Hispaniola (Westminster City Council v Woodbury (Valuation Officer) [1991] 2 EGLR 173) quoted at [30] and [31], above.

[51] Mr Widdicombe submits that such a conclusion is at odds with the Scottish and Hong Kong cases to which I have already referred. I therefore turn briefly to those authorities.

b [52] In the Scottish case Assessor for Glasgow v RNVR Club (Scotland) 1974 SC 67, in which the physical facts were remarkably similar, the Lands Valuation Appeal Court was concerned with the question whether a former naval vessel refitted for use as a club was 'heritable' or not in Scottish law. It should at once be observed that the entry in the valuation roll under consideration simply referred to the subject of the valuation as 'Description: Club. Situation: Custom House Quay'. Thus there was no reference to, or consideration of, the relationship of the vessel c to the river bed beneath or to any land save the adjoining quay to which it was secured. Indeed it does not appear that there had been any licence granted to the vessel's owners in respect of the river bed of the kind with which we are concerned.

d [53] In giving the leading judgment, Lord Fraser adopted the approach taken by Lord Fleming in John Menzies & Co v The Assessor for Edinburgh 1937 SC 784 and followed by Lord Kilbrandon in Assessor for Renfrewshire v Mitchell 1965 SC 271, by asking the question first whether the subject structure belonged to a class or genus which was prima facie heritable. He rejected the submission of counsel that there was a genus 'club' into which the vessel could be conveniently placed e and stated (1974 SC 67 at 72):

'In my opinion the general character of this structure is plainly, and obviously, that of a ship. It began its life as a ship and unquestionably continued as such until 1947, and it still retains much of its original appearance and character. Above all it shares with other ships the essential f characteristic that it habitually floats on water. Nobody has suggested that a ship is prima facie heritable and I do not think such a suggestion could reasonably be made. If one starts from that position, the question is whether there are special facts about this ship which distinguish it from other ships and make it heritable and not moveable. It undoubtedly has many unusual features. Perhaps the most prominent of these is that it has been moored at g its present position for 16 or 17 years and that its owners have no intention of moving it in the foreseeable future. But that does not take the matter far, because it is settled that, if a thing is by its nature moveable, the mere passage of time will not make it heritable, even though it is never in fact moved: Anderson Grice & Co Ltd v. Assessor for Angus [1962] RA 590. The connections h of the various services, and especially of gas, are consistent with and indeed indicative of the intention to keep the ship where it is. Further its use as a clubhouse in the middle of Glasgow is an unusual use for a ship. But, in my opinion, these factors are not enough to outweigh its general character of moveability.'

j [54] Later in his judgment he observed (at 72-73):

'... I do not think that a floating ship, even if permanently moored in one place, could enter the roll as being lands or heritages, except perhaps if there was a high degree of mutual adaptation between the ship and the berth at which it was moored.'

[55] Lord Avonside was of similar opinion, as was Lord Keith. He said (at 73–74):

‘The subjects of appeal were designed and constructed as a ship, and they rest not upon land but upon water. This is the outstanding characteristic of the subjects. In my opinion this characteristic necessarily involves that the subjects are prima facie moveable. The other circumstances of the case are not, in my view, sufficient to warrant the inference that the subjects have become heritable by attachment to, or mutual adaptation with, heritable property.’

[56] It is thus apparent that the approach of the Scottish courts places great emphasis upon the general character of the structure for the purpose of its classification as either heritable or moveable: see also Armour’s Valuation for Rating (5th edn, 1985) pp 227–232 (paras 9-01–9-08), where the observation appears that—

‘reference to English authority in this field is inappropriate and could be misleading, since the separate considerations of the heritability of the subject and the rateability of the occupation are not clearly distinguished in the English cases.’

Since the RNVR Club case was decided on the basis of Scottish law and turned entirely on whether or not the vessel was ‘moveable’, I do not think it affords Mr Widdicombe any useful support in this appeal.

[57] The same is true of the decision of the Hong Kong Lands Tribunal in Yiu Lian Machinery Repairing Works Ltd v Comr of Rating and Valuation [1982] HKC 55 in which the President of the tribunal (Judge Cruden), following the decision in the RNVR Club case held that, before the floating dry docks concerned could be rateable as chattels enjoyed with the land, there would have to be a high degree of mutual adaptation between the vessels and the berth at which they were moored. Judge Cruden observed (at 72):

‘I appreciate that even in the absence of sufficient physical or legal connection between the vessels as chattels and the land to satisfy Hong Kong requirements, the position in England might be different. For the English criterion of occupation and liability for rates flowing from the mere existence of a unit of occupation would be sufficient for floating docks together with the land—either sea bed or shore—to form one unit of occupation and so to constitute a rateable hereditament. However, I am satisfied that the unit of occupation has no place in Hong Kong rating law.’

[58] On appeal ([1985] 2 HKC 517) the Hong Kong Court of Appeal held, in the words of the headnote, that having regard to the history of the legislation in Hong Kong, it could not be said that the English rule that the value of chattels was to be included as part of the land itself was, on a proper construction of the wording of the Ordinance, applicable in Hong Kong, where a stricter course prevailed; only the land itself or any building or part thereof were rateable and the Lands Tribunal’s decision that none of the dry docks was sufficiently connected with a piece of land to be taken into account in estimating its rateable value would not be disturbed.

a [59] The particular observation upon which Mr Widdicombe has placed emphasis is the following:

b 'We find ourselves unable to accept the proposition that a vessel which floats in the sea many feet above a piece of land is properly said to be enjoyed with it or to enhance its value. If that is so, then the same must be said in respect, for example, of an advertising balloon attached by wire to dry land, or even perhaps to a block in the sea bed off a popular holiday resort. Both the balloon and the vessel are of course connected to the land, but the connection is not for the purpose of enjoying or enhancing the land. It is simply to prevent either getting lost or into difficulties. Objects left free in air or on water are inclined to stray unless properly tethered. Builders huts and caravans set upon jacks do not.' (See [1985] 2 HKC 517 at 526.)

d [60] I do not find those observations telling or indeed accurate in relation to the facts of this case. As I have already indicated, it does not seem to me that the mere fact that a vessel floats on water above the land (ie the river bed), per se prevents it from being a chattel enjoyed with the land and which enhances its value. Nor, if it is secured permanently in position by horizontal attachment to adjacent land forming part of the same hereditament, is it vital that the vessel should be directly secured or connected to the land beneath. In such circumstances, the purpose and function of the horizontal attachment is to confine the vessel to the area of the licensed land beneath, thereby enjoying that land (albeit supported by the water above it) as a permanent means of support by which means the river bed, together with the adjacent quay as part of the same hereditament, is enhanced in value.

f [61] The analogy of an advertising balloon connected by a single wire and free to float to and fro, unrelated to or constrained by the area of the land beneath and plainly incapable of amounting to occupation of it, seems to me inapt. This is an area in which analogies are on the whole unhelpful. However, in the example given, a more appropriate analogy would be that of a barrage balloon permanently tethered in a stationary position by guy ropes with a platform suspended from it just above the land beneath and in permanent use as a nightclub dance floor, approached by a heavy metal ramp or ramps resting on the ground. Be that as it may, as the court went on to observe, whether a chattel is sufficiently connected with a piece of land to be taken into account in estimating its rateable value is essentially a question of fact in every case.

h CONCLUSION

j [62] There is no suggestion in this case that the Lands Tribunal misstated or misunderstood any of the primary facts in relation to the position, purpose or function of the Tuxedo Royale or the nature or extent of the hereditament the subject of their decision. Nor is it suggested that they misstated or misunderstood the principles of law applicable to those facts save as to the degree of connection and/or adaptation of the vessel necessary to amount to occupation of the land in question. In that respect, I accept the submissions of Mr Mould set out at [41]–[43], above and the conclusion of the Lands Tribunal as stated in [12], above.

[63] I would therefore dismiss this appeal.

CHADWICK LJ.

[64] I agree.

a

TUCKEY LJ.

[65] I also agree.

Appeal dismissed. Permission to appeal refused.

b

Kate O'Hanlon Barrister.

a Westminster City Council v O'Reilly and others

[2003] EWHC 485 (Admin)

b QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (ADMINISTRATIVE COURT)

MACKAY J

21, 28 FEBRUARY 2003

c Licensing – Permitted hours – Special hours certificate – Premises for which music and dancing licence in force for part of premises – Whether possible to have special hours certificate in force for whole premises – Licensing Act 1964, s 77A.

d The licensees had the benefit of a justices' on-licence in relation to the ground and basement floors of a building. A music and dancing licence (MDL) was granted in respect of the basement under s 52 of the Local Government Act 1963. A provisional special hours certificate (SHC) was also granted pursuant to s 77A^a of the Licensing Act 1964 which covered both the basement and the ground floor. Section 77A(1) provided that a provisional hours certificate would be issued where 'the licensing justices are satisfied ... (a) that the premises are ... (ii) premises for which a music and dancing licence is in force.' The concluding words of the section empowered justices, if they were satisfied that 'part only of the premises is intended to be used' for music and dancing, to grant an SHC 'for that part'. The matter came before the justices who confirmed the provisional SHC. The local authority, concerned that the justices' ruling would open the door to late night bars, appealed by way of case stated. The authority contended (i) that the SHC could not apply to the ground floor since there was no MDL in force in relation to that floor. It argued that to hold otherwise would require the word 'premises' where it appeared in s 77A(1)(a)(ii) to be construed, not as the whole of the licensed premises, but as 'the licensed premises or any part of them'; (ii) that the concluding words of the section were apt to cover the facts of the instant case where part only of the premises and not both floors was intended to be used for music and dancing. Therefore the discretion that was in the hands of the justices was restricted to granting, if all other matters were proved to their satisfaction, a provisional SHC 'for that part'; and (iii) that the interdependence of the MDL and the SHC were well illustrated by s 81^b of the 1964 Act which provided that if at any time while a SHC was in force there was not also a MDL in force for the premises to which or part of which the SHC related, the SHC would be revoked. The licensees argued that there was no reason why two sets of premises, that covered by the SHC and that covered by the MDL, had necessarily to be coterminous, provided the justices were otherwise satisfied that s 77A was met, and that since s 81(2) existed to cope with cases of abuse by enabling the police to apply to revoke the SHC, the resultant scheme was sensible, workable and appropriate.

j Held – On the true construction of s 77A of the 1964 Act there could be no special hours certificate in relation to an area that was not already covered by a music

a Section 77A, so far as material, is set out at [9], below

b Section 81, so far as material, is set out at [16], below and dancing licence. If, at (1)(a)(ii) 'the premises' (a word which up to that point in the section, and after that point in the section, was plainly used to refer to the premises covered by the justices' liquor licence) was to have some different meaning, namely the whole premises or any part of them, then the draftsman would have said so, as he had in two other places in the s 77A. Further, the concluding words were there to reinforce what the section had already said: that an SHC could not be granted in respect of a physical area which was not itself covered by an MDL. Moreover, while s 81(2) provided a mechanism for policing SHCs, that was no sort of reason for opening the doors any wider than was necessary to the possibility of abuse of them. It followed that both the grant of a provisional SHC and its confirmation was wrong in law. Accordingly, the appeal would be allowed (see [25]–[31], below).

Notes

For special hours certificates, see 26 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 245.

For the Licensing Act 1964, s 77A, see 24 Halsbury's Statutes (1998 reissue) 426.

Cases referred to in judgment

Customs and Excise Comrs v Griffith [1924] 1 KB 735, [1924] All ER Rep 744, CA.

R v Crown Court at Stafford, ex p Shipley [1998] 2 All ER 465, [1998] 1 WLR 1438, CA.

Richards v Bloxham (Binks) (1968) 66 LGR 739, DC.

Spring House (Freehold) Ltd v Mount Cook Land Ltd [2001] EWCA Civ 1833, [2002] 2 All ER 822.

Case referred to in skeleton arguments

Northern Leisure plc v Schofield [2001] 1 All ER 660, [2001] 1 WLR 1196.

Case stated

The City of Westminster appealed by way of case stated from the decision of the Licensing Committee sitting at Horseferry Road Magistrates' Court on 7 May 2002 confirming and making final a provisional special hours certificate granted on 18 December 2001 in favour of Richard Thomas O'Reilly, Luca Cordiglien, Stephen Fleury and Mark Robert Young, relating to the ground and basement floors of a restaurant and bar complex known as the Elysium in Glasshouse Street, London W1. The question for the opinion of the High Court is set out at [6], below. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

James Rankin (instructed by Colin Wilson) for the appellants.

John Saunders QC and Andrew Evans (instructed by Jeffrey Green Russell) for the respondents.

cur adv vult

28 February 2003. The following judgment of the court was delivered.

MACKAY J.

[1] Part of the Café Royal complex at Glasshouse Street, London W1, is known under the style 'Elysium'. On the ground floor there is a reception area, bar and servery, and a kitchen. At the basement level there is a second kitchen, a restaurant and a lounge. Entrances to both floors are to be found at the level a of the ground floor. There are two: one in Regent Street and one in Glasshouse Street itself. Access to the basement is internal; that is to say, through the ground floor.

[2] The licensing history relating to Elysium is as follows. There was a provisional justices' on-licence in existence in respect of both ground and basement floors which was declared final on 4 May 2002. It is subject to certain conditions which are not material to this appeal. On 18 December 2001 the licensing committee for South Westminster granted a provisional special hours certificate (SHC) pursuant to s 77A of the Licensing Act 1964, to which I will have to return. As they say in their case stated, that certificate covered both the basement and the ground floor, as were depicted in certain plans deposited with them. Also on that date a provisional music and dancing licence (MDL) was granted by Westminster City Council (Westminster) under s 52 of the London Government Act 1963. One condition of the MDL, as granted, was that it allowed the premises to remain open till 1 a.m. There was an appeal by the licensees to the Crown Court, which resulted in that terminal time limit being extended to 3 a.m. The MDL was made the subject of a full grant on 7 May 2002, to expire after 31 October 2002. It said on its face that it licensed the use of the basement of the premises for music and dancing subject to certain conditions, not all of which are relevant for the purposes of this appeal. The first condition allowed the premises to remain open for the purpose of this licence up to 3 a.m. on Mondays to Saturdays. Mr Saunders QC, on behalf of the licensees, harbours reservations—indeed, I think he would put it higher than that—as to whether the restriction apparent on the face of the MDL as being to the basement only should have appeared on it, but realistically accepts, for the purpose of my task today, that I can only proceed on the basis that the MDL was issued with that restriction.

[3] This is an appeal by way of case stated. The stated case discloses further facts which are relevant and which have required substantial amendment by consent in the light of further investigations undertaken after I granted a short adjournment of this appeal last week. All the references in the stated case to plans 105E and 106A as being the approved deposited plans are agreed to be wrong and should read as referring to plans 105F and 106D. The significance of that difference for the purposes of this appeal is that on the latter set of plans it was made plain that the area in respect of which the SHC was sought was both floors. Also there were physical modifications of the structure of the premises apparent in those plans and those were approved, all contrary to what was said in the case as stated by the justices.

[4] Additionally, on 30 April 2002 an environmental health officer for Westminster wrote to the justices drawing their attention to the fact that the MDL related to the basement only; but other evidence before me is to the effect that the justices' clerk now has no record of that letter having been received. On 3 May Westminster wrote again to the justices reiterating that position. The evidence from the justices' clerk is that after the hearing which is questioned in this appeal (that is to say, the hearing of 7 May) she found this letter attached to papers relevant to the application, but there was no file note to indicate that the letter had been brought to the attention of the justices at the hearing. Paragraph 4 of the stated case was to the effect that Westminster, among others, had raised no objection to the grant of the application at the hearing. That must now be read subject to further agreed amendments of the case to the effect that a representative of Westminster did attend the hearing and drew the attention of the justices to the content of the letter of 3 May 2002. Whether that actually constituted an objection properly so called is a rather fine point and one not necessary to be decided, it seems to me, by me today. a

[5] This, therefore, is an appeal by way of case stated against the decision of the licensing committee, sitting at Horseferry Road Magistrates' Court on 7 May 2002, by which the provisional SHC granted on 18 December 2001 was confirmed and made final. As I have already stated, but should repeat, that related to both floors of Elysium, whereas the MDL covered the basement only. The justices expressed their conclusions in this way: b

'We were of the opinion that as the premises were licensed for intoxicating liquor, that a local authority music and dancing licence was in force and that those parts of the premises to which the SHC was to apply had been completed in accordance with the approved deposited plans the provisional grant of the SHC should be declared final in accordance with s 77A(3).' c

[6] They framed the following question for the opinion of this court: d

'Whether we were correct in law in declaring the provisional SHC under s 77A(3) of the 1964 Act final and thereby, an extension in the permitted hours until 3 am in respect of a part of the premises for which there was no public entertainment licence in force.'

The four persons named as the successful licensees in the final certificate are the respondents to this appeal. They support the justices' decision and would answer this question affirmatively. e

[7] At an earlier hearing it seemed that there was to be an argument by the respondents as to the lack of standing of Westminster to make this appeal under s 111 of the Magistrates' Courts Act 1980. But that no longer being pursued, it is necessary to look at the substantive issue in dispute. f

[8] The original s 77 of the 1964 Act allowed for the grant of an SHC in respect of licensed premises which were, among other things, 'structurally adapted, and bona fide used, or intended to be used', for music and dancing and substantial refreshment. There was seen to be a disadvantage to this scheme in that the intending operator of premises who hoped to benefit from the grant of such a certificate had to take something of a gamble. He had to acquire and structurally adapt his premises in the hope that the justices would, in their discretion, grant him an SHC on completion. Though he could acquire a provisional justices' on-licence and a provisional MDL, he could not acquire a provisional SHC. So in 1996 there was added by amendment to the 1964 Act a new s 77A which provided for such a provisional grant. g

[9] As s 77A is at the heart of this appeal, I must read its relevant parts: h

'(1) Where, on an application made by a person interested in any premises of in respect of which a grant or provisional grant of a justices' licence has been made and which are to be, or are in the course of being, constructed, altered or extended, the licensing justices are satisfied—(a) that the premises are ... i
(ii) premises for which a music and dancing licence is in force, (b) that the whole or any part of the premises is intended to be used, and, if completed in accordance with plans deposited with the licensing justices, will be structurally adapted, for the purpose of providing for persons resorting to a the premises ... (ii) ... music and dancing and substantial refreshment, to which the sale of intoxicating liquor is ancillary, the licensing justices may make a provisional grant, with or without limitations, of a special hours certificate for the premises or, if they are satisfied that part only of the premises is intended to be used or will be adapted as mentioned in paragraph (b) of this subsection, for that part.'

b [10] In this case, when such an application was made under this section and granted on 18 December 2001, the position was as follows. First, the whole of the premises known as Elysium (that is to say, the ground and basement floors) were licensed premises within the meaning of that section. Secondly, an MDL was in force, not for the whole of the premises, but for part of them, namely c the basement only. Thirdly, that part of the premises, and not the whole of them, was intended to be used for, and was structurally adapted for providing, music, dancing and substantial refreshment, to which the sale of intoxicating liquor was ancillary. In the event the justices granted a provisional SHC in respect of the whole premises; that is to say, both floors.

d [11] Westminster argue that, as it is the case that the ground floor does not have the benefit of an MDL and it cannot be, or have been, the intention to provide music and dancing facilities on that floor, the justices had no power to grant an SHC, provisional or final, in respect of that floor. They only had power to grant an SHC of either kind in respect of the area covered by the MDL, namely the basement.

e [12] The respondents argue that there is nothing in the words of the statute or in logic which requires that the physical area of the building (to use a neutral term) covered by the SHC has to be coterminous with the area where music and dancing is permitted by licence, provided that such facilities are properly provided elsewhere on the premises.

f [13] Putting more flesh on the bones of those respective arguments, Westminster's case starts from the point (which is not contentious) that the word 'premises', where it appears, as it does, in many parts of the statute, is a word which is flexible as to its meaning, even protean; that is to say, capable of bearing different meanings according to the context in which it finds itself. If authority were needed for that, they say, there is the authority of the Court of Appeal—in a very different kind of case—in Spring House (Freehold) Ltd v Mount Cook Land Ltd [2001] EWCA Civ 1833 at [28], [2002] 2 All ER 822 at [28], where so much is stated. In Customs and Excise Comrs v Griffith [1924] 1 KB 735 at 746–747, [1924] All ER Rep 744 at 750 Scrutton LJ, considering this problem in the specific context of licensed premises, said:

h '... I do not find anything in the Licensing Act which limits the word "premises" to an entire building. In my opinion any part of a building which is defined by metes and bounds is "premises" in respect of which a licence can be granted, provided it is in the justices' opinion structurally adapted for the sale of liquor.'

j Hence the limitation of the MDL to part of the larger premises (which can be perceived, for example, in s 82 of the 1964 Act), says Mr Rankin, shows how within a set of licensed premises one part of those larger premises can be treated for certain purposes as separate premises.

[14] The governing principle (if there is one single principle) which must always be held in mind when considering SHCs, and s 77A in particular, was expressed by Simon Brown LJ, in R v Crown Court at Stafford, ex p Shipley [1998] 2 All ER 465 at 482, [1998] 1 WLR 1438 at 1456 in this way: a

‘During whatever hours of trading are permitted by the SHC the drinking must “on the whole” be ancillary to the provision of food and/or entertainment; an SHC should not be granted to an ordinary public house so as to turn it into a “late night pub”.’ b

Westminster in this case fear that the result of the justices’ order will be to do just that: to open the door to the creation, deliberate or otherwise, of a late-night bar pure and simple on the ground floor of Elysium.

[15] Looking at the words of s 77A itself, Mr Rankin argues that, for the respondents’ opposition to his appeal to succeed, ‘premises’, where it appears at sub-s (1)(a)(ii), must be construed, not as the whole of the licensed premises, c which is its meaning in the body of sub-s (1), but as ‘the licensed premises or any part of them’. Secondly, he draws my attention particularly to the concluding words of the section empowering justices—

‘if they are satisfied that part only of the premises is intended to be used or will be adapted as mentioned in paragraph (b) of this subsection, for that part.’ (My emphasis.) d

He says those words are apt to cover the facts of this case, where part only of the premises (that is to say, the basement) and not both floors was intended to be used or adapted for music and dancing and substantial refreshment. e Therefore the discretion that was in the hands of the justices was restricted to granting, if all other matters were proved to their satisfaction, a provisional SHC ‘for that part’; that is to say, the basement. These, he says, are plain words and they mean quite simply what they say.

[16] He says that the link between or the interdependence of the MDL and the SHC are well illustrated by s 81. In its relevant parts that section reads: f

‘(1) If at any time while a special hours certificate is in force there is not also in force for the premises to which or part of which the certificate relates ... (b) where the special hours certificate is granted by virtue of section ... 77A(3)(b)(ii) of this Act, a music and dancing licence ... the special hours certificate shall thereby be revoked ... g

(2) At any time while a special hours certificate for any premises or part of premises is in force, the chief officer of police may apply to the licensing justices ... for the revocation of the certificate on the ground that, while the certificate has been in force—(a) the premises have not, or the part has not, been used as mentioned in section ... 77A ... or that on the whole the persons resorting to the premises or part are there, at times when the sale or supply of intoxicating liquor there is lawful by virtue only of the certificate, for the purpose of obtaining intoxicating liquor rather than for an appropriate purpose ... h

‘Appropriate purpose’ is defined as dancing and the obtaining of refreshments other than intoxicating liquor. j

[17] So under the first subsection, if for any reason the MDL dies (expiry, revocation or whatever) and it was one which related to the premises or the part to which the SHC relates, the SHC dies with it and is automatically revoked. The SHC for the whole of the premises or part of the premises has no

a capacity for independent life unless underpinned by an MDL which has, says Mr Rankin, to cover the same area as it. The SHC can relate to a narrower area than the MDL, he argues, but the position cannot be reversed. So far as sub-s (2) is concerned, the words in sub-s (2)(a) 'the premises have not, or the part has not, been used ...' give grounds to the police to make an application to revoke, as does the fact that, as a matter of fact, the premises as a whole have not, or the part in question has not, been used 'on the whole' for appropriate purposes.

b [18] Mr Saunders points to this and says that this gives Westminster just the protection against the coming into being of a late-night bar on the ground floor which it says it fears; and that is undoubtedly right. But Westminster say, for the purposes of construing s 77A, that its value is that it underlines how c interrelated the SHC and the MDL are and that underpinning any premises or any part of any premises to which an SHC is attached must also be found an MDL.

d [19] The respondents' argument, as I have said, is that there is no reason in logic or law why the two sets of premises, that covered by the SHC and that covered by the MDL, must necessarily be coterminous. Just as, argues Mr Saunders, within premises which are undoubtedly covered by an MDL not every square metre will be intended to be, or capable of being, used, for example, for dancing over, or for eating at, or even for either, so it will be with e premises used more widely: there will be separate areas; there will be bars and sitting-out places where no question of dancing arises. If justices are otherwise satisfied that s 77A is met (and it is to be noted that the sale of intoxicating liquor has to be ancillary to the provision of music, dancing and substantial refreshment) and since s 81 exists to cope with cases of abuse, the resultant scheme is perfectly sensible, workable and appropriate.

f [20] He invites me to take this approach, that I should look at the premises as a whole, both floors, and answer the questions posed by s 77A: are there sufficient facilities for dancing and sufficient facilities for eating, such that they evidence an intention by the would-be holder of an SHC that any drinking on the premises, viewed as a whole, can properly be viewed as likely to be ancillary to those purposes? Take, for example, a position where one had a basement g entirely devoted to a dance floor and a ground floor entirely devoted to the provision of a restaurant and bar. Why should it be necessary, he argues, to have an MDL covering both floors, when there would have been no question of the ground floor being used for the dancing area, but that otherwise the project would easily fit within the structure and framework of s 77A. So he argues, returning to what I might call his problems in s 77A, that I should view h sub-s (1)(a)(ii) as in effect asking this question of the justices: is there an MDL applicable to some part of these premises? The words in the concluding sentence of s (1) 'part only of the premises' are there to cover a situation (which both sides accept as a possibility, if the facts were such as to demand it) where the SHC sought relates to some area which is in fact smaller than that covered j by the MDL.

[21] He reminds me of the classic and general authority in this case of Richards v Bloxham (Binks) (1968) 66 LGR 739 at 744-745, which illustrates the principles on which a s 81(2) revocation may take place. Where on the whole customers resort to premises covered by the SHC, in the words of Lord Parker CJ, 'to consume intoxicating liquor and not either to dance or to have substantial refreshment', then that is a ground on which the justices in their discretion may revoke the licence. a [22] I have not found this an easy issue to resolve, free, as it is, of direct authority, despite the clear and helpful submissions from both counsel. But my conclusion is that I prefer the appellants' arguments for the following three main reasons.

[23] The first is the reading of s 77A itself and the two problem areas, as I have called them and indicated. If, at sub-s (1)(a)(ii), the 'premises' (a word which up to that point in the section, and after that point in the section, is plainly used to refer to the premises covered by the justices' liquor licence; that is to say, in this case both floors) was to have some different meaning, namely the whole premises or any part of them, then the simple answer, to my mind, is that the draftsman could have said so, and would have said so, as he did in two other places in this very section. b
c

[24] Secondly, the concluding words could indeed be apt to cover a situation where the part of the premises covered by the SHC was smaller rather than larger than the part covered by the MDL. Such a situation, while being far from impossible to envisage, must surely be, in relative terms, a rare occurrence. A much more likely interpretation of these words is that they are there to reinforce what the section has already said: that an SHC must not issue in respect of a physical area which is not itself covered by an MDL. I comfort myself in this conclusion by the realisation which I have reached that this would secure more effectively, in my judgment, the objectives of the section, while at the same time avoiding the risks of the 'late-night bar', against the creation of which the justices have to be alive at all times. d
e

[25] Thirdly, while s 81(2) does indeed provide a mechanism for policing SHCs, that, in my judgment, is no sort of reason for opening the door any wider than is necessary to the possibility of abuse of them. By this I do not mean abuse by these licensees or, indeed, any licensees in general. It would be quite possible to envisage, as Mr Saunders effectively invites me to envisage, the ground floor of these premises being used as some kind of ancillary sitting-out area by resting dancers and/or postprandial drinkers. But however sincere the intentions of the licensee, it would be equally possible to see the ground floor of these premises being regularly resorted to, on an off-the-street basis, by late-night drinkers who might well be entirely indifferent to—perhaps even ignorant of—the facilities on offer below their feet. To leave that to be dealt with by police action, and burden the enforcement system with the task of disentangling whether 'on the whole' the persons resorting are there for the purpose of drinking rather than an appropriate purpose, would be an undesirable result if its prospect can be lessened. The situation created by the present grant seems to me almost bound to lead to such problems. f
g
h

[26] In form this appeal lies against the justices' decision of 7 May 2002 in making the provisional grant a final one and therefore acting under s 77A(3). I have not set out the terms of that subsection. I do not think I need to do so. But they include a requirement for the justices to be 'satisfied, in relation to the premises to which the certificate relates ... that they are, or are part of ... premises for which a music and dancing licence is in force'. j

[27] It is accepted for the purposes of this appeal that if, in my judgment, the provisional grant was in error, as in my judgment it was, then the final grant a too must be equally wrong in law. I would therefore answer the question asked in the negative.

[28] The result is that, for the avoidance of doubt, I make a formal declaration that the SHC granted by the justices on 7 May 2002 applies to the basement floor only of the premises known as Elysium, Glasshouse Street, London W1, and to no other part.

b [29] To that extent, this appeal is allowed.

Appeal allowed. Permission to appeal granted.

Martyn Gurr Barrister.

Re Salvage Association

[2003] EWHC 1028 (Ch)

CHANCERY DIVISION

BLACKBURNE J

15 APRIL, 9 MAY 2003

Company – Administration order – Jurisdiction – Association incorporated by Royal Charter – Insolvency Act 1986, ss 1(4), 8(7).

The members of the general committee of an association incorporated by Royal Charter in 1876, applied for an administration order for the purposes of the approval of a voluntary arrangement and/or a more advantageous realisation of its assets than would be effected on a winding up. An issue arose as to the court's jurisdiction to make an administration order under Pt II of the Insolvency Act 1986 in respect of the association and its ability to enter into a company voluntary arrangement available under Pt I of that Act. With effect from 31 May 2002, s 8(7)^a of the Act provided that a reference to a 'company' includes a reference to a company in relation to which an administration order may be made by virtue of art 3^b of Council Regulation (EC) 1346/2000 (on Insolvency Proceedings) (the regulation) and s 1(4)^c provided that a reference to a 'company' includes a reference to a company in relation to which a proposal for a voluntary arrangement may be made by virtue of art 3 of the regulation. Article 2(d)^d of the regulation defined 'court' as 'the judicial body or any other competent body of a member state empowered to open insolvency proceedings'.

Held – The jurisdiction of the court to make an administration order applied to companies in the extended sense referred to in art 3, namely 'company or legal person'. The association was just such a company: the Royal Charter by which it was incorporated was effective to constitute the association a legal person separate from its members, enjoying perpetual succession, having a common seal, capable of suing and being sued in the courts and having power, in addition to the particular powers set out in the Charter, to do all matters and things incidental or appertaining to a body corporate. The centre of the association's main interests was in the European Union, and, more particularly, in the United Kingdom with the result that the regulation applied and art 3(1) allocated jurisdiction for the main proceedings to the United Kingdom. Further, s 1(4) created domestic law jurisdiction to open company voluntary arrangement proceedings in the jurisdiction in relation to a legal person such as the association. Adopting a broad interpretation of the definition of the expression 'court' in art 2(d) there was power in the association to enter into a voluntary arrangement with its creditors. It followed that the court had jurisdiction to make an administration order in relation to the association and might properly do so for

a Section 8(7) is set out at [8], below

b Article 3, so far as material, is set out at [9], below

c Section 1(4) is set out at [16], below

d Article 2(d), so far as material, is set out at [19], below

- a the purpose, inter alia, of approving a company voluntary arrangement (see [14], [17], [24], below).

Re BRAC Rent-A-Car International Inc [2003] 2 All ER 201 applied.

Notes

- b For the power of the court to make an administration order see 7(3) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn) (1996 reissue) para 2081.

For the Insolvency Act 1986, ss 1, 8, see 4 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (1996 reissue) 736, 743.

Case referred to in judgment

- c BRAC Rent-A-Car International Inc, Re [2003] EWHC 128 (Ch), [2003] 2 All ER 201, [2003] 1 WLR 1421.

Cases referred to in skeleton argument

Glaser (W&A) Ltd, Re [1994] BCC 199.

- d International Bulk Commodities Ltd, Re [1993] 1 All ER 361, [1993] Ch 77, [1992] 3 WLR 238.

Application

- e The general committee of The Salvage Association petitioned for an administration order under s 8(1) of the Insolvency Act 1986 in respect of its business affairs. The facts are set out in the judgment.

Gabriel Moss QC (instructed by Lawrence Graham) for the applicant.

Cur adv vult

- f 15 April 2003. Blackburne J announced that the application would be granted for reasons to be given later.

9 May 2003. The following judgment was delivered.

g BLACKBURNE J.

INTRODUCTION

- h [1] On 15 April 2003, in the course of a busy interim applications list, I made an order placing The Salvage Association in administration with a view to the approval of a voluntary arrangement and (or alternatively) a more advantageous realisation of its assets than would be effected on a winding up. I did so on the petition of the members of the Association's general committee. As the petition raised what are, to some extent, novel questions of jurisdiction under the Insolvency Act 1986, I indicated that I would set out in writing the reasons why I was satisfied that the court had jurisdiction to make the order. I now set out those reasons. I begin with some background.

j [2] The Salvage Association is an association of members incorporated by Royal Charter. Its original Charter was granted in 1867. The incorporated body was given the name 'The Association for the Protection of Commercial Interests as respects Wrecked and Damaged Property'. In 1971 the 1867 Charter was revoked and replaced by a new Royal Charter. It was renamed 'The Salvage Association'. Its principal objects have been to protect the interests of members and others in respect of shipping, cargoes and marine, non-marine and aviation insurance; and to carry out salvage operations, including in particular surveys of shipping, cargoes and investigations into the causes of loss, damage or injury to such interests. Its membership has comprised Lloyds' underwriters and insurance companies.

[3] For reasons which it is unnecessary to relate the Association concluded in late 2000 that its core surveying business was unlikely in the future to generate sufficient profit. In March 2001 it sold its business to a subsidiary of British Maritime Technology. The Association's intention was to conclude a solvent wind-down of its activities, settle outstanding liabilities in full, and, at the end of this process, surrender its Royal Charter. A surplus for distribution to members was expected.

[4] Among its liabilities are funding obligations owed to a pension scheme known as The Salvage Association Retirement Benefits Plan for Surveyors. The Plan was set up to provide for the surveyors employed by the Association. In late December 2001 it became apparent that the Association's liability to the Plan was several times greater than the £1.4m for which provision had been made in its financial projections: £1.4m was twice the estimated deficiency of which the Association was aware at the time of the sale of its business in March 2001.

[5] With the co-operation of members willing to enter into compromises of claims they have arising out of moneys which the Association has collected on their behalf, there is a very good prospect of securing a satisfactory resolution of the Association's financial difficulties through a voluntary arrangement. The arrangement would involve members with claims against the Association abandoning a percentage of those claims, thereby enabling the Association to satisfy a greater proportion of its liability to the Plan. The hope is that, by means of a voluntary arrangement implemented under the protection of an administration, the Association may be enabled to wind itself down in a manner satisfactory to its creditors and befitting an organisation established by Royal Charter which has operated throughout its long life as a valued vehicle of the London marine insurance market.

[6] These proposals, amply demonstrated as achievable by the evidence before the court, presuppose two matters: first, that the court's jurisdiction to make an administration order under Pt II of the 1986 Act and, second, that the ability to enter into a company voluntary arrangement, available under Pt I of the 1986 Act, extend, in both cases, to an association incorporated by Royal Charter. There is no precise authority covering either point. After hearing argument from Mr Gabriel Moss QC appearing on behalf of the Association instructed by Messrs Lawrence Graham and being satisfied that the necessary jurisdiction existed, I made an order placing the Association in administration and appointed Ian Christopher Oakley Smith and Mark Charles Batten of PricewaterhouseCoopers to be the joint administrators. As I have mentioned, I indicated when making that order that I would set out in writing why I was satisfied that the necessary jurisdiction existed.

ADMINISTRATION

[7] It has for long been a matter of controversy whether the reference to a 'company' in s 8(1)—the provision which empowers the court to make an administration order in relation to a company—includes unregistered companies which could be wound up under the 1986 Act. There are arguments both ways

a (see, for example, Lightman & Moss, the Law of Receivers and Administrators of Companies (3rd edn, 2000) (paras 25-045–25-048) favouring an interpretation which would extend the meaning of ‘company’ to include foreign unregistered companies; but see Smart, Cross-Border Insolvency (2nd edn, 1998) pp 130–136 concluding that Pt II of the 1986 Act is confined to registered companies).

b [8] With effect from 31 May 2002, however, the 1986 Act has contained in s 8(7) a provision making clear that a reference to a ‘company’ in Pt II goes beyond a company registered under the Companies Acts. Inserted by reg 5 of the Insolvency Act 1986 (Amendment) (No 2) Regulations 2002, SI 2002/1240 (the 2002 regulations), s 8(7) is as follows:

c ‘In this Part a reference to a company includes a reference to a company in relation to which an administration order may be made by virtue of Article 3 of the EC Regulation.’

The reference is to Council Regulation (EEC) 1346/2000 on Insolvency Proceedings (OJ 2000 L160 p 1) (the regulation).

[9] Article 3, so far as material, is as follows:

d ‘1. The courts of the Member State within the territory of which the centre of a debtor’s main interests is situated shall have jurisdiction to open insolvency proceedings. In the case of a company or legal person, the place of the registered office shall be presumed to be the centre of its main interests in the absence of proof to the contrary.

e 2. Where the centre of the debtor’s main interests is situated within the territory of a Member State, the courts of another Member State shall have jurisdiction to open insolvency proceedings against that debtor only if he possesses an establishment within the territory of that other Member State.’

f Article 2(a) defines ‘insolvency proceedings’ as ‘the collective proceedings’ listed in Annex A. The proceedings so listed include (in relation to the United Kingdom) administration.

g [10] The operation of s 8(7) was recently considered by Lloyd J in Re BRAC Rent-A-Car International Inc [2003] EWHC 128 (Ch), [2003] 2 All ER 201, [2003] 1 WLR 1421. That case concerned a company incorporated in Delaware which had its registered office in the United States. It had never traded in the United States. Its operations were conducted almost entirely in the United Kingdom. It was registered under the Companies Acts as an overseas company. The question was whether there was jurisdiction under Pt II of the 1986 Act to make an administration order in relation to it. This turned on whether the jurisdiction to open insolvency proceedings conferred by art 3 of the regulation is limited, in the case of legal persons, to those incorporated within the European Union. Lloyd J, for reasons which I need not set out, held that it was not. He rejected a submission that, as regards the expression ‘... a company or legal person ...’ appearing in art 3(1), the regulation was confined to entities incorporated in a relevant member state. Since, in that case, the company had been incorporated in the United States, the submission, if accepted, would have denied the English courts jurisdiction.

j [11] The significance of that decision, for present purposes, is that, in the case of ‘main proceedings’—which are the relevant proceedings in this case—then, provided the centre of main interests of the company is within the United Kingdom, jurisdiction in relation to the various types of insolvency proceedings set out in Annex A to the regulation (so far as capable of relating to a company) is allocated to the United Kingdom and it matters not where the company was incorporated (whether in a member state or elsewhere in the world). Assuming Re BRAC was correctly decided, the question which arises is whether s 8(7) is only effective in relation to companies incorporated outside the United Kingdom, leaving it to United Kingdom domestic law to determine whether, as regards a company incorporated within the jurisdiction (and irrespective of the location of that company's centre of main interests), it has jurisdiction to open any and if so what insolvency proceedings in relation to that company. a

b

[12] Mr Moss submitted that, assuming that the purpose of the amendment to s 8 was to avoid discrimination against European Union companies in other member states in the application English domestic law once international jurisdiction was allocated to the United Kingdom under the regulation, it would have made no sense for Parliament to have used the criterion of place of registration in clarifying domestic law jurisdiction when the regulation itself had rejected it in favour of the concept of the 'centre of main interests'. On the contrary, he said, it makes sense to regard an European Union company for the purposes of English domestic law jurisdiction as one which has its centre of main interests in the European Union (including the United Kingdom) and to ignore the place of incorporation. I agree. It would be odd if a company which had the centre of its main interests in the United Kingdom could be the subject of an administration order if incorporated anywhere in the world other than in the United Kingdom but could not be if, although a 'company' within the extended meaning of that expression ('... company or legal person ...') and assuming (but without deciding) that the operation of Pt II of the 1986 Act (ignoring s 8(7)) is confined to companies registered under the Companies Act 1985 or one of its statutory predecessors, it happened not to be a company registered under one of those Acts. c
d
e

[13] Mr Moss submitted that I should follow the decision in Re BRAC unless I considered it to be plainly wrong. In so submitting Mr Moss nevertheless pointed to what he said was an error in the judge's discussion of s 8(7). He emphasised that the error did not in any way affect the conclusion in that case or the reasoning which led to it. This was Lloyd J's reference (at [9]) to s 8(7) being 'strictly speaking, unnecessary because the [regulation] ... has direct effect in all the member states (except Denmark ...) as of 31 May 2002'. Mr Moss said that this implied, incorrectly, that the regulation lays down criteria for the making of administration orders. This, he submitted, was wrong since art 4(2) of the regulation expressly provides that the domestic law criteria for 'opening' proceedings are to be governed by the law of the state of opening, in this case English domestic law. What s 8(7) does, he submitted, is to clarify (or extend, according to one's view of previous law) English domestic law to state that whenever the courts in the United Kingdom have international jurisdiction under art 3 they also have domestic law jurisdiction. Subject to that minor criticism, the validity of which I accept, I respectfully find persuasive the reasoning which led Lloyd J to his conclusion in Re BRAC and I am content therefore to follow his decision. f
g
h

[14] Applying s 8(7) and the decision in Re BRAC there is plainly jurisdiction to make an administration order in this case. The centre of the Association's main interests is in the European Union and, more particularly, in the United Kingdom with the result that the regulation (as regards the proceedings which it covers) applies and art 3(1) allocates jurisdiction for main proceedings to the United Kingdom. Administration is within the list of insolvency proceedings covered by i

- a the article. Finally, s 8(7) makes clear that the jurisdiction of the English court to make an administration order applies to companies in the extended sense ('company or legal person') referred to in art 3(1). The Association is just such a company: the Royal Charter by which it was incorporated was effective to constitute the Association a legal person separate from its members, enjoying perpetual succession, having a common seal, capable of suing and being sued in the courts and having power, in addition to the particular powers set out in the Charter, to do all matters and things incidental or appertaining to a body corporate.

COMPANY VOLUNTARY ARRANGEMENT

- c [15] That brings me to the further jurisdictional question which is whether the ability to enter into a company voluntary arrangement under Pt I of the 1986 Act extends to unregistered companies.

- d [16] Here also an amendment to the 1986 Act has been made, effective from 31 May 2002, this time by reg 4 of the 2002 regulations. This provides for the insertion of a new subsection—sub-s (4)—into s 1 of the 1986 Act. Following the same formula as appears in s 8(7), s 1(4) is as follows:

'In this Part a reference to a company includes a reference to a company in relation to which a proposal for a voluntary arrangement may be made by virtue of Article 3 of the EC Regulation.'

- e 'Voluntary arrangements under insolvency legislation' are among the insolvency proceedings (applicable to the United Kingdom) set out in Annex A.

- f [17] In my judgment, for the same reasons as apply in relation to the making of an administration order, s 1(4) creates domestic law jurisdiction to open company voluntary arrangement proceedings in this jurisdiction in relation to a legal person such as the Association. It therefore follows that the same factors which operate to confer jurisdiction to make an administration order under Pt II in respect of the Association apply no less to the ability of the Association to enter into a voluntary arrangement with its creditors under Pt I.

- g [18] I should nevertheless mention one particular matter to which Mr Moss drew my attention. It concerns the apparent assumption in art 3(1), evident from its wording, that the jurisdiction to open insolvency proceedings with which that article is concerned relates to proceedings by reference to 'the courts of the Member State'.

[19] Article 2(d) defines 'court' for the purposes of the regulation as meaning:

- h '... the judicial body or any other competent body of a Member State empowered to open insolvency proceedings or to take decisions in the course of such proceedings ...'

- j [20] The reference to insolvency proceedings is, as art 2(a) explains (and has already been mentioned), to the collective proceedings listed in Annex A. In the case of the United Kingdom they include 'Voluntary arrangements under insolvency legislation'. They also include 'Creditors' voluntary winding up (with confirmation by the court)' as well as administration and other forms of collective insolvency regime. At first blush it might appear difficult to fit the concept of the 'opening' of insolvency proceedings 'by the court' or some 'other competent body of a Member State' to the process by which a company voluntary arrangement is commenced, or for that matter, to a creditors' voluntary liquidation. A voluntary arrangement is set in motion by a decision of a meeting of the company's creditors to accept a proposal involving a composition in satisfaction of the company's debts or a scheme of arrangement of its affairs. Unless, in the case of a voluntary arrangement, the meeting of creditors at which the relevant resolution is passed is to be regarded as 'a competent body of a Member State' it is difficult to see how the regulation works in relation to proceedings instituted by an out-of-court process of this kind. It will be readily appreciated, however, that this difficulty is not in any way dependant on the fact that the Association is an unregistered company but affects all company voluntary arrangements. It applies no less to individual voluntary arrangements.

[21] The answer lies, in my view, in avoiding a too literal approach to the application of the definition of 'court' in the regulation and in understanding the reference in that definition to 'other competent body of a Member State' as applying not merely to some organ of the state but, more widely, to any body recognised as competent in that member state to resolve upon (ie 'open') the insolvency proceedings in question. In this connection it is not without interest that para 66 of a report by Miguel Virgos and Etienne Schmit published in July 1996 on the Convention on Insolvency Proceedings referred, in a commentary on the definition article of the convention, in particular the convention's definition of expression 'court' (which, I understand, is word for word the same as in the regulation), to the expression having 'a very broad sense' and as covering—

'not only the judiciary or an authority which plays a similar role to that of a court or public authority ... but also a person or body empowered by national law to open proceedings or make decisions in the course of those proceedings ...'

[22] The convention never came into force for want of sufficient signatures by members states although its provisions are closely mirrored in the regulation. The Virgos-Schmit report, so far as concerns the meaning of the regulation, is of questionable status. Nevertheless, the broad approach to matters of interpretation commended in that report encourages me to adopt a no less broad approach to the meaning of 'court' in the definition of that expression in art 2(d). Further encouragement to do so appears from paras 8.17–8.19 of The EC Regulation On Insolvency Proceedings—A Commentary and Annotated Guide, edited by Moss, Fletcher and Isaacs (Oxford University Press 2002).

[23] Consistently with the application of s 8(7) and adopting a broad interpretation of the definition of the expression 'court' in art 2(d), I am therefore satisfied that there is power in the Association under Pt I of the 1986 Act to enter into a voluntary arrangement with its creditors.

CONCLUSION

[24] It follows that the court has jurisdiction to make an administration order in relation to the Association and may properly do so for the purpose, inter alia, of approving a company voluntary arrangement under Pt I.

Order accordingly.

a Powell v Herefordshire Health Authority
[2002] EWCA Civ 1786

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

LORD PHILLIPS OF WORTH MATRAVERS MR, KAY AND DYSON LJJ

b 27 NOVEMBER 2002

Costs – Interest on costs – Date from which interest payable – Consent order on issue of liability – Whether interest on costs payable from date of consent order or from date when issue of quantum resolved – Judgments Act 1838, s 17 – CPR 44.3(6)(g).

c The infant claimant commenced proceedings in June 1989 against the defendant health authority claiming damages for personal injury suffered as a result of allegedly negligent care following her birth. The defendant admitted liability in April 1994 and judgment was entered by consent, to the effect that the claimant should recover damages to be assessed and costs. The issue of quantum was resolved by the parties in June 2001. The settlement, which was made an order of the court, provided that the defendant should pay the claimant's costs on the standard basis. At the costs hearing, the costs judge considered, as a preliminary point, whether interest on the costs should run from April 1994, as the claimant contended in reliance on s 17^a of the Judgments Act 1838 and CPR 40.8(1)^b, which provided that interest should begin to run from the date that judgment was given, or whether it should run from June 2001, as the defendant contended. The costs judge felt compelled by the 1838 Act to conclude that interest ran from April 1994, as the date when the original judgment had been entered. The defendant appealed, and the issue arose whether the provisions of CPR 44.3(6)(g)^c gave the costs judge the discretion to award interest from a date other than those for which the parties had contended.

g Held – CPR 44.3(6)(g) gave the costs judge the discretion to look at the dates when the costs had been incurred, and to come to a conclusion which fitted the justice of the circumstances of the particular case. He had not done so because he had not been made aware of that possibility. Accordingly, his order would be set aside, and would be replaced by an order which reflected terms which had been agreed by the parties (see [1], [13]–[15], below).

h Notes

For interest on costs, see 10 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) paras 41–50.

For the Judgments Act 1838, s 17, see 22 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2000 reissue) 473.

j Appeal

The defendant, Herefordshire Health Authority, appealed with permission of Master Rogers from his decision on 31 July 2001 whereby he ruled that interest

a Section 17, so far as material, is set out at [7], below

b Rule 40.8(1) is set out at [8], below

c Rule 44.3(6)(g) so far as material, is set out at [12], below payable on costs by the defendant to the claimant, Kimberley Caroline Powell, acting by her father and next friend Leslie John Powell, arising out of a claim for damages for personal injury, should run from the date upon which judgment was entered, rather than the date upon which damages were quantified. The facts are set out in the judgment of Kay LJ. a

Ralph Lewis QC (instructed by Lloyd and Cooper, Leominster) for the claimant. b
David Holland (instructed by Beachcroft Wansbroughs, Winchester) for the defendant.

LORD PHILLIPS OF WORTH MATRAVERS MR.

[1] I shall ask Kay LJ to give a short judgment which will make it quite plain why this appeal has been disposed of in this way. c

KAY LJ.

[2] This is an appeal from the decision of Master Rogers given on 31 July 2002 by which he ruled that interest payable by the defendant to the claimant on the entire costs of the action should run from 1 June 1994, the date upon which judgment was entered for the claimant for damages to be assessed, rather than the much later date upon which damages were quantified. d

[3] The case was an action claiming damages for personal injury suffered soon after birth by the claimant, an infant. She was born on 26 June 1986 at the defendant's hospital in Hereford. Her care following her birth was alleged to be negligent, as a result of which she suffered severe brain damage. Legal aid was obtained to pursue a claim and proceedings commenced in June 1989. e

[4] In April 1994 liability was admitted and judgment was entered by consent in the following terms: 'That the plaintiff do recover against the defendants damages to be assessed and costs.'

[5] In June 2001 the issue of quantum was resolved by the parties. On 11 June Judge Nicholl, sitting as a judge of the High Court, approved a gross award of £2,175,000 inclusive of £250,000 interim payments. Clause F of the terms of settlement which formed part of the approval, and which was made an order of the court, provided: f

'The defendant pay the claimant's costs to be subject to detailed assessment (if not agreed) on the standard basis and in accordance with Reg 107 of the Civil Legal Aid (General) Regulations 1989 [SI 1989/339], the claimant's solicitors waiving any claim to further costs.'

g

[6] On 31 July 2002 the matter of costs came before Master Rogers. He decided to consider as a preliminary point the date from which interest on the costs should run. The contention advanced on behalf of the claimant was that the interest on the costs ran from April 1994 when the judgment for damages to be assessed was entered. On behalf of the defendant it was argued that the correct date was June 2001 when the judgment for the agreed measure of damages was entered. As Master Rogers observed, the consequences of the claimant's contention were 'fairly startling'. He calculated that if the costs were of the order of £200,000, interest would amount to approximately £156,000 if the claimant was right. h

[7] The argument advanced before Master Rogers on behalf of the claimant, was based upon s 17 of the Judgments Act 1838 which, following amendment i a by art 3 of the Civil Procedure (Modification of Enactments) Order 1998, SI 1998/2940, provides: 'Every judgment debt shall carry interest ... from such time as shall be prescribed by rules of court until the same shall be satisfied ...'

[8] Section 18 of the 1838 Act makes an order for costs a judgment debt within the meaning of s 17. CPR 40.8(1) provides:

b 'Where interest is payable on a judgment pursuant to section 17 of the Judgments Act 1838 or section 74 of the County Courts Act 1984, the interest shall begin to run from the date that judgment is given unless—(a) a rule in another Part or a practice direction makes different provision; or (b) the court orders otherwise.'

c [9] The contention on behalf of the claimant was that the judgment of April 1994 ordered the defendant to pay the costs of the action. It was argued that the interest on the costs ran from that date.

d [10] On behalf of the defendant it was submitted that the date of the order giving rise to the entitlement to costs was 11 June 2001, the date of the infant settlement approval hearing when damages were assessed. If that argument was not to be accepted, it was contended that, even if interest on the costs incurred in relation to liability ran from the earlier date, interest on costs in determining quantum should run from the latter date.

e [11] Neither party suggested to Master Rogers that he had any power to order that the costs run from any different date. Master Rogers concluded on the arguments presented to him that the date from which the interest ran was the date when the original judgment had been entered, June 1994. He clearly recognised that this decision would seem unjust to the defendant in that interest would be carried on a substantial part of the costs for many years before those costs were actually incurred, but he felt compelled by the 1838 Act, as subsequently interpreted by the courts, to reach such a conclusion.

f [12] Unfortunately, neither party drew to the attention of Master Rogers the provisions of CPR 44.3(6)(g), which provides:

g 'The orders which the court may make under this rule include an order that a party must pay ... (g) interest on costs from or until a certain date, including a date before judgment.'

h [13] There was thus no need in law for Master Rogers to find himself in the legal straitjacket that the parties had suggested. He had a discretion which enabled him to look at the dates when the costs had been incurred, and to come to a conclusion in relation to the payment of interest that fitted the justice of the circumstances of the particular case. He did not do so because he was not made aware of the possibility of that course. It becomes immediately apparent that the decision that he made cannot stand.

i [14] Having considered the matter, counsel for the parties (neither of whom appeared before Master Rogers) have now appreciated that that is the situation. They have discussed what would be a fair order pursuant to the rule to which we have referred, and they have been able to agree terms. In those circumstances it is unnecessary for us to consider the matter any further, just as it is unnecessary to consider the rather difficult questions as to what would have been the position under the old law, which now happily is a part of legal history.

LORD PHILLIPS OF WORTH MATRAVERS MR.

a

[15] That is the judgment of the court.

Order accordingly.

Kate O'Hanlon Barrister.

R (on the application of Quintavalle) v Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority

[2003] EWCA Civ 667

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

LORD PHILLIPS OF WORTH MATRAVERS MR, SCHIEMANN AND MANCE LJJ

1, 2 APRIL, 16 MAY 2003

Medical treatment – Human Reproduction – Embryo – Tissue typing – Whether statutory authority having power to permit tissue typing in conjunction with pre-implantation genetic diagnosis – Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990, ss 2(1), 3(1)(b), Sch 2, para 1(1).

Z was a child who was born with beta thalassaemia major. His condition might be cured by a transplant of stem cells from someone with matching tissue. Those cells could be supplied from blood taken from the umbilical cord of a newborn child, or from bone marrow. Z's parents wished to undergo a procedure which involved the in vitro fertilisation (IVF) of eggs taken from the mother with sperm taken from the husband to form embryos; the removal from each developing embryo of a single cell by a biopsy; the examination of that cell using molecular genetics to see whether the embryo carried beta thalassaemia (PGD); simultaneous use of the same process to identify whether the embryo had the same tissue type as Z (tissue typing); jettison of embryos found by that analysis to be either bearing beta thalassaemia disease or of a different tissue type to Z, and implantation in the mother's womb of an embryo shown to be free of beta thalassaemia and of the same tissue type as Z. An application was made to the defendant authority for a ruling as to whether an IVF clinic could properly apply for a licence to administer treatment including tissue typing. The authority's decision was that it would be prepared in principle to grant a licence for treatment that included tissue typing, but only where PGD was already necessary to avoid the passing on of a serious genetic disorder, and subject to certain conditions. In accordance with that decision, the authority granted a licence to a clinic to carry out the treatment on the parents. The claimant, who acted on behalf of a campaigning group which was concerned to facilitate debate on ethical issues arising from human reproduction, and, in particular, assisted reproduction, sought judicial review of the authority's decision, on the ground that the authority had no power under the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990 to issue a licence that permitted the use of tissue typing to select between healthy embryos. Her application was allowed, and the authority appealed. It contended that the treatment which the parents sought was for the purpose of assisting a woman to carry a child, and was, therefore, treatment within the terms of s 2(1) of the Act, and that a biopsy with the object of tissue typing was a practice 'designed to secure that embryos are in a suitable condition to be placed in a woman or to determine whether embryos are suitable for that purpose' within para 1(1)(d) of Sch 2 to the Act, since in determining suitability, regard could be had to the desired characteristics of the child that would be produced by the embryo.

Held – The 1990 Act authorised the authority to license IVF treatment with PGD for the purpose of tissue typing, subject to such conditions as it considered appropriate. When concern as to the characteristics of any child that she might bear might inhibit a woman from bearing a child, IVF treatment coupled with PGD that would eliminate that concern could properly be said to be ‘for the purpose of assisting women to carry children’. The activities that the authority had licensed in the instant case were the same as those it regularly licensed for the purpose of assisting women to bear children free of hereditary diseases. The difference was as to the desired characteristics identified by the biopsy. That difference might be critical in determining whether or not the authority would decide to license the activities in question. That difference could not, however, be critical in determining whether or not the treatment, including the PGD, was ‘for the purpose of enabling women to carry children’. Whether the PGD had the purpose of producing a child free from genetic defects, or of producing a child with stem cells matching a sick or dying sibling, the IVF treatment that included the PGD constituted treatment ‘for the purpose of enabling women to carry children’. Moreover, when the object of the treatment was to enable a woman to bear a child with a tissue type that would enable stem cells to be provided to a sick sibling, an embryo would only be suitable for the purpose of being placed within her if it would lead to the birth of a child with the tissue type in question (see [48]–[50], [93], [96], [97], [145], [146], below).

Decision of Maurice Kay J [2003] 2 All ER 105 reversed.

Notes

For prohibitions on the use of embryos and licences for treatment, see 30 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) paras 59, 61–62.

For the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990, ss 2, 3, Sch 2, para 1, see 28 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2001 reissue) 291, 332.

Cases referred to in judgments

R (on the application of Quintavalle) v Secretary of State for Health [2003] UKHL 13, [2003] 2 All ER 113, [2003] 2 WLR 692.

Pepper (Inspector of Taxes) v Hart [1993] 1 All ER 42, [1993] AC 593, [1992] 3 WLR 1032, HL.

Royal College of Nursing of the UK v Dept of Health and Social Security [1981] 1 All ER 545, [1981] AC 800, [1981] 2 WLR 279, HL.

Cases referred to in skeleton arguments

Black-Clawson International Ltd v Papierwerke Waldhof-Aschaffenburg AG [1975] 1 All ER 810, [1975] AC 591, [1975] 2 WLR 513, HL.

NHS Trust A v M, NHS Trust B v H [2001] 1 All ER 801, [2001] Fam 348, [2001] 2 WLR 942.

R v Radio Authority, ex p Bull [1997] 2 All ER 561, [1998] QB 294, [1997] 3 WLR 1094, CA.

Appeal

The Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority (HFEA) appealed with permission of Maurice Kay J given on 20 December 2002 from his decision of the same date ([2003] 2 All ER 105) giving judgment in favour of the respondent, Josephine Quintavalle, acting on behalf of Comment on Reproductive Ethics, in a judicial review proceedings concerning the power of the HFEA to grant licences for tissue typing under para 1 of Sch 2 to the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990. The facts are set out in the judgment of Lord Phillips of Worth Matravers MR.

b David Pannick QC and Dinah Rose (instructed by Morgan Cole, Cardiff) for the appellant.

James Dingemans QC and Martin Chamberlain (instructed by Coningsbys, Surrey) for the respondent.

James Eadie (instructed by Department of Work and Pensions) for the Secretary of State for Health as Intervener.

c Cur adv vult

16 May 2003. The following judgments were delivered.

d LORD PHILLIPS OF WORTH MATRAVERS MR.

e [1] Mr and Mrs Hashmi have five children. The fourth, a son, Zain was born with a blood disorder known as beta thalassaemia major. By the time that he was two and a half years old this had reduced him to a parlous condition, requiring him to take a daily cocktail of drugs and to submit to regular blood transfusions in hospital in order to remain alive. His life expectancy is uncertain. Mrs Hashmi had been aware that she had a genetic predisposition to producing children with this disorder and, when pregnant with Zain had undergone prenatal testing to see whether, if she carried Zain to term, he would be born with the disorder. The test failed to disclose that this was indeed the position.

f [2] Zain's condition might be cured by a transplant of stem cells from someone with matching tissue. The stem cells could be supplied from blood taken from the umbilical cord of a newborn child, or from bone marrow. The most likely source of matching tissue would be a sibling, for statistically Mrs Hashmi has one chance in four of producing a child with matching tissue, although the odds are somewhat longer of producing such a child who is not affected with beta thalassaemia major. None of Zain's three elder siblings have tissue that matches his.

g [3] Mrs Hashmi resolved to have another child, in the hope that it would have matching tissue. She conceived, but prenatal testing showed that the child would have beta thalassaemia major, so she underwent an abortion. She conceived again, and a healthy son was born, but unfortunately his tissue did not match that of Zain.

h [4] At this point Mrs Hashmi met Dr Simon Fishel, the managing and scientific director of Centres for Assisted Reproduction Ltd (CARE). CARE is the largest single provider of in vitro fertilisation (IVF) services in the United Kingdom. It provides these services at various locations both to NHS and private patients. Dr Fishel told Mrs Hashmi of a procedure, at the cutting edge of technology, that had been developed at the Reproductive Genetics Institute (RGI) in Chicago in the United States and which might provide the solution to her problem. In summary, that procedure would include the following stages. (i) The fertilisation 'in vitro' of a number of eggs taken from Mrs Hashmi with sperm taken from her husband to form embryos. (ii) The removal from the developing embryo of a single cell by a biopsy. (iii) The examination of that cell using molecular genetics to see whether the embryo carried the beta thalassaemia disease. This process is commonly described as 'Pre-implantation Genetic Diagnosis' (PGD). (iv) Use simultaneously of the same process to identify whether the embryo had the same tissue type as Zain. Because this process involves examination of proteins known as human leukocyte antigens (HLA), this form of PGD is described as 'HLA typing'. I shall refer to it by the more popular phrase of 'tissue typing'. (v) Jettison of embryos found by this analysis to be either disease bearing or of a different HLA type to Zain and implantation in the womb of Mrs Hashmi of an embryo shown to be disease free and of the same HLA as Zain. a

[5] Mrs Hashmi asked Dr Fishel whether it would be possible for her to be impregnated in this country with an embryo created and selected in this way. IVF treatment can only be carried out in this country under licence issued by the appellants, the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority (HFEA), pursuant to the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990. For some years PGD screening against genetic disease had been carried out as part of IVF treatment licensed by the HFEA. Tissue typing had never, however, been carried out as part of such treatment and Dr Fishel considered that this procedure required express authorisation under licence from HFEA. After careful consideration of the implications, CARE applied to the HFEA for a ruling as to whether an IVF clinic could properly apply for a licence to administer treatment including tissue typing. b

[6] The HFEA announced their decision in a press release on 13 December 2001. They would be prepared in principle to grant a licence for treatment that included tissue typing, subject to a number of conditions. The HFEA decided that tissue typing should only be permitted where PGD was already necessary to avoid the passing on of a serious genetic disorder. They also decided that licences permitting PGD in conjunction with tissue typing should only be granted on a case by case basis. Such licences would only be granted subject to the following conditions. (a) The condition of the affected child should be severe or life threatening, of a sufficient seriousness to justify the use of PGD. (b) The embryos should themselves be at risk of the condition affecting the child. (c) All other possibilities of treatment and sources of tissue for the affected child should have been explored. (d) The techniques should not be available where the intended recipient is a parent. (e) The intention should be to take only cord blood for the purposes of the treatment. (f) Appropriate counselling should be given to the parents. (g) Families should be encouraged to take part in follow-up studies. (h) Embryos should not be genetically modified to provide a tissue match. c

[7] In accordance with this decision, on 22 February 2002, the HFEA granted a licence to Park Hospital operated by CARE in Nottingham to carry out IVF treatment that included PGD for 'beta thalassaemia in conjunction with HLA typing for patients known as Mr and Mrs H'. d

[8] Mr and Mrs Hashmi then made two attempts to produce a child by IVF treatment involving PGD and tissue typing. In the first IVF was effected at Park Hospital. Fifteen embryos were produced. The biopsied cells from those were then flown to RGI in Chicago for genetic analysis, while the embryos were frozen awaiting the results. Only one embryo proved to have an exact tissue match, but it carried the beta thalassaemia disease. Mr and Mrs Hashmi travelled to RGI for the second attempt. Ten embryos were produced. Two of these proved disease free and to have a tissue match with Zain. One was implanted in Mrs Hashmi, e

- a but no pregnancy resulted. Mr and Mrs Hashmi were prevented from a further attempt by the judgment that is the subject of this appeal.

THE SCIENCE INVOLVED

- b [9] Dr Fishel in his witness statement described how PGD in conjunction with tissue typing is carried out by the RGI. There is no need to attempt to describe the entire process; it suffices to identify the following two stages. (i) About three days after in vitro fertilisation, when the embryo has sub-divided into eight cells, one of these cells is removed by a biopsy. (ii) The genetic material in the cell is then tested with a genetic probe, the DNA sequence of which has been so prepared as to identify whether there is a tissue match and whether the embryonic tissue contains any form of thalassaemia disease.

c THE CHALLENGE

- d [10] The respondent, Josephine Quintavalle, acts on behalf of Comment on Reproductive Ethics (CORE). CORE is a group whose purpose is 'to focus and facilitate debate on ethical issues arising from human reproduction and, in particular, assisted reproduction'. Absolute respect for the human embryo is a principal tenet of CORE. The respondent sought and obtained permission to seek judicial review of the HFEA's decision announced on 13 December 2001. She challenged that decision on the ground that the HFEA had no power to issue a licence that permitted the use of HLA typing to select between healthy embryos. Her challenge succeeded. On 20 December 2002 Maurice Kay J gave judgment in her favour, quashing the HFEA's decision (see [2003] 2 All ER 105).

- e [11] Maurice Kay J gave permission to appeal against his judgment to this court because of the importance of the issue of whether tissue typing can lawfully be licensed by the HFEA. The Secretary of State for Health was concerned that the judgment has wider implications—in particular that it puts in doubt the legitimacy of the beneficial practice of PGD screening for genetic diseases.
- f Accordingly the Secretary of State obtained permission to intervene to support the HFEA's appeal.

THE ACT

- g [12] The 1990 Act was passed 'to make provision in connection with human embryos and any subsequent development of such embryos; to prohibit certain practices in connection with embryos and gametes; to establish a Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority', and for other purposes.

[13] The following provisions of the Act are particularly material:

- h '2.—(1) In this Act ...
"treatment services" means medical, surgical or obstetric services provided to the public or a section of the public for the purpose of assisting women to carry children ...

Activities governed by the Act

- j 3. Prohibitions in connection with embryos.—(1) No person shall—(a) bring about the creation of an embryo, or (b) keep or use an embryo, except in pursuance of a licence ...

5. The Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority.—(1) There shall be a body corporate called the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority ...

Scope of licences

11. Licences for treatment, storage and research.—(1) The Authority may grant the following and no other licences—(a) licences under paragraph 1 of Schedule 2 to this Act authorising activities in the course of providing treatment services, (b) licences under that Schedule authorising the storage of gametes and embryos, and (c) licences under paragraph 3 of that Schedule authorising activities for the purposes of a project of research ...

Licence conditions

12. General conditions.—The following shall be conditions of every licence granted under this Act—(a) that the activities authorised by the licence shall be carried on only on the premises to which the licence relates and under the supervision of the person responsible ...

13. Conditions of licences for treatment.—(1) The following shall be conditions of every licence under para 1 of Sch 2 to this Act ...

(5) A woman shall not be provided with treatment services unless account has been taken of the welfare of any child who may be born as a result of the treatment (including the need of that child for a father), and of any other child who may be affected by the birth ...

SCHEDULE 2

ACTIVITIES FOR WHICH LICENCES MAY BE GRANTED

Licences for treatment

1.—(1) A licence under this paragraph may authorise any of the following in the course of providing treatment services—(a) bringing about the creation of embryos in vitro, (b) keeping embryos, (c) using gametes, (d) practices designed to secure that embryos are in a suitable condition to be placed in a woman or to determine whether embryos are suitable for that purpose, (e) placing any embryo in a woman, (f) mixing sperm with the egg of a hamster, or other animal specified in directions, for the purpose of testing the fertility or normality of the sperm, but only where anything which forms is destroyed when the test is complete and, in any event, not later than the two cell stage, and (g) such other practices as may be specified in, or determined in accordance with, regulations.

(2) Subject to the provisions of this Act, a licence under this paragraph may be granted subject to such conditions as may be specified in the licence and may authorise the performance of any of the activities referred to in sub-paragraph (1) above in such manner as may be so specified.

(3) A licence under this paragraph cannot authorise any activity unless it appears to the Authority to be necessary or desirable for the purpose of providing treatment services ...

Licences for research

3.—(1) A licence under this paragraph may authorise any of the following—(a) bringing about the creation of embryos in vitro, and (b) keeping or using embryos, for the purposes of a project of research specified in the licence.

(2) A licence under this paragraph cannot authorise any activity unless it appears to the Authority to be necessary or desirable for the purpose of—(a) promoting advances in the treatment of infertility, (b) increasing knowledge about the causes of congenital disease, (c) increasing knowledge about the causes of miscarriages, (d) developing more effective techniques of contraception, or (e) developing methods for detecting the presence of gene or chromosome abnormalities in embryos before implantation, or for such other purposes as may be specified in regulations.

a (3) Purposes may only be so specified with a view to the authorisation of projects of research which increase knowledge about the creation and development of embryos, or about disease or enable such knowledge to be applied ...

b (6) No licence under this paragraph shall be granted unless the Authority is satisfied that any proposed use of embryos is necessary for the purposes of the research ...

General

4.—(1) A licence under this Schedule can only authorise activities to be carried on on premises specified in the licence and under the supervision of an individual designated in the licence.

c (2) A licence cannot—(a) authorise activities falling within both para 1 and para 3 above, (b) apply to more than one project of research, (c) authorise activities to be carried on under the supervision of more than one individual, or (d) apply to premises in different places.’

d [14] For present purposes it is important to note the following scheme of the Act. Section 3 prohibits the creation or use of an embryo except in pursuance of a licence. Section 11 restricts the power of the HFEA to grant licences by reference to the provisions of Sch 2. Schedule 2 sets out lists of activities which may be authorised by a licence and makes provision for adding to these by regulations. So far as treatment is concerned, the HFEA is, however, subject to the overriding restriction that it cannot authorise any activity unless it appears e necessary or desirable for the purpose of providing ‘treatment services’.

THE ISSUES BEFORE THE JUDGE

f [15] Before Maurice Kay J two issues were canvassed. (i) Does genetic analysis of a cell taken from an embryo involve the ‘use of an embryo’? (ii) Is genetic analysis for the purpose of tissue typing ‘necessary or desirable for the purpose of providing treatment services’?

g [16] The first issue arose out of the submission on behalf of the HFEA that tissue typing did not require a licence because it was performed on a cell extracted from an embryo rather than the embryo itself. The HFEA accepted that the removal of the cell by a biopsy constituted ‘use of an embryo’, but submitted that testing the cell thereafter did not constitute such use. Mrs Quintavalle contended that tissue typing did constitute ‘use of an embryo’ and, in consequence, could not be carried on without a licence.

h [17] The second issue arose only if the HFEA failed on the first issue. In that event the HFEA contended that they could lawfully licence such use in that tissue typing was ‘desirable for the purpose of rendering treatment services’. The HFEA argued that the relevant test was whether the activity under consideration was ‘at least desirable for the overall purpose of providing fertility treatment’.

j [18] Mrs Quintavalle relied upon the definition of ‘treatment services’ and submitted that it could not be said that tissue typing was for the purpose of those services. The purpose of tissue typing was not to ‘assist women to carry children’ but to ensure that a child born to a particular woman would have tissue that was compatible with the tissue of a sibling.

THE JUDGMENT OF MAURICE KAY J

[19] The judge held against the HFEA on both issues. There were a number of reasons why he held that tissue typing involved the use of an embryo, including the fact that it was inconceivable that Parliament intended to leave an activity such as tissue typing, which had potential for misuse, outside the control of the Act. As to the second issue he observed that tissue typing of an embryo had no impact on the ability of a woman to carry the embryo after implantation. In those circumstances it could not be said that tissue typing was 'necessary or desirable for the purpose of assisting a woman to carry a child'.

THE ISSUES BEFORE US

[20] Mr Pannick QC, who appeared for the HFEA, accepted that the first issue considered by Maurice Kay J did not go to the heart of the case. He recognised that the primary object of carrying out a biopsy of each embryo was to carry out tissue typing of the cell that was removed. It was common ground that the biopsy involved 'using' the embryo. If the tissue typing was not carried out 'for the purpose of assisting a woman to carry a child', then the biopsy could not be said to be for that purpose either. More broadly Mr and Mrs Hashmi's case demonstrated the true nature of treatment involving tissue typing. The primary object of the entire treatment, comprehending creation of the embryo, biopsy for PGD and tissue typing, the analysis of the cell removed by the biopsy and the implantation of the embryo, if it proved to be free of disease and a tissue match for Zain, was to produce a child whose umbilical cord would provide the stem cells which might save Zain's life. The vital question was whether this treatment was 'for the purpose of assisting a woman to carry a child'.

[21] Mr Pannick submitted that the answer to this question was Yes. He submitted that the judge had wrongly concluded that treatment services had to have as their sole object the assistance of the physical process of producing a child. IVF coupled with PGD was a practice aimed at enabling women to have children free of hereditary diseases. Analysis of the Act, and of background material to which it was legitimate to have resort, demonstrated that treatment services extended to embrace PGD designed to prevent the implantation of embryos which would result in the birth of a children carrying genetic defects. Such screening assisted a woman to carry a child because it gave her the knowledge that the child would not be born handicapped. Without such knowledge some women who carried genetic diseases would not be prepared to have children. In the same way tissue typing would assist Mrs Hashmi to carry a child, for her wish to do so was conditional upon knowing that the birth of that child would be capable of saving the life and health of Zain.

[22] Mr Pannick accepted that under this reasoning PGD with the object of ensuring that a child had certain characteristics for purely social reasons might also be said to be 'for the purpose of assisting women to carry children' but submitted that it was for the HFEA to control PGD to ensure that this was not used for purposes which were ethically objectionable. That accorded with the scheme of the Act. It was only practices that were unquestionably objectionable that were prohibited by the legislation. PGD for the purpose of avoiding genetic defects was not objectionable at all.

[23] Mr Pannick accepted that it would not be enough for him to show that tissue typing was a practice that assisted women to carry children. He had to show that a biopsy with the object of tissue typing was one of the specific activities listed in para 1(1) of Sch 2. He submitted that it fell within '(d) practices designed to secure that embryos are in a suitable condition to be placed in a woman or to determine whether embryos are suitable for that purpose'.

a Suitability could have regard to the desired characteristics of the child that would be produced by the embryo.

[24] Mr Dingham QC, for Mrs Quintavalle, challenged these submissions. He did not abandon the primary submission that 'treatment services' only extended to services designed to assist women in overcoming problems in conceiving and carrying a child to term. Most of his energies were, however, b directed to an alternative argument. Even if PGD for the purpose of screening out genetic defects fell within the definition of 'treatment services', such a practice differed in principle from PGD screening designed to reject healthy and viable embryos because they lacked some desired characteristic. While the former might be said to assist a woman in carrying a child the latter certainly could not.

c BACKGROUND MATERIAL

[25] Maurice Kay J did not consider it necessary to resort to background material when interpreting the Act but before us both parties devoted much time to exploring the history of the legislation. I have found this a helpful exercise d because that history bears closely on the issue of construction that we have to resolve. The House of Lords in R (on the application of Quintavalle) v Secretary of State for Health [2003] UKHL 13, [2003] 2 All ER 113, [2003] 2 WLR 692 recently considered another issue of construction of the Act raised by Mrs Quintavalle and Lord Bingham of Cornhill gave the following summary of the legislative history e and purpose of the Act. This is a good starting point.

[11] The birth of the first child resulting from in vitro fertilisation in July 1978 prompted much ethical and scientific debate which in turn led to the appointment in July 1982 of a Committee of Inquiry under the chairmanship of Dame Mary Warnock DBE to—

f "consider recent and potential developments in medicine and science related to human fertilisation and embryology; to consider what policies and safeguards should be applied, including consideration of the social, ethical and legal implications of these developments; and to make recommendations."

g The committee reported in July 1984 (Report of the Committee of Inquiry into Human Fertilisation and Embryology (Cmnd 9314) (the Warnock Report)). A White Paper was published in November 1987 Human Fertilisation and Embryology: A Framework for Legislation (Cm 259) when the Department of h Health and Social Security recognised (para 6) "the particular difficulties of framing legislation on these sensitive issues against a background of fast-moving medical and scientific development".

j [12] There is no doubting the sensitivity of the issues. There were those who considered the creation of embryos, and thus of life, in vitro to be either sacrilegious or ethically repugnant and wished to ban such activities altogether. There were others who considered that these new techniques, by offering means of enabling the infertile to have children and increasing knowledge of congenital disease, had the potential to improve the human condition, and this view also did not lack religious and moral arguments to support it. Nor can one doubt the difficulty of legislating against a background of fast-moving medical and scientific development. It is not often that Parliament has to frame legislation apt to apply to developments at the advanced cutting edge of science. a

[13] The solution recommended and embodied in the 1990 Act was not to ban all creation and subsequent use of live human embryos produced in vitro but instead, and subject to certain express prohibitions of which some have been noted above, to permit such creation and use subject to specified conditions, restrictions and time limits and subject to the regimes of control briefly described in [4] above. The merits of this solution are not a matter for the House in its judicial capacity. It is, however, plain that while Parliament outlawed certain grotesque possibilities (such as placing a live animal embryo in a woman or a live human embryo in an animal), it otherwise opted for a strict regime of control. No activity within this field was left unregulated. There was to be no free for all. b c

[26] Neither party now suggests that tissue typing is an activity that is left unregulated by the Act. The issue is whether it is absolutely prohibited by the Act, whether it is an activity that the Secretary of State could by regulation permit to be licensed but has not yet done so, or whether it is a practice which can be licensed because it falls within para 1(1)(d) of Sch 2. A more detailed analysis of the background material is needed to assist in resolving this issue. d

THE WARNOCK REPORT

[27] The first eight chapters of the Report of the Committee of Inquiry into Human Fertilisation and Embryology (Cmnd 9314) (the Warnock Report) address techniques for the alleviation of infertility. Chapter 9 is headed 'The Wider Use of these Techniques'. This addresses the problem of hereditary diseases. It contemplates the possibility of avoiding transmission of a gender linked hereditary disease by PGD screening for gender to avoid implantation of embryos with the vulnerable gender. It states: e f

'We see no reason why, if a method of selecting the sex of a child before fertilisation is developed, this should not be offered to couples who have good medical reasons for choosing the sex of their child.'

The report goes on to consider the possibility of gender selection for purely social reasons and concludes that it is not possible to make positive recommendations on this issue other than that the acceptability of such a practice should be kept under review. g

[28] Chapter 12 of the report is headed 'Possible Future Developments in Research'. This opens with the following comments: h

'There is a number of specific techniques and procedures involving the use of human embryos which have caused much public anxiety. Many of these have not yet reached the stage where they are practical possibilities. We believe that our recommendations for the regulation of research will allay much of that anxiety, as it will be the duty of the proposed licensing body (13.3) to keep these and other new techniques under constant review; indeed, in some instances our proposals will preclude certain developments altogether. It is important, however to consider whether further restrictions are required, although it must be borne in mind that we cannot foresee all possible developments.' i a [29] The chapter specifically considers the possibility of embryonic biopsy followed by PGD in order to diagnose whether an embryo is genetically abnormal and concludes that this is unlikely to become feasible for a considerable time.

b [30] Chapter 13 of the report recommends the establishment of a new statutory licensing authority both to regulate those infertility services which should be subject to control and to licence research involving the use of embryos in circumstances where this is justified by the objectives of the research.

THE WHITE PAPER

[31] The White Paper (Human Fertilisation and Embryology: A Framework for Legislation (Cm 259)), produced after consultation on the Warnock Report, announced the government's intention to create a statutory licensing authority.

c As recommended in the Warnock Report one function of this authority would be to licence the provision of 'infertility services'. So far as research was concerned, however, the consultation process had disclosed strongly conflicting views. The government proposed to leave it to Parliament to decide whether the authority's role should extend to licensing embryo research, or whether such research should be absolutely prohibited.

d [32] The White Paper set out in an annex the arguments for and against permitting the licensing of research. Arguments in favour included:

e '49. It is argued that the greatest potential benefits of research involving human embryos lie in the prevention of congenital disorders. Studies of eggs, sperm and early embryos may lead to ways of preventing some chromosomal abnormalities developing. Also, in the future, those who support research envisage the development of techniques including embryo biopsy which might allow the very early detection of embryos which had single gene or chromosome defects which would result in seriously abnormal babies. In the UK some 7,000 babies a year (about 1 per cent of all babies) are born with an obvious single gene inherited defect. Pre-implantation "diagnosis" could ultimately result in some fall in that number.'

A footnote explained:

g '1. Male infertility is the sole cause in about 30 per cent of cases of infertility and it is a factor in some others.

h 2. The technique of embryo biopsy could extend the use of IVF from treating infertile couples to those at risk of passing on an hereditary handicap. It would involve the removal and culture of one or two cells from an embryo still in vitro and need not affect the subsequent development of the embryo. It could, however, give the possibility in some instances of rejecting defective embryos in favour of healthy ones and reducing the number of requests for abortion on grounds of fetal abnormality. Attempts are also being made to develop non-invasive techniques for detecting defective embryos.'

j [33] The White Paper commented:

'29. The key distinction in the debate surrounding embryo research appears to be between the use of an embryo with the intention of achieving (with that embryo) a successful pregnancy leading to a healthy baby; and its use for other reasons (eg improvement of knowledge about disease). Those who are opposed to all research involving human embryos argue that procedures which lead to the destruction of the embryo or which make it unsuitable for transfer to a woman should not be permitted in any circumstances. Procedures which do not damage the embryo, or which are actively beneficial to it, do not give the same cause for concern even though such procedures may form part of what some would regard as a programme of research (for example the observation of embryos developing in different nutrient fluids prior to transfer to a woman.)

30. The Government therefore proposes that the alternative draft clauses which will be made available to Parliament should be along the following lines:

It will be a criminal offence to carry out any procedures on a human embryo other than those aimed at preparing the embryo for transfer to the uterus of a woman: or those carried out to ascertain the suitability of that embryo for the intended transfer.

Except as part of a project specifically licensed by the SLA, it will be a criminal offence to carry out any procedures on a human embryo other than those aimed at preparing the embryo for transfer to the uterus of a woman or those carried out to ascertain the suitability of that embryo for the intended transfer.'

[34] The latter is plainly the origin of the provision that ultimately became para 1(1)(d) of Sch 2. It is to be noted that 'suitability' is not defined, but that procedures carried out to ascertain suitability for transfer were considered to be appropriate for licensing, whether or not embryo research was prohibited.

PROCEEDINGS IN PARLIAMENT

[35] The Bill that became the Act was introduced in the House of Lords on 22 November 1989. As presaged in the White Paper there were alternative draft provisions, one which permitted the licensing of research and one which prohibited this. On the second reading on 7 December 1989 the clause permitting embryo research was carried by 154 votes. The second reading in the House of Commons took place on 2 April and the third reading on 23 April 1990. Proposed amendments imposing a ban on embryo research were heavily defeated. By the time of the third reading it was known that Dr Robert Winston had successfully implanted female embryos after genetically screening out male embryos which were, or might have been, affected with gender linked genetic disorders.

[36] In the course of debate on the third reading, Mr Kenneth Clarke, the Secretary of State for Health, remarked (171 Official Report (6th series) col 37):

'Not all reproductive technologies are aimed at helping infertile couples to have children. Some are designed to help people to have healthy normal children by allowing a range of congenital diseases and handicaps to be detected prenatally by pre-implantation diagnosis. The possibility of preventing genetic disease is one of the reasons most frequently cited in support of embryo research.'

Mr Clarke was then addressed by Mrs Ann Winterton, who was opposed to embryo research. She was anxious to refute the suggestion that a ban on research would lead to a ban on PGD screening for hereditary defects. She asked him to confirm that 'Sch 2, para 1(d) would allow such pre-implantation screening for genetic handicaps to continue even if today we voted for a ban on destructive embryo research'. Mr Clarke confirmed (at col 38) that '[t]hat treatment, now

- a that it is being developed, could be continued if the amendments were agreed to'. Mrs Winterton later made the same point again and it was subsequently repeated by others.

DISCUSSION

- b [37] Maurice Kay J did not find it appropriate to consider whether the Act permits PGD screening for hereditary diseases. Mr Pannick's argument founded on this question as a stepping stone to the construction for which he contended. It seems to me not merely appropriate but necessary to consider the implications of any suggested construction on the position of screening for hereditary diseases. As I have shown, this practice was an important feature of the context in which the Act was passed.

- c [38] Mr Pannick submitted that para 3(2)(b) of Sch 2 was significant. This permits the licensing of embryo research activities for the purpose of 'developing methods for detecting the presence of gene or chromosome abnormalities in embryos before implantation'. Mr Pannick argued that it would be strange if Parliament approved research to develop a method for achieving an objective d which was prohibited elsewhere in the Act. The clear inference of permitting such research was that Parliament approved of PGD to avoid implantation of embryos carrying genetic defects. The phrase 'for the purpose of assisting women to carry children' and of 'suitable for that purpose' in Sch 2, para 1(1)(d) had to be read so as to embrace that activity.

- e [39] I found this argument persuasive. The Warnock Report recommended permitting the licensing of existing techniques of infertility treatment. It went on to consider wider uses of IVF to screen out hereditary diseases. It was in favour of gender selection to screen out gender linked diseases, which was the only form of PGD screening which seemed likely to prove feasible in the immediate future. It anticipated the remote possibility of PGD involving single cell biopsy of the f type with which this appeal is concerned, and recommended permitting regulated research. The White Paper left open the question of whether research under licence should be permitted. The decision turned essentially on whether the potential benefits from research outweighed the ethical objection to creating and then destroying human embryos. Foremost in the potential benefits was the possibility of preventing the passing on of hereditary diseases to children.

- g [40] Parliament chose to permit the licensing of research. It makes little sense for Parliament, at the same time, to prohibit reaping the benefit of that research, even under licence.

- h [41] The matter is, in my judgment, put beyond doubt by the statement made by the Secretary of State in the course of Parliamentary debate. This is one of those rare cases where, under the application of the principle in Pepper (Inspector of Taxes) v Hart [1993] 1 All ER 42, [1993] AC 593, it is legitimate to resort to such material. The minister made an express statement to Parliament upon the very issue of construction under consideration and it is clear that the issue in question was of particular concern to Parliament.

- j [42] The question remains whether the two vital phrases 'for the purpose of assisting women to carry children' and 'designed to secure that the embryo is suitable for the purpose of being placed in a woman' are appropriate to describe the object of IVF treatment which is designed not to assist the processes of fertilisation and gestation, but to ensure that the child which is produced by those processes is healthy.

[43] My initial reaction to the meaning of 'for the purpose of assisting women to carry children' was the same as that of Maurice Kay J. The phrase naturally suggests treatment designed to assist the physical processes from fertilisation to the birth of a child. But if the impediment to bearing a child is concern that it may be born with a hereditary defect, treatment which enables women to become pregnant and to bear children in the confidence that they will not be suffering from such defects can properly be described as 'for the purpose of assisting women to carry children'. I believe that it is appropriate to give it this meaning in order sensibly to reconcile the provisions of the Act that deal with treatment and those that deal with research. I also think that it is legitimate when deciding to adopt this construction to have regard to the fact that the more narrow alternative construction would render unlawful a practice which has been carried on for over a decade and which is patently beneficial. It is also legitimate to have regard to Mr Clarke's statement to Parliament. a

[44] What of the actual process of biopsy and PGD—can that properly be said to be 'designed to secure that the embryo is suitable for the purpose of being placed in a woman'? Here I agree with Mr Pannick that, once satisfied that the treatment as a whole is for the purpose of enabling a woman to carry a child, no further problem arises. The word 'suitable' takes its meaning from its context. Where the object of the treatment is to enable a woman to bear a child confident that it will not carry a hereditary defect, an embryo will only be suitable for the purpose of being placed within her if it is free of that defect. PGD is thus designed to secure that the embryo is suitable for this purpose. The reassurance which Mr Clarke gave to Parliament was not one which did violence to the language of para 1(i)(d) of Sch 2. b

[45] I should add that Mr Dingemans suggested that it was possible to accommodate PGD testing within the narrow construction of the Act reached by Maurice Kay J on the basis that embryos with genetic defects are more prone to result in miscarriage. Mr Eadie, for the Secretary of State, sought permission to adduce evidence from a geneticist, Professor Alexander Raeburn, that shows that some hereditary diseases do not affect the development of the embryo within the woman. If it mattered, I would have had regard to this evidence, but there is ample other evidence which shows that the primary concern about genetic defects was and is not that they imperil the pregnancy but that they lead to the birth of children carrying the defects. c

TISSUE TYPING

[46] I said that Mr Pannick used the question of whether the Act permitted PGD screening as a stepping stone to the construction of the Act for which he contended. It remains to consider whether this stepping stone takes him safely to his destination. d

'TREATMENT FOR THE PURPOSE OF ASSISTING WOMEN TO BEAR CHILDREN'

[47] The discussion thus far had led me to the following conclusion. When concern as to the characteristics of any child that she may bear may inhibit a woman from bearing a child, IVF treatment coupled with PGD that will eliminate that concern can properly be said to be 'for the purpose of assisting women to carry children'. When the Act was passed women who had reason to fear that they would give birth to children with genetic defects were probably the only section of the population for whom it was envisaged that IVF treatment could be justified on this basis. No evidence suggests that the wish of a woman e a to bear a child in order to provide a source of stem cells for a sick or dying sibling was anticipated at that time. Such a wish is now the reality, and the case of Mr and Mrs Hashmi is not unique.

[48] The activities that the HFEA has licensed in the case of Mr and Mrs Hashmi, are the same as those it has regularly licensed for the purpose of assisting women to bear children free of hereditary diseases: (i) creation of embryos; (ii) biopsies of the embryos; (iii) analysis of the cells removed by biopsy b by the use of a DNA probe in order to identify those embryos likely to produce children with desired characteristics; and (iv) implantation of those embryos. The difference is as to the desired characteristics. That difference may be critical in determining whether or not the HFEA will decide to license the activities in question. I cannot see, however, that the difference can be critical in determining c whether or not the treatment, including the PGD, is 'for the purpose of enabling women to carry children'. My conclusion is that whether the PGD has the purpose of producing a child free from genetic defects, or of producing a child with stem cells matching a sick or dying sibling, the IVF treatment that includes the PGD constitutes 'treatment for the purpose of assisting women to bear d children'.

'DESIGNED TO SECURE THAT THE EMBRYO IS SUITABLE FOR THE PURPOSE OF BEING PLACED IN THE WOMAN'

[49] Just as in the case of PGD screening for genetic defects, the meaning of 'suitable' falls to be determined having regard to its context. When the object of e the treatment is to enable a woman to bear a child with a tissue type that will enable stem cells to be provided to a sick sibling, an embryo will only be suitable for the purpose of being placed within her if it will lead to the birth of a child with the tissue type in question. Accordingly I conclude that the HFEA was right to decide that the Act authorised it to licence IVF treatment with PGD for the f purpose of tissue typing subject to such conditions as it considered appropriate.

CONCLUSION

[50] IVF treatment can help women to bear children when they are unable to do so by the normal process of fertilisation. Screening of embryos before g implantation enables a choice to be made as to the characteristics of the child to be born with the assistance of the treatment. Whether and for what purposes such a choice should be permitted raises difficult ethical questions. My conclusion is that Parliament has placed that choice in the hands of the HFEA. For the reasons that I have given I would allow this appeal.

h SCHIEMANN LJ.

[51] The advances of science have made possible in vitro fertilisation and the creation of embryos outside the human body. Those embryos can be used for experimental and other purposes. They can, even after use for experimental or other purposes, be implanted inside a woman. All this, for which the common j law made no special provision, gave rise to a considerable amount of public anxiety. Some wished to prevent the creation of such embryos in vitro. Others considered that the benefits to be gained by such creation outweighed the disbenefits. By the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990 Parliament decided in principle not to forbid the creation of embryos in vitro and their subsequent use but to regulate what could be done.

[52] The Act provided for the setting up of the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority with a general power to keep under review information about embryos and about the provision of treatment services and activities governed by the Act. Part of the regulatory mechanism established by the Act is the issue of licences by or on behalf of the Authority.

[53] The underlying task which faces the court in the present case is one of construction of this Act. It is clear from the Act that Parliament itself has regulated some matters: other matters it has left to be regulated by the Authority. We have to decide whether the issue of a licence to permit tissue typing in order to test an embryo for tissue compatibility with a sibling affected by a particular disorder is in principle open to the Authority. The judge held it was not. For reasons which I shall endeavour to set out I respectfully differ.

[54] The structure of the Act is as follows.

SOME ACTIVITIES ARE FORBIDDEN OUTRIGHT

[55] Parliament has made the decision that the activities enumerated in s 3(2) and (3) of the Act are unacceptable in any circumstances.

[56] Section 3(2) provides: 'No person shall place in a woman—(a) a live embryo other than a human embryo, or (b) any live gametes other than human gametes.'

[57] Section 3(3) provides:

'A licence cannot authorise—(a) keeping or using an embryo after the appearance of the primitive streak, (b) placing an embryo in any animal, (c) keeping or using an embryo in circumstances in which regulations forbid its keeping or use, or (d) replacing a nucleus of a cell of an embryo with a nucleus taken from a cell of any person, embryo or subsequent development of an embryo.'

[58] Section 41(1) provides:

'A person who—(a) contravenes section 3(2) ... of this Act, or (b) does anything which by virtue of section 3(3) of this Act, cannot be authorised by a licence is guilty of an offence and liable on conviction on indictment to imprisonment for a term not exceeding ten years ...'

SOME ACTIVITIES ARE FORBIDDEN UNLESS DONE IN PURSUANCE OF A LICENCE

[59] Some activities are forbidden unless done in pursuance of a licence or of a direction given by the Authority—see s 3(1) and s 23(3).

[60] Section 3(1) provides: 'No person shall—(a) bring about the creation of an embryo, or (b) keep or use an embryo except in pursuance of a licence ...'

[61] A person who contravenes s 3(1) is guilty of an offence carrying a lesser maximum penalty of two years' imprisonment—see s 41(2) and (4).

THE LICENSING REGIME

[62] Parliament has imposed inhibitions on what a licence can authorise. The phraseology imposing those inhibitions is sometimes in positive form.

[63] Thus s 11 indicates that the only activities for which licences may be granted are—(a) activities in the course of providing treatment services, (b) storage and (c) research. From that one can deduce that Parliament has decided that licences may not be granted for other activities.

a [64] The phraseology is sometimes in negative form forbidding outright the licensing of some types of activity. I have drawn attention to the outright prohibitions in s 3(3) on what can be authorised. But there are other inhibitions.

[65] Thus para 1(4) provides that a licence can not authorise altering the genetic structure of any cell while it forms part of an embryo. Schedule 2, para 4(2) sets out further inhibitions on what a licence can do.

b [66] The phraseology is sometimes in the form of forbidding an activity unless certain preconditions are satisfied. One example of this legislative technique is provided by Sch 2, para 1(3) which in my judgment is the crucial provision in this appeal. It provides that: 'A licence under this paragraph cannot authorise any activity unless it appears to the Authority to be necessary or desirable for the purpose of providing treatment services.' I shall return to this paragraph later.

c [67] There seems to me no practical differences between inhibitions imposed in the negative and those imposed in the positive form.

[68] One should note that Parliament has not imposed any express obligation on the Authority to grant a licence in any prescribed circumstances.

d WHAT A LICENCE CAN AUTHORISE

[69] By contrast with the inhibitions as to what may be done and as to what may be authorised by a licence, sub-paras 1(1) and (2) of the second Schedule set out what may be authorised by a licence. A provision to which reference has been made in the argument is the following:

e '1 (1) A licence under this paragraph may authorise any of the following in the course of providing treatment services ... (d) practices designed to secure that embryos are in a suitable condition to be placed in a woman or to determine whether embryos are suitable for that purpose ...'

f THE DECISION UNDER ATTACK

[70] The decision of the Authority which was quashed by the judge was the decision in principle to allow tissue typing to be used in conjunction with preimplantation genetic diagnosis for serious genetic diseases. It was made clear by the press release that, before this technique could be used in treatment, approval would be required from an Authority licence committee which would consider applications on a case by case basis and that licences would be subject to strict conditions. A licence has indeed been issued designed to assist Mr and Mrs Hashmi to have a further child which will not suffer from the genetic disease from which Zain suffers and whose tissue is compatible with his. The validity of that licence is, however, not directly in issue before us.

h [71] The whole process envisaged by the Authority was: (i) the removal of a cell from an embryo created by in vitro fertilisation; (ii) the testing of that cell to see both (a) whether the embryo carries a genetic disorder and (b) whether the embryo enjoys tissue compatibility with a sibling affected with that disorder; and (iii) where it was established that the embryo both did not carry the genetic disorder and enjoyed tissue compatibility, the implantation of the embryo in the mother of the affected sibling. Hereafter I shall refer to this whole process as the process in issue.

j

ANALYSIS: SCHEDULE 2, SUBPARAGRAPH 1(3)

[72] It is convenient at this point to set the relevant subparagraph again:

'1 (3) A licence under this paragraph cannot authorise any activity unless it appears to the Authority to be necessary or desirable for the purpose of providing treatment services.'

[73] The crucial question for the court is whether the process in issue could lawfully appear to the Authority as being necessary or desirable for providing treatment services.

[74] The definition of treatment services appears in s 2(1). This provides:

'In this Act ...

"treatment services" means medical, surgical or obstetric services provided to the public or a section of the public for the purposes of assisting women to carry children.'

[75] Incorporating that definition into para 1(3) of the second Schedule leads to the following result:

'A licence under this paragraph cannot authorise any activity unless it appears to the Authority to be necessary or desirable for the purpose of providing medical, surgical or obstetric services provided to the public or a section of the public for the purpose of assisting women to carry children.'

[76] All parties, faced with this inelegant amalgam, have proceeded on the basis that the issues before us can be resolved more easily by simply ignoring the words which I have placed in italics. I agree that this seems the most sensible approach. The primary question can thus be phrased thus: can the process in issue lawfully appear to the authority as necessary or desirable for the purpose of assisting a woman to carry a child?

SOME BACKGROUND CONSIDERATIONS

[77] It is clear that Parliament decided to permit the creation in vitro and subsequent use of embryos in some circumstances for some purposes. There is therefore not the absolute ban on this type of activity, which undoubtedly some would have wished. There is, however, an absolute ban on certain segments of this type of activity which are absolutely prohibited as being ethically objectionable in all circumstances and thus within what it is convenient to call a prohibited area.

[78] The dispute between the parties has centred on whether the process in issue falls within the prohibited area or within the area which is to be regulated by the Authority.

[79] The ethical concerns which underlie this legislation are concerns about (a) the creation of embryos and (b) the use of embryos. Four separate matters fall for consideration: (i) the creation of the embryos; (ii) their use in the course of carrying out the biopsies and also (so it is argued) the testing procedures in relation to the extracted cell; (iii) the implantation of an embryo after tests have revealed that it does not suffer from a genetic defect and its tissue is compatible with that of a sibling; and (iv) allowing embryos which did not suffer from a genetic defect to perish because their tissue is not so compatible.

[80] It is a commonplace practice in one in vitro fertilisation cycle to create several embryos. One is then implanted. The others are stored ready for implantation in a later cycle if a further attempt to achieve pregnancy is needed. If however a pregnancy results and there is no wish for a further pregnancy, the other embryos are allowed to perish. This is so even though there is no reason a to suspect any abnormalities in them. Paragraphs 44–48 of the White Paper Human Fertilisation and Embryology: A Framework for Legislation (Cm 259) make clear that the government did not regard this as always unacceptable. Section 17 of the Act seeks to ensure that proper arrangements are made for the disposal of embryos that have been allowed to perish.

b [81] It seems to me that the creation of embryos with the knowledge that some perfectly healthy embryos will deliberately be allowed to perish was not regarded by Parliament as always unacceptable. The contrary has not been argued.

[82] Further, it seems to me that the use of an embryo by implantation after tests have revealed that it does not suffer from a genetic defect was not regarded by Parliament as always unacceptable in itself. Again, the contrary has not been argued.

c [83] Allowing embryos which do not suffer from a genetic defect to perish was also not regarded by Parliament as always unacceptable. Again the contrary has not been argued.

d [84] The submissions have concentrated on the concern identified in 79, above. This relates to two matters. It has not been argued before us that the use of an embryo by carrying out of a biopsy to extract one cell was itself regarded by Parliament as always unacceptable. The evidence is that this process need not harm the embryo from which the cell has been extracted.

e [85] There is in my judgment no indication in the Act that the carrying out of tests on cells extracted from an embryo was regarded by Parliament as unacceptable as such. Again the contrary has not been argued although I think that Mr Dingemans wished to leave the point open.

f [86] It is clear that amongst the purposes for which embryos are permitted to be used are projects of research specified in the licence: Sch 2, para 3(1). Amongst those purposes can be developing methods for detecting the presence of gene or chromosome abnormalities in embryos before implantation, increasing knowledge about the causes of congenital disease and other serious disease and enabling such knowledge to be applied in developing treatments for serious disease: see Sch 2, para 3(2) and the Human Fertilisation and Embryology (Research Purposes) Regulations 2001, SI 2001/188. These are all matters which Parliament has permitted the Authority to sanction.

g
CONCLUSION

h [87] The analysis undertaken in the preceding paragraphs indicates that Parliament was not opposed in principle to doing to an embryo any of the things which are likely to happen to it if the decision of the Authority is implemented. On the other hand Parliament did not sanction a free-for-all. No part of the process in issue (with the possible exception of carrying out tests on the extracted cells) can lawfully be done without a licence granted by an Authority specially set up by Parliament to supervise developments in this field. The phraseology of para 1(3) immediately points to the Authority as the primary decision taker.

i [88] One of the tasks of that Authority was to determine whether the process in issue appeared to it to be necessary or desirable for the purposes of assisting a woman to carry a child. That involved the Authority in determining whether the process in issue would assist a woman to carry a child and, if so, whether it was necessary or desirable for that purpose.

[89] In my judgment it was lawfully open to the Authority to come to the conclusion that the process in issue would assist some women, who would otherwise refrain from conception or abort either spontaneously or deliberately, to carry a child. a [90] Further in my judgment it was lawfully open to the Authority to come to the conclusion that the process in issue was necessary or desirable for that purpose.

[91] I therefore consider that the Authority's decision in principle does not infringe para 1(3) of the second Schedule. b

[92] It remains to consider whether the sanctioning of the process in issue is inhibited by para 1(1)(d) of the Schedule.

[93] Since the process in issue does not offend against sub-para 1(3) it follows that it will be done for the purpose of assisting a woman to carry a child. If that be so, it will also be done 'in the course of providing treatment services' and thus fall within the opening words of para 1(1). c

[94] It does not appear to me that the separation out of various activities in the latter part of para 1(1) presents any further difficulties if I am right in my conclusions so far.

[95] The creation of the embryo in vitro is expressly listed. So is the placing of an embryo in the woman. d

[96] Once one accepts, as I do, that the process in issue can in some circumstances lawfully be regarded by the Authority as desirable for the purpose of assisting a woman to carry a child, then this implies in my judgment that the concept of suitability in para 1(1)(d) is wide enough to embrace ensuring that the embryo does not suffer from a genetic defect and tissue incompatibility. I therefore consider that the remaining proposed activities fall comfortably within the phrase 'practices designed to determine whether embryos are suitable' for the purpose of implantation. e

[97] For these reasons I would allow this appeal.

[98] I point out in conclusion that Parliament did not impose upon the Authority any express obligation to sanction the grant of licences even if what was proposed was indubitably necessary for the purpose of assisting a woman to carry a child. That seems to me to dispose of much of the force of the argument that if what has been sanctioned in principle here and licensed in one case is lawful, then licensing activities for the purpose of social selection is an unavoidable consequence. If the decision of the Authority is upheld in the present case it does not mean that parents have a right to in vitro fertilisation for social selection purposes. f

MANCE LJ.

INTRODUCTION

[99] The facts of this case excite great sympathy. But the issue is one of law. It involves the construction of the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990, in the context of scientific developments which go beyond any specifically envisaged at the time of the Act. Mr and Mrs Hashmi presently have five children, one of whom, Zain, suffers from a potentially fatal blood disorder, beta thalassaemia, so that he produces no or inadequate red blood cells. His condition fluctuates, sometime giving great cause for concern, but giving him, even at the best of times, a quality of life which is described as 'extremely miserable' in relation to the other children. His future is uncertain. He may live to his 30s or even early 40s on evolving medication and frequent blood transfusions; he could become allergic to medication, which could itself be life-threatening; and he h a might at any time develop fairly rapid organ failure. All this could be cured by a successful stem cell transplant from a matched donor, after which Zain could achieve a relatively normal life.

[100] A matching donor may sometimes be found in the form of an existing relative willing to assist, or in a donor bank. Failing success in one of these ways, Dr Fishel, the Hashmi's clinical embryologist, explains that consultants commonly suggest the delivery of a sibling matching the sick child. Following the birth of such a sibling, stem cell blood can be recovered from the umbilical cord and donated to the sick child. This procedure does not in any way invade the new child's body. Mrs Hashmi has tried to give birth to a matching sibling on two occasions. This has led to one pregnancy being terminated because of the presence of beta thalassaemia and to the birth of the Hashmi's son, Haris, who is not however a tissue match for Zain.

[101] Against that background the Centre for Assisted Reproduction Ltd at the Park Hospital, Nottingham (the care clinic) applied to the Human Fertilisation and Embryo Authority (HFEA) on 27 September 2001 for a licence to perform a Preimplantation Genetic Diagnosis (PGD), including thereby screening for beta thalassaemia and tissue (or human leukocyte antigen) typing for Mr and Mrs Hashmi. The term PGD is in the previous sentence used in a wide sense to include tissue typing. The documents before us show that the term is sometimes used in a narrower sense to cover simply testing for genetic defects. The proposal was for embryos created by in vitro fertilisation (IVF) to be biopsied and for the biopsied material to be transported to Chicago for screening and tissue typing. In November 2001 a committee of the HFEA and (as it had become) the Human Genetics Commission had approved such screening 'where there is a significant risk of a serious genetic disorder being present in the embryo', but had 'agreed that there were sufficient ethical difficulties' with tissue typing 'that it should be subject to further discussion before its use was considered'. Despite this, the HFEA received favourable advice from its ethics committee on 22 November 2001 on the proposal relating to Mr and Mrs Hashmi. After discussing this, the HFEA at its meeting on 29 November 2001 concluded that, in circumstances where there would have in any event to be a biopsy to screen for beta thalassaemia, the HFEA might in very rare circumstances and under strict controls, permit further testing of cells derived from the embryo, including in particular tissue typing. That decision was announced by press release dated 13 December 2001. The present proceedings were brought by Josephine Quintavalle on behalf of Comment on Reproductive Ethics (Core) on 5 March 2003, seeking an order quashing the HFEA's decision and declaring that a licence granted by the HFEA cannot authorise practices designed to test an embryo for tissue-compatibility with an affected sibling.

[102] After consideration by the HFEA the care clinic's application led to the grant of a licence on 22 February 2003 for various listed activities to be carried out under the supervision of Mr Simon Thornton, including IVF, PGD and Preimplantation Genetic Screening for Aneuploidy.

j [103] The licence is subject to extensive conditions, set out in Annex A, which in turn refers to Annexes B, C and D. In particular, s (5)(a) of Annex A provides that, with respect to any PGD programme, it is a condition 'that PGD may only be carried out for those disorders specifically listed in the PGD licences Annex C to the licence'. Annex C provides for 'Sexing for X-linked diagnosis' in respect of haemophilia, Duchenne muscular dystrophy and Linz syndrome, for 'Specific diagnosis' in respect of cystic fibrosis, beta thalassaemia, sickle cell anaemia and chromosomal translocation and for the following 'Special Category': 'β-thalassaemia in conjunction with HLA typing for patients known as Mr and Mrs H'.

[104] All these tests appear in Annex C under the general heading of PGD. Screening for genetic defects and tissue typing both involve a detailed genetic analysis using the same cells taken from an embryo by biopsy. But genetic screening for abnormalities such as beta thalassaemia can be undertaken without at the same time undertaking tissue typing.

[105] A note to Annex C refers back to Annex A, ss 4 and 5 for additional conditions relating to PGD. Section 4 makes it a condition with respect to any programme involving blastomere/polar body biopsy:

'(b) that no embryo or material removed from it may be subjected to a test which supplies genetic information about the embryo that is not listed in an annex to this licence or specifically approved by a licence committee in any particular case.

(c) that no embryo may be transferred to a woman where that embryo, or any material removed from it or from the gametes that produced it, has been subject to a test, which supplies genetic information about the embryo, that is not specifically listed in an Annex to this licence or not specifically approved by a licence committee in any particular case.

(d) that centres should not use any information derived from tests on an embryo, or any material removed from it or from the gametes that produced it, to select embryos of a particular sex for social reasons.'

[106] The licence is capable on its face of covering any number of treatments, save for its (unprecedented) inclusion, in Annex C, of the 'Specific Category' referring to Mr and Mrs Hashmi. Two unsuccessful IVF procedures had been undertaken by the time the present case brought by Mrs Quintavalle came before Maurice Kay J for hearing. On 20 December 2002 ([2003] 2 All ER 105) he gave judgment quashing the decision in principle announced by the HFEA on 13 December 2001. The present appeal is brought by the HFEA with the support of the Secretary of State for Health. The arguments have developed before us along rather different lines to those raised before the judge.

THE HUMAN FERTILISATION AND EMBRYOLOGY ACT 1990

[107] I need not repeat the statutory scheme, which has been set out by Lord Phillips of Worth Matravers MR. The relevant starting point consists in the prohibitions under s 3(1) on bringing about the creation of an embryo (defined in s 1(2) as meaning creation outside the human body) or use of an embryo, except in pursuance of a licence. A licence can only authorise activities 'in the course of', and which appear to the HFEA to be necessary or desirable 'for the purpose of', 'providing treatment services': see s 11 and Sch 2, paras 1(1) and (3). Treatment services are defined by s 2(2) as 'medical, surgical or obstetric services provided to the public or a section of the public for the purpose of assisting women to carry children'. Treatment services extend beyond the activities for which any licence would be required. There are of course many medical, surgical and obstetric services (including advice, medicine and hospital facilities) 'for the purpose of enabling women to carry children' which do not involve the creation outside the human body, or the keeping or use, of an embryo.

a [108] The House of Lords in R (on the application of Quintavalle) v Secretary of State for Health [2003] UKHL 13, [2003] 2 All ER 113, [2003] 2 WLR 692 has recently considered the statutory scheme. Lord Bingham of Cornhill (with whose speech Lord Steyn, Lord Hoffmann and Lord Scott of Foscote all agreed) identified the Act (at [4]) as imposing three levels of control:

b "The highest is that contained in the Act itself. As is apparent, for example from s 3(2) and (3), the Act prohibits certain activities absolutely, a prohibition fortified by a potential penalty of up to ten years' imprisonment (s 41(1)). The next level of control is provided by the Secretary of State, who is empowered to make regulations for certain purposes subject (so far as relevant here) to an affirmative resolution of both Houses of Parliament (s 45(1), (4)). Pursuant to s 3(3)(c) the Secretary of State may make regulations prohibiting the c keeping or use of an embryo in specified circumstances. The third level of control is that exercised by the Authority. Section 3(1) prohibits the creation, keeping or use of an embryo except in pursuance of a licence, and the Act contains very detailed provisions governing the grant, revocation and d suspension of licences and the conditions to which they may be subject: see, among other references, ss 11–22 of and Sch 2 to the Act. A power is also conferred on the Authority to give binding directions: ss 23–24.'

[109] The House of Lords had, as we have, to grapple with at first sight contrasting rules that a statute always bears the meaning that it had when

e Parliament passed it and that a statute is always speaking, and with the difficulty that arises in deciding whether a modern invention or activity falls within statutory language used at a time when it did not exist. The House approved Lord Wilberforce's description (in Royal College of Nursing of the UK v Dept of Health and Social Security [1981] 1 All ER 545 at 564–565, [1981] AC 800 at 822) of the f court's role in this situation:

'In interpreting an Act of Parliament it is proper, and indeed necessary, to have regard to the state of affairs existing, and known by Parliament to be existing, at the time. It is a fair presumption that Parliament's policy or intention is directed to that state of affairs. Leaving aside cases of omission

g by inadvertence, this being not such a case when a new state of affairs, or a fresh set of facts bearing on policy, comes into existence, the courts have to consider whether they fall within the parliamentary intention. They may be held to do so if they fall within the same genus of facts as those to which the expressed policy has been formulated. They may also be held to do so if

h there can be detected a clear purpose in the legislation which can only be fulfilled if the extension is made. How liberally these principles may be applied must depend on the nature of the enactment, and the strictness or otherwise of the words in which it has been expressed. The courts should be less willing to extend expressed meanings if it is clear that the Act in question was designed to be restrictive or circumscribed in its operation rather than

j liberal or permissive. They will be much less willing to do so where the new subject matter is different in kind or dimension from that for which the legislation was passed. In any event there is one course which the courts cannot take under the law of this country: they cannot fill gaps; they cannot by asking the question, "What would Parliament have done in this current case, not being one in contemplation, if the facts had been before it?", attempt themselves to supply the answer, if the answer is not to be found in the terms of the Act itself.' a

TISSUE TYPING AS USE OF AN EMBRYO

[110] The prohibition in s 3 on creation or use without a licence relates to any 'embryo'. Under s 1(1), except where otherwise stated, embryo means 'a live human embryo where fertilisation is complete', but also includes 'an egg in the process of fertilisation'. The judge concluded that tissue typing itself involved use of an embryo. The most substantial reasons the judge gave were that Parliament could not have intended to leave an activity such as tissue typing outside the direct control of the Act, and that Sch 2, para 1(1)(d) covers practices designed to secure the suitable condition, or to determine the suitability, of embryos to be placed in a woman. The judge's view would have significant practical consequences. Under s 12(a) (though subject to the possibility of directions under s 24, sub-ss (3) and (4) in particular) a licence must provide that the activities which it authorises shall be carried on only on the premises to which the licence relates and under the supervision of the person responsible, ie here at the care clinic under Mr Thornton's supervision. On the judge's view, the transporting of embryonic cell material to a laboratory outside the care clinic (eg to Chicago, as in this case) would, at least in the absence of any relevant qualifying directions, be impermissible. b c d

[111] I do not consider that the judge's view was correct. An embryo is distinct from embryonic cell material, which is extracted from an embryo leaving the embryo free to continue to develop. Section 3A(1) with its distinction between an embryo and female cells taken or derived from an embryo also confirms this. The points made by the judge overlook the fact that the creation outside the human body, biopsying and implantation of an embryo all fall within s 3. They can all only take place under a licence, which may impose strict conditions regarding the nature of any testing permissible in respect of any embryonic cell material removed from such an embryo. Clause (d) also controls the purpose for which any such biopsy must take place, a point to which I will return. The fact that some practices (eg a biopsy) designed to secure the suitable condition, or determine the suitability, of embryos to be placed in a woman involve use of an embryo does not mean that all practices for such a purpose involve 'use' of the embryo, or therefore require to be licensed as activities under para 1(1) of Sch 2. The language of the HFEA's press notice and licence are open to the forensic comment that at points they equate embryonic cells with an embryo from which they have been removed, and treat PGD (including here both screening and tissue typing) as activities themselves requiring to be licensed. But these documents cannot construe for us the true scope of the legislative provisions. e f g h

CREATION AND BIOPSYING OF AN EMBRYO FOR THE PURPOSE OF ANY FORM OF PGD

[112] The central issues are thus whether the activities of bringing about the creation by IVF of an embryo and, particularly, its biopsying are activities capable of being licensed, when the purpose is to test embryonic cells removed from the embryo by PGD, including tissue typing, and only to place the embryo in the relevant woman if the embryo is both free from genetic disorder and has tissue compatible with an existing sibling. j

[113] These issues turn, firstly, upon the definition of 'treatment services' in s 2(1) as 'medical, surgical or obstetric services provided to the public or a section

a of the public for the purpose of assisting women to carry children'. Licences may (as stated in [107], above) only be granted authorising activities which satisfy the two initial criteria, that they are 'in the course of', and appear to the HFEA to be necessary or desirable 'for the purpose of', providing treatment services (s 11 and Sch 2, paras 1(1) and (3)).

b [114] Treatment services are already defined by s 2(1) to include a required purpose (that 'of assisting women to carry children'). Schedule 2, para 1(3), in providing that any activity must appear to the HFEA necessary or desirable for the purpose of services for that purpose, is to say the least inelegant. There is a duplication of 'purposes' if the full definition is read into para 1(3). It does not make sense to consider whether an activity (consisting for example of 'placing an embryo in a woman') is necessary or desirable for the purpose of providing c medical services for the purpose of assisting women to carry children. The intention must be that the activity should appear to the HFEA to be necessary or desirable for the simple purpose of assisting women to carry children. The true function of Sch 2, para 1(3) is to establish the standard by which the HFEA must form its judgment as to whether an activity should be licensed.

d [115] Provided an activity meets the two initial criteria, and in the absence of any regulation under Sch 2, para 1(1)(g), it must also fall within one of the particular heads of Sch 2, para 1(1). The most relevant one is (d)—'practices designed ... to determine whether embryos are suitable for that purpose' (viz 'to be placed in a woman'). Part of cl (d) was relied on in the claim form, but it was not relied on as a bar to the HFEA's objection by the judge, or it seems raised as e such in argument before him. There was no respondent's notice seeking to raise it before us. Nevertheless, it was referred to before us and is important to consider. Curiously, the only relevant argument raised in the claim form related to the initial words of cl (d) 'in a suitable condition to be placed in a woman'. The claim form submitted, firstly and correctly, that these words focus on condition;
f secondly, that they are only concerned with 'those characteristics of the embryo which in objective terms render it unsuitable to be placed in any woman'; and thirdly that any contrary interpretation would permit the HFEA to license selection for characteristics such as sex, intelligence or hair colour. The first submission ignores the critical later words 'practices designed ... to determine whether embryos are suitable for that purpose'. These words go on any view wider than g the condition of the embryo, to allow some consideration of its inherent characteristics or qualities. I return to the second submission in [127], below and to the third in [145], below.

THE PERMISSIBILITY OF SCREENING OUT GENETIC DEFECTS?

h [116] The judge said that the case did not require him to resolve whether not only tissue typing, but also PGD, in the limited sense of screening to avoid use of any embryo showing genetic defects, was unlawful. But, in deciding in Mrs Quintavalle's favour, he interpreted 'treatment services' in a way which, the HFEA submits, could present obstacles to screening of embryos for genetic defects, as well as to the taking of decisions not to implant particular embryos
j based on the results of such screening. The judge associated the concept of 'assisting women to carry children' with problems arising from 'an impaired ability to conceive or to carry a child through pregnancy to full term and birth', and observed that the carrying of a child would be 'wholly unaffected by the tissue typing'. By focusing on the single question whether the woman could conceive and carry a child to full term and birth, the judge on one view eliminated the possibility of any test the main purpose or effect of which could be said to determine whether the child would, after its birth, be healthy or suffer from, or be the carrier of, some abnormality, as well as the possibility of deciding against the implantation of a particular embryo because of any abnormality detected that would affect the viability of the embryo while being carried.

[117] It is doubtful whether so limited an interpretation was advanced to the judge. The skeleton argument lodged on Mrs Quintavalle's behalf in the Administrative Court contains these passages:

'15. ... (c) Parliament was aware of the possibility of genetic testing by embryonic biopsy and, in the light of that knowledge, provided that a licence could authorise "practices designed to ... determine whether embryos are suitable" to be placed in a woman: see Sch 2, para 1(1)(d) ...

(e) But there are some activities which Parliament placed beyond the reach of regulations ... [Sch 2, para 1(3)] ensures that any such [genetic] testing must be carried out for the purpose of assisting women to carry children (eg by screening out embryos with a genetic defect) and not for any other purpose—for example, to allow parents to choose a male or female child or (to take another more extreme example) to choose a baby with a preferred eye or hair colour.'

[118] Those passages regarding Parliament's knowledge and intentions are amply born out by the information regarding research which took place and came to Parliament's attention during the Parliamentary process as well as by the debate recorded in Hansard, to which Lord Phillips MR has referred. Before us, Mr Dingemans QC for Mrs Quintavalle sought to reconcile the judge's words with the general permissibility of genetic testing. He submitted that the judge's formulation would not restrict genetic testing to screen out abnormalities, because abnormal genetic conditions involve a greater risk of problems in carriage and birth, even though this risk may not materialise in any particular case. He drew attention, as the only relevant evidence, to a passage in the witness statement of Dr Fishel, to the effect that most chromosomal abnormalities 'are not compatible with normal foetal development'. On that basis, he submitted (in the words of his skeleton argument) that 'If it is right that most defects cause an embryo to be non-viable, the dire consequences predicted by the [HFEA] do not follow'. The Secretary of State sought to put before us fresh evidence from Professor Raeburn, at which it was agreed that we could look provisionally (or de bene esse). It was that chromosomal abnormalities are likely significantly to impair the viability of an embryo, whereas the majority of conditions caused by single gene abnormalities (which we were told include beta thalassaemia) do not affect the viability of an embryo, but almost always have a major postnatal impact.

[119] Had Professor Raeburn's evidence appeared critical to this appeal, I would have been reluctant, in view of the importance of the issue, to proceed without it and without admitting in reply any further evidence that the respondent might have been able to adduce. But we know, as Dr Fishel's statement tells us, that some abnormalities are compatible with normal foetal development. One has also to ask whether Parliament can have intended to limit the assistance given to women to carry children to treatment for infertility, including treatment to determine the viability of an embryo for implantation, carriage to and birth at term; or whether Parliament must be taken to have had a broader concern for the health of the child after birth and future generations.

- a* Children with inherited genetic problems are of course loved and receive exceptional care from their families, as in the case of Zain. That does not however bear directly on the question whether it is open to a family to choose that the potential mother in the family should not conceive a child who may suffer disability, pain and perhaps an early death or who as a carrier may expose his or her own children to the same fate.
- b* [120] The legislation contains a number of indications telling against any limitation of focus to mere viability. First, Parliament resolved the choice left to it as a result of the White Paper of November 1987 (Human Fertilisation and Embryology: A Framework for Legislation (Cm 259) para 30) in favour of permitting research under licence on embryos. It therefore included s 11(1)(c) and Sch 2, para 3. Under Sch 2, para 3 such licences may authorise creation and use of embryos 'for the purpose of ... (e) developing methods for detecting the presence of gene or chromosome abnormalities in embryos before implantation' or for other purposes which might be specified in regulations 'with a view to the authorisation of projects of research which increase knowledge about the creation and development of embryos, or about disease, or enable such knowledge to be applied'. Regulations permitting licences for the purposes of increasing knowledge about the development of embryos and about serious disease and of enabling any such knowledge to be applied in developing treatments for serious disease have now been made (the Human Fertilisation and Embryology (Research Purposes) Regulations 2001, SI 2001/188). While it is theoretically possible that Parliament intended to permit research into methods of detecting abnormalities, or into applications of knowledge acquired about disease, which it would be impermissible to licence for practical use unless the Act was amended, it seems improbable that it was contemplated that research, a particularly contentious matter, should be permissible into methods and applications the use of which in practice Parliament had decided to exclude.
- e* [121] Second, under Sch 2, para 1(1)(f) licences may be granted authorising the mixing of sperm 'for the purpose of testing the fertility or normality of the sperm'.
- f* [122] Third, there is some support in s 13(5) for a conclusion that Parliament cannot have limited its sights to matters going to the viability of an embryo for the purpose of being implanted, carried to term and born as a child. It is true that s 13(5) is a condition which must be included in every licence under Sch 2, para 1 (and is included in the licence relating to Mr and Mrs Hashmi), and that its role is to require the treating body, here the care clinic, to take account of the welfare of every child who may be born as a result of the treatment and of any other child who may be affected by the birth. This is a requirement that must not only apply before, but continue throughout the administration of treatment services. On the respondent's case it is not a requirement which the clinic can fulfil in one most effective way, by screening to avoid the implantation of an embryo which has or may have a genetic abnormality which would affect the child after birth (and, potentially, also affect siblings, in cases where the birth of such a child might impose heavy stress on the family generally). In short, s 13(5) points towards a wider concern for the future child and siblings, which is better served if the legislation is read as permitting such screening.
- j* [123] Fourth, I note that 'treatment services' are defined as 'medical, surgical and obstetric services provided to the public or a section of the public'. Although their purpose must be to assist women to carry children, they are not services provided exclusively to women. The potential father is someone to whom such services may be being provided, and whose natural concerns about future health and welfare would be expected to be relevant (cf also s 28). This too tends to point against any conclusion that the legislation focuses solely on the woman's narrow physical ability to become pregnant and give birth. a [124] I turn to the Warnock Report, which inspired much of the subsequent Act. The judge did not consider it appropriate to have regard to this report, but the relevance of it and the subsequent White Paper as background, and of the mischiefs intended to be addressed as indicated by these documents, is confirmed by the House of Lords' reasoning in the first Quintavalle case. The Warnock committee took a positive view towards the wider use of techniques (then in their infancy) as a facility or service available in cases other than infertility (ch 9). Chapter 9.2 dealt with the transmission of hereditary disease 'which may be severely handicapping to the next generation, either because the individual has the condition or is a carrier'. The committee also identified among these techniques sex selection for 'couples who have good medical reasons for choosing the sex of their child' (ch 9.11), while observing that, 'if an efficient and easy method of ensuring the conception of a child of a particular sex became available, it is likely that some couples would wish to make use of it for purely social reasons', which could affect not only the individual family and the children involved, but society as a whole (ch 9.11). While 'dubious' about the use of sex selection techniques on a wide scale, the committee did not find it possible to make any positive recommendations. It considered that the whole question of the acceptability of sex selection should be kept under review, and referred in this context to ch 13, where it recommended the establishing of an authority such as the HFEA. b

c
d
e

[125] The White Paper focuses on the issue of research, on which the government proposed to leave Parliament with a choice. But it contemplated expressly (in paras 29–30) that embryos could under the proposed legislation be screened by PGD, so as to achieve 'successful pregnancy leading to a healthy baby', that embryos would only be implanted 'if suitable', and that they would be allowed 'to perish where they were not to be transferred (eg because an abnormality had been detected)'. As I shall demonstrate in more detail (in [135]–[139], below), the White Paper does not suggest that any different approach than that adopted in the Warnock Report was being taken to the particular wider techniques on which the Warnock Report had commented in its ch 9. f
g

[126] I am in these circumstances left in no real doubt that the concept of 'medical, surgical or obstetric services ... for the purpose of assisting women to carry children' was intended to embrace not merely services to assist women physically to carry to term and give birth, but also services to assist them to give birth to children who would be normal and healthy during their lives and would in turn be able to have normal and healthy children. I have equally little difficulty in concluding that the words 'practices designed ... to determine whether embryos are suitable for that purpose [namely to be placed in a woman]' in Sch 2, para 1(1)(d) were intended to embrace PGD in the form of screening to avoid the use of any embryo with an abnormality which might affect the viability of the embryo if implanted or which might affect any resulting child either during that child's own life or any future generation because the child would be a carrier. 'Suitable' is explained in Longman's Dictionary of the English Language as 'meeting the requirements of a use, purpose, or situation'. But here the statute only h a identifies the next step or immediate purpose, leaving it to those interpreting it to ascertain from its background and other terms the more distant purposes and wider context that may admissibly be taken into account when judging suitability.
j

[127] The initial words of para 1(1)(d)—‘Practices designed to secure that embryos are in a suitable condition to be placed in a woman’—focus on the need to protect the embryo’s condition, by for example keeping and treating it in an appropriate way. The second half of para 1(1)(d) deals in a more general way with the ‘suitability’ of the embryo to be placed in ‘a woman’. The abstract and impersonal way in which this is expressed is explicable because the paragraph is dealing with practices that may and will usually be authorised by a licence granted to a clinic in general terms for classes of activity in relation to women who have not yet been ascertained. It does not follow from this formulation that the suitability of an embryo for implantation is to be assessed objectively without reference to the particular woman in whom it is to be placed. That would make no sense. The compatibility of the particular embryo with the particular mother must, at least, be a fundamental consideration.

[128] I add this consideration. To see the legislation as interested only in women’s ability successfully to experience the physical process of pregnancy and birth would seem to me to invert the significance of the human wish to reproduce. Just as ‘placing an embryo in a woman’ is only a first step towards a successful pregnancy, so pregnancy and the experience of birth are steps towards an expanded family life, not an end in themselves.

e THE PERMISSIBILITY OF TISSUE TYPING?

[129] This brings me to the more difficult question whether the concepts of ‘treatment services’ and ‘practices suitable ... to determine whether embryos are suitable’ to be placed in a woman cover the present case. Mr Eadie for the Secretary of State submitted that this question does not arise in circumstances like those of Mr and Mrs Hashmi, with which the HFEA’s decision announced on 13 December 2001 was also concerned. A biopsy is necessary in any event for the legitimate purpose of testing embryonic cells to screen out beta thalassaemia. Taking the opportunity to test the same cells to check for tissue compatibility with an affected sibling would not itself constitute an activity requiring a licence and would not affect the legitimacy of the licensed activity of taking a biopsy to screen out beta thalassaemia. In Mr Eadie’s skeleton argument, this argument was put on the basis that the HFEA was only prepared to permit tissue typing tests ‘where the genetic test (the dominant and necessary purpose of the biopsy) is to take place’.

[130] Mr Pannick QC (while not adopting Mr Eadie’s present argument in other respects) did submit that there was no evidence that Mr and Mrs Hashmi would not want another child in any event (provided only that the child was free of an abnormality such as beta thalassaemia). If necessary, I would infer that Mr and Mrs Hashmi would, in their whole family’s interests, decide against having another child unless they could be confident of realising their hopes to improve the whole family’s life by curing Zain. But, whether this is so or not, the present proceedings relate to a decision by the HFEA announced in December 2001 which was directed to circumstances where both screening out of a genetic defect and tissue typing were (and in the case of Mr and Mrs Hashmi are) important purposes of an intended biopsy. If one looks at the actual licence granted to the care clinic in respect of Mr and Mrs Hashmi, this also confirms that, whatever other longer term decision might or might not be taken, the biopsy envisaged by the HFEA's decision and the care clinic licence had a dual purpose, which was to authorise both PGD to screen out abnormalities and tissue typing. Indeed, Mrs Hashmi in her powerful oral plea before us underlined her family's desire to save Zain, while stressing the protection that any new child brought into the family home would enjoy.

[131] Where a biopsy has two basic purposes of this kind, I do not, as presently advised, think that a licence can be given for it, if one of those purposes falls outside those permitted under s 2(1) and Sch 2, para 1(1)(d). Mr Pannick was therefore right in my view to accept that in such circumstances the HFEA has to establish that each of these purposes can properly be regarded as being 'for the purpose of assisting women to carry children' and as falling within the concept of 'practices ... designed to determine whether embryos are suitable' to be placed in a woman. The former phrase is the primary control, which only Parliament can relax. The latter concept would be capable of expansion within the limits of the former phrase, by the Secretary of State making regulations under Sch 2, para 1(1)(g) and s 45(1) of the Act.

[132] It follows from [129]–[131], above that whether a biopsy for the purpose of tissue typing is capable of being licensed cannot depend upon whether or not a biopsy is also intended for the purpose of PGD screening for genetic abnormalities. The HFEA by its decision announced in December 2001 and by its licence to the care clinic restricted tissue typing to cases where a biopsy was anyway necessary to screen out genetic abnormalities. But that was a restriction introduced not because the HFEA regarded the Act as requiring it to limit any licence in this way, but because the HFEA, exercising its judgment, considered that the invasive procedure of a biopsy should only be undertaken on an embryo if it was necessary in the first instance from the point of view of the embryo, in other words to confirm the embryo's genetic normality. If a biopsy was necessary in any event on that ground, then there was no objection to allowing it for the further purpose of tissue testing.

[133] For reasons that I have already considered in relation to PGD screening to exclude abnormalities, the assistance to women to carry children which the Act contemplates is not limited to assistance in the narrow physical operation of becoming pregnant and giving birth. It extends to assistance in ensuring that any child born will so far as possible be free of genetic defects and not be a carrier of some hereditary problem which could affect a future generation. Considerations relating to the future well-being of yet-to-be-born children will weigh heavily with any prospective parents. So too will any effect that a new child would be likely to have on an existing sibling. Families which cannot, for financial reasons or because of the needs of an existing sibling, accommodate another child, may take steps to avoid having one. Families may equally have another child with the idea in mind that he or she will be company for an existing child. Such considerations may no doubt also play a significant role in the clinical judgment, about the welfare of any child who may be born and of any other child who may be affected by the birth, which is contemplated by s 13(5) of the Act. Whilst that subsection probably had primarily in mind consideration of any adverse effects on the welfare of the future or any existing child, the language does not exclude positive effects. The relevant considerations may indeed point in opposite directions. For example, it might be to the benefit of an existing child to have a companion, but there might be a countervailing risk to the welfare of the new child in the form of some hereditary disability.

a [134] It is, however, at the core of the respondent's case that the services which may be provided do not extend to assisting women to carry children selected for particular characteristics unrelated to any abnormality. Screening out genetic abnormalities is one thing. Screening out certain normal characteristics is another. The crucial distinction has been put as being between 'screening out abnormalities' and 'screening in preferences'. That distinction b raises a spectre of eugenics and 'designer babies'. But it is a crude over-simplification to view this case as being about 'preferences'. The word suggests personal indulgence or predilection and the luxury of a real choice. But there is no element of whim in the circumstances that the HFEA had it in mind to licence in December 2001, and Mr and Mrs Hashmi are not seeking to indulge themselves. The case is about a family's reaction, understandable in the light of c current scientific possibilities, to a cruel fate which one of its members is suffering and will continue to suffer, without a successful stem cell transplant. Ethical concerns that a child to be born might be used as a vehicle, or would not be valued and loved were, for good reason in the circumstances as they appear, not at the forefront of any submissions made to us in the present case. Other d concerns, for example regarding any increase in the numbers of embryos that might be discarded, were raised. But I do not regard any of them as in any way decisive, or as having any relevance approaching that which attaches to the Warnock Report and White Paper, which evidence the immediate background to the legislation and the aspects of IVF which were being addressed. On the HFEA's and the Secretary of State's case, such ethical concerns as may be raised e by the presently proposed procedures fall appropriately to be addressed by the HFEA and the care clinic in the exercise of their respective functions.

[135] Returning to the discussion in the Warnock Report, ch 9.11, on sex selection (see [124], above), the present circumstances lie conceptually between the two poles of 'good medical reasons' for tests, by which the Warnock f committee was referring simply to medical reasons affecting children yet to be born, and testing for 'purely social reasons' which the Warnock committee said would 'obviously affect the individual family and the children involved, and would also have implications for society as a whole'. However they lie far closer in spirit in my view to the former pole than to the latter. There are here good medical reasons for screening any embryo, although they do not relate to any g future child's health. The concerns to which the HFEA's decision and the licence for Mr and Mrs Hashmi are directed are anything but 'purely social', relating as they do to the health of a sibling and the well-being of the whole family. What matters in any event is that the Warnock committee proposed in ch 9.11 of its report to leave even the general question of the acceptability of sex selection to h the authority which it recommended should be established.

[136] Mr Dingemans submitted that the Warnock committee had elsewhere made clear that the legislation should prohibit absolutely any development such as the presently proposed tissue typing. He referred to ch 12.16. The committee in ch 12 anticipated the future development of various techniques (among them j in ch 12.11 cloning by embryo-splitting, in ch 12.12–12.13 embryonic biopsy to identify any abnormality and in ch 12.14 nucleus substitution). In ch 12.15, it anticipated a possible further technique to identify and replace a defective gene. Then, in ch 12.16, the committee said this:

'Public anxiety about these techniques centres, not so much on their possible therapeutic use, but on the idea of the deliberate creation of human beings with specific characteristics. This has overtones of selective breeding. We regard such techniques as purely speculative but believe that any developments in these fields are precluded by the controls we have already recommended ...'

It added:

'We would go further. We recommend that the proposed licensing body promulgates guidance on what types of research, apart from those prohibited by law, would be unlikely to be considered ethically acceptable in any circumstances and therefore would not be licensed. We envisage this guidance being reviewed from time to time to take account of both changes in scientific knowledge and changes in public attitudes.'

[137] When speaking of 'such techniques' as purely speculative, it is not clear that the Warnock committee had in mind all the possible future techniques previously discussed, or whether it was referring to techniques with 'overtones of selective breeding'. But, assuming that it was speaking of all the possible future techniques, its reference to 'the controls we have already recommended' did not contemplate that all such techniques would be absolutely prohibited under the legislation. The 'controls' in question were to consist of a combination of absolute prohibitions (see eg ch 12.8 and 9) and the performance by the proposed licensing body of its function. See also ch 12.1, where the committee said that:

'We believe that our recommendations for the regulation of research will allay much of that anxiety, as it will be the duty of the proposed licensing body (13.3) to keep these and other new techniques under constant review; indeed, in some instances our proposals will preclude certain developments altogether.'

[138] In these circumstances, I see no inconsistency between chs 9.11 and 12.16 of the Warnock Report.

[139] One of the potential future techniques to which the Warnock Report referred without recommending any absolute prohibition was embryo-splitting (ch 12.11). Lord Bingham noted this as a point of some relevance when he concluded in Quintavalle's case [2003] 2 All ER 113 at [18] that the Act permitted the licensing of cloning by cell nuclear replacement (CNR), involving implanting a replacement nucleus in an unfertilised egg, as distinct from replacing the nucleus of an already fertilised embryo. The White Paper did, however, go further than the Warnock Report in two other areas—by recommending absolute prohibitions of nucleus substitution and of techniques aimed at modifying the genetic constitution of an embryo. Lord Bingham inferred in Quintavalle's case that s 3(3)(d) of the Act was enacted to give effect to this White Paper recommendation. It is in my opinion of considerable relevance to this appeal that neither Warnock nor the White Paper recommended any absolute prohibition in relation to embryonic testing or in relation to sex selection for reasons unrelated to the child-to-be-born's medical condition.

[140] Mr Pannick also pointed out that the effect of s 4(1)(b) (which contains a limited extension of protection beyond embryos to sperm) is to enable use in the course of providing treatment services (as defined in s 2(1)) to prospective parents together of sperm sorted to select sex. That is not to say that the same approach governs sex selection in relation to embryos. It clearly does not. Embryos enjoy on any view a higher level of protection, and, when their use is permissible at all, a it is only under the control of the HFEA. But it is at least clear that there is no absolute bar on sex selection in all circumstances.

[141] The Act was framed at a time when PGD to screen out disabilities was understood as a possibility, and was (as I have concluded) contemplated in certain of its provisions. In contrast, tissue typing and other techniques to screen out certain normal characteristics were only speculative possibilities at the time of the Act. That the distinction between these procedures may itself be debatable, as Mr Pannick exemplified by taking the instances of dyslexia and deafness, does not really help, since problems of scope on any view arise. But it can be said that the concept of 'services ... for the purpose of assisting women to carry children' seems on its face wide enough to embrace some forms of activity in relation to healthy embryos, eg testing to ensure that the right sperm and egg had been used, although the considerations here differ from those presently under consideration.

[142] More importantly, once it is recognised that the concept of 'services ... for the purpose of assisting women to carry children' extends beyond purely physical problems affecting the viability of the embryo during pregnancy and birth, and allows the screening of embryos for genetic abnormalities, it becomes clear that such services may have regard to prospective parents' and society's concern for others and for the future. The concept is in other words to be read in a general, rather than a restrictive sense. If that is so, I see no basis for drawing a line which excludes the services envisaged by the decision announced on 13 December 2001. The assistance to carry a child provided can be viewed either as assistance to have a child whose addition to the family could, without any invasion of tissue, bring very special benefits for a sibling and for the family as a whole and who would be expected to be valued correspondingly, or more narrowly as assistance to the parents in giving them crucial information to decide whether the potential mother should go ahead to have an embryo placed in her. In whichever way the assistance is viewed, I regard it as coming within the statutory concept of 'services ... for the purpose of assisting women to carry children'.

[143] Where Parliament intended to put absolute limits in the fields of potential scientific development identified by the Warnock Report and White Paper, it did so expressly, as in s 3(2) and (3). Notably it did not include any absolute prohibition in the area of sex selection for 'social purposes'. The inference is that even this was left to be regulated by the licensing authority with the assistance of clinics (on which licences must under the Act impose conditions extending well beyond the purely medical or surgical to matters of general welfare). The present circumstances involve a form of selection which is much less obviously problematic than, and very far removed from, selection for social purposes. But, as I have stressed, what matters is that the HFEA's judgment of the desirability of the proposed treatment services has not, as such, been challenged, if it lay within its powers to make it at all. I would therefore hold that it was, in circumstances such as those faced by the Hashmis, open to the HFEA under the Act to conclude that a biopsy for the purpose of selecting an embryo with tissue compatible with that of a very sick child was an activity necessary or desirable for the purpose of treatment services as defined.

[144] Viewing the issue in terms of the guidance provided by Lord Wilberforce's formulation ([109], above), a biopsy for the purpose of tissue typing is, in the wider sense, a form of PGD. Its direct purpose is to establish the embryo's genetic makeup and in that light to decide whether or not it should be implanted.

The differences between the testing of embryonic cells for abnormality and for tissue typing lies in the precise aspects of the genetic makeup tested and in the factors taken into account when deciding whether to implant. In the one case, it may be said, the procedures are with a view to ensuring the health of the child to be or of future generations, while in the other they are to promote the health of a sibling and the general welfare of the existing family. The taxonomy of statutory provisions may offer no easy answer (cf the difference of judicial opinion in the Royal College of Nursing case itself), but I would regard these as differences falling in Lord Wilberforce's terms within the same genus (even if not the same species) of facts as those to which the expressed statutory policy has been formulated. Indeed, I would go further for reasons which I have already indicated. The background (in the form of the Warnock Report and White Paper) supports the view that Parliament envisaged the possibility or likelihood of future developments (even though it could not know precisely what they would be) and positively intended to bring all such procedures within the sphere of the HFEA, with the exception of those specifically prohibited.

[145] It remains to consider Sch 2, para 1(1)(d). I have rejected the suggestion that this clause is only concerned with characteristics which in objective terms render an embryo unsuitable to be placed in any woman ([127], above). The compatibility of the particular embryo with the particular woman is fundamental. Clause (d) also enables a clinic and parents to consider before implantation not merely whether the embryo can viably be implanted and carried to term, but also whether the future child will himself or herself be healthy or a carrier of an hereditary disease which may affect future generations ([126]–[128], above). I have further concluded that a biopsy for the purpose of tissue typing and of enabling a choice to be made regarding implantation based on the compatibility of the embryo's tissue with that of a sibling is capable of constituting a service for the purpose of assisting woman to carry children ([142], above). But is suitability for placement in a woman, in contrast to treatment services, to be judged only by considering whether the embryo is viable and capable of leading to a healthy child who will not be a carrier of an hereditary disease? If it is, there is still the possibility of the Secretary of State widening the ambit of licensable activities by regulation under Sch 2, para 1(1)(g). Nevertheless, I consider it improbable that this was a distinction or a limitation that Parliament intended at this point to introduce by the bare requirement that a licensed practice should be designed to determine whether an embryo was suitable to be implanted. As I have observed, that requirement leaves open the more distant purposes and wider context by reference to which suitability may be judged ([126], above). Having concluded that the concept of treatment services embraces the situation addressed by the HFEA's decision announced on 13 December 2001, it is natural also to regard the concept of suitability as apt to do so. Tissue typing is aimed at providing assistance matching the felt and perceived needs of the family as a whole and the parents and siblings in particular. The HFEA must already bear their interests in mind when determining whether to issue any licence. The HFEA, when granting any licence, may, in the exercise of its powers under s 11 and Sch 2, para 1(1) and (2), limit in such way as it considers appropriate the practices which it licenses or the purposes for which they may be undertaken—as it in fact did (see [105], above). Clinics are bound to have regard to the interests of siblings as well as those of any child-to-be-born under s 13(5) when providing any treatment services; and their performance of that role is a likely to be assisted by information obtained from tissue typing. I conclude that the suitability of the embryo to be placed in a (particular) woman may be considered in the context of objectively established aims and perceived needs relating to the child-to-be-born's parents and to an affected sibling, of the kind that the HFEA had in mind in reaching its decision announced on 13 December 2001 and in later granting the care clinic's licence.

b CONCLUSION

[146] I would for these reasons hold that the appeal succeeds. I would accordingly set aside the order whereby the judge quashed the HFEA's decision in principle announced on 13 December 2001 to allow tissue typing to test an embryo for tissue compatibility with an affected sibling.

c Appeal allowed.

Kate O'Hanlon Barrister.

Skidmore v Dartford & Gravesham NHS Trust

[2003] UKHL 27

HOUSE OF LORDS

LORD BINGHAM OF CORNHILL, LORD STEYN, LORD CLYDE, LORD HUTTON AND LORD SCOTT OF FOSCOTE

10 APRIL, 22 MAY 2003

Medical practitioner – Disciplinary proceedings – Procedure – Categorisation of proceedings – Whether professional or personal conduct – Department of Health Circular HC(90)9.

The employee was a consultant surgeon employed by the trust. Whilst he was performing keyhole surgery on a patient, a major artery was punctured and there was a large loss of blood. The operation had to be converted to open surgery and was eventually completed successfully. The patient's husband sought an explanation from the patient relations manager who in turn asked for the employee's comments. The thrust of his explanation was to blame the episode on a faulty instrument and to suggest that the blood loss was normal. The trust brought a charge of personal misconduct against the employee alleging that he had sought to deliberately mislead the patient and her family, the community health council and the chief executive through a series of statements and correspondence which he knew to be untrue. Department of Health Circular HC(90)9, a contractual disciplinary code, was incorporated into the employee's contract. It provided for a difference in procedure depending on whether the case involved allegations of 'professional conduct' or 'personal conduct'. The former was governed by a judicialised procedure under the circular. The latter was governed by less formal disciplinary procedures without, amongst other things, the right of legal representation. Personal conduct was defined as 'performance or behaviour of practitioners due to factors other than those associated with the exercise of medical or dental skills' and professional conduct was defined as 'performance or behaviour of practitioners arising from the exercise of medical or dental skills'. At the disciplinary hearing before the trust's chief executive the question whether the proceedings were properly constituted or whether the case should have been dealt with under the circular was argued as a preliminary point. The chief executive decided that the allegations were of personal and not professional misconduct and that as a result she had jurisdiction to deal with the complaint. She concluded that the employee had lied and that he should be dismissed with immediate effect. The employee applied to an employment tribunal alleging unfair dismissal. The tribunal dismissed the complaint and the employee's appeal was dismissed by the Employment Appeal Tribunal on the ground that the case against him was essentially of a personal nature. On the employee's appeal, the Court of Appeal held that the decision of the employer had to comply with the terms of the contract and that the decision of the trust on categorisation was wrong since the case was one involving professional conduct. The trust appealed to the House of Lords.

- Held – A purposive construction of the circular and common sense considerations pointed towards a broad interpretation of professional conduct. When in a doctor/patient relationship a doctor committed deliberate misconduct it might come within the category of professional conduct. Lies told by a doctor to a patient about important details of an operation could amount to professional conduct. In such a case the medical practitioner was professing to speak as a doctor about a matter covered by his medical skills. Accordingly in breach of contract the trust adopted the wrong procedure. The decision of the Employment Appeal tribunal would be quashed and the matter remitted to an employment tribunal to reconsider the complaint of unfair dismissal on the basis that the trust employed the wrong procedure (see [1], [19], [20], [22]–[24], [29], [30], below).
- Saeed v Royal Wolverhampton Hospitals NHS Trust* [2001] ICR 903 considered. Decision of the Court of Appeal [2002] All ER (D) 52 (Jan) affirmed.

Notes

- For the contractual basis for disciplinary powers, see 16 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn) (2000 reissue) para 408.

Cases referred to in opinions

- Associated Provincial Picture Houses Ltd v Wednesbury Corp* [1947] 2 All ER 680, [1948] 1 KB 223, CA.
- Bhanot v South West London & St George's Mental Health NHS Trust* [2000] Lloyd's Rep Med 324.
- Brown v GIO Insurance Ltd* [1998] Lloyd's Rep IR 201, CA.
- Chatterjee v City and Hackney Community Services NHS Trust* (1998) 49 BMLR 55.
- Kramer v South Bedfordshire Community Health Care Trust* (1995) 30 BMLR 34.
- Niarchos (London) Ltd v Shell Tankers Ltd* [1961] 2 Lloyd's Rep 496.
- R v Secretary of State for Health and Trent Regional Health Authority, ex p Guirguis* [1990] IRLR 30, CA.
- Saeed v Royal Wolverhampton Hospitals NHS Trust* [2001] ICR 903, CA; affg [2000] Lloyd's Rep Med 331.
- West of England Shipowners Mutual Insurance Association (Luxembourg) v Cristal Ltd, The Glacier Bay* [1996] 1 Lloyd's Rep 370, CA.

Cases also referred to in list of authorities

- A County Council v W (Disclosure)* [1997] 1 FLR 574.
- Dzumhur v Redbridge Healthcare NHS Trust* (3 March 2000, unreported).
- Investors Compensation Scheme Ltd v West Bromwich Building Society* [1998] 1 All ER 98, [1998] 1 WLR 896, HL.

Appeal

- Dartford & Gravesham NHS Trust appealed with permission of the Appeal Committee of the House of Lords given on 30 May 2002 from the decision of the Court of Appeal (Keene, Aldous LJ and Sir Christopher Slade) on 15 January 2002 ([2002] EWCA Civ 18, [2002] ICR 403) allowing an appeal by the respondent, Frederick David Skidmore, from the decision of the Employment Appeal Tribunal on 22 February 2001, dismissing his appeal from the decision of an industrial tribunal on 4 August 1999 that the correct procedure had been adopted for his dismissal from his employment with the appellant. The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Steyn.

Michael Douglas QC (instructed by Brachers) for the trust.

Timothy Barnes QC and Angus Moon (instructed by Radcliffes Le Brasseur) for the employee.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

22 May 2003. The following opinions were delivered.

LORD BINGHAM OF CORNHILL.

[1] My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the opinion of my noble and learned friend Lord Steyn. I am in full agreement with it and I would accordingly dismiss the appeal and make the order which he proposes.

LORD STEYN.

(I) THE QUESTIONS

[2] My Lords, this appeal raises important issues in respect of hospital disciplinary proceedings. The context is a contractual disciplinary code. Specifically, the issues arise because of the incorporation of Department of Health Circular HC(90)9 Disciplinary Procedures for Hospital and Community Medical and Dental Staff dated March 1990 (Circular HC(90)9) in most hospital doctors' contracts. Circular HC(90)9 governed the hospital sector of the National Health Service before the creation of autonomous trusts under the National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990. It is still in use by autonomous NHS trusts. The disciplinary code provides for a difference in procedure depending on whether the case involves allegations of 'professional conduct' or 'personal conduct'. The former is governed by a judicialised procedure under Circular HC(90)9. The latter is governed by less formal disciplinary procedures without, amongst other things, the right of legal representation. Inevitably this relatively complex structure gives rise to issues of demarcation concerning the category in which a particular case falls. Not surprisingly, this has given rise to legal problems and criticism: compare Raymond 'The Employment Rights of the NHS Hospital Doctor' in Dyer Doctors, Patients and the Law (1992) p 194; the Department of Health consultation paper dated November 1999 entitled Supporting Doctors, Protecting Patients: A consultation paper on preventing, recognising and dealing with poor clinical performance of doctors in the NHS in England; and the NHS Executive's A summary of the responses to 'Supporting Doctors, Protecting Patients' (2001) section 4. There has been a difference of judicial view reflected in a number of decisions to which it will be necessary to turn. Two questions dominate the debate. They are: (1) Who decides on the categorisation of a case? (2) How is the line between professional and personal conduct to be drawn? Both these questions arise in the present appeal.

(II) THE OPERATION AND THE AFTERMATH

[3] In April 1997 Mr Skidmore was a consultant surgeon at the Joyce Green Hospital. On 3 April 1997 Mr Skidmore operated on Mrs A for the removal of a gall bladder. The method was keyhole surgery. During the surgical procedure the patient's left iliac artery was punctured by a sharp three-pronged instrument. There was a large loss of blood. The operation had to be converted to open surgery. A surgeon, who had been operating in an adjacent theatre, was called to assist. There was a short period of cardio-pulmonary resuscitation. The patient a had eight units of blood transfused during the operation and two further units transfused post-operatively. On any view it was a serious episode with potential life-threatening implications. But the operation was eventually completed successfully and Mrs A made a complete recovery.

b [4] Mrs A's husband sought an explanation from the patient relations manager who in turn asked for Mr Skidmore's comments. In two meetings Mr Skidmore gave his explanation first to Mrs A and then to Mrs A and her husband. The thrust of his explanation was to blame the episode on a faulty instrument and to suggest that the blood loss was normal, viz only two units, and that Mrs A had not arrested or required resuscitation. This version of events was in conflict with the contemporaneous notes of the operation made by the anaesthetist. In a written response Mr Skidmore expanded on his oral explanations.

c (III) THE DISCIPLINARY PROCEEDINGS

[5] Following further exchanges and investigations, the Dartford & Gravesham NHS Trust (the trust) made a charge of personal misconduct against Mr Skidmore. The outline statement alleged that Mr Skidmore—d 'sought to deliberately mislead:

—The patient and her family —community health council
—the chief executive

e through a series of statements and correspondence which he knew to be untrue ... Mr Skidmore set out to deceive the patient, her husband, the community health council and her GP about the actual events that occurred in theatre and subsequently ... Mr Skidmore set out to deceive the chief executive with information he knew not to be true.'

f The trust had decided that this charge was properly a charge in respect of personal conduct within the meaning of the disciplinary code.

g [6] On 27 and 28 October 1997 the hearing took place before the trust's chief executive. Dr Barker of the Medical Protection Society represented Mr Skidmore and Dr Key represented the management. The question whether the proceedings were properly constituted or whether the case should have been dealt with under the Circular HC(90)9 procedure governing professional conduct was argued as a preliminary point. The chief executive decided that the allegations were of personal and not professional misconduct and that as a result she had jurisdiction to deal with the complaint. Oral evidence was then heard from witnesses on behalf of both parties. On 20 November 1997 the chief executive delivered her reasoned decision. She concluded that Mr Skidmore had falsely told Mr and h Mrs A that two units had been transfused in the theatre when in truth eight units had been transfused and that he had stated as a fact that the instrument was faulty and had been returned to the manufacturer for inspection when this was clearly not the case. She concluded that Mr Skidmore had lied and had continued to be untruthful when he appeared before her. She decided that he should be dismissed j with immediate effect.

[7] Mr Skidmore appealed to an appeal panel of the trust board. On 2 December 1997 an appeal panel consisting of the trust chairman, the finance director, and three non-executive directors heard the appeal. The question of the correct procedure was again dealt with as a preliminary point. After hearing submissions the panel decided that the allegations were properly dealt with under the internal disciplinary procedures. The hearing continued. The chief executive gave evidence before the panel and was cross-examined by Mr Skidmore's representative, Dr Panting. The panel also heard evidence from Mr Skidmore, two witnesses who had given evidence below and also a local general practitioner who had not. On 18 December 1997 the panel delivered its decision. It found that Mr Skidmore's conduct constituted gross misconduct and that summary dismissal had been appropriate.

[8] Annex C of Circular HC(90)9 requires the Secretary of State on application to refer to a panel the question whether an applicant's appointment is being terminated on the sole ground of personal misconduct. Mr Skidmore appealed under Annex C. By letter dated 11 June 1998 the Secretary of State rejected the appeal on the basis that he had no jurisdiction in accordance with the decision of the Court of Appeal in R v Secretary of State for Health and Trent Regional Health Authority, ex p Guirguis [1990] IRLR 30, as Mr Skidmore had been dismissed without notice.

(IV) THE PROCEEDINGS ALLEGING UNFAIR DISMISSAL

[9] Mr Skidmore then applied to an industrial tribunal (now an employment tribunal) alleging unfair dismissal. The grounds of his application were twofold, viz that the wrong procedures had been adopted and that the complaint was without substance. On 4 August 1999 the tribunal dismissed the application by a majority.

[10] Mr Skidmore appealed to the Employment Appeal Tribunal (EAT) on a number of grounds. One ground was that the wrong procedure had been adopted. On 22 February 2001 the EAT dismissed the appeal ([2001] ICR 911). Relying on decisions of Lightman J in Kramer v South Bedfordshire Community Health Care Trust (1995) 30 BMLR 34 and Chatterjee v City and Hackney Community Services NHS Trust (1998) 49 BMLR 55, the EAT took the view that, absent bad faith or Wednesbury unreasonableness (see Associated Provincial Picture Houses Ltd v Wednesbury Corp [1947] 2 All ER 680, [1948] 1 KB 223), the employer's decision on categorisation was final. In any event, the EAT concluded that the case against Mr Skidmore was essentially of a personal nature.

(V) THE COURT OF APPEAL DECISION

[11] In an unreserved judgment, given on 15 January 2002 by Keene LJ with the agreement of Aldous LJ and Sir Christopher Slade, the Court of Appeal unanimously allowed Mr Skidmore's appeal ([2002] EWCA Civ 18, [2002] ICR 403). Following a recent decision of the Court of Appeal in Saeed v Royal Wolverhampton Hospitals NHS Trust [2001] ICR 903, Keene LJ held that the decision of the employer must comply with the terms of the contract. Keene LJ further held that on the facts the decision of the employer on categorisation was wrong: the case was one involving professional conduct. The appeal before the House challenges the decision of the Court of Appeal on both points. Before directly addressing these issues it is necessary to set out critical features of Circular HC(90)9 and to explain the conflict of judicial decisions.

(VI) CIRCULAR HC(90)9

[12] Circular HC(90)9 is a lengthy document. For present purposes it is only necessary to set out a few extracts from it. The circular draws a distinction between 'personal conduct', 'professional conduct' and 'professional competence'. Those categories of allegations of misconduct are defined in para 3 of the circular as follows:

a 'PERSONAL CONDUCT—Performance or behaviour of practitioners due to factors other than those associated with the exercise of medical or dental skills.

'PROFESSIONAL CONDUCT—Performance or behaviour of practitioners arising from the exercise of medical or dental skills.

b PROFESSIONAL COMPETENCE—Adequacy of performance of practitioners related to the exercise of their medical or dental skills and professional judgment.'

Circular HC(90)9 then provides (Annex B):

c 'There are broadly three types of case which may involve medical or dental staff: (a) cases involving personal conduct; (b) cases involving professional conduct; (c) cases involving professional competence. It is for the Authority to decide under which category a case falls. Guidance on the definition of each category is given in paragraph 3 of the Circular.' (See above; my emphasis.)

d In cases involving personal conduct Annex B provides that 'the position of a doctor or dentist is no different from that of other health service staff'. With regard to cases involving professional misconduct and professional incompetence, Annex B of Circular HC(90)9 provides in para 8 that the panel (consisting usually of three members) should have a legally-qualified chairman. Moreover in such cases Annex B of Circular HC(90)9 provides, inter alia, in para 12 for the following further procedural rights:

e 'The practitioner should have the right to appear personally before the investigating panel and to be represented (either by a lawyer ... or otherwise), and to hear all the evidence presented to the panel. He should have the right to cross-examine all witnesses and to produce his own witnesses, and they and he may also be subjected to cross-examination.'

By contrast the internal procedure applicable to cases of personal conduct contains no such safeguards and is generally more informal.

g [13] Since the hearing of the present case in the Court of Appeal, counsel for Mr Skidmore has unearthed the genesis of Circular HC(90)9. While the distinction between professional and personal conduct goes back to 1956, the disciplinary arrangements presently reflected in Circular HC(90)9 were the result of the deliberations of a joint working party which published a report in August 1988 entitled Disciplinary Procedures for Hospital and Community Doctors and Dentists. The joint working party was made up of representatives of the health departments, the NHS and the professions. It was set up to 'review disciplinary procedures for hospital and community doctors and dentists' and specifically to 'consider the scope, operation and effectiveness of the disciplinary procedures' in Circular HM(61)112. Paragraph 3 of the report reads:

j 'The Working Party recognised the professions' concerns that disciplinary procedures for senior doctors and dentists must ensure that the grounds for dismissal have been fully justified, since a specialist who has been dismissed from an NHS post on professional grounds would be unlikely to find alternative employment elsewhere. The professions felt that the procedures used should be sufficiently weighty to reflect both the long periods of training and competitive selection processes which doctors have undergone before appointment to senior posts, and also the potential gravity of the outcome of such procedures.'

The recommendations of the working party were accepted and gave rise to Circular HC(90)9 which was published by the Department of Health in March 1990. The terms contained in Circular HC(90)9 were imposed upon doctors by reg 3 of the National Health Service (Remuneration and Conditions of Service) Regulations 1991, SI 1991/481. It is now part of the employment contract of Mr Skidmore and of the employment contracts of almost all NHS hospital doctors. It will be necessary to return to the significance of the report for the purpose of Circular HC 90(9) (see [20], below).

(VII) THE CASE LAW

[14] Concentrating at this stage on the issue of whose decision determines the categorisation of a case, I now turn to the directly relevant case law as matters stood at the time of the Court of Appeal judgment. In a carefully reasoned judgment in Kramer v South Bedfordshire Community Health Care Trust (1995) 30 BMLR 34 Lightman J (at 38) approached the problem as follows:

'As an implied term of [the] contract of employment, the trust in making this decision must act in good faith and (I would also think) reach a decision which the trust could reasonably reach. If the trust can be shown to have acted in breach of this term, its decision may be challenged on that ground, but (subject to this important proviso) its decision stands. There can otherwise be no reason to include in the contract this provision that categorisation is a matter for the trust. Unlike [counsel for the doctor], I cannot regard this provision as otiose or find any significance in the fact that the impact of the provision was not appreciated by the trust's legal advisers until I raised it. The decision of the trust cannot be impugned merely because the employee or the court would have characterised the case differently or considers the trust's characterisation is wrong, or because the trust has given no reasons (in particular in a case like the present where no reasons were sought and no complaint has been made of lack of reasons prior to the hearing). The trust in this case decided that the charges were of personal misconduct and accordingly that the procedure appropriate to proceedings for personal misconduct should be adopted. This decision can only be impugned on grounds of lack of good faith or unreasonableness in reaching this determination on the part of the trust.'

In all material respects this decision was made on the same contractual terms as are to be found in the contract before the House. In Chatterjee v City and Hackney Community Services NHS Trust (1998) 49 BMLR 55 Lightman J followed his earlier decision in Kramer's case. In Bhanot v South West London & St George's Mental Health NHS Trust [2000] Lloyd's Rep Med 324 at 328 Bell J disagreed. He observed:

'This is an action for breach of contract and what I am deciding is whether on the information before me the case of breach of contract is sufficiently strong to make the order which the claimant seeks.'

At first instance in Saeed v Royal Wolverhampton Hospitals NHS Trust [2000] Lloyd's Rep Med 331, Gage J preferred the approach of Lightman J. On the facts Gage J found that the allegation of indecent assault during a medical examination against a senior house officer was one of personal conduct. The Court of Appeal ([2001] ICR 903) agreed with Gage J on the latter point and dismissed the appeal. Hale LJ a (with whom Dame Elizabeth Butler-Sloss P and Potter LJ agreed) defined the first issue as follows (at 907): 'Who decided into which category the case fell, and on what basis could the court interfere with that decision?' Hale LJ commenced her judgment by saying:

b '12 One might have thought that the answer to the first issue was obvious. The employer who is contemplating disciplinary action against an employee has to decide which procedure should be followed. If the employee thinks that the employer has made the wrong choice, he can try to have it changed in advance or seek damages after the event. The court will have to perform its usual task of construing the contract and applying it to the facts of the case.

c 13 Unfortunately the issue has been clouded by the introduction of public law concepts into an ordinary contractual situation ...'

She then discussed the conflicting dicta at first instance and expressed her preference for the general approach of Bell J. She concluded (at 908 (para 17)):

d 'Of course the employer has to decide which procedure to follow. But the employer has to take that decision in accordance with the terms of the contract ... the trust will be in breach of contract if [the definitions in Circular HC(90)9] are not properly applied.'

e Taking the view that an indecent assault by a doctor during an examination of a patient cannot amount to a charge of professional misconduct she held that the appeal should be dismissed.

(VIII) ISSUE NO 1: WHO DECIDES?

f [15] Counsel for the trust invited the House to adopt the approach of Lightman J on the first issue. For reasons which can be explained shortly it is not possible to adopt this course. It is common ground, and rightly so, that no public law issues are involved and that the questions before the House must be resolved within the framework of the contract between Mr Skidmore and the trust. That is so despite the fact that a public body is involved. Prima facie therefore the position is as follows. The trust is entitled to decide what disciplinary route should be followed. That decision must, however, comply with the terms of the contract. If a non-conforming decision is taken and acted upon, there is a breach of contract resulting in the usual remedies. The only escape from this position would be if it could be shown that the parties agreed upon wording in their contract making it clear that the employer's decision would be final thereby excluding the role of the court except, of course, in cases of bad faith or possibly g the absence of reasonable grounds for the decision. There is no such provision in the present contract. It does, of course, provide that 'It is for the authority to decide under which category a case falls'. This provision merely states the obvious: the trust must take the initial decision to commence the appropriate disciplinary procedure. It is, however, quite insufficient to exclude the normal consequences of a failure to follow the agreed contractual procedures. If there h has been a breach by the trust in adopting the wrong procedure, Mr Skidmore is entitled to appropriate relief. So far I am in general agreement with the approach of the Court of Appeal in Saeed's case.

j [16] There is, however, one aspect of the analysis of the Court of Appeal which I cannot accept. Hale LJ observed that the issue has been clouded by the introduction of public law concepts into an ordinary contractual situation. That is not how Lightman J approached the matter in Kramer v South Bedfordshire Community Health Care Trust (1995) 30 BMLR 34 and Chatterjee v City and Hackney Community Services NHS Trust (1998) 49 BMLR 55. On the contrary, he expressly based his reasoning on an implied term of the contract of employment. He said that there 'can otherwise be no reason to include in the contract this provision that categorisation is a matter for the trust'. The likelihood is that Lightman J had in mind decided cases where the court interpreted a contractual term dependent on the exercise of the will of one party as by implication restricted to a decision taken in good faith and on reasonable grounds, eg a clause entrusting a decision as to the adequacy of performance to the absolute discretion of one party. The foundation of such an implication is to satisfy the reasonable expectations of the parties. Some examples of such cases are to be found in the judgment of McNair J in Niarchos (London) Ltd v Shell Tankers Ltd [1961] 2 Lloyd's Rep 496 at 507–509; see also Lewison The Interpretation of Contracts (2nd edn, 1997) pp 347–350 (para 12.03). There are other recent examples of special provisions: see West of England Shipowners Mutual Insurance Association (Luxembourg) v Cristal Ltd, The Glacier Bay [1996] 1 Lloyd's Rep 370 ('the sole judge') and Brown v GIO Insurance Ltd [1998] Lloyd's Rep IR 201 ('the sole judge'). The mistake of the judge in Kramer's case and Chatterjee's case was to place a weight upon a contractual provision which it was incapable of bearing. There was no agreement to entrust the issue to the final decision of the trust. There was no warrant for the term the judge implied. The contract was entirely workable on the basis that the trust had to decide on categorisation but it had to do so in accordance with the contract.

[17] I would reject the challenge of the trust to the decision of the Court of Appeal on the first point.

(IX) ISSUE NO 2: WHICH CATEGORY?

[18] It is now necessary to consider how the case against Mr Skidmore should be categorised. The starting point must be the proper interpretation of the definitions contained in the disciplinary code. It seems right to treat the definitions of professional conduct ('behaviour of practitioners arising from the exercise of medical or dental skills') and professional competence ('adequacy of performance of practitioners related to the exercise of their medical or dental skills and professional judgment') as the primary categories. Personal conduct is the residual category consisting of 'behaviour ... due to factors other than those associated with the exercise of medical or dental skills' (my emphasis). If a case is properly to be categorised as involving professional conduct or competence, the judicialised disciplinary route under Circular HC(90)9 is obligatory. That is so even if the case could also be said to amount to personal misconduct.

[19] For present purposes it is unnecessary to examine the distinction between professional conduct and professional competence. It is common ground that professional competence is not a relevant category. The line drawn between professional conduct and personal conduct is conduct 'arising from the exercise of medical or dental skills' and 'other' conduct. How this distinction should in practice be applied must now be considered. The structure of the disciplinary code set out in Circular HC(90)9 is a classic case requiring a broad and purposive interpretation enabling sensible procedural decisions to be taken. It would, for example, be surprising if a case where a doctor embarked on an intimate medical examination of a woman, which he knew to be wholly unnecessary, necessarily fell outside the scope of what may constitute professional misconduct. After all, a in such a case, the doctor is using his position as a hospital doctor to perpetrate an act of serious professional misconduct. I cannot, therefore, agree with the ruling in Saeed v Royal Wolverhampton Hospitals NHS Trust [2001] ICR 903 at 910 (para 24) that an indecent assault committed by a doctor during a medical examination cannot constitute professional misconduct within the code. It is a case of a doctor misusing his ostensible medical skills for improper purposes. In b my view it falls within the scope of professional misconduct within the definition. Relying on the text of Circular HC(90)9 I take the view that a purposive construction, and commonsense considerations, point towards a broad interpretation of professional conduct.

[20] Since the decision in Saeed's case and the hearing in the Court of Appeal
 c there has become available the joint working party report (Disciplinary Procedures for Hospital and Community Doctors and Dentists (August 1998)) setting out the reasons for the line drawn between professional and personal misconduct. The emphasis is on the serious consequences for a doctor of an adverse decision, making a doctor dismissed on professional grounds virtually unemployable. In d my view this background material reinforces a broad interpretation of Circular HC(90)9 notably in respect of what may amount to professional misconduct. It supports the interpretation that when in a doctor/patient relationship a doctor commits deliberate misconduct it may come within the category of professional conduct.

[21] Keene LJ concluded that the allegations against Mr Skidmore fell within e the category of professional conduct and that was the appropriate machinery to be used. He explained ([2002] ICR 403):

[32] ... First, the applicant was lying about the performance by him of an operation. The operation did not merely provide the occasion or f opportunity for his misconduct, as happens in some cases where a medical examination of a patient provides an opportunity for an indecent assault, to take a familiar example. The operation here was the subject matter of the lie, and the conduct on the part of the applicant would not have taken place but for the exercise of his medical skills in the course of the operation. It comes into a different category from lies told about a matter not involving g his medical skills, such as, for example, whether he had been having an affair with a member of the nursing staff.

[33] Secondly, the history of this matter shows that it was seen as part of the applicant's professional duty to respond to the complaint by Mr A and to communicate with the patient and his general practitioner, and in due course h with the chief executive. He was patently expected to respond to the letter from the patient relations manager and the enclosed complaint. Indeed, any surgeon would be expected to explain to a patient what had happened during the course of an operation if something untoward or unexpected had taken place, as the GMC booklet "Good Medical Practice" indicates. Such an
 j explanation surely is to be regarded as conduct arising from the exercise of his medical skills. The doctor in such a situation is acting in the course of fulfilling a professional responsibility. In the same way, it is part of a consultant's normal responsibility to keep a patient's general practitioner informed of the success or failure of an operation which he has conducted. So the letter of 21 April 1997 to the general practitioner is to be seen as arising from the exercise of the applicant's medical skills during the operation.

[34] Thirdly, it is to my mind relevant that the allegations against the applicant raised issues which, at least to a degree, needed medical experience or expertise for their determination. I have in mind in particular the applicant's attempted explanation of how he confused the number of units of blood transfused. Despite Mr Douglas's attempts to persuade us to the contrary, it seems to me that some medical experience was required to give proper consideration to that proffered explanation. The internal disciplinary procedure does not necessarily involve anyone with medical experience determining such an issue. The independent procedure under the Circular does. That too points towards the proper categorisation of the allegations here.'

This reasoning is irresistible.

[22] Given the interpretation, which I have adopted, it is in truth self-evident that lies told by a doctor to a patient about important details of an operation can amount to professional conduct. After all in such a case the medical practitioner is professing to speak as a doctor about a matter covered by his medical skills. The argument to the contrary on behalf of the trust must be rejected.

(X) THE OUTCOME

[23] I conclude that in breach of contract the trust adopted the wrong procedure. I would therefore dismiss the appeal. In the result the decision of the EAT is quashed and the matter is remitted to an employment tribunal to reconsider the complaint of unfair dismissal on the basis that the trust employed the wrong procedure.

LORD CLYDE.

[24] My Lords, I agree that the appeal should be dismissed for the reasons set out in the speech of my noble and learned friend Lord Steyn. I add a few words of my own merely in the hope of giving assistance in the future application of the scheme of categories of conduct set out in the Department of Health Circular HC(90)9 Disciplinary Procedures for Hospital and Community Medical and Dental Staff (Circular HC(90)9).

[25] Paragraph 3 of Circular HC(90)9 explains that authorities had sometimes had great difficulty in defining the nature of the conduct in question. The expressions 'personal conduct', 'professional conduct' and 'professional competence' required in particular concentration upon the particular words 'personal' and 'professional' and the making of some kind of distinction between them. Clearly these terms would be hard to apply precisely and grey areas could easily be identified where the terms could overlap. Those difficulties were sought to be overcome by Circular HC(90)9. The guidance which it gave had the effect of moving the attention away from the former expressions and onto the agreed definitions of the categories of conduct. One importance of this was that the words 'personal' and 'professional' are no longer of importance in themselves. The new guidance would work equally well if the three categories were identified as 'type A conduct', 'type B conduct' and 'type C conduct'. The expressions 'personal conduct' and 'professional conduct' and 'professional competence' have become simply labels, serving only to identify categories which have now been fully defined.

[26] The categories must be taken to be exhaustive of all kinds of conduct which might attract disciplinary attention. While it is a threefold categorisation there are only two forms of procedure which may follow. The expression 'due a to factors associated with' is not a very happy one. But to make the scheme coherent and exhaustive of all cases which may be subject to disciplinary procedure the two main cases must be those where the conduct is due to factors associated with the exercise of medical or dental skills and those where the conduct is due to factors other than those associated with the exercise of medical or dental skills. That latter case is labelled 'personal conduct' and attracts the b procedure appropriate for such cases. If the conduct is due to factors associated with the exercise of medical or dental skills it will fall into one or other of the two groups which bear the respective labels of 'professional conduct' and 'professional competence'. In relation to the task of making a choice between the second and third kinds of conduct, consideration has to be given to the matters of adequacy and professional judgment which characterise the third kind of c conduct. But that choice is not of consequence for the basic distinction in procedure. Both the second and the third kinds of conduct call for the more elaborate processing of the case.

[27] While I do not for a moment suggest that there is only one way in which one must go about the task of deciding which category applies in any particular d case, I would prefer first to ask the question whether the conduct complained of is due to factors associated with the exercise of medical or dental skills. One must look at the conduct in question and ask whether it has come about through factors associated with the exercise of medical or dental skills. I agree with my noble and learned friend Lord Steyn that a broad approach is appropriate. If there is such an association then the further question may be asked whether it is a e matter of conduct or of competence within the meaning of the second and third definitions. If it does not fall into the third category as a matter of the adequacy of the performance of a practitioner related to the exercise of medical or dental skills and professional judgment then it must fall into the second category. But in either case the more elaborate procedure will have to be followed. If on the other f hand there is no such association then the case will be one for the less elaborate procedure designed for cases in the category of 'personal conduct'.

[28] Approaching the present case in this way it seems to me clear beyond doubt that the conduct in question was due to factors associated with the respondent's exercise of medical skills and so did not qualify under the heading of g 'personal conduct'.

LORD HUTTON.

[29] My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the opinion of my noble and learned friend Lord Steyn. For the reasons he has given, with which I am in full agreement, I too would dismiss this appeal and make the order which h he proposes.

LORD SCOTT OF FOSCOTE.

[30] My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in advance the opinion of my noble and learned friend, Lord Steyn. For the reasons he has given, with j which I agree, I too would dismiss this appeal and make the order proposed.

Appeal dismissed.

Celia Fox Barrister.

Sepet and another v Secretary of State for the Home Department a

[2003] UKHL 15

HOUSE OF LORDS

LORD BINGHAM OF CORNHILL, LORD STEYN, LORD HOFFMANN, LORD HUTTON AND LORD RODGER OF EARLSFERRY b

4-6 FEBRUARY, 20 MARCH 2003

Immigration – Leave to enter – Refugee – Asylum – Fear of persecution by applicant for refugee status – Conscientious objection to military service – Whether international law recognising right of conscientious objection to military service for purpose of establishing refugee status – Convention and Protocol relating to the Status of Refugees 1951, art 1A(2). c

The applicants were Turkish nationals of Kurdish origin, each of whom claimed asylum in the United Kingdom on the ground that they would be liable, if returned to Turkey, to perform compulsory military service, on pain of imprisonment if they refused. Neither of them claimed to have a conscientious objection to military service in all circumstances, or an objection based on religious belief, each rather objecting because of political opposition to the policies of the then Turkish government in relation to the Kurdish people, and because of a wish not to be required to participate in actions, possibly involving atrocities and abuse of human rights, against their own people. Their claims for asylum were rejected by the Secretary of State, and challenges to his decision were successively rejected by a special adjudicator (who found that there was no likelihood that either applicant would be required to engage in military action contrary to the basic rules of human conduct), the Immigration Appeal Tribunal and the Court of Appeal. They appealed to the House of Lords, contending that there was an internationally recognised fundamental right to refuse to undertake military service on grounds of conscience which brought them within the definition of refugees in art 1A(2)^a of the Convention and Protocol relating to the Status of Refugees 1951 as having a well-founded fear of being persecuted for reasons of race, religion, nationality, membership of a particular social group or political opinion. d
e
f
g

Held – There was currently no legal rule binding in international law which recognised a right to conscientious objection to military service, such as would give rise to a good case for refugee status if it were not respected. While the reach of an international human rights convention was not forever determined by the intentions of those who originally framed it, there was no material which established an extant right of absolute or partial conscientious objection. Accordingly, the appeals would be dismissed (see [11], [20], [24], [53], [55], [56], [58], below). h

Per curiam. In deciding whether an asylum applicant has been or would be persecuted for convention reasons, the decision maker will begin by considering j

^a Article 1A(2), so far as material, is set out at [2], below.

- a the reason in the mind of the persecutor for inflicting the persecutory treatment. He will then ask if that is the real reason, or whether there is some other effective reason (see [23], [24], [56], [59], below).

Notes

- b For asylum and the meaning of 'refugee', see 4(2) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn) (2002 reissue) paras 238, 239.

Cases referred to in opinions

- A v Minister for Immigration and Ethnic Affairs* (1997) 2 BHRC 143, Aust HC.
A v Switzerland (1984) 38 DR 219, E Com HR.
A-G of Canada v Ward [1993] 2 SCR 689, Can SC.
- c Autio v Finland (1991) 72 DR 245, E Com HR.
Canas-Segovia v Immigration and Naturalization Service (1990) 902 F 2d 717, US Ct of Apps (9th Cir).
Canas-Segovia v Immigration and Naturalization Service (1992) 970 F 2d 599, US Ct of Apps (9th Cir).
- d Chen Shi Hai v Minister for Immigration and Multicultural Affairs [2000] HCA 19, (2000) 201 CLR 293, Aust HC.
Ciric v Canada (Minister of Employment and Immigration) [1994] 2 FC 65, Can Fed Ct.
Erduran v Minister for Immigration and Multicultural Affairs [2002] FCA 814, Aust Fed Ct.
Gillette v US (1970) 401 US 437, US SC.
Goodwin v UK [2002] 2 FCR 577, ECt HR.
- e Grandrath v Germany (1965) 8 YB 324, E Com HR.
Grandrath v Germany (1967) 10 YB 626, Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe.
Heudens v Belgium App No 24630/94 (22 May 1995, unreported), E Com HR.
Horvath v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2000] 3 All ER 577, [2001] 1 AC 489, [2000] 3 WLR 379, HL.
- f Immigration and Naturalization Service v Elias-Zacarias (1992) 502 US 478, US SC.
Johansen v Norway (1985) 44 DR 155, E Com HR.
LTK v Finland (1985) 94 ILR 396, UN HR Committee.
Minister for Immigration and Multicultural Affairs v Ibrahim [2000] HCA 55, (2000) 204 CLR 1, Aust HC.
- g Minister for Immigration and Multicultural Affairs v Yusuf [2001] HCA 30, (2001) 206 CLR 323, Aust HC.
Omoruyi v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2001] Imm AR 175, CA.
Qureshi v Victoria University of Manchester (1996) [2001] ICR 863, EAT.
R v Immigration Appeal Tribunal, ex p Shah [1997] Imm AR 145; rvsd [1998] 4 All ER 30, [1998] 1 WLR 74, CA; rvsd [1999] 2 All ER 545, [1999] 2 AC 629, [1999] 2 WLR 1015, HL.
- h R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, ex p Adan, R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, ex p Aitseguer [2001] 1 All ER 593, [2001] 2 AC 477, [2001] 2 WLR 143, HL; affg [1999] 4 All ER 774, [2001] 2 AC 477, [1999] 3 WLR 1274, CA.
- j Refugee Appeal No 72635/01 (6 September 2002, unreported), NZ Refugee Status Appeals Authority.
Sandralingham v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, Rajendrakumar v Immigration Appeal Tribunal [1996] Imm AR 97, CA.
Sivakumar v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2001] EWCA Civ 1196, [2002] INLR 310; affd [2003] UKHL 14, [2003] 2 All ER 1097, [2003] 1 WLR 840.

- Thlimmenos v Greece* App No 34369/97 (4 December 1998, unreported), E Com HR; a (2001) 31 EHRR 411, ECt HR.
Tsirlis v Greece (1998) 25 EHRR 198, ECt HR.
X v Austria (1973) 43 CD 161, E Com HR.
Zolfagharkhani v Canada (Minister of Employment and Immigration) [1993] FC 540, Can Fed Ct.

Cases referred to in list of authorities b

- Adan v Secretary of State for the Home Dept* [1997] 2 All ER 723, [1997] 1 WLR 1107, CA.
Alonzo v US Immigration and Naturalization Service (1990) 915 F 2d 546, US Ct of Apps (9th Cir).
Applicant N 403 v Minister for Immigration and Multicultural Affairs [2000] FCA 1088, Aust Fed Ct. c
Atibo v Immigration Officer, London (Heathrow) Airport [1978] Imm AR 93, IAT.
Brown v Stott (Procurator Fiscal, Dunfermline) [2001] 2 All ER 97, [2001] 2 WLR 817, PC.
Bugdaycay v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [1987] 1 All ER 940, [1987] AC 514, [1987] 2 WLR 606, HL.
C v UK (1983) 37 DR 142, E Com HR. d
Castillo v Immigration and Naturalization Service (1991) 951 F 2d 1117, US Ct of Apps (9th Cir).
Castioni, Re [1891] 1 QB 149, [1886–90] All ER Rep 640, DC.
Church v Secretary of State for the Home Dept (5 April 1982, unreported).
Dwomoh v Sava (1988) 696 F Supp 970, US DC (SD NY).
Fadil v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2001] Imm AR 392, CA. e
IS v Bulgaria App No 32438/96 (6 April 2000, unreported), ECt HR.
Israeli v Minister for Immigration and Multicultural Affairs [1998] FCA 447, Aust Fed Ct.
Jain v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2000] Imm AR 76, CA.
Järvinen v Finland (1990) 118 ILR 137, UN HR Committee.
Kalashnikov v Russia App No 47095/99 (15 July 2002, unreported), ECt HR. f
R (Kariharan) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2002] EWCA Civ 1102, [2003]
 QB 933, [2002] 3 WLR 1783.
Kolczynski, Re [1955] 1 All ER 31, sub nom R v Governor of Brixton Prison, ex p
Kolczynski [1955] 1 QB 540, [1955] 2 WLR 116, DC.
Legal Consequences for States of the Continued Presence of South Africa in Namibia
(South West Africa) (1971) ICJ Rep 16, ICJ. g
Magyari v Minister for Immigration and Multicultural Affairs [1997] FCA 417, Aust Fed Ct.
Mehenni v Minister for Immigration and Multicultural Affairs [1999] FCA 789, Aust Fed Ct.
Mijoljevic v Minister for Immigration and Multicultural Affairs [1999] FCA 834, Aust Fed Ct.
Montoya v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2002] EWCA Civ 620, [2002] INLR 399. h
Nagarajan v London Regional Transport [1999] 4 All ER 65, [2000] 1 AC 501, [1999]
 3 WLR 425, HL.
Nicaragua v USA (1986) 76 ILR 349, ICJ.
North Sea Continental Shelf Cases (1969) 41 ILR 29, ICJ.
Paramanathan v Minister for Immigration and Multicultural Affairs [1998] FCA 1693, (1998) 94 FCR 28, Aust Fed Ct. j
Peers v Greece (2001) 33 EHRR 1192, ECt HR.
Petrovski v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [1993] Imm AR 134, IAT.
Prior v Canada [1988] 2 FC 371, Can Fed Ct.
R (on the application of Yogathas) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, R (on the application of Thangarasa) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2001] EWCA Civ

- a* 1611, [2001] All ER (D) 121 (Sep); affd [2002] UKHL 36, [2002] 4 All ER 800, [2002] 3 WLR 1276.
- R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, ex p Hashem* [1987] Imm AR 577.
- R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, ex p Mehari* [1994] 2 All ER 494, [1994] QB 474, [1994] 2 WLR 349.
- R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, ex p Robinson* [1997] 4 All ER 210, [1998] QB 929, [1997] 3 WLR 1162, CA.
- b* R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, ex p Sivakumaran (UN High Comr for Refugees intervening) [1988] 1 All ER 193, [1988] AC 958, [1988] 2 WLR 92, HL.
- R v Zausmer* (1911) 7 Crim App R 41.
- Schtraks v Government of Israel* [1962] 3 All ER 529, [1964] AC 556, [1962] 3 WLR 1013, HL.
- c* Selective Draft Law Cases (1917) 245 US 366, US SC.
- South West Africa Cases* [1966] ICJ Rep 1, ICJ.
- Stefanov v Bulgaria* App No 32438/96 (3 May 2001, unreported), ECt HR.
- T v Secretary of State for the Home Dept* [1996] 2 All ER 865, [1996] AC 742, [1996] 2 WLR 766, HL.
- d* V v Netherlands (1984) 39 DR 267, E Com HR.

Appeals

The applicants, Yasin Sepet and Erdem Bulbul, appealed with permission of the Appeal Committee of the House of Lords given on 21 November 2001 from the decision of the Court of Appeal (Waller, Laws and Jonathan Parker LJ) on 11 May 2001 ([2001] EWCA Civ 681, [2001] Imm AR 452) dismissing their appeals from the decision of the Immigration Appeal Tribunal (Collins J and PR Moulden) on 18 May 2000 dismissing their appeals from (i) the determination of a special adjudicator (JRLG Varcoe CMG) on 19 February 1998 dismissing Mr Sepet's appeal from the decision of the respondent, the Secretary of State for the Home Department, on 29 September 1993 refusing his application for asylum in the United Kingdom, and (ii) the special adjudicator's determination on 27 February 1998 dismissing Mr Bulbul's appeal from the Secretary of State's decision on 11 July 1996 refusing his application for asylum in the United Kingdom. The United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees intervened in the proceedings. The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Bingham of Cornhill.

- g* Andrew Nicol QC and Rick Scannell (instructed by Deighton Guedalla) for Mr Sepet. Andrew Nicol QC and Nadine French (instructed by Birnberg Peirce & Partners) for Mr Bulbul.
- John Howell QC and Mark Shaw QC (instructed by the Treasury Solicitor) for the Secretary of State.
- h* Nicholas Blake QC and Tim Eicke (instructed by Wesley Gryk) for the High Commissioner.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

- j* 20 March 2003. The following opinions were delivered.

LORD BINGHAM OF CORNHILL.

[1] My Lords, the issue in this appeal is whether the applicants, both of them Turkish nationals of Kurdish origin, should have been granted asylum on the ground that they were refugees within the meaning of art 1A(2) of the Geneva

Convention relating to the Status of Refugees (Geneva, 28 July 1951; TS 39 (1953); Cmnd 9171) (the 1951 convention) and the 1967 Protocol to that convention (New York, 31 January 1967; TS 15 (1969); Cmnd 3906). The ground upon which asylum was claimed related to their liability, if returned to Turkey, to perform compulsory military service on pain of imprisonment if they refused. Their claims for asylum were rejected by the respondent Secretary of State, and challenges to his decisions were successively rejected by the Special Adjudicator (Mr JRLG Varcoe CMG), the Immigration Appeal Tribunal (Collins J and Mr PR Moulden) ([2000] Imm AR 445) and the Court of Appeal (Waller, Laws and Jonathan Parker LJ) ([2001] EWCA Civ 681, [2001] Imm AR 452). In argument before the House, as in the Court of Appeal, helpful submissions were made on behalf of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees.

[2] By s 8(1) of the Asylum and Immigration Appeals Act 1993 (in force at the relevant time):

‘A person who is refused leave to enter the United Kingdom under the 1971 [Immigration] Act may appeal against the refusal to a special adjudicator on the ground that his removal in consequence of the refusal would be contrary to the United Kingdom’s obligations under the [1951] Convention.’

Paragraph 334 of the Immigration Rules (1994) (HC 395) expands the language of the subsection:

‘An asylum applicant will be granted asylum in the United Kingdom if the Secretary of State is satisfied that: (i) he is in the United Kingdom ... and (ii) he is a refugee, as defined by the Convention and Protocol; and (iii) refusing his application would result in his being required to go ... in breach of the Convention and Protocol, to a country in which his life or freedom would be threatened on account of his race, religion, nationality, political opinion or membership of a particular social group.’

These last words reproduce some of the language of the 1951 convention itself, made in direct response to what was then very recent history. Thus the preamble to that convention referred to the rights and freedoms recognised in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (Paris, 10 December 1948; UNTS 2 (1949); Cmd 7226) approved in 1948 and recorded that the United Nations had ‘on various occasions manifested its profound concern for refugees and endeavoured to assure refugees the widest possible exercise of these fundamental rights and freedoms’. For purposes of the 1951 convention a refugee was defined by art 1A(2) to mean any person who—

‘owing to well-founded fear of being persecuted for reasons of race, religion, nationality, membership of a particular social group or political opinion, is outside the country of his nationality and is unable or, owing to such fear, is unwilling to avail himself of the protection of that country ...’

In the very extensive discussion of this definition the five grounds specified have conveniently come to be known as ‘convention reasons’. Article 1 of the convention also contains, at art 1F, an important exclusion:

‘The provisions of this Convention shall not apply to any person with respect to whom there are serious reasons for considering that: (a) he has committed a crime against peace, a war crime, or a crime against humanity, as defined in the international instruments drawn up to make provision in

- a respect of such crimes; (b) he has committed a serious non-political crime outside the country of refuge prior to his admission to that country as a refugee; (c) he has been guilty of acts contrary to the purposes and principles of the United Nations.'

[3] In any asylum case the facts are all important and these cases are no exception. The first applicant, now aged 32, has not claimed to have a conscientious objection to bearing arms, serving his country or donning a uniform. His objections to military service stemmed from his political opposition to the policies of the then Turkish government and from his wish not to be required to participate in actions, including atrocities, which he alleged to be perpetrated against his own people in the Kurdish areas of the country. The special adjudicator accepted that this applicant's reluctance to perform military service stemmed from his genuine political opinions, but found no reasonable likelihood that he would be required to engage in military action contrary to the basic rules of human conduct, even assuming that he was required to serve in a predominantly Kurdish area of Turkey. This applicant's wish to avoid military service was at least one of his reasons for leaving Turkey (which he did in 1990). He would still be regarded as liable for conscription on his return and might be charged with the offence of draft evasion, not having returned sooner. Any further refusal on his part would almost certainly lead to the preferment of charges against him.

- e [4] The second applicant is now 25. He arrived in the United Kingdom in 1996. He later claimed that he would have received his call-up papers in August 1997 and become liable to call-up in about February 1998. He would be liable to be apprehended on his return to Turkey and to face a charge of draft evasion if he continued to refuse to serve. He has not claimed that he would refuse to wear uniform in all circumstances. His objection to performing military service related to his general antipathy towards the policy of the then Turkish government to oppose self-determination for the Kurdish people. He also feared that he might be sent to the operational area and required to take part in military action, possibly involving atrocities and abuse of human rights, against his own people. The special adjudicator found that this applicant's objection was not one of moral conviction but, rather, stemmed from his political views. He found no reasonable likelihood that this applicant would be required to engage in, or be associated with, acts offending against the basic rules of human conduct.

[5] Turkish law at present provides no non-combatant alternative to military service. Draft evaders are liable to a prison sentence of between six months and three years. On completion of the sentence the offender is required to undertake his military service. It is an agreed fact that those who refuse to perform military service in Turkey (including Kurds) are not subject to disproportionate or excessive punishment, in law or in fact, as a result of their refusal. Draft evaders are liable to prosecution and punishment irrespective of the reasons prompting their refusal.

[6] The task of the House is to interpret the 1951 convention and, having done so, apply it to the facts of the applicants' cases, between which it is unnecessary to distinguish. In interpreting the convention the House must respect arts 31 and 32 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties (Vienna, 23 May 1969; TS 58 (1980); Cmnd 7964):

'ARTICLE 31

General rule of interpretation

1. A treaty shall be interpreted in good faith in accordance with the ordinary meaning to be given to the terms of the treaty in their context and in the light of its object and purpose.

2. The context for the purpose of the interpretation of a treaty shall comprise, in addition to the text, including its preamble and annexes: (a) any agreement relating to the treaty which was made between all the parties in connexion with the conclusion of the treaty; (b) any instrument which was made by one or more parties in connexion with the conclusion of the treaty and accepted by the other parties as an instrument related to the treaty.

3. There shall be taken into account, together with the context: (a) any subsequent agreement between the parties regarding the interpretation of the treaty or the application of its provisions; (b) any subsequent practice in the application of the treaty which establishes the agreement of the parties regarding its interpretation; (c) any relevant rules of international law applicable in the relations between the parties.

4. A special meaning shall be given to a term if it is established that the parties so intended.

ARTICLE 32

Supplementary means of interpretation

Recourse may be had to supplementary means of interpretation, including the preparatory work of the treaty and the circumstances of its conclusion, in order to confirm the meaning resulting from the application of article 31, or to determine the meaning when the interpretation according to article 31: (a) leaves the meaning ambiguous or obscure; or (b) leads to a result which is manifestly absurd or unreasonable.'

It is plain that the convention has a single autonomous meaning, to which effect should be given in and by all member states, regardless of where a decision falls to be made (see R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, ex p Adan, R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, ex p Aitseguer [2001] 1 All ER 593, [2001] 2 AC 477). It is also, I think, plain that the convention must be seen as a living instrument in the sense that while its meaning does not change over time its application will. I would agree with the observation of Sedley J in R v Immigration Appeal Tribunal, ex p Shah [1997] Imm AR 145 at 152:

'Unless it [the convention] is seen as a living thing, adopted by civilised countries for a humanitarian end which is constant in motive but mutable in form, the Convention will eventually become an anachronism.'

I would also endorse the observation of Laws LJ in R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, ex p Adan, R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, ex p Aitseguer [1999] 4 All ER 774 at 795, [2001] 2 AC 477 at 500:

'It is clear that the signatory states intended that the convention should afford continuing protection for refugees in the changing circumstances of the present and future world. In our view the convention has to be regarded as a living instrument: just as, by the Strasbourg jurisprudence, the European Convention on Human Rights is so regarded.'

a [7] To make good their claim to asylum as refugees it was necessary for the applicants to show, to the standard of reasonable likelihood or real risk, (1) that they feared, if they had remained in or were returned to Turkey, that they would be persecuted, (2) for one or more of the convention reasons, and (3) that such fear was well founded. Although it is no doubt true, as stated in Sandralingham v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, Rajendrakumar v Immigration Appeal Tribunal [1996] Imm AR 97 at 109, that the 1951 convention definition raises a single composite question, analysis requires consideration of the constituent elements of the definition. At the heart of the definition lies the concept of persecution. It is when a person, suffering or fearing persecution in country A, flees to country B that it becomes the duty of country B to afford him (by the grant of asylum) the protection denied him by or under the laws of country A. History provides many examples of racial, religious, national, social and political minorities (sometimes even majorities) which have without doubt suffered persecution. But it is a strong word. Its dictionary definitions (save in their emphasis on religious persecution) accord with popular usage: '... the infliction of death, torture, or penalties for adherence to a religious belief or an opinion as such, with a view to the repression or extirpation of it ...'; 'A particular course or period of systematic infliction of punishment directed against the professors of a (religious) belief ...': Oxford English Dictionary (2nd edn, 1989). Valuable guidance is given by Professor Hathaway The Law of Refugee Status (1991) p 112, in a passage relied on by Lord Hope of Craighead in Horvath v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2000] 3 All ER 577 at 581, [2001] 1 AC 489 at 495:

b

c

d

e

'In sum, persecution is most appropriately defined as the sustained or systemic failure of state protection in relation to one of the core entitlements which has been recognised by the international community.'

f In this passage Professor Hathaway draws attention to a second requirement, no less important than that of showing persecution: the requirement to show, as a condition of entitlement to recognition as a refugee, that the persecution feared will (in reasonable likelihood) be for one or more of the five convention reasons. As Dawson J pointed out in the High Court of Australia in A v Minister for Immigration and Ethnic Affairs (1997) 2 BHRC 143 at 160:

g 'By including in its operative provisions the requirement that a refugee fear persecution, the convention limits its humanitarian scope and does not afford universal protection to asylum seekers. No matter how devastating may be epidemic, natural disaster or famine, a person fleeing them is not a refugee within the terms of the convention. And by incorporating the five convention reasons the convention plainly contemplates that there will even be persons fearing persecution who will not be able to gain asylum as refugees.'

h

[8] There is compelling support for the view that refugee status should be accorded to one who has refused to undertake compulsory military service on the grounds that such service would or might require him to commit atrocities or gross human rights abuses or participate in a conflict condemned by the international community, or where refusal to serve would earn grossly excessive or disproportionate punishment (see, for example, Zolfagharkhani v Canada (Minister of Employment and Immigration) [1993] FC 540, Ciric v Canada (Minister of Employment and Immigration) [1994] 2 FC 65, Canas-Segovia v Immigration and

j

Naturalization Service (1990) 902 F 2d 717, UNHCR Handbook on Procedures and Criteria for Determining Refugee Status (paras 169, 171)). But the applicants cannot, on the facts as found, bring themselves within any of these categories. Nor have they been found to have a rooted objection to all military service of any kind, or an objection based on religious belief. Their unwillingness to serve is based on their strong and sincere opposition to the policy of the Turkish government towards their own Kurdish community. There can be no doubt that the applicants' fear of the treatment which they will receive if they are returned to Turkey and maintain their refusal to serve is well founded: it is the treatment described in [5], above. The crucial question is whether the treatment which the applicants reasonably fear is to be regarded, for purposes of the 1951 convention, as persecution for one or more of the convention reasons.

[9] The core of the applicants' argument in the Court of Appeal was summarised by Laws LJ ([2001] Imm AR 452 at [19]) in these terms:

'(i) There exists a fundamental right, which is internationally recognised, to refuse to undertake military service on grounds of conscience. (ii) Where an individual, motivated by genuine conscientious grounds, refuses to undertake such service and the state offers no civilian or non-combative alternative, the prospect of his prosecution and punishment for evading the draft would if carried into effect amount to persecution for a Convention reason within article 1A(2) (assuming, what is not in contention in these cases, that the nature of the punishment would be sufficiently severe to amount to potential persecution). (iii) Proposition (ii) applies alike to cases of absolute and partial conscientious grounds; and the [applicants], on the proved or admitted facts, are refugees according to this reasoning.'

This was the thrust of the applicants' case before the House also. The key is to be found in submission (i): for while discriminatory infringement of a recognised human right may not necessarily constitute persecution for convention reasons, Mr Nicol QC for the applicants accepted that there could be no persecution for convention reasons without discriminatory infringement of a recognised human right. So it is necessary to investigate whether the treatment which the applicants reasonably fear would infringe a recognised human right.

[10] The leading international human rights instruments, literally interpreted, give little assistance to the applicants' argument. The Universal Declaration of Human Rights in 1948 prohibited slavery or servitude (art 4) and declared a right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion, including a right to manifest religion or belief publicly or privately (art 18), but it made no express reference to a right of conscientious objection. A very similar right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion is embodied in the European Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998) (the ECHR) (art 9) and in the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (New York, 19 December 1966; TS 6 (1977); Cmd 6702) (the ICCPR) (art 18). Each of these instruments also (in arts 4 and 8 respectively) outlaws slavery, servitude and forced or compulsory labour. But in art 8(3)(c) of the ICCPR it is expressly provided that 'forced or compulsory labour' shall not include: '(ii) Any service of a military character and, in countries where conscientious objection is recognized, any national service required by law of conscientious objectors ...' Despite minor differences of wording, art 4(3)(b) of the ECHR is to identical effect. At the time when these provisions were drafted a and adopted, it was plainly contemplated that there could be states, parties to the respective conventions, which did not recognise a right of conscientious objection and did not provide a non-combatant alternative to compulsory military service. Articles 4(3)(b) of the ECHR and 8(3)(c) of the ICCPR have not been amended by international agreement, and there has been no later convention recognising or defining or regulating a right of conscientious objection.

b [11] For reasons on which I have already touched, the reach of an international human rights convention is not forever determined by the intentions of those who originally framed it. Thus, like the Court of Appeal, the House was appropriately asked to consider a mass of material illustrating the movement of international opinion among those concerned with human rights and refugees in the period, now a very significant period, since the major relevant conventions were adopted. A large number of these materials were listed by Waller LJ ([2001] Imm AR 452 at [194]), and they were also considered at length by Laws LJ. From these materials it is plain that several respected human rights bodies have recommended and urged member states to recognise a right of conscientious objection to compulsory military service, to provide a non-combatant alternative to it and to consider the grant of asylum to genuine conscientious objectors. But resolutions and recommendations of this kind, however sympathetic one may be towards their motivation and purpose, cannot themselves establish a legal rule binding in international law. I shall accordingly confine my attention to five documents which seem to me most directly relevant in ascertaining the point which international opinion has now reached.

c [12] Mention must first be made of the UNHCR Handbook which, subject to minor editing, dates from 1979 and is recognised as an important source of guidance on matters to which it relates. It is necessary to quote paras 167–174:

f ‘Deserters and persons avoiding military service

g 167. In countries where military service is compulsory, failure to perform this duty is frequently punishable by law. Moreover, whether military service is compulsory or not, desertion is invariably considered a criminal offence. The penalties may vary from country to country, and are not normally regarded as persecution. Fear of prosecution and punishment for desertion or draft-evasion does not in itself constitute well-founded fear of persecution under the definition. Desertion or draft-evasion does not, on the other hand, exclude a person from being a refugee, and a person may be a refugee in addition to being a deserter or draft-evader.

h 168. A person is clearly not a refugee if his only reason for desertion or draft-evasion is his dislike of military service or fear of combat. He may, however, be a refugee if his desertion or evasion of military service is concomitant with other relevant motives for leaving or remaining outside his country, or if he otherwise has reasons, within the meaning of the definition, to fear persecution.

j 169. A deserter or draft-evader may also be considered a refugee if it can be shown that he would suffer disproportionately severe punishment for the military offence on account of his race, religion, nationality, membership of a particular social group or political opinion. The same would apply if it can be shown that he has well-founded fear of persecution on these grounds above and beyond the punishment for desertion.

170. There are, however, also cases where the necessity to perform military service may be the sole ground for a claim to refugee status, ie when a person can show that the performance of military service would have required his participation in military action contrary to his genuine political, religious or moral convictions, or to valid reasons of conscience. a

171. Not every conviction, genuine though it may be, will constitute a sufficient reason for claiming refugee status after desertion or draft-evasion. It is not enough for a person to be in disagreement with his government regarding the political justification for a particular military action. Where, however, the type of military action, with which an individual does not wish to be associated, is condemned by the international community as contrary to basic rules of human conduct, punishment for desertion or draft-evasion could, in the light of all other requirements of the definition, in itself be regarded as persecution. b
c

172. Refusal to perform military service may also be based on religious convictions. If an applicant is able to show that his religious convictions are genuine, and that such convictions are not taken into account by the authorities of his country in requiring him to perform military service, he may be able to establish a claim to refugee status. Such a claim would, of course, be supported by any additional indications that the applicant or his family may have encountered difficulties due to their religious convictions. d

173. The question as to whether objection to performing military service for reasons of conscience can give rise to a valid claim to refugee status should also be considered in the light of more recent developments in this field. An increasing number of States have introduced legislation or administrative regulations whereby persons who can invoke genuine reasons of conscience are exempted from military service, either entirely or subject to their performing alternative (ie civilian) service. The introduction of such legislation or administrative regulations has also been the subject of recommendations by international agencies. In the light of these developments, it would be open to Contracting States, to grant refugee status to persons who object to performing military service for genuine reasons of conscience. e
f

174. The genuineness of a person's political, religious or moral convictions, or of his reasons of conscience for objecting to performing military service, will of course need to be established by a thorough investigation of his personality and background. The fact that he may have manifested his views prior to being called to arms, or that he may already have encountered difficulties with the authorities because of his convictions, are relevant considerations. Whether he has been drafted into compulsory service or joined the army as a volunteer may also be indicative of the genuineness of his convictions. g
h

Some of these paragraphs may very readily be accepted. The paragraph most helpful to the applicants is para 170. But this appears to be qualified by para 171, which immediately follows and is much less helpful to the applicants. Less helpful also is para 172, in its tentative suggestion that a person 'may be able to establish a claim to refugee status'. The same comment may be made of para 173: '... it would be open to Contracting States, to grant refugee status ...' Read as a whole, these paragraphs do not in my opinion provide the clear statement which the applicants need. j a [13] The applicants understandably placed reliance on General Comment 22 (30 July 1993) of the United Nations Human Rights Committee, which in para 11 said (with reference to art 18 of the ICCPR):

b '11. Many individuals have claimed the right to refuse to perform military service (conscientious objection) on the basis that such right derives from their freedoms under article 18. In response to such claims, a growing number of States have in their laws exempted from compulsory military service citizens who genuinely hold religious or other beliefs that forbid the performance of military service and replaced it with alternative national service. The Covenant does not explicitly refer to a right to conscientious objection, but the Committee believes that such a right can be derived from article 18, inasmuch as the obligation to use lethal force may seriously conflict with the freedom of conscience and the right to manifest one's religion or belief. When this right is recognized by law or practice, there shall be no differentiation among conscientious objectors on the basis of the nature of their particular beliefs; likewise, there shall be no discrimination against conscientious objectors because they have failed to perform military service. The Committee invites States parties to report on the conditions under which persons can be exempted from military service on the basis of their rights under article 18 and on the nature and length of alternative national service.'

e This is perhaps the nearest one comes to a suggestion that a right of conscientious objection can be derived from art 18 of the ICCPR. But it is, again, a somewhat tentative suggestion ('believes that such a right can be derived'), and the Committee implicitly acknowledges that there are member states in which a right of conscientious objection is not recognised by law or practice. Thus while the thrust of the Committee's thinking is plain, one finds no clear assertion of binding principle.

f [14] I turn next to the Joint Position adopted by the Council of the European Union on the harmonised application of the term 'refugee' in art 1 of the 1951 convention (see OJ 1996 L63 p 2). Paragraph 10 (p 6) of this Joint Position was entitled 'Conscientious objection, absence without leave and desertion' and reads:

g 'The fear of punishment for conscientious objection, absence without leave or desertion is investigated on an individual basis. It should in itself be insufficient to justify recognition of refugee status. The penalty must be assessed in particular in accordance with the principles set out in point 5. In cases of absence without leave or desertion, the person concerned must be accorded refugee status if the conditions under which military duties are performed themselves constitute persecution. Similarly, refugee status may be granted, in the light of all the other requirements of the definition, in cases of punishment of conscientious objection or deliberate absence without leave and desertion on grounds of conscience if the performance of his military duties were to have the effect of leading the person concerned to participate in acts falling under the exclusion clauses in Article 1F of the Geneva Convention ...'

j The reference to 'point 5' appears to refer most specifically to sub-para 5.1.2(b) which reads:

'Discriminatory punishment'

Punishment or the threat thereof on the basis of a universally applicable criminal law provision will be discriminatory if persons who breach the law are punished but certain persons are subject to more severe punishment on account of characteristics likely to lead to the award of refugee status. The discriminatory element in the punishment imposed is essential. Persecution may be deemed to exist in the event of a disproportionate sentence, provided that there is a link with one of the grounds of persecution referred to in Article 1A.'

This statement recognises the grounds for claiming asylum to which I have referred in [8], above. But it goes no further, and the statement is prefaced by a rider that 'it shall not bind the legislative authorities or affect decisions of the judicial authorities of the member states'.

[15] I refer next to the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union, which includes art 10:

'Freedom of thought, conscience and religion'

1. Everyone has the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion. This right includes freedom to change religion or belief and freedom, either alone or in community with others and in public or in private, to manifest religion or belief, in worship, teaching, practice and observance.

2. The right to conscientious objection is recognised, in accordance with the national laws governing the exercise of this right.'

While para 1 is said to derive, as it plainly does, from art 9 of the ECHR, para 2 is said to derive from national constitutional traditions. The applicants' difficulty is that national laws and national constitutional traditions may, or may not, recognise a right of conscientious objection; in any event, the Treaty of Nice expressly acknowledged that the status of the Charter of Fundamental Rights was a matter to be addressed thereafter.

[16] Lastly, in this context I would refer to a draft directive of the Council of the European Union (dated 28 November 2002) on minimum standards for the qualification of third country nationals as refugees. Since the draft may be amended, and may never be adopted, it must be received with caution. But since it is seeking to harmonise member states' interpretation of the requirements of art 1A(2) of the 1951 convention, and since (although provisional) it represents the most recent statement on this subject which the House has seen, it seems to me to deserve attention. Chapter III concerns the qualification for being a refugee and art 11 (entitled 'Acts of persecution') provides:

'1. Acts considered as persecution within the meaning of Article 1A of the Geneva Convention must: (a) be sufficiently serious by their nature or repetition as to constitute a severe violation of basic human rights, in particular the rights from which derogation cannot be made under Article 15(2) of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms; or (b) be an accumulation of various measures, including violations of human rights which is sufficiently severe as to affect an individual in a similar manner as mentioned in sub-paragraph (a).

2. Acts of persecution, which can be qualified as such in accordance with paragraph 1, can inter alia take the form of ... (e) prosecution or punishment for refusal to perform military service in a conflict, where performing

- a military service would include crimes or acts falling under the exclusion clauses as set out in Article 14, paragraph 2 ...'

Article 14 is entitled 'Exclusion' and provides in para (2):

- b 'A third country national ... is excluded from being a refugee where there are serious reasons for considering that: (a) he or she has committed a crime against peace, a war crime, or a crime against humanity, as defined in the international instruments drawn up to make provision in respect of such crimes; (b) he or she has committed a serious non-political crime outside the country of refuge prior to his or her admission as a refugee; which means the time of issuing a residence permit based on the granting of refugee status; particularly cruel actions, even if committed with an allegedly political objective, may be classified as serious non-political crimes; (c) he or she has been guilty of acts contrary to the purposes and principles of the United Nations as set out in the Preamble and Articles 1 and 2 of the Charter of the United Nations.'

- d This statement plainly affords a narrower ground for claiming asylum than some of the statements quoted above. It may be thought too narrow and may no doubt be widened in the course of negotiation. But it makes it hard for the applicants to show that there is clear international recognition of the right for which they contend, at any rate as of now. This temporal limitation is important, since international opinion is dynamic and the House cannot do more than give effect to what it understands to be the current position.

- e [17] It is necessary to consider whether the applicants' contention finds compelling support in the decided cases. There are undoubtedly authorities on which they can properly rely, notably Canas-Segovia v Immigration and Naturalization Service (1990) 902 F 2d 717, Canas-Segovia v Immigration and Naturalization Service (1992) 970 F 2d 599 and Erduran v Minister for Immigration and Multicultural Affairs [2002] FCA 814. But the first of these decisions is in my opinion open to the criticism made of it by Jonathan Parker LJ ([2001] Imm AR 452 at [147]–[150]), and the second does not sit altogether comfortably with the decision of the majority of the High Court of Australia in Minister for Immigration and Multicultural Affairs v Yusuf [2001] HCA 30, (2001) 206 CLR 323. They can scarcely be said to constitute a settled body of judicial opinion. Against them must be set a line of decisions of the European Commission on Human Rights which have, at least until recently, held the right asserted by the applicants to be excluded by art 4(3)(b) of the ECHR (see Grandrath v Germany (1965) 8 YB 324, Grandrath v Germany (1967) 10 YB 626, X v Austria (1973) 43 CD 161, A v Switzerland (1984) 38 DR 219, Johansen v Norway (1985) 44 DR 155, Autio v Finland (1991) 72 DR 245 and Heudens v Belgium App No 24630/94 (22 May 1995, unreported)). The applicants drew support from the dissent of one Commission member in Tsirlis v Greece (1998) 25 EHRR 198 at 224–226, a dissent which was repeated and elaborated, with a greater body of support, in the report of the Commission adopted on 4 December 1998 in the case of Thlimmenos v Greece App No 34369/97 (4 December 1998, unreported) (paras 3, 4). This dissenting view was not however adopted by the European Court of Human Rights when the case came before it ((2000) 31 EHRR 411). Whether the imposition of sanctions on conscientious objectors to compulsory military service might, notwithstanding art 4(3)(b) of the ECHR, infringe the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion guaranteed by art 9(1) was a point which the court (at 424, 426 (paras 43, 53)) expressly left open. I am in respectful agreement with the detailed analysis of this authority made by Jonathan Parker LJ ([2001] Imm AR 452 at [124]–[139]). While, therefore, there are indications of changed thinking among a minority of members of the Commission, there is as yet no authority to support the applicants' contention.

[18] It is not in my opinion necessary to explore the circumstances in which the practice of states may give rise to a right commanding international recognition, since the evidence before the House does not disclose a uniformity of practice. It is no doubt true that the dependence of modern warfare on sophisticated weaponry and technological skill has lessened the need for mass armies and so diminished the dependence of some states on conscription. Thus in Europe several states currently have no conscription, and of those that do the great majority recognise a right of conscientious objection. But figures based on a 1998 report by War Registers International show a somewhat different picture worldwide. Of 180 states surveyed, some form of conscription was found to exist in 95. In 52 of those 95 states the right of conscientious objection was found not to be recognised at all. In a further seven of those 95 states there was no known provision governing a right of conscientious objection. In the remaining 36 states the right of conscientious objection appeared to be recognised to some extent. It could not, currently, be said that there is de facto observance of anything approaching a uniform rule.

[19] In the course of his judgment, Laws LJ ([2001] Imm AR 452 at [23]–[24]) quoted the works of two respected authorities on refugee law, Professor Hathaway The Law of Refugee Status (1991) and Professor Goodwin-Gill The Refugee in International Law (2nd edn, 1996). It is unnecessary to repeat his citations, also relied on before the House. It is however noteworthy that Professor Hathaway (at p 182) describes the right to conscientious objection as 'an emerging part of international human rights law' and Professor Goodwin-Gill observes (at p 55) that 'The international community nevertheless appears to be moving towards acceptance of a right of conscientious objection.' Both, in short, discern movement towards recognition of a right, but neither suggests it has yet been achieved. In a report prepared for the appeal of the first applicant, it is true, Professor Goodwin-Gill went a little further (see the judgment of Laws LJ ([2001] Imm AR 452 at [25])); but even then he suggests what states ought to do, and suggests that recognition of a right of conscientious objection ought to derive from the protection given to freedom of conscience by customary international law and universal human rights treaties. The problem, to my mind, is that the treaties have treated compulsory military service as an exception from the forced labour prohibition without making any other provision, and I do not think there is, as yet, a new consensus.

[20] On the main issue to which this opinion has so far been addressed, the Court of Appeal was divided. Of absolute conscientious objectors Laws LJ concluded (at [79]):

'In the result, I would hold that there is no material to establish a presently extant legal rule or principle which vouchsafes a right of absolute conscientious objection, such that where it is not respected, a good case to refugee status under the Convention may arise. No such putative rule or principle is to be found in the Convention's international autonomous meaning or common standard.'

a Turning to partial conscientious objectors he reached (at [84]) a similar conclusion:

‘It is plain, however, that no matter how clear the political basis for a partial objection may be, there is in such a case no more of an international underpinning, by treaty or customary law, to quicken the objector’s claim into a legal right than in the case of the absolute objector. In my judgment, therefore, such a claim is stillborn for all the reasons I have already given.’

b Jonathan Parker LJ (at [100]) shared his view. Waller LJ took a view more favourable in principle to the applicants. Of absolute objectors he said (at [201]):

c ‘Thus if someone can show that he/she is a genuine conscientious objector, that he/she is to be conscripted into a military in a state that simply does not recognise the possibility of such conscientious belief, and that he/she will be prosecuted as a result, in my view he/she will have established a well-founded fear of persecution for a Convention reason. That however does not dispose of the appeals before us.’

d His opinion (at [208]) in the case of partial objectors was similar:

e ‘In my view thus a partial objector may be able to show a deep-seated conscientious reason why he/she should not be conscripted by reference to the fact that he/she will be required to take part in a war against his/her own ethnic community, and may show an infringement of article 9(1), but it takes more than mere disagreement with a policy that allows Kurds to be conscripted to fight Kurds to establish that position.’

f Thus although there was agreement on the outcome, there was disagreement on the intervening steps. Despite my genuine respect for the care and thoroughness with which Waller LJ has put forward his conclusions, and with a measure of reluctance since they may well reflect the international consensus of tomorrow, I feel compelled to accept the view of the Court of Appeal majority on the state of the law today as revealed by the abundant materials before us. That conclusion is fatal to the success of these appeals, which I would accordingly dismiss.

g [21] This conclusion makes it strictly unnecessary to determine a further issue raised by the respondent Secretary of State, but since the House heard full argument and the issue is one of great practical importance I think it desirable to express an opinion. It was argued that, in deciding whether an asylum applicant had been or would be persecuted for convention reasons—

h ‘the examination of the circumstances should be approached from the perspective of the persecutor, since that is the perspective that is determinative in inciting the persecution (see A-G of Canada v Ward [1993] 2 SCR 689 at 747).’

j Support for this approach is found in Immigration and Naturalization Service v Elias-Zacarias (1992) 502 US 478, a decision very strongly criticised by Professor Hathaway (see ‘The Causal Nexus in International Refugee Law’ (2002) 23 Mich J Int’l L 207). The Court of Appeal unanimously rejected this argument ([2001] Imm AR 452 at [92], [154], [182])) and some of the authorities point towards a more objective approach (see Chen Shi Hai v Minister for Immigration and Multicultural Affairs [2000] HCA 19, (2000) 201 CLR 293 at 304, 313 (paras 33, 65), Refugee Appeal No 72635/01 (6 September 2002, unreported) paras 167–173)).

[22] I would express the test somewhat differently from the Court of Appeal in this case. In his judgment in Sivakumar v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2001] EWCA Civ 1196 at [23], [2002] INLR 310 at [23], Dyson LJ stated: 'It is necessary for the person who is considering the claim for asylum to assess carefully the real reason for the persecution.' This seems to me to be a clear, simple and workmanlike test which gives effect to the 1951 convention provided that it is understood that the reason is the reason which operates in the mind of the persecutor and not the reason which the victim believes to be the reason for the persecution, and that there may be more than one real reason. The application of the test calls for the exercise of an objective judgment. Decision makers are not concerned (subject to a qualification mentioned below) to explore the motives or purposes of those who have committed or may commit acts of persecution, nor the belief of the victim as to those motives or purposes. Having made the best assessment possible of all the facts and circumstances, they must label or categorise the reason for the persecution. The qualification mentioned is that where the reason for the persecution is or may be the imputation by the persecutors of a particular belief or opinion (or, for that matter, the attribution of a racial origin or nationality or membership of a particular social group) one is concerned not with the correctness of the matter imputed or attributed but with the belief of the persecutor: the real reason for the persecution of a victim may be the persecutor's belief that he holds extreme political opinions or adheres to a particular faith even if in truth the victim does not hold those opinions or belong to that faith. I take this approach to reflect that put forward by McHugh J in Minister for Immigration and Multicultural Affairs v Ibrahim [2000] HCA 55, (2000) 204 CLR 1 at 33 (para 102):

'In this case, among the questions which the Tribunal should have asked were (a) what harm does the applicant fear on his return to Somalia? (b) is that fear well-founded? (c) why will the applicant be subjected to that harm? and (d) if the answer to (c) is "because of his membership of a particular social group", would the harm constitute persecution for the purpose of the Convention?'

Treatment is not persecutory if it is treatment meted out to all and is not discriminatory (see A v Minister for Immigration and Ethnic Affairs (1997) 2 BHRC 143 at 168 per McHugh J). The question held to be appropriate in the field of racial discrimination in Qureshi v Victoria University of Manchester (1996) [2001] ICR 863 at 874, suitably adapted to the particular case, is in my view apt in this context also: 'Were racial grounds an effective cause of the difference in treatment?'

[23] However difficult the application of the test to the facts of particular cases, I do not think that the test to be applied should itself be problematical. The decision-maker will begin by considering the reason in the mind of the persecutor for inflicting the persecutory treatment. That reason would, in this case, be the applicants' refusal to serve in the army. But the decision maker does not stop there. He asks if that is the real reason, or whether there is some other effective reason. The victims' belief that the treatment is inflicted because of their political opinions is beside the point unless the decision-maker concludes that the holding of such opinions was the, or a, real reason for the persecutory treatment. On the facts here, that would not be a tenable view, since it is clear that anyone refusing

- a to serve would be treated in the same way, whatever his personal grounds for refusing.

LORD STEYN.

- b [24] My Lords, I have had the privilege of reading the opinion of Lord Bingham of Cornhill. I am in complete agreement with it. For the reasons he has given I would also dismiss the appeals.

LORD HOFFMANN.

- c [25] My Lords, the applicants are Kurdish Turks who came to this country at the ages of 19 and 18 respectively. They were shortly to become liable under Turkish law to military service. On arrival in the United Kingdom they claimed asylum on various grounds, of which the only one now relied upon is a fear that if returned to Turkey they would be prosecuted for refusing to enlist. They claim that their refusal was on the ground of their deeply held political objections to the policies of the then Turkish government towards the Kurdish minority. This, they say, was sufficient to entitle them to asylum because punishment for d refusing military service on such grounds would be persecution for reasons of their political opinions within the meaning of the Geneva Convention relating to the Status of Refugees (Geneva, 28 July 1951; TS 39 (1953); Cmnd 9171) (the 1951 convention).

- e [26] I emphasise that the case is put simply on the basis that they would be liable to punishment for refusing to perform military service. This is because of two important findings of fact by the special adjudicator which are now not challenged and which form part of the agreed statement of facts. The first is that the penalty for draft evasion (a prison sentence of six months to three years) is not disproportionate or excessive. The second is that there is no reasonable likelihood that the applicants would have been required to engage in military f action contrary to basic rules of human conduct, whether against Kurds or anyone else.

- g [27] The Secretary of State says that in these circumstances there is nothing wrong or unusual in Turkey having compulsory military service and suitable penalties for disobedience. If the applicants refuse to serve, the state is entitled to punish them, not for their political opinions but for failing to enlist. Their political opinions may be the reason why they refuse to serve but they are not the reason why they will be punished. They are free to hold whatever opinions they please about Turkish policy towards the Kurds as long as they report for duty. Putting the same point in a different way, imposing a punishment for failing to comply with a universal obligation of this kind is not persecution.

- h [28] Mr Nicol QC, who appeared for the applicants, says that it is not so simple. Treating some group of people in the same way as everyone else may be persecuting them if their group has a right to be treated differently. For example, in Thlimmenos v Greece (2001) 31 EHRR 411 the appellant was refused appointment as a chartered accountant pursuant to a general law which j disqualified anyone who had been convicted of felony. The applicant's felony had been a refusal to do military service on the ground of his religious convictions as a Jehovah's Witness. The European Court of Human Rights held (at 424-425 (para 44)) that the disqualification infringed the anti-discrimination provisions of art 14 of the European Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998) (the ECHR) because it failed to treat his felony, committed because of his religious principles, differently from ordinary felonies:

'The right not to be discriminated against in the enjoyment of the rights guaranteed under the Convention is also violated when States without an objective and reasonable justification fail to treat differently persons whose situations are significantly different.'

[29] The right guaranteed under the convention in respect of which there had been discrimination was the freedom of religion guaranteed by art 9. The court found that failure to treat the applicant differently had no objective justification. The conviction had no relevance to his suitability as an accountant and he had already been punished by a prison sentence for his refusal to do military service.

[30] Thlimmenos v Greece therefore supports the proposition that, at any rate for the purposes of art 14, a law of general application may have a discriminatory effect if it contains no exceptions for people who have a right to be treated differently. But I note in passing that the court, while holding that Thlimmenos had a right to be treated differently in respect of qualification as an accountant, expressed no view on the point which arises in this case, namely whether he would have had a right to be treated differently in respect of his obligation to perform military service. That would have required an altogether different assessment of objective justification.

[31] I shall consider later whether this principle of discrimination by failing to treat different cases differently can be fitted into the language of the 1951 convention. Accepting for the moment that it can, I pass on to the next stage in Mr Nicol's argument, which is to show that it applies to laws imposing a general obligation to do military service. The question here is whether people who object to such service on conscientious religious or political grounds have a human right to be excused.

[32] Mr Nicol accepts that ordinarily a conscientious religious or political objection is not a reason for being entitled to treat oneself as absolved from the laws of the state. In many western countries, including the United Kingdom, civil disobedience is an honourable tradition which goes back to Antigone. It may be vindicated by history—think of the suffragettes—but often what makes it honourable and demonstrates the strength of conviction is willingness to accept the punishment. (That is not to agree with Socrates that it would necessarily be dishonourable to try to avoid punishment.) The standard moral position is summarised by Ronald Dworkin in Taking Rights Seriously (1977) pp 186–187:

'In a democracy, or at least a democracy that in principle respects individual rights, each citizen has a general moral duty to obey all the laws, even though he would like some of them changed. He owes that duty to his fellow citizens, who obey laws that they do not like, to his benefit. But this general duty cannot be an absolute duty, because even a society that is in principle just may produce unjust laws and policies, and a man has duties other than his duties to the state. A man must honour his duties to his God and to his conscience, and if these conflict with his duty to the state, then he is entitled, in the end, to do what he judges to be right. If he decides that he must break the law, however, then he must submit to the judgment and punishment that the state imposes, in recognition of the fact that his duty to a his fellow citizens was overwhelmed but not extinguished by his religious or moral obligations.'

[33] This suggests that while the demonstrator or objector cannot be morally condemned, and may indeed be praised, for following the dictates of his conscience, it is not necessarily unjust for the state to punish him in the same way as any other person who breaks the law. It will of course be different if the law itself is unjust. The injustice of the law will carry over into its enforcement. But b if the law is not otherwise unjust, as conscription is accepted in principle to be, then it does not follow that because his objection is conscientious, the state is not entitled to punish him. He has his reasons and the state, in the interests of its citizens generally, has different reasons. Both might be right.

c [34] That is certainly the view we would take of someone who, for example, refused to pay part of his taxes because he felt he could not conscientiously contribute to military expenditure, or insisted on chaining herself to a JCB because she thought it was morally offensive to destroy beautiful countryside to build a new motorway. As judges we would respect their views but might feel it necessary to punish them all the same. Whether we did so or not would be d largely a pragmatic question. We would take into account their moral views but would not accept an unqualified moral duty to give way to them. On the contrary we might feel that although we sympathised and even shared the same opinions, we had to give greater weight to the need to enforce the law. In e deciding whether or not to impose punishment, the most important consideration would be whether it would do more harm than good. This means that the objector has no right not to be punished. It is a matter for the state (including the judges) to decide on utilitarian grounds whether to do so or not. As Ronald Dworkin said in A Matter of Principle (1985) p 114: 'Utilitarianism may be a poor general theory of justice, but it states an excellent necessary condition for a just punishment.'

f [35] Mr Nicol was, I think, inclined to accept these principles as correct for most forms of civil disobedience. Conscientious objection to a law is not enough to make punishment unjust. It is not a reason why the objector has a right to be treated differently. But he said that military service was different. An obligation to kill people was something which the state could not justly impose upon g anyone who had a deeply held objection to doing so.

[36] The difficulty about this argument is that it is accepted that in general the state does have the right to impose upon its citizens an obligation to kill people in war. It would of course be different if they were being asked to commit war crimes; in such a case, anyone could legitimately object. But ordinary army h service, though demanding and often inconvenient, sometimes unpleasant and occasionally dangerous, is in many countries (and was in many more, including the United Kingdom) part of the citizen's ordinary duty.

[37] Mr Nicol did not offer a rational ground for distinguishing between objection to military service and objection to other laws. One might feel intuitively that some such ground might be constructed around the notion of the sanctity of life, although I am not sure that even that could be described as j rational. In any event, it would not have served Mr Nicol's purpose because it does not form the basis of these applicants' objections. They would have no objection to fighting in a war for a Turkish (or Kurdish) government of the right political complexion. He appealed instead to the practice of nations and the opinions of jurists, which he says support the proposition that conscientious objection to military service on any religious or political ground should be recognised. a [38] The question in this appeal is the meaning of the term 'refugee' in the 1951 convention. That in turn raises the question of what is meant by 'persecuted'. Mr Nicol says that if people are subjected to punishment which would be regarded as discriminatory by reference to their fundamental human rights, they are being persecuted. If those fundamental rights relate to their religious beliefs or political opinions, then they are being persecuted for reasons of those beliefs or opinions. My Lords, I have not attempted to examine all aspects of these propositions but for present purposes I am content to accept them. I shall therefore consider whether punishing conscientious objectors is an infringement of their fundamental human rights to freedom of conscience and opinion. b

c

[39] How does one establish the scope of fundamental human rights for the purposes of an international convention such as the 1951 convention? Many state parties to the 1951 convention are also parties to human rights conventions, such as the ECHR and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (New York, 19 December 1966; TS 6 (1977); Cmd 6702) (the ICCPR). Mr Nicol says that the current state of human rights as expressed in those and other similar conventions is the best guide to their content for the purposes of the 1951 convention. d

[40] Mr Howell QC, who appeared for the Secretary of State, said that the question was whether a right of conscientious objection had become part of customary international law. For that purpose there had to have been a general and consistent practice of states which was recognised as conforming to a legal obligation (see Oppenheim's International Law (9th edn, 1992) vol 1 pp 27–31 (ed Jennings and Watts)). There was plainly no such settled practice relating to conscientious objection. There are many countries, of which I shall mention some in a moment, which do not recognise it. e
f

[41] I do not think it is possible to apply the rules for the development of rules of international law concerning the relations of states with each other (for example, as to how boundaries should be drawn) to the fundamental human rights of citizens against the state. There are unhappily many fundamental human rights which would fail such a test of state practice and the 1951 convention is itself a recognition of this fact. In my opinion a different approach is needed. Fundamental human rights are the minimum rights which a state ought to concede to its citizens. For the purpose of deciding what these minimum rights are, international instruments are important even if many state parties in practice disregard them. (The African Charter on Human and People's Rights, adopted in 1981, is perhaps a conspicuous example.) But the instruments show recognition that such rights ought to exist. The delinquent states do not normally deny this; they usually pretend that they comply. Equally, the fact that many states openly deny this existence of a human right is not necessarily a reason for saying that it does not exist. One may think, so much the worse for them. But state practice is nevertheless important because it is difficult to assert the existence of a universal fundamental human right disavowed by many states which take human rights seriously. g
h
j

[42] As I have said, there are many countries which do not, or did not until relatively recently, recognise any form of conscientious objection. Those that do are not agreed on the grounds upon which it should be allowed. The Rapporteur a of the Committee on Legal Affairs and Human Rights of the Council of Europe reported on 4 May 2001 on 'Exercise of the right of conscientious objection to military service in Council of Europe member states' (para 24): 'Grounds for exemption from military service range from a very limited list of reasons to a very broad interpretation of the concept of conscience.'

b [43] In the United Kingdom, for example, some forms of conscientious objection were recognised in both World Wars; the practice of the tribunals which decided claims to conscientious objector status does not appear to have been uniform. Likewise in the United States conscientious objection is recognised, but the statutory grounds are more specific: the objection must be to all war and not merely to the particular war for which one is being conscripted. This ruled out people who did not object to serving in defence of their country but thought that the Vietnam War, for example, was immoral. In France conscientious objection was not recognised until 1963, after the end of the Algerian War, and in Germany it was recognised in the new 1949 constitution after the end of the 1935–45 war, when the German Army was in abeyance. On the other hand, in many countries there is conscription and no conscientious objection.

e [44] What conclusions can one draw from these mixed data? It seems to me that even in Europe and the United States, the recognition of conscientious objection, sometimes as a prelude to the abolition of conscription, does not demonstrate any recognition of a principle that conscientious objectors have a moral right to be treated differently. On the contrary, I think that practice supports Dworkin's view that recognition of the strength of the objector's religious, moral or political feelings is only part of a complex judgment that includes the pragmatic question as to whether compelling conscientious objectors to enlist or suffer punishment will do more harm than good. Among the other relevant factors are the following: first, martyrs attract sympathy, particularly if they suffer on religious grounds in a country which takes religion seriously; secondly, unwilling soldiers may not be very effective; thirdly, they tend to be articulate people who may spread their views in the ranks; fourthly, modern military technology requires highly trained specialists and not masses of unskilled men.

g [45] I pass then from state practice to the opinions of jurists. There seems little doubt that the framers of the ICCPR and the ECHR did not think that the conventions conferred a right to conscientious objection. That is shown by the provisions of art 8(c)(ii) of the ICCPR and art 4(3)(b) of the ECHR which speak, in a different context, of countries 'where conscientious objection is recognised'. That clearly indicates that the framers thought there might be state parties to the convention in which conscientious objection was not recognised. Of course that is not by any means conclusive. The framers of the post-Civil War amendments to the constitution of the United States did not think that they were inconsistent with segregation, but the courts in the mid-twentieth century decided that they were. The broad concepts of human rights do not change in meaning: 'respect for ... private life' always means the area of personal autonomy which the state must concede to the individual, but each generation of judges must give its own content to such concepts. They may think that the framers of the instrument were wrong in their assumptions or that the extent of the area of personal autonomy has changed with changes in the values of society (see Goodwin v UK [2002] 2 FCR 577). Perhaps even more important, there may be changes in what is perceived to be the appropriate balance between one human right (eg respect for private life) and another (eg freedom of expression by newspapers) or the extent to which a human right needs to be qualified in the interests of good government or on other utilitarian grounds. a [46] In the present case, the human right relied upon as founding a right to conscientious objection is the freedom of thought, conscience and religion (see art 18 of the ICCPR and art 9 of the ECHR). Although both articles give an unqualified right to hold religious opinions and to manifest that belief in 'worship, observance, practice and teaching', the right to manifest a religion or belief in other ways may be limited so far as 'necessary to protect public safety, order, health, or morals or the fundamental rights and freedoms of others'. The framers of the covenants appear to have believed, as I have said, that public safety was a legitimate reason for not allowing a religion or belief to be manifested by refusal to do military service. So the question is whether that is no longer the right view to take. b

c

[47] The changes in the nature of warfare which I mentioned earlier do not seem to me a reason for recognising an international human right to conscientious objection. They only strengthen the pragmatic reasons, in countries which have high technology armies but still have conscription, for not punishing conscientious objection. But that is a matter of policy, not principle. It is no reason for saying that a country which needs a citizen army to defend itself is obliged to put the conscience of a conscript before the needs of national defence and, perhaps as important, the principle of equality of sacrifice among citizens. d
e

[48] The notion that there is such a human right seems to be of recent origin. In LTK v Finland (1985) 94 ILR 396 the United Nations Human Rights Committee established under the ICCPR said flatly that 'the Covenant does not provide for the right to conscientious objection'. But in 1993 the committee issued 'General Comment 22' on 30 July 1993 in which it tentatively changed its mind and said: f

'11. Many individuals have claimed the right to refuse to perform military service (conscientious objection) on the basis that such right derives from their freedoms under article 18. In response to such claims, a growing number of States have in their laws exempted from compulsory military service citizens who genuinely hold religious or other beliefs that forbid the performance of military service and replaced it with alternative national service. The Covenant does not explicitly refer to a right to conscientious objection, but the Committee believes that such a right can be derived from article 18, inasmuch as the obligation to use lethal force may seriously conflict with the freedom of conscience and the right to manifest one's religion or belief.' g
h

[49] There are two observations to be made. First, the fact that (a) people claim a right to conscientious objection under art 18 and (b) a growing number of states concede a right to conscientious objection, does not by any means demonstrate that they recognise that such a right exists under art 18. It may show no more than that their military requirements make it sensible to tolerate some form of conscientious objection. Secondly, the statement that an obligation to use lethal force may 'seriously conflict with freedom of conscience etc' does not even attempt to explain why such an obligation should be distinguished from other legal obligations which may similarly conflict. j

a [50] The European Court of Human Rights has never found it necessary to decide whether art 9 (the equivalent of art 18 of the ICCPR) entails a right of conscientious objection but the European Commission on Human Rights has considered the matter several times. On all the occasions when it considered that it was necessary to decide the point, it has said that art 9 does not (see, for example, Autio v Finland (1991) 72 DR 245 referring to earlier cases). In Tsirlis v Greece (1998) 25 EHRR 198 at 224 there was a single dissent from Mrs Liddy, who distinguished cases in which the action does not 'actually express the belief concerned' (like chaining oneself to the railings outside Parliament) or 'has no specific conscientious implications in itself' (like paying tax). I find it hard to see the principle upon which these distinctions are made: they appear to involve questions of degree. There is no reason why a religion should not require one to chain oneself to railings, not pay tax or fight a holy war and to say that such beliefs would be irrational or contrary to the public interest would seem to me to miss the point. However, Mrs Liddy gained five more votes for a similar dissent in Thlimmenos v Greece App No 34369/97 (4 December 1998, unreported), and there the matter stands.

d [51] Finally there is the recently adopted Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union which provides in art 10(2) that '[t]he right to conscientious objection is recognised, in accordance with the national laws governing the exercise of this right'. The reference to national laws enabled the European institutions which proclaimed the Charter (the legal status of which is still undecided) to avoid defining the nature of the right but this makes it difficult to provide a coherent theory as to why the right should exist. Is it based upon particular respect for a religious or philosophical belief in the sanctity of life? In that case, it should be confined to objections, as in the United States, to all wars and perhaps only to combatant roles in the forces. Or is it more broadly based on political objection to particular operations? In that case, how should it be distinguished from other aspects of government policy? It is difficult to escape the conclusion that this provision was adopted because all the member states either had no conscription or did not foresee a situation in which it would be necessary to force deeply unwilling recruits into their armed forces.

g [52] If one turns to consider what the European Union considers would amount to a violation of fundamental rights by other nations, a different story emerges. On 4 March 1996 the Council of the European Union adopted, pursuant to the 'Third Pillar' provisions of art K.3 of the Maastricht Treaty (now art 31 EU), a Joint Position on the interpretation of the 1951 convention (OJ 1996 L63 p 2). Point 10 said that fear of punishment for conscientious objection should in itself be insufficient to justify recognition of refugee status. It might however amount to persecution if the punishment was discriminatory, if the conditions under which service had to be performed amounted in themselves to persecution or if they would require the applicant to commit war crimes or the like. A similar position is adopted in the current draft of a Council Directive on refugees which was approved at the Justice and Home Affairs Council on 28 November 2002.

j These documents suggest that the European Union does not accept that a failure to recognise conscientious objection is a discriminatory breach of the fundamental human rights of the objectors.

[53] In my opinion, therefore, the applicants have not made out their case for saying that there exists a core human right to refuse military service on conscientious grounds which entails that punishment of persons who hold such views is necessarily discriminatory treatment. The existence of such a right is not supported by either a moral imperative or international practice. a [54] This conclusion makes it unnecessary to decide whether Mr Nicol is right in saying that, for the purposes of the 1951 convention, to apply a general law imposing significant punishment on people who have a human right to be treated differently because of their conscientious opinions amounts to persecution on the grounds that they hold those opinions, or whether, as the Secretary of State says, b it is a complete answer that the Turkish authorities are not concerned with their political opinions but only with their refusal to enlist. My present inclination is to agree with Laws LJ that it would be inconsistent to say that a general conscription law which did not make an exception for conscientious objectors was an infringement of their fundamental human rights but that punishing conscientious objectors under such a law was not persecution for reasons of their opinions. c The bizarre case of Omoruyi v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2001] Imm AR 175 was different. Mr Omoruyi was not claiming that by virtue of his Christianity he had a human right to be treated differently from other Nigerians in being allowed to bury his father's body. Everyone had such a right. He was claiming that having to comply with the demands of a criminal gang was harder on him because he was a Christian. d Whether or not that was the case, it did not mean that the reason why he was subjected to the demand or not excepted from the demand had anything to do with his religion.

[55] I would therefore dismiss the appeal.

LORD HUTTON. e

[56] My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speech of my noble and learned friend Lord Bingham of Cornhill. I am in full agreement with it and for the reasons which he gives I, too, would dismiss these appeals.

LORD RODGER OF EARLSFERRY. f

[57] My Lords, my noble and learned friends Lord Bingham of Cornhill and Lord Hoffmann have explained that, until now, with only minor exceptions the relevant bodies have been unwilling to affirm the existence in international law of a right to object to military service on grounds of conscience. Those bodies have preferred, at most, to commend to states that they should recognise such a right within their domestic legal order. g The reluctance to go further doubtless reflects the real difficulty of identifying the scope of any right that all states would have to recognise, whatever their circumstances. It is not obvious, for example, that the recognition in peacetime of a right to exemption from military service on grounds of conscience raises precisely the same issues as the recognition of such a right by a state which is fighting for its very survival, which, lacking more sophisticated weapons, requires all the manpower it can muster and which may not be in a position to scrutinise applications for exemption. h The dilemma of the conscientious objector asserting a right to exemption in an hour of national peril is correspondingly the more exquisite.

[58] The applicants do not object to performing military service in all j circumstances. This only makes defining the scope of the right which they assert more problematical. In Gillette v US (1970) 401 US 437, in a powerful opinion delivered at the height of the controversy over the selective draft for military service in Vietnam, Marshall J analysed the particular difficulties of recognising anything short of an absolute objection to military service. He drew attention to

- a* the inevitable competition between the values of conscientious objection and of equality of sacrifice, a competition that has to be resolved while bearing in mind that in practice an extensive right of conscientious objection will tend to be asserted by the educated and articulate rather than by the less fortunate members of society. States with different histories, different social mixes and different political, cultural, religious or philosophical values may legitimately differ as to how such a sensitive issue should be determined. It is hardly surprising therefore that no universal solution which all must follow has so far been identified. In these circumstances, for the reasons given by Lord Bingham and Lord Hoffmann I agree that the House cannot recognise the supposed core human right for which the applicants contend. The appeals must accordingly be dismissed.
- b*

- c* [59] I also agree with what Lord Bingham has said about the way in which decision makers should determine the reasons for the persecution which an applicant fears.

Appeals dismissed.

Kate O'Hanlon Barrister.

CMA CGM SA v Beteiligungs-Kommanditgesellschaft
MS 'Northern Pioneer' Schiffahrtsgesellschaft mbH & Co and others

[2002] EWCA Civ 1878

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

LORD PHILLIPS OF WORTH MATRAVERS MR, RIX AND DYSON LJJ

19 NOVEMBER, 18 DECEMBER 2002

Arbitration – Award – Leave to appeal against award – Appeal against refusal of leave to appeal to Court of Appeal – Principles to be applied – Arbitration Act 1996, s 69.

Arbitration proceedings were commenced between the owners and charterers of container ships which had been chartered under the New York Produce Exchange form of time charter. Clause 31^a of each of the charterparties was a war cancellation clause and the proceedings raised the question whether the charterers had validly cancelled the charters pursuant to cl 31. The arbitrators found that they had not. The charterers sought permission to appeal to the Commercial Court from that decision pursuant to s 69^b of the Arbitration Act 1996, contending that the arbitrators had erred in relation to issues of law. The judge refused permission to appeal against the arbitrators' award because he was of the view that the criteria set out in s 69(3)(b), which included that leave should be given only on a question of law that the tribunal had been asked to determine, precluded such permission, since the critical question raised by the charterers, namely whether cl 31 was subject to an implied condition that the right to cancel had to be exercised within a reasonable time of its accrual, had not been explored before the arbitrators. However, in relation to four issues of law he granted permission to appeal to the Court of Appeal against his decision. The appeal raised the following questions: (i) whether the judge had applied the correct principles when granting permission to appeal to the Court of Appeal; (ii) whether the judge had applied the correct principles when refusing permission to appeal against the arbitrators' award; and (iii) whether the judge had correctly applied those principles.

Held – (1) Permission to appeal to the Court of Appeal against the refusal of permission to appeal to the High Court should be granted only in cases where a decision to grant or refuse permission to appeal to the High Court in the particular case called for elucidation as to the manner of the application of the statutory criteria laid down in s 69 of the 1996 Act. In the instant case, the judge had not identified any uncertainty as to the manner in which the statutory criteria should be applied, had not pointed to any uncertainty in the criteria and had not suggested any respect in which he might have misapplied the criteria. It followed that he had not applied the correct principles in granting leave to appeal to the

^a Clause 31, so far as is material, is set out at [2], below

^b Section 69, so far as is material, is set out at [10], below

a Court of Appeal (see [12]–[16], below); Antaios Cia Naviera v Salen Rederierna AB, The Antaios [1984] 3 All ER 229 applied.

(2) Since the judge had held that the finding of the arbitrators on the question he had identified as critical was not a finding on a question which the tribunal was asked to determine within the meaning of s 69(3)(b), his decision to refuse permission to appeal from the arbitrators' award was inevitable. He had therefore applied the correct principles, as laid down by s 69(3), to the question whether permission should have been granted to appeal against the arbitrators' award (see [24]–[27], below).

(3) In so far as the judge's refusal of permission was founded on s 69(3)(b), it was not well founded. There were, however, other considerations which justified his decision. Before the judge could grant permission to appeal, s 69 required that the judge should find (i) that the decision of the arbitrators on the existence of an implied term was obviously wrong or that the point was one of general public importance and that the decision of the arbitrators was at least open to serious doubt and (ii) that reversing the decision of the arbitrators on the point would substantially affect the rights of one or more of the parties. It could not be said in the instant case that the arbitrators' decision was obviously wrong, nor that it was open to serious doubt. Had the arbitrators applied the principles of election, waiver and estoppel, they would have concluded that those precluded the right to cancel the charterparty after a period of delay as long as that in the instant case. Moreover, the determination of the question was not one which would substantially affect the rights of the parties, and the question was not one of general public importance. Accordingly, the appeal would be dismissed (see [36]–[38], [55], [56], [65], below); Antaios Cia Naviera v Salen Rederierna AB, The Antaios [1984] 3 All ER 229 applied.

Notes

f For appeal from an arbitration award on a point of law, see Supp to 2 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) paras 690–713.4.

Cases referred to in judgment

Antaios Cia Naviera SA v Salen Rederierna AB, The Antaios [1984] 3 All ER 229, [1985] AC 191, [1984] 3 WLR 592, HL; affg [1983] 3 All ER 777, [1983] 1 WLR 1362, CA; affg [1983] 2 Lloyd's Rep 473.

Associated Provincial Picture Houses Ltd v Wednesbury Corp [1947] 2 All ER 680, [1948] 1 KB 223, CA.

Edwards (Inspector of Taxes) v Bairstow [1955] 3 All ER 48, [1956] AC 14, [1955] 3 WLR 410, HL.

Kawasaki Kisen Kabushiki Kaisha and Belships Co Ltd, Skibsaksjeselskap, Re An Arbitration between [1939] 2 All ER 108.

Kawasaki Kisen Kabushiki Kaisha of Kobe v Bantham Steamship Co Ltd [1939] 1 All ER 819, [1939] 2 KB 544, CA.

Mardorf Peach & Co Ltd v Attica Sea Carriers Corp of Liberia, The Laconia [1977] 1 All ER 545, [1977] AC 850, [1977] 2 WLR 286, HL.

North Range Shipping Ltd v Seatrans Shipping Corp [2002] EWCA Civ 405, [2002] 2 All ER (Comm) 193, [2002] 1 WLR 2397.

Petraco (Bermuda) Ltd v Petromed International SA [1988] 3 All ER 454, [1988] 1 WLR 896, CA.

Peyman v Lanjani [1984] 3 All ER 703, [1985] Ch 457, [1985] 2 WLR 154, CA.

Pioneer Shipping Ltd v BTP Tioxide Ltd, The Nema [1981] 2 All ER 1030, [1982] AC 724, [1981] 3 WLR 292, HL. a Scandinavian Trading Tanker Co AB v Flota Petrolera Ecuatoriana, The Scaptrade [1981] 2 Lloyd's Rep 425; affd [1983] 1 All ER 301, [1983] QB 529, [1983] 2 WLR 248, CA; affd [1983] 2 All ER 763, [1983] 2 AC 694, [1983] 3 WLR 203, HL.

Appeal b

The claimant charterers, CMA CGM SA, appealed from the order of Tomlinson J on 2 July 2002 refusing them permission to appeal pursuant to s 69 of the Arbitration Act 1996 from an award of arbitrators (Sir Christopher Staughton, Adrian Hamilton QC and Kenneth Rokison QC). On 16 July 2002 Tomlinson J granted permission to appeal from that order to the Court of Appeal pursuant to s 69. The respondent owners (claimants in the arbitration) were Beteiligungs-KG MS 'Northern Pioneer' Schiffahrtsgesellschaft mbH & Co, Beteiligungs-KG MS 'Northern Reliance' Schiffahrtsgesellschaft mbH & Co, Beteiligungs-KG MS 'Northern Faith' Schiffahrtsgesellschaft mbH & Co, Beteiligungs-KG MS 'Northern Honour' Schiffahrtsgesellschaft mbH & Co and Beteiligungs-KG MS 'Northern Dignity' Schiffahrtsgesellschaft mbH & Co. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court. c
d

Philippa Hopkins (instructed by Ince & Co) for the charterers.

Stephen Kenny (instructed by Holman Fenwick & Willan) for the owners.

Cur adv vult e

18 December 2002. The following judgment of the court was delivered.

LORD PHILLIPS OF WORTH MATRAVERS MR.

INTRODUCTION f

[1] This appeal arises out of and relates to an award of three eminent commercial arbitrators, Sir Christopher Staughton, Mr Adrian Hamilton QC and Mr Kenneth Rokison QC. The arbitration raised the question of whether charterers of four vessels under the New York Produce Exchange (NYPE) form of charter had validly cancelled those charters pursuant to the war cancellation clause. The arbitrators held that they had not. The charterers sought permission to appeal to the Commercial Court against that decision, contending that the arbitrators had erred in relation to seven issues of law. They did so pursuant to s 69 of the Arbitration Act 1996. By order dated 2 July 2002 Tomlinson J refused permission to appeal. On 16 July 2002 he granted permission to appeal to this court against his decision in relation to four issues. So far as we are aware, this is the first time that permission to appeal to this court has been granted pursuant to s 69 of the 1996 Act. The appeal raises three issues. (1) Did Tomlinson J apply the correct principles when granting permission to appeal to this court? (2) Did Tomlinson J apply the correct principles when refusing permission to appeal against the arbitrators' award? (3) Did Tomlinson J correctly apply the latter principles? g
h
j

[2] The respondents (the owners), who were the claimants in the arbitration, are five German limited liability partnerships each of which owns one container ship. They chartered these vessels under the NYPE form of time charter, with amendments up to 12 June 1981, to a company of which the appellants (the charterers), who were the respondents in the arbitration, are the universal a successor. Clause 31 of each of the charterparties was a war cancellation clause which provided, so far as material, as follows:

b In the event of the outbreak of war (whether there be a declaration of war or not) between any two or more of the following countries: The United States of America, the United Kingdom, France, Russia, the People's Republic of China, Federal Republic of Germany and any country of the EEC or in the event of the nation under whose flag the vessel sails becoming involved in war (whether there be a declaration of war or not), either the Owners or the charterers may cancel this charter ...'*

c [3] The charters were for lengthy terms and, from 1996 to 1999, container line rates fell. In September 1997 the charters were varied, to accommodate the charterers. Notwithstanding this variation the charterers had, in March 1999, a powerful commercial motive for terminating the charters. It was in March 1999 that a military operation began in Kosovo in which Germany participated as a member of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO). In relation to this, the arbitrators found the following facts:

d 'The particular operation with which we are concerned started on 24 March 1999. Germany participated as a member of NATO. Under the German constitution, the German Bundestag approved German participation in the operation. From 24 March 1999, this participation involved the deployment of ten Tornado ECR aircraft and four Tornado Recce aircraft of e the German Air Force, initially mainly suppressing Yugoslav air defences, and reconnaissance, and later switching to other targets. During the second half of April the intensity of the operation, including Germany's participation increased considerably. We conclude, however, that the operation was one operation, starting on 24 March 1999, and the increase in Germany's f participation was one of scale or tempo, rather than in the nature of Germany's involvement.'

[4] By notice dated 29 April 1999 the charterers purported to terminate each of the charterparties on the ground that Germany, under whose flag the vessels sailed, had become involved in war in Kosovo and Yugoslavia.

g [5] The arbitrators found that the cancellation of the charterparties was invalid for reasons which included the following: (1) (by a majority) that the events in Kosovo did not constitute 'war' within the meaning of that word in cl 31; (2) (by the same majority) that if events in Kosovo did constitute war, Germany was not 'involved' in that war within the meaning of that word in cl 31;
h (3) that under cl 31, the right to cancel a charter had to be exercised within a reasonable time of the event in question; (4) the charterers had not given notice of cancellation within a reasonable time of the alleged involvement of Germany in the alleged war.

j [6] The issues in respect of which the charterers sought permission to appeal and which we shall have to consider, having regard to the terms upon which Tomlinson J gave leave to appeal to us, are the following:

- (i) Whether on a proper construction of cl 31 of the charterparties, the expression "[a] nation ... becoming involved in war" in that clause is apt to encompass circumstances in which a nation participates in a military operation as a member of NATO (or another international body).
- (ii) Whether the option to cancel given by cl 31 of the charterparties arose only in the event that the war in question, or the flag state's involvement in that war, had an impact on the trading or operations of the vessel or vessels concerned. (iii) Whether (a) there was implied into cl 31 of the charterparties any term to the effect that the right to cancel the charterparties pursuant to that clause had to be exercised by the giving of a notice within a particular time frame or (b) there was no such implied term and the right to cancel could be lost only as the result of an election by the party concerned. (iv) If there was an implied term, whether the term in question was that the right to cancel had to be exercised (a) by notice given within a reasonable time of its accrual (and in particular within a few days thereof) or (b) before such time had elapsed as to make the other party believe that no such right would be exercised.'

SECTION 69 AND ITS HISTORY

[7] The regime under which decisions of arbitrators were brought before the High Court by case stated was radically altered by the Arbitration Act 1979, s 1 of which provided, in so far as material:

'(1) In the Arbitration Act 1950 ... section 21 (statement of case ...) shall cease to have effect and, without prejudice to the right of appeal conferred by subsection (2) below, the High Court shall not have jurisdiction to set aside or remit an award on an arbitration agreement on the ground of errors of fact or law on the face of the award.

(2) Subject to subsection (3) below, an appeal shall lie to the High Court on any question of law arising out of an award made on an arbitration agreement; and on the determination of such an appeal the High Court may ... (a) confirm, vary or set aside the award ...

(3) An appeal under this section may be brought by any of the parties to the reference—(a) with the consent of all the other parties to the reference; or (b) ... with the leave of the court.

(4) The High Court shall not grant leave under subsection (3)(b) above unless it considers that, having regard to all the circumstances, the determination of the question of law concerned could substantially affect the rights of one or more of the parties to the arbitration agreement ...

(7) No appeal shall lie to the Court of Appeal from a decision of the High Court on an appeal under this section unless—(a) the High Court or the Court of Appeal gives leave; and (b) it is certified by the High Court that the question of law to which its decision relates either is one of general public importance or is one which for some other special reason should be considered by the Court of Appeal ...'

[8] In Pioneer Shipping Ltd v BTP Tioxide Ltd, The Nema [1981] 2 All ER 1030, [1982] AC 724 the House of Lords gave guidance as to the circumstances in which permission to appeal to the High Court from the decision of an arbitrator should be given. In relation to the construction of a 'one-off' clause, permission should not be given unless, in the opinion of the court, the arbitrator was obviously wrong. In dealing with the approach to standard clauses, Lord Diplock said ([1981] 2 All ER 1030 at 1040, [1982] AC 724 at 743):

'For reasons already sufficiently discussed, rather less strict criteria are in my view appropriate where questions of construction of contracts in standard terms are concerned. That there should be as high a degree of legal certainty as it is practicable to obtain as to how such terms apply on the a occurrence of events of a kind that it is not unlikely may reproduce themselves in similar transactions between other parties engaged in the same trade is a public interest that is recognised by the 1979 Act, particularly in s 4. So, if the decision of the question of construction in the circumstances of the particular case would add significantly to the clarity and certainty of English commercial law it would be proper to give leave in a case sufficiently substantial to escape the ban imposed by the first part of s 1(4), bearing in mind always that a superabundance of citable judicial decisions arising out of slightly different facts is calculated to hinder rather than to promote clarity in settled principles of commercial law. But leave should not be given, even in such a case, unless the judge considered that a strong prima facie case had been made out that the arbitrator had been wrong in his construction; and when the events to which the standard clause fell to be applied in the particular arbitration were themselves one-off events stricter criteria should be applied on the same lines as those that I have suggested as appropriate to one-off clauses.'

d [9] Three years later, Lord Diplock had occasion to revert to this topic in Antaios Cia Naviera SA v Salen Rederierna AB, The Antaios [1984] 3 All ER 229 at 235, [1985] AC 191 at 203–204:

e 'My Lords, I think that your Lordships should take this opportunity of affirming that the guideline given in The Nema [1981] 2 All ER 1030 at 1040, [1982] AC 724 at 743 that, even in a case that turns on the construction of a standard term, "leave should not be given ... unless the judge considered that a strong prima facie case had been made out that the arbitrator had been wrong in his construction" applies even though there may be dicta in other reported cases at first instance which suggest that on some question of the construction of that standard term there may among commercial judges be two schools of thought. I am confining myself to conflicting dicta, not decisions. If there are conflicting decisions, the judge should give leave to appeal to the High Court, and whatever judge hears the appeal should in accordance with the decision that he favours give leave to appeal from his decision to the Court of Appeal with the appropriate certificate under s 1(7) as to the general public importance of the question to which it relates; for only thus can be attained that desirable degree of certainty in English commercial law which s 1(4) of the 1979 Act was designed to preserve.'

[10] Section 69 of the 1996 Act has replaced the Nema guidelines with statutory criteria, as follows:

h '(1) Unless otherwise agreed by the parties, a party to arbitral proceedings may (upon notice to the other parties and to the tribunal) appeal to the court on a question of law arising out of an award made in the proceedings ...

(2) An appeal shall not be brought under this section except—(a) with the agreement of all the other parties to the proceedings, or (b) with the leave of the court ...

j (3) Leave to appeal shall be given only if the court is satisfied—(a) that the determination of the question will substantially affect the rights of one or more of the parties, (b) that the question is one which the tribunal was asked to determine, (c) that, on the basis of the findings of fact in the award—(i) the decision of the tribunal on the question is obviously wrong, or (ii) the question is one of general public importance and the decision of the tribunal is at least open to serious doubt, and (d) that, despite the agreement of the parties to resolve the matter by arbitration, it is just and proper in all the circumstances for the court to determine the question. a

(4) An application for leave to appeal under this section shall identify the question of law to be determined and state the grounds on which it is alleged that leave to appeal should be granted.

(5) The court shall determine an application for leave to appeal under this section without a hearing unless it appears to the court that a hearing is required. b

(6) The leave of the court is required for any appeal from a decision of the court under this section to grant or refuse leave to appeal.'

[11] The statutory criteria are clearly strongly influenced by the Nema guidelines. They do not, however, follow these entirely. We have concluded that they open the door a little more widely to the granting of permission to appeal than the crack that was left by Lord Diplock. We shall elaborate on this conclusion later in this judgment. c

[12] Section 69(6) reproduces, in effect, s 1(6A) of the 1979 Act, which provided: d

'Unless the High Court gives leave, no appeal shall lie to the Court of Appeal from a decision of the High Court—(a) to grant or refuse leave under subsection (3)(b) ...'

Lord Diplock, in a speech with which the other members of the House concurred, considered the principles to be applied under this subsection in The Antaios ([1984] 3 All ER 229 at 236–237, [1985] AC 191 at 205): e

'... leave to appeal to the Court of Appeal should be granted by the judge under s 1(6A) only in cases where a decision whether to grant or to refuse leave to appeal to the High Court under s 1(3)(b) in the particular case in his view called for some amplification, elucidation or adaptation to changing practices of existing guidelines laid down by appellate courts, and that leave to appeal under s 1(6A) should not be granted in any other type of case. Judges should have the courage of their own convictions and decide for themselves whether, applying existing guidelines, leave to appeal to the High Court under s 1(3)(b) ought to be granted or not. In the sole type of case in which leave to appeal to the Court of Appeal under s 1(6A) may properly be given the judge ought to give reasons for his decision to grant such leave so that the Court of Appeal may be informed of the lacuna, uncertainty or unsuitability in the light of changing practices that the judge has perceived in the existing guidelines; moreover, since the grant of leave entails also the necessity for the application of Edwards (Inspector of Taxes) v Bairstow [1955] 3 All ER 48, [1956] AC 14 principles by the Court of Appeal in order to examine whether the judge had acted within the limits of his discretion, the judge should also give the reasons for the way in which he had exercised his discretion.' f
g
h
i

[13] Nothing in s 69 of the 1996 Act affords any grounds for departing from these principles. On the contrary, the fact that, as we have indicated, s 69 opens a little more widely the door to granting permission to appeal from the award of an arbitrator is all the more reason why the judge's decision on the application for such permission should be final.

DID TOMLINSON J APPLY THE CORRECT PRINCIPLES WHEN GRANTING PERMISSION TO APPEAL TO THIS COURT?

[14] Tomlinson J refused the charterers' application for permission to appeal to the Commercial Court because he was firmly of the view that the statutory criteria set out in s 69(3) of the 1996 Act precluded the grant of permission. He did so notwithstanding that he had identified issues in relation to the proper construction of a standard war cancellation clause, such as cl 31, that were 'obviously of general public importance'. In granting permission to appeal to this court in relation to his decision he explained why he did so:

'However, on the issues relating to the war cancellation clause, I grant leave to appeal from my decision pursuant to s 69(6) of the 1996 Act, in order that the Court of Appeal may consider whether I have misapplied the statutory criteria or have approached them inappropriately inflexibly given the general public importance of the underlying question of the proper approach to the construction of a standard war cancellation clause, and, if it thinks it appropriate, give guidance.'

[15] The observations of Lord Diplock in The Antaios, which we have set out in [12], above, fall to be applied, subject to this qualification. The guidelines are no longer judge-made—they are statutory criteria. There is no scope for amplifying or adapting them in the light of changing practices. To the extent that there is scope for elucidation as to the manner of their application, it may be appropriate to grant permission to appeal. Subject to this, if the judge decides that the statutory criteria for granting permission to appeal are not satisfied, he should not grant permission to appeal against that decision. His decision on the merits of the application for permission to appeal should be final.

[16] Tomlinson J did not identify any uncertainty as to the manner in which the statutory criteria should be applied. It was his clear view that they precluded the grant of permission to appeal. He did not point to any uncertainty in the criteria. He did not suggest any respect in which he might have misapplied the criteria. We detect that he hoped that this court might find a way to ease the rigorous restriction that the criteria impose on review by the Commercial Court of important issues of law arising in arbitrations. Lord Diplock would not, we think, have approved the grant of permission to appeal for such a motive and nor do we. We shall, however, take advantage in due course of the opportunity to consider the extent to which some of Lord Diplock's observations in The Antaios can be reconciled with the statutory criteria.

SOME COMMENTS ON PROCEDURE

[17] Before considering the principles applied by Tomlinson J we wish to say a word about the procedure adopted in this case. In accordance with sub-ss 4 and 5 of s 69 the charterers applied in writing for permission to appeal. The claim form in which they did so set out clearly and concisely, albeit over ten pages, their grounds of appeal. This claim form was accompanied by a witness statement from Mr Deering, the charterers' solicitor. This included three detailed pages of 'background to the dispute' for the alleged purpose of satisfying Tomlinson J that determination of the questions in issue would substantially affect the rights of the parties—see s 69(3)(a). This was unnecessary and inappropriate. The rights of the parties are those at issue in the arbitration and s 69(3)(a) is designed to ensure that permission to appeal will not be given in relation to issues which have no substantial impact on those rights. What appears to have been a lengthy plea 'ad misericordiam' as to the charterers' financial plight was uncalled for. a [18] Exhibited to Mr Deering's statement were 137 pages of exhibits, which included not merely the award but a considerable volume of background material, including the charterers' skeleton argument at the arbitration (45 pages).

[19] Mr Leir of the owners' solicitors responded with 28 pages of argument against the grant of permission to appeal. Mr Deering felt it necessary to respond to this with a further 13 pages, including the assertion that his clients were not aware of their right to cancel the charters until two days before they did so—a statement which raises a number of questions but which, so it seems to us, was not likely to be of any assistance to Tomlinson J. b

[20] In North Range Shipping Ltd v Seatrans Shipping Corp [2002] EWCA Civ 405, [2002] 2 All ER (Comm) 193, [2002] 1 WLR 2397 this court held that a judge, when refusing permission to appeal under s 69 of the 1996 Act, was required by virtue of art 6 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998) to give sufficient reasons to enable the losing party to understand why the judge had reached his decision, although the court emphasised that such reasons could be very short. To this extent Lord Diplock's guidance in The Antaios is no longer followed. c

[21] Tomlinson J, in refusing permission to appeal, gave very adequate reasons for his decision in two-and-a-half closely typed pages, which were faxed to the parties on 13 June 2002. On 20 June the charterers' solicitors faxed to the judge a three-page 'application for further consideration', joining issue with some of the judge's conclusions. Not surprisingly, this provoked a three-page riposte from the owners' solicitors, to which the charterers' solicitors responded. d

[22] Because his order refusing permission to appeal had not yet been drawn up, the judge considered it appropriate to consider this correspondence. He commented: e

'I cannot think that the Court of Appeal envisaged that the giving of reasons should lead to a potentially never-ending process in which it is suggested that, for one reason, or another, the judge's decision is wrong. In the ordinary way the proper forum in which to debate the question whether a first instance judge has made an incorrect decision is in the Court of Appeal, not by way of application to the judge to reconsider his decision. I would accept that there may be cases in which it may be appropriate to draw to the attention of the court that it has apparently proceeded upon a misapprehension or otherwise failed to have regard to a relevant consideration. I do not however accept that the present is such a case.' f

[23] We sympathise with the judge's comments. More fundamentally, we view the whole saga that we have just described with dismay. The statutory requirement that applications for permission to appeal should be paper applications unless the court otherwise directs must surely have been intended to simplify the procedure and to save the court's time. That requirement reflects the fact that the criteria for the grant of permission to appeal are clear-cut and easy to apply. They do not require the drawing of fine lines, nor will they usually give much scope for the court to require assistance in the form of submissions or advocacy. If this case reflects current practice, and we apprehend that it may, then the procedure has got out of hand and is at odds with both the spirit of the legislation and the ethos of the Commercial Court. Any written submissions g a placed before the court in support of an application for permission to appeal from findings in an arbitral award should normally be capable of being read and digested by the judge within the half-hour that, under the old regime, used to be allotted for such applications.

h

j

DID TOMLINSON J APPLY THE CORRECT PRINCIPLES WHEN REFUSING PERMISSION TO APPEAL AGAINST THE ARBITRATORS' AWARD?

b [24] For an appeal against the award to succeed, the charterers would have to reverse three separate findings of the arbitrators in relation to cl 31 of the charterparty: (1) that operations in Kosovo were not 'war'; (2) that Germany was not 'involved'; and (3) that the charterers had been required to give notice of cancellation within a reasonable time and had failed to do so.

c [25] In his reasons for refusing permission to appeal, Tomlinson J observed that the first two issues involved mixed fact and law and that the proper approach to the construction of clauses such as cl 31 was a question of general public importance. He did not, expressly, consider whether the majority decision of the tribunal on these two issues was at least open to serious doubt. This was perhaps d because even if there were grounds for challenge in relation to these two issues, such challenge would not affect the result, or the rights of the parties, unless the unanimous decision of the arbitrators on the third issue could be attacked. As to that issue, the challenge that the charterers sought to bring was to the finding of the arbitrators that, as a matter of law, the charterers had to exercise any right to cancel that they enjoyed within a reasonable time.

e [26] Tomlinson J held that this challenge was not open to the charterers because the question was not 'one which the tribunal was asked to determine': see s 69(3)(b). He further held that there were alternative bases upon which the time that elapsed before the charterers gave notice of cancellation might have been relevant: (1) implied term, (2) waiver/election and estoppel. These latter f alternatives were not explored before the arbitrators. As we understand his judgment, it was because questions of waiver/election and estoppel were not explored before the arbitrators that Tomlinson J concluded that it was not open to the charterers to challenge the arbitrators' finding that, by reason of an implied term, notice of cancellation had to be given within a reasonable time.

g [27] Given Tomlinson J's conclusion that the arbitrators were not asked to determine the critical question his decision that the application for permission to appeal must be refused was inevitable. He applied the correct principles, as laid down by s 69(3). Whether the manner of his application of those principles is open to attack remains to be considered.

h DID TOMLINSON J CORRECTLY APPLY THE PRINCIPLES GOVERNING PERMISSION TO APPEAL FROM AN ARBITRATION AWARD?

j [28] In Antaios Cia Naviera SA v Salen Rederierna AB, The Antaios [1984] 3 All ER 229, [1985] AC 191 Lord Diplock observed, in the passage that we have quoted at [12], above, that in performing the task which confronts us, the Court of Appeal had to apply Edwards (Inspector of Taxes) v Bairstow [1955] 3 All ER 48, [1956] AC 14 in order to decide 'whether the judge had acted within the limits of his discretion'. This demonstrates that our task is essentially one of judicial review. In so far as Tomlinson J has made findings of law, we can review them. In so far as he has made findings of fact, or exercised a discretion, the familiar Wednesbury test falls to be applied (Associated Provincial Picture Houses Ltd v Wednesbury Corp [1947] 2 All ER 680, [1948] 1 KB 223).

‘THE QUESTION IS ONE THAT THE ARBITRATORS WERE ASKED TO DETERMINE’

[29] Section 69(3)(b) is an addition to the Nema guidelines, resolving a difference of view between the Commercial Court and the Court of Appeal in Petraco (Bermuda) Ltd v Petromed International SA [1988] 3 All ER 454, [1988] 1 WLR 896. In his decision giving permission to appeal to this court, Tomlinson J commented ‘the critical question was not even raised faintly’. On behalf of the charterers, Miss Hopkins challenged this finding. It is first necessary to identify what Tomlinson J considered to be ‘the critical question’.

[30] The issues that we have set out in [6], above, were four of seven issues that the charterers identified in their claim form in order to comply with s 69(4) of the 1996 Act. On analysis, we consider that the ‘critical question’ identified by Tomlinson J was issue (iii). We so find having regard to the following passage from his reasons for refusing permission to appeal:

‘I do not believe that it would be a proper exercise of my statutory discretion to give leave to appeal in circumstances where the arbitrators have unanimously concluded that any right to cancel which the charterers may have enjoyed was not exercised within a reasonable time and was thus lost. The applicants recognise that even were they successful on all issues relating to the war cancellation clause, there would have to be a remission to the arbitrators for them to consider whether CMA had waived or had elected not to exercise the option to cancel, that being a question which they had not been asked to determine at the hearing. The arbitrators find that CMA would have known of and been able to assess the well-publicised events within a few days. CMA adduced no evidence to lay a foundation for an argument that they could not be taken to have waived or elected not to exercise the option to cancel because they were unaware of the existence of that right, and they seem at the hearing to have argued only very faintly against the necessity to imply a term that the right must be exercised within a reasonable time. What was described by their counsel as “the more interesting question” was the nature of the term, a reflection of the debate whether the term should be formulated such that the right of cancellation is to be exercised within a reasonable time or before such lapse of time as would make the other party think that the right would not be exercised. That strikes me as an arid debate since I cannot think that the formulation of the term in these different ways can lead to a different outcome, and it would appear that CMA’s counsel came close to accepting this when he suggested that the latter, “Davenport” formulation [Brian Davenport QC and Michele White ‘Last voyage orders – again: The Gregos’ [1994] Lloyd’s MCLQ 154], encapsulates the test for determining what is a reasonable time. Another way of putting the same point is that if within a reasonable time within which to ascertain that war had broken out and within which to decide the question whether, seeing that war had broken out, it was in their interests to continue to implement the contract or not, one party does not give to the other notice of cancellation, the other party is entitled to conclude that the existence of the war will not be relied upon as giving rise to the right to cancel. The short point is therefore that the arbitrators were not asked to analyse the matter in terms of waiver/election and evidence was not deployed before them concerning CMA’s awareness or lack of awareness as to the existence of a right to cancel. The resolution of the question in fact left to the arbitrators was an objective determination of fact peculiarly within the province of the arbitrators. I conclude that it is inappropriate to give

- a leave to appeal on the issues arising out of the war cancellation clause. The questions raised are either questions the determination of which will not substantially affect the rights of one or more of the parties or are questions which the tribunal was not asked to determine.'

[31] Miss Hopkins' submissions on this point can be summarised as follows:

- b (1) the arbitrators had held that cl 31 was subject to an implied condition that the right to cancel had to be exercised within a reasonable time of its accrual; (2) the charterers had challenged before the arbitrators the existence of this implied condition; (3) it followed that the question of whether there was an implied term was one which 'the tribunal was asked to determine'; (4) it was the charterers' case that mere inaction would not constitute an election, estoppel or waiver, however long it continued; (5) it was for the owners, not the charterers, to raise any averments of estoppel, waiver or election. They had not done so.

- c [32] In support of her submission that the question of an implied term was before the arbitrators, Miss Hopkins relied upon: (i) 'The charterers' skeleton argument at the arbitration. This included in the issues to be determined: 'Did the option have to be exercised within any particular time? If so, did CMA exercise it within time?' The answer to these issues, suggested by the skeleton, was: 'It is not necessary to imply a term limiting the time during which the option has to be exercised. Wars wax and wane and are unpredictable'. (ii) A passage of discussion between the charterers' counsel and Sir Christopher Staughton in the course of the former's submissions:

- e 'Mr Haddon-Cave: Question 3 on p 7, did the option have to be exercised within a reasonable time and if so was it exercised within a reasonable time? And his estoppel point. I see the force on why it might be thought that there was an implied term, but it's not necessarily so because, as Mr Hamilton pointed out yesterday, the character of the war changes and you may wish
- f at some stage in the war to exercise the option, you may not.

Sir Christopher Staughton: Are you allowed to wait and see what sort of war it is going to be?

Mr Haddon-Cave: There is no reason why the parties could not have intended that to be the case.

- g Sir Christopher Staughton: If it's established that you have to exercise the option within a reasonable time, why should you be allowed a licence to decide what's a reasonable time for you?

- h Mr Haddon-Cave: That's the issue—is it necessary to imply a term? I quite see the force of that point as an option; I don't argue the point terribly forcefully, there is an authority to that effect, so I don't dwell on it or accept it. The more interesting question, perhaps, is what is the nature of that term, and I suggest that it is as Mr Davenport suggests on p 160 of his article, that the option probably has to be exercised before such time has elapsed that will leave the other party to think that no notice of termination was going to be exercised.'

- j (iii) The charterers' written closing argument, which simply repeated the matters in their skeleton argument to which we have referred at (i), above.

[33] In their award the arbitrators made the following finding:

'An option to cancel a charterparty in the event of war must be exercised within a reasonable time of the event in question. In Re An Arbitration between Kawasaki Kisen Kaisha Ltd and Belships Co Ltd, Skibsakjeselskap

[1939] 2 All ER 108, Branson J said, in respect of the Japan/China war (at 183):
“... the charterers and the shipowners would be entitled here to a reasonable time within which to ascertain that war had broken out, and within which to consider and decide the question whether or not, seeing that war had broken out, they thought it was in their interest to continue to implement the contract.”

[34] We consider that in making this finding the arbitrators were determining a question which they had been ‘asked to determine’. It is true that Mr Haddon-Cave QC had virtually conceded the point, but we consider that he did enough to prevent being shut out under s 69(3)(b) from seeking to appeal against the arbitrators’ finding on the point.

[35] No doubt because Mr Haddon-Cave challenged the implication of a term so faintly, no questions of election, waiver or estoppel appear to have been explored at the arbitration, although the cryptic statement ‘and his estoppel point’ in the passage that we have quoted at 32, above, suggests that estoppel may have received at least a passing reference in the submissions made on behalf of the owners. In these circumstances, we do not consider that the fact that issues of election, waiver or estoppel were not explored is a bar, by virtue of s 69(3)(b), to the grant of permission to appeal issue (iii) set out at [6], above.

[36] All of this leads us to conclude, not without hesitation, that, in so far as Tomlinson J’s refusal of permission to appeal was founded on s 69(3)(b), it was not well founded. None the less, if the charterers had intended to make a serious challenge to the implication of a term, we consider that they should have laid the ground for this more thoroughly. It may well be that Mr Haddon-Cave concluded that the arbitrators would feel obliged, or inclined, to follow Re An Arbitration between Kawasaki Kisen Kaishiki Kaisha and Belships Co Ltd, Skibsaksjeselskap [1939] 2 All ER 108. None the less we think that it would have been open to him to urge them strenuously not to do so in the light of subsequent developments in the law, so as to make it plain that this was a live issue and one that would, if necessary, form the basis of a challenge before the Commercial Court. Had he done so, this would almost undoubtedly have been met with alternative allegations of election, waiver and estoppel, and these matters would have been explored. As it is, were the charterers to be given permission to appeal to the Commercial Court and there to succeed on the ground that the arbitrators were wrong to find an implied term and that issues of election, waiver and estoppel remained to be resolved, the matter would have to be remitted to the arbitrators for further consideration. This fact would, in our opinion, have justified Tomlinson J in declining to give permission to appeal on the ground that s 69(3)(d) was not satisfied. There were, however, other considerations that, in our opinion, justified the judge in refusing permission to appeal.

[37] Before he could grant permission to appeal s 69 required that the judge should find (1) that the decision of the arbitrators on the existence of an implied term was obviously wrong or that the point was one of general public importance and that the decision of the arbitrators was at least open to serious doubt and (2) that reversing the decision of the arbitrators on the point would substantially affect the rights of one or more of the parties. We turn to consider these criteria.

WAS THE DECISION OF THE ARBITRATORS THAT THERE WAS AN IMPLIED TERM OBVIOUSLY WRONG?

[38] As we shall show shortly, there is scope for argument as to whether the arbitrators were correct in finding that cl 31 was subject to an implied term that a the right to cancel had to be exercised within a reasonable time, but it cannot be said that the arbitrators were obviously wrong to follow the decision in the Belships case, and Miss Hopkins did not submit to the contrary.

WAS THE DECISION OF THE ARBITRATORS THAT THERE WAS AN IMPLIED TERM OPEN TO SERIOUS DOUBT?

b [39] The Belships case, which the arbitrators followed, concerned a clause in a charterparty which gave owners and charterers the option of cancelling the charterparty if one of a number of specified countries became 'engaged in war' with any other of those countries. It was submitted to Branson J that, so long as a state of war continued, the option given by this clause remained open. He rejected that submission. He held that there was a term to be implied that the c option would have to be exercised within a reasonable time. In so finding he applied the test of whether, as a matter of business efficacy, it was necessary to imply such a term.

[40] Cases dealing with the operation of war cancellation clauses are rare. More common are cases dealing with the right to withdraw a vessel from a charterparty for non-payment of hire. Those cases all agree that such a right has d to be exercised within a reasonable time of the non-payment, but they do not agree on the juridical basis for such a requirement. As an alternative to an implied term, principles of election, waiver and estoppel have been advanced as the explanation. These principles can raise difficult theoretical questions as to the manner of their application—see Scandinavian Trading Tanker Co AB v Flota Petrolera e Ecuatoriana, The Scaptrade [1981] 2 Lloyd's Rep 425 at 430, although they do not appear to have done so in practice. We believe that there is a good reason for this, as we shall explain. Having regard to the different theories to which we have referred above, it is at least arguable that there is a serious doubt as to whether the juridical basis of the requirement to exercise a right to withdraw from a charter within a reasonable time is an implied term. For the reasons which follow f we do not need to express a final view on this matter.

DOES IT MATTER?

[41] Is the question of whether the arbitrators were right to follow the Belships case in implying a term 'a question of general public importance'? If they were wrong, will this 'substantially affect the rights' of the parties? Miss Hopkins g submits that the answer to both questions is Yes. This is because it is her case that the mere passage of time will not give rise to the implication of an election or a waiver or to an estoppel. Thus, she argues, it is only the implication of a term that can give rise to a requirement to give notice of cancellation within a reasonable time.

h [42] Miss Hopkins' submission echoes one which was advanced in The Antaios. Indeed, there are close parallels between this case and The Antaios which it is helpful to identify before proceeding further. In the present case there were two relevant issues before the arbitrators. The first was as to the true construction of the war cancellation clause in the NYPE charter. We shall call this issue 'the j construction issue'. The second was as to whether the right to cancel the charter had been lost as a result of the passage of time. We shall call this issue 'the time issue'.

[43] The Antaios also involved a purported cancellation of a time charter on the NYPE form. In that case it was the owners who had purported to terminate the charter by withdrawing their vessel. They relied upon cl 5, which provided 'on any breach of this charterparty owners shall be at liberty to withdraw the vessel ...'

There was an issue as to whether the words 'any breach' meant 'any breach at all' or 'any repudiatory breach'. We shall call this 'the construction issue'. The arbitrators held that the words meant 'any repudiatory breach', that the breach relied upon by the owners was not repudiatory and that, therefore, the owners had had no right to withdraw the vessel.

[44] Owners in The Antaios learned of the breach by the charterers on 7 May 1980 but did not purport to withdraw their vessel until 20 May. There was an issue as to whether this period of delay had resulted in the loss by the owners of their right (if right there was) to withdraw the vessel. We shall call this issue 'the time issue'. The arbitrators held in favour of the charterers on this issue also. The time issue in The Antaios raised precisely the same questions as the time issue in the present case. We turn to consider the treatment of those questions in The Antaios.

[45] An application for permission to appeal pursuant to the 1979 Act was made to Staughton J, and the decision of the arbitrators on the time issue can be deduced from the report of his judgment (see [1983] 2 Lloyd's Rep 473). The arbitrators held that there was an implied term that the right to withdraw would be exercised within a reasonable time. A reasonable time would have been two days, and certainly not as long as 13 days, and thus any right to withdraw was lost. The arbitrators also held, however, that there was no conduct on the part of the owners that amounted to affirmation or election during that 13-day period.

[46] In seeking permission to appeal to the Commercial Court, counsel for the owners argued that the arbitrators had been wrong to imply a term. The right to withdraw would only have been lost by waiver, and on the arbitrators' findings there had been no waiver. Staughton J examined the authorities and concluded that they demonstrated quite clearly 'that lapse of a reasonable time does deprive the owner of the right to withdraw' (see [1983] 2 Lloyd's Rep 473 at 475). He went on to hold that what mattered was the arbitrators' conclusion that the right to withdraw was lost, not the manner in which they described that right. Once they had found as a fact that a reasonable time had expired, their conclusion was inevitable.

[47] So far as the construction issue was concerned, Staughton J observed that the arbitrators' finding was at odds with one, if not two, expressions of view by commercial judges. Had that been the only issue he would have been minded to give permission to appeal. As, however, he considered that the arbitrators' conclusion on the time issue was correct, and this was determinative of the result, permission to appeal would be refused. Subsequently Staughton J gave permission to appeal against his decision for the sole purpose of permitting the Court of Appeal to consider whether his approach had been correct in principle.

[48] The Court of Appeal ([1983] 3 All ER 777, [1983] 1 WLR 1362) were unanimous in holding that Staughton J had acted correctly in principle in giving permission to appeal to the Court of Appeal against his own decision. By a majority they held that his decision to refuse permission to appeal to the Commercial Court against the award of the arbitrators was also correct. They did so on the basis that the arbitrators had correctly held that the owners had to exercise their right (if right they had) to withdraw the vessel within a reasonable time and that, whatever the juridical basis for this requirement, the arbitrators' findings that a reasonable time had elapsed was inviolable.

[49] The following are the material passages in the leading judgment of Sir John Donaldson MR ([1983] 3 All ER 777 at 782–784, [1983] 1 WLR 1362 at 1370–1371):

- a* 'I now turn to the substance of the appeal. In Mardorf Peach & Co Ltd v Attica Sea Carriers Corp of Liberia, The Laconia [1977] 1 All ER 545, [1977] AC 850 Lord Wilberforce, with the agreement of Lord Salmon, said, obiter, that notice of withdrawal must be given within a reasonable time after the default and that what is a reasonable time is essentially a matter for the arbitrators. As a general proposition this is hardly open to challenge, but somewhat
- b* different views have been expressed on why this should be the case. Two theories in particular have been aired, namely that the rule stems from an implied term of the contract or that delay in exercising the right will amount to waiver or create an estoppel. In the present case the owners knew of the default on 7 May 1980 and indicated to the charterers that any delay in withdrawing the vessel would be without prejudice to their right to do so.
- c* The arbitrators took the view that such an indication prevented the owners' conduct amounting to a waiver of their rights of creating any estoppel. However, they espoused the implied term explanation for the legal result declared in The Laconia and held that the owners had lost any right to withdraw the vessel ... I know of no authority for the proposition, and I do
- d* not think that I have ever heard it suggested before, that a shipowner can extend the time for reaching a decision whether or not to withdraw beyond what is reasonable in all the circumstances by the simple device of announcing that his failure to decide is without prejudice to his rights ... If counsel for the owners is right, and the owner can extend his option to withdraw the vessel in this way, chaos would result. Ships would be hove to
- e* at sea or tied up in port, no one knowing whether they were going to perform the chartered service. Counsel for the owners answers this by saying that when the next hire comes due, or when the owner has to accept or reject instructions from the charterers, he will have to make up his mind. I am not sure that this is necessarily so, because if counsel is right I do not see
- f* why he should not continue to perform the charterparty in all respects while at the same time proclaiming that none of this was to be taken as being an election to affirm the contract. So far as accepting payment of hire is concerned, if this must inevitably amount to an affirmation of the contract, it must be remembered that hire is sometimes paid only monthly. An interval of nearly a month before the owners could be forced to elect would
- g* be wholly unacceptable commercially. This is not to say that a declaration such as was made by the owners in this case can never have any effect. As Lloyd J pointed out in The Scaptrade ([1981] 2 Lloyd's Rep 425 at 430), what time is reasonable may well be affected by matters known only to the owners. Being in ignorance of these matters, charterers might reasonably
- h* conclude after x days that the owners were not going to withdraw the vessel and in such circumstances I can well understand it being held that the owners had waived their right to withdraw or were estopped from asserting it. If on the other hand the owners made their problems known to the charterers or indicated that they were not abandoning their rights, they may thereby
- j* retain their right of withdrawal for a longer period than x days, being such period as was reasonable in all the circumstances, including the special problems which were afflicting them. Thus waiver or an implied term are not alternatives. The implied term may well set a limit on the owners' rights and waiver may cut down those rights, but the concept of waiver is only appropriate where the person "waiving" is giving up some right. In the instant appeal the owners are contending that by "waiver" they acquired something which they would not otherwise have had, namely a right to withdraw the vessel after the expiry of a reasonable time.’

[50] In concurring with the result proposed by Sir John Donaldson MR, Fox LJ held, on the authority of Mardorf Peach & Co Ltd v Attica Sea Carriers Corp of Liberia, The Laconia [1977] 1 All ER 545, [1977] AC 850, that there was no doubt as to the existence of the rule that a right to withdraw must be exercised within a reasonable time. He continued ([1983] 3 All ER 777 at 788, [1983] 1 WLR 1362 at 1376–1377):

‘I do not think that the fact that doubt or dispute exists as to the basis of the rule is, by itself, a sufficient reason for giving leave to appeal to the High Court. If the decision was probably right, whatever the basis of the rule, it was proper to refuse leave ... I turn then to consider what would be the consequence in this case of a resolution of the question of the basis of the rule as stated by Lord Wilberforce in The Laconia. Resolution in favour of the implied term theory would leave matters as they are since the arbitrators proceeded upon that basis. The question, therefore, is what would be the consequence of resolution in favour of the “election” theory. As I understand the reasons of the arbitrators, the only materiality of the “election” basis is that, if it be right, the fact that the owners indicated that the delay after 7 May would be without prejudice to their right to terminate demonstrated that there was no election by the owners to affirm the contract. I cannot see how the mere unilateral assertion of the owners that delay after 7 May was to be without prejudice to their rights can affect the matter. If the owners can do that, the rule, whatever its basis, is largely useless. I can see that there might be circumstances in which the owners could not reasonably be expected to make up their mind at once and that if they bring that to the notice of the charterers (who might not otherwise be aware of it) they could reserve their position. That, however, is a quite different matter and goes generally to the question of reasonableness. I would suppose that the question of reasonableness must be determined in the light of all the circumstances. One does not look at it exclusively from the point of view of either side. But, be that as it may, if the owners’ right to withdraw must be exercised within a reasonable time I do not see how they can extend the “reasonable time” simply by their own choice; though they could no doubt extinguish or reduce their rights by waiver. Apart from the “without prejudice” point, the arbitrators, as I read the reasons, do not suggest that the juridical basis of the rule would have affected their finding of fact on the question of reasonable time and I do not think it would.’

[51] In the House of Lords Lord Diplock gave the following endorsement to the decision of Staughton J and the majority of the Court of Appeal in a short passage ([1984] 3 All ER 229 at 234, [1985] AC 191 at 201–202):

‘Staughton J, however, indicated that but for the “reasonable time” point he would have been strongly minded to give leave to appeal on the construction of the NYPE withdrawal clause since this was in a standard form which is widely used and conflicting judicial dicta are to be found as to the meaning which the arbitrators had ascribed to the expression “any breach of this Charter Party” appearing in the clause. Staughton J, however, noted in his reasons for refusing leave that, while there were alternative jurisprudential concepts from which the requirement that notice of a withdrawal should be given within a reasonable time might be derived, ie “implied term” of the contract and “waiver”, both of which concepts had been referred to indifferently by Lord Wilberforce in Mardorf Peach & Co Ltd v Attica Sea Carriers Corp of Liberia, The Laconia [1977] 1 All ER 545, [1977] AC 850 (a case which dealt only with withdrawal in default of punctual and regular payment of the hire), whichever concept were applied to the facts of the instant case it would lead to the same result; and although the arbitrators had plumped for “implied term” and excluded “waiver”, the grounds which they said precluded the existence of waiver were in the view of Staughton J and of the majority of the Court of Appeal (which is also shared by me) quite manifestly wrong.

c As the other members of the House of Lords agreed with Lord Diplock’s speech, this passage would seem to determine that principles of waiver are capable of resulting in the loss of a right to withdraw from a charter through effluxion of time alone.

d [52] The passages that we have just quoted do not afford much assistance to identifying (1) how it is that the doctrines of election, waiver and estoppel are capable of producing a ‘rule’ that a right to avoid a charter must be exercised within a reasonable time, nor (2) to identifying the considerations that are relevant to determining what is a ‘reasonable time’ and whether these are the same when considering an implied term as when considering election, waiver and estoppel. Our own conclusions are as follows.

e [53] A time charterparty is a joint adventure. The shipowner provides the use of his ship in accordance with orders given by the charterer. The charterer pays hire for the services provided by the shipowner. The suggestion that such a charter may permit a prolonged period during which one or both of the parties remains at liberty to terminate the charter is in conflict with business efficacy, as f so forcefully demonstrated by Sir John Donaldson MR at [49], above. If circumstances arise giving rise to a right to terminate the charter business efficacy requires that the right be exercised promptly. If the shipowner continues to provide the services of his ship, or the charterer continues to make use of those services beyond such time as would reasonably be needed to react to those circumstances, the inference will normally be that he has decided not to exercise the right to terminate the charter. In such circumstances the principles of g election, waiver and estoppel will normally preclude the party in question from thereafter terminating the charter. Thus the requirements of business efficacy that justify the implication of a term that the right to withdraw be exercised within a reasonable time will normally produce the same result as a consequence h of the application of the principles of election, waiver, and estoppel.

[54] Principles of election, waiver and estoppel can, however, sometimes be difficult to apply. Miss Hopkins has demonstrated that to us by an attempt to rely upon the difficult case of Peyman v Lanjani [1984] 3 All ER 703, [1985] Ch 457, in support of the surprising submission that the charterers in this case could not lose j their right to cancel the charter until they received legal advice that they had such a right. The Antaios provides another example of those difficulties, for it was not clear to Ackner LJ, who dissented in the Court of Appeal, that the owners’ right to withdraw was barred by principles of election, waiver or estoppel. In the light of such potential difficulties, it seems to us that there is a strong case for the implication of the term found by Branson J in the Belships case. As we stated earlier, however, this is not a question which it is necessary for us to resolve.

[55] At the end of the day the question for us, applying the template of The Antaios, is whether, on the facts of this case, the decision of the arbitrators that the charterers were out of time for exercising a right to cancel the charter was 'open to serious doubt'. We are in no doubt that it was not. The following are our reasons. A delay in purporting to cancel the charterparty for over a month from the date of the events alleged to have given rise to the right to cancel was only consistent with a determination to continue with the charterparty despite those events. Had the arbitrators applied the principles of election, waiver and estoppel we are confident that they would have concluded that these precluded the right to cancel the charterparty after so long a period of delay. Thus the juridical basis upon which the arbitrators found that the right to cancel had to be exercised within a reasonable time did not impact upon their decision. a
b

[56] For these reasons we do not consider that determination of the question of whether the arbitrators were right to imply the term which they applied would substantially affect the rights of the parties. Nor do we consider that the question is one which is of general public importance. It follows that this appeal must be dismissed. c

[57] Thus, in order to resolve this appeal, it has not proved necessary to decide whether, if the construction issue had stood alone, it would have been open to Tomlinson J to have granted permission to appeal to the Commercial Court against the majority arbitrators' finding on that issue. This question raises, however, consideration of the extent to which the criteria in s 69 of the 1996 Act have departed from the Nema guidelines and this is a matter upon which we believe it would be helpful to give guidance. d
e

THE DEPARTURE FROM THE NEMA GUIDELINES

[58] In The Antaios Sir John Donaldson MR considered the question raised by Staughton J of whether, where the commercial judge had formed the view that the arbitrators were probably right, the fact that the Court of Appeal might take a different view was any ground for granting permission to appeal to the High Court. He answered this question ([1983] 3 All ER 777 at 782, [1983] 1 WLR 1362 at 1369–1370): f

'My answer to this question is that it is not if his appreciation that the Court of Appeal might take a different view has no more solid a basis than that this is in the nature of appellate courts and that if the Court of Appeal did take a different view and the parties were sufficiently persistent his own view might equally well be affirmed by the House of Lords. It is quite different if there are known to be differing schools of thought, each claiming their adherents amongst the judiciary, and the Court of Appeal, given the chance, might support either the school of thought to which the judge belongs or another school of thought. In such a case leave to appeal to the High Court should be given, provided that the resolution of the issue would substantially affect the rights of the parties (s 1(4) of the 1979 Act) and the case qualified for leave to appeal to the Court of Appeal under s 1(7) of the 1979 Act as no doubt it usually would. I add this additional qualification because there is no point in the judge giving leave when he has little doubt that the arbitrator is right and that, despite adversarial argument, he will affirm the award, unless he is also prepared to enable the Court of Appeal to resolve the conflict of judicial opinion.'

g
h
j

Fox LJ agreed with him ([1983] 3 All ER 777 at 788–789, [1983] 1 WLR 1362 at 1377–1378).

a [59] In [9], above, we have quoted what we have described as the gloss placed by Lord Diplock on his Nema guidelines. He went on to explain his reasons for differing from the views of Sir John Donaldson MR ([1984] 3 All ER 229 at 235–236, [1985] AC 191 at 204):

b 'Decisions are one thing; dicta are quite another. In the first place they are persuasive only, their persuasive strength depending on the professional reputation of the judge who voiced them. In the second place, the fact that there can only be found dicta but no conflicting decisions on the meaning of particular words or phrases appearing in the language used in a standard term in a commercial contract, especially if, like the NYPE withdrawal clause, it has been in common use for very many years, suggests either that

c a choice between the rival meanings of those particular words or phrases that are espoused by the conflicting dicta is not one which has been found in practice to have consequences of sufficient commercial importance to justify the cost of litigating the matter or that businessmen who enter into contracts containing that standard term share a common understanding as to what

d those particular words and phrases were intended by them to mean. It was strenuously urged on your Lordships that, wherever it could be shown by comparison of judicial dicta that there were two schools of thought among commercial judges on any question of construction of a standard term in a commercial contract, leave to appeal from an arbitral award which involved that question of construction would depend on which school of thought was

e the one to which the judge who heard the application adhered. Maybe it would; but it is in the very nature of judicial discretion that within the bounds of "reasonableness" in the wide Wednesbury sense of that term, one judge may exercise the discretion one way whereas another judge might have exercised it in another; it is not peculiar to s 1(3)(b). It follows that I do

f not agree with Sir John Donaldson MR where in the instant case he says that leave should be given under s 1(3)(b) to appeal to the High Court on a question of construction of a standard term on which it can be shown that there are two schools of thought among puisne judges where the conflict of judicial opinion appears in dicta only (see [1983] 3 All ER 777 at 782, [1983] 1 WLR 1362 at 1369–1370). This would not normally provide a reason for

g departing from the Nema guidelines which I have repeated earlier in this speech.'

[60] The reasoning in this passage would have precluded Tomlinson J from giving permission to appeal on the construction issue unless he had formed the view that the arbitrators' decision on that issue was probably wrong. We do not,

h however, consider that this part of the Nema guidelines survives the provisions of s 69. The criterion for granting permission to appeal in s 69(3)(c)(ii) is that the question should be one of general public importance and that the decision of the arbitrators should be at least open to serious doubt. These words impose a test which is broader than Lord Diplock's requirement that permission to appeal should not be given 'unless the judge considered that a strong prima facie case

j had been made out that the arbitrator had been wrong in his construction'. Section 69(3)(c)(ii) is consonant with the approach of Sir John Donaldson MR in The Antaios.

[61] The guideline of Lord Diplock which has been superseded by s 69(3)(c)(ii) was calculated to place a particularly severe restraint on the role of the Commercial Court and higher courts in resolving issues of commercial law of general public importance. This is because the likelihood of conflicting judicial decisions in relation to such issues, where they related to standard clauses in widely used charterparties containing arbitration clauses, was greatly reduced by the guideline itself. We consider that the facts of this case demonstrate that changing circumstances can raise issues of general public importance in relation to such clauses that are not covered by judicial decision. a

[62] The nature of international conflict has changed over the years. The changes underlie the construction issue. The reasoning of the majority arbitrators on this issue was as follows. (1) There is no technical meaning of the word 'war'. It must be construed in a commonsense way—see Kawasaki Kisen Kabushiki Kaisha of Kobe v Bantham Steamship Co Ltd [1939] 1 All ER 819 at 826, [1939] 2 KB 544 at 558–559. (2) 'War' is to be distinguished from 'warlike activities and hostilities short of war' dealt with in cl 23(a) of the charter. 'War' means a war between nation states. (3) A businessman applying common sense in the context of cl 31 would not regard the NATO operation in Kosovo as a war. (4) Members of NATO participating in a NATO operation are not 'involved' in the operation as a nation. b

[63] The minority arbitrator, Sir Christopher Staughton, thought that the majority arbitrators had asked the wrong question. They should have asked whether a businessman would have said that there was a war in Kosovo in March and April 1999, to which the answer would have been Yes. Germany, in his view, was 'involved' in the Kosovo conflict. c

[64] The difference of view between the experienced arbitrators in this case provides, of itself, ground for contending that the decision of the majority is 'at least open to serious doubt'. We conclude that, had it not been for the fact that the arbitrators' conclusion on the 'time' issue rendered the question academic, it would have been open to Tomlinson J, in accordance with s 69 of the 1996 Act, to follow his inclination and give permission to appeal. d

[65] For the reasons that we have given, this appeal will be dismissed. e

Appeal dismissed. f

Kate O'Hanlon Barrister.

[2003] EWCA Civ 511

25 MARCH, 9 APRIL 2003

a tribunal established by law – Human Rights Act 1998, Sch 1, Pt 1, art 6(1).

f art 6.

de facto judge of the High Court and his judgment therefore a judgment of the High Court (see [18], [24], [32], [40], below); Fawdry and Co (a firm) v Murfitt (Lord Chancellor intervening) [2003] OB 104 considered.

J by common law since the de facto doctrine validated the office of the judge rather than his acts. That doctrine matched the substantive content of the phrase ‘established by law’. It did not ratify the acts of usurpers or operate arbitrarily. It was limited, in effect, to the correction of mistakes of form rather than of substance. In those circumstances, the convention did not require the disqualification

a Article 6, so far as material, is set out at [26], below of a judge purely because his authority had not been formally established before he sat. It followed in the instant case that the judge had been a tribunal established by law. Accordingly, the appeal would be dismissed (see [32], [35], [36], [39], [40] below). a

Notes

For independent tribunals established by law, see 8(2) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 140. b

For the Human Rights Act 1998, Sch 1, Pt I, art 6, see 7 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2002 reissue) 554.

Cases referred to in judgment

A v B (a company) [2002] EWCA Civ 337, [2002] 2 All ER 545, [2002] 3 WLR 542. c Aldridge, Re (1897) 15 NZLR 361, NZ CA.

Fawdry and Co (a firm) v Murfitt (Lord Chancellor intervening) [2002] EWCA Civ 643, [2003] QB 104, [2002] 3 WLR 1354.

Locabail (UK) Ltd v Bayfield Properties Ltd [2000] 1 All ER 65, [2000] QB 451, [2000] 2 WLR 870, CA.

Manitoba Language Rights under the Manitoba Act 1870, Reference re (1985) 19 DLR (4th) 1, Canada SC. d

State v Carroll (1871) 38 Conn 449, Connecticut SC.

Sunday Times v UK (1979) 2 EHRR 245, [1979] ECHR 6538/74, ECt HR.

Zand v Austria (1978) 15 DR 70, E Com HR. e

Cases referred to in skeleton arguments

Abbot of Fountaine's case (1431) 9 H VI 33.

Adams v Adams (A-G intervening) [1970] 3 All ER 572, [1971] P 188, Div.

Bagot's Case (1469) YB 9 Edw 4.

Curtin v Barton (1893) 139 NY 505, NY CA.

De Cubber v Belgium (1984) 7 EHRR 236, [1984] ECHR 9186/80, E Ct HR. f

Delcourt v Belgium (1970) 1 EHRR 355, [1970] ECHR 2689/65, E Ct HR.

EE v Federal Republic of Germany App No 18889/91 (14 October 1992, unreported), E Com HR.

Gahan v Lafitte (1842) 3 Moo PCC 382, PC.

Golder v UK (1975) 1 EHRR 524, [1975] ECHR 4451/70, E Ct HR. g

Harris v Jays (1599) 4 Co Rep 30a, 76 ER 956.

Hodgetts v Baker (1890) 34 Sol Jo 584, Ch D.

Knowles v Luce (1579) Moore KB 109, 72 ER 473.

Medicaments and Related Classes of Goods (No 2), Re [2001] ICR 564, [2001] 1 WLR 700, CA. h

Pfeifer v Austria (1992) 14 EHRR 692, [1990] ECHR 11855/95, E Ct HR.

Porrett, Re [1891] 2 Ch 433, CA.

R v Bedford Level Corp (1805) 6 East 356, 102 ER 1323.

R v Gough [1993] 2 All ER 724, [1993] AC 646, [1993] 2 WLR 883, HL.

R v Sussex Justices, ex p McCarthy [1924] 1 KB 256, [1923] All ER Rep 233, DC. j

Sayers v Clarke Walker (a firm) [2002] EWCA Civ 645, [2002] 3 All ER 490, [2002] 1 WLR 3095, CA.

Stieringer v Germany App No 28899/95 (25 November 1996, unreported), E Com HR.

Stubbings v UK (1996) 1 BHRC 316, E Ct HR.

Tameside Metropolitan BC v Grant [2002] 3 FCR 238, [2002] Fam 194, [2002] 2 WLR 376.

Walker v UK (2000) 29 EHRR CD 276, E Ct HR.

- a Whitfield v A-G [1989] LRC (Const) 248, Bah SC.
Yorkshire Bank plc v Hall [1999] 1 All ER 879, [1999] 1 WLR 1713, CA.

Appéal

- b The claimant, Edgar John Coppard, appealed with permission of the Court of Appeal (Judge and Mummery LJ) granted on 5 November 2002 from the decision of Judge Richard Seymour QC in the Queen's Bench Division on 23 January 2001 ([2001] All ER (D) 148 (Jan)), awarding him nominal damages only in his proceedings for breach of contract against the defendant, the Customs and Excise Commissioners. The Lord Chancellor intervened in the appeal. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.
- c Duncan Macpherson (instructed by Johnson Sillett Bloom) for Mr Coppard.
Michael Patchett-Joyce (instructed by the Solicitor for Customs and Excise) for the commissioners.
Philip Sales (instructed by the Treasury Solicitor) for the Lord Chancellor.

Cur adv vult

- d 9 April 2003. The following judgment was delivered.

SEDLEY LJ.

[1] This is a judgment of the court.

- e THE ISSUE

[2] This appeal raises an issue of some constitutional importance. It can be framed without levity in the question: when is a judge not a judge?

- f [3] The facts giving rise to it can be shortly stated. Mr Coppard sued the Commissioners of Customs and Excise (the commissioners) in the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court for damages for breach of a contract which they had entered into with him for deferred payments of value added tax. The breach had resulted in the commissioners making him bankrupt, and they admitted liability for any damage it had caused. The case therefore went to trial on damages alone. It was listed for hearing before Judge Richard Seymour QC, who after a two-day hearing delivered a reserved judgment on 23 January 2001 ([2001] All ER (D) 148 (Jan)), finding against Mr Coppard on all substantive questions and awarding him nominal damages of £2 for the admitted breach. He refused permission to appeal, and were it not for subsequent developments the case would not have reached this court.

- g [4] What Mr Coppard subsequently discovered, however, was that Judge Seymour was not authorised to sit as a judge of the High Court. The office he held was that of circuit judge. In that capacity he was authorised by the Lord Chancellor, pursuant to s 68 of the Supreme Court Act 1981, to deal with what was known as Official Referees' business and is now the business of the Technology and Construction Court (TCC), a limb of the High Court; but that was all.

- j [5] The Lord Chancellor has power under s 9(1) of the 1981 Act to authorise circuit judges to sit as justices of the High Court. This power is routinely exercised on the appointment of a circuit judge to the TCC, but by a most regrettable oversight it had not been exercised in respect of Judge Seymour or (as has now been ascertained) Judge Toulmin QC. Accordingly it is accepted both by the commissioners and by counsel for the Lord Chancellor that the judge sat and adjudicated in Mr Coppard's case without legal authority.

[6] Before considering the consequences of this, it is right to say that the judgment Judge Seymour delivered was of high quality and legally impeccable. The sole reason why this court (Judge and Mummery LJ) gave conditional permission to appeal after refusal on the papers by Latham LJ was that his position raised a question of general importance which was not resolved by authority.

TIME

[7] It is first necessary to deal with the condition upon which permission was granted: that this court must be satisfied by affidavit evidence that it is right to enlarge the time for appealing.

[8] Mr Coppard can be exonerated of any delay until the last week of August 2001, when he finally learnt from the Lord Chancellor's Department what Judge Seymour's legal status had been at the time of trial and judgment. From then until 12 June 2002, when the appellant's notice was finally lodged, he deposes that he was occupied in seeking funds, first—unsuccessfully, despite a favourable opinion of counsel—from the Legal Services Commission, then privately. He finally remortgaged his house on 29 May 2002 and within a fortnight had issued his appellant's notice.

[9] It is in the interests of public justice, at least as much as in Mr Coppard's interests, that the present issue should be resolved. It is only if to do so at this distance of time would unjustifiably damage or jeopardise the position of others that we would be disposed to refuse to enlarge time, and we do not see such a situation here. Neither the commissioners nor the intervener takes any point on time. In all these circumstances we enlarge the time for appealing to the date of the appellant's notice.

THE NATURE OF THE CHALLENGE

[10] In his amended grounds Mr Duncan Macpherson puts his case with simplicity and clarity. His premise is that Judge Seymour knew or ought to have known that he was not authorised to sit as a judge of the High Court. It follows, he contends, that when he tried this High Court case Judge Seymour was a judge neither in law nor in fact. He submits, both consequently and independently, that Judge Seymour did not constitute a tribunal established by law within art 6 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998), and that his judgment should be set aside and the damages claim reheard by a properly constituted tribunal.

[11] Some important elements of this process of reasoning are uncontentious. It is common ground, for the reasons I have given, that Judge Seymour was in law not a judge of the High Court. If in addition he was not a High Court judge de facto, it will follow that his judgment, not being a judgment of the High Court at all, is a nullity and has to be set aside as of right. In this event art 6 will add nothing. But if Judge Seymour was, in the eye of English law, a High Court judge in fact, with the result that his judgment is valid at common law, the question will arise whether the obligation of the state under s 6 of the 1998 Act to act compatibly with the convention rights would be violated by the common law's recognition of a judgment not given by 'a tribunal established by law'.

[12] The contention of Mr Philip Sales for the Lord Chancellor is that in answering the first question we will be answering the second—in other words, that 'law' in art 6 includes common law; but if he is wrong, as Mr Macpherson

- a says he is on authority and principle, then on this further and alternative ground the appeal must succeed. If Mr Sales is held to be right, however, Mr Macpherson seeks to fall back on a further argument: that in that case the common law, by treating an invalid assumption of jurisdiction as valid, itself offends against art 6. But we do not think that this argument is on analysis a true fallback. It is the same answer as Mr Macpherson gives to Mr Sales' proposition that a judge in fact is a judge in law, namely that art 6 will not accommodate such a proposition even if the common law does.

- b [13] The one answer to the appeal which in our judgment is unacceptable in principle is that advanced, perhaps more out of hope than out of conviction, by counsel for the commissioners, Mr Michael Patchett-Joyce, that the want of authority was a simple error of procedure which by virtue of CPR 3.10 does not of itself invalidate any step taken on the basis of it. It would do little for the rule of law and for constitutional propriety to relegate an issue as important as qualification for judicial office to the realm of procedure.

- c [14] So the two key questions are: (i) Did Judge Seymour sit and give judgment as a judge in fact of the High Court? (i) Did he in that event constitute a tribunal established by law?

THE LAW

- e [15] The concept of a judge in fact (de facto) is an ancient one. It is not confined to judges but has been extended to offices, including the monarchy itself, which have been exercised by persons later held not to have lawfully occupied them. The central requirement for the operation of the doctrine is that the person exercising the office must have been reputed to hold it. Given this, Wade and Forsyth Administrative Law (8th edn, 2000) pp 291–292, describe the doctrine in this way:

- f 'In one class of cases there is a long-standing doctrine that collateral challenge is not to be allowed: where there is some unknown flaw in the appointment or authority of some officer or judge. The acts of the officer or judge may be held to be valid in law even though his own appointment is invalid and in truth he has no legal power at all.'

- g [16] Recently this court in Fawdry and Co (a firm) v Murfitt (Lord Chancellor intervening) [2002] EWCA Civ 643, [2003] QB 104, [2002] 3 WLR 1354 considered some of the implications of the doctrine so stated. The case concerned a different situation from the present because the judge who had sat was held to have been a judge in law, albeit for reasons which had been unknown to her. But had this not been the case, it would have been necessary to consider whether she had been a judge in fact, and the court looked at this question contingently. All three members of the court were troubled by the possibility that the principle might be so broad as to validate the acts of someone who knew perfectly well, although the litigants did not, that he or she had no authority to adjudicate. Neither Mr Philip Sales (who appeared in that case, as in this, for the Lord Chancellor as intervener) nor the court was content with the idea that the doctrine could go so far; and more than one authority suggested that it did not. Thus in Re Aldridge (1897) 15 NZLR 361 at 372, Richmond J said:

'It may well be that the principle which validates the acts of a Judge de facto cannot be invoked for their own protection by any who wilfully abuse the office, still less by mere usurpers.'

[17] This question, although not determinative, was considered by this court in the Fawdry case. Hale LJ, giving the leading judgment, said ([2003] QB 104 at [30]): a

‘But what if the court usher had been persuaded to sit and everyone in court had behaved as if he were entitled to do so? There must come a point at which, whatever the public perception, there is no basis for applying the de facto doctrine. The dividing line between what is and is not sufficient “colour” in borderline cases may not be as clear as one would like, but fortunately the point does not arise for decision here.’ b

Sedley LJ said (at [43]):

‘In the present state of authority the position of the usurper, in the sense of someone who discharges an office in the actual or constructive knowledge that he has no title to it, is in my view uncertain. If the purpose of the de facto doctrine is the maintenance of stability and confidence in the legal system and the prevention of technical disputes about the formalities of appointment, it might well be said that a sufficiently clearly reputed tenure of office should not be open to challenge even on the ground of the purported officer’s knowledge of his own incapacity. Yet, as Mr Sales’s response on behalf of the Lord Chancellor confirms, it goes entirely against the grain to validate the acts of someone who knows, even if the world does not, that he is not qualified to hold the office he is exercising.’ c

Ward LJ (at [60]–[61]) declined to speculate on the acts of an impostor beyond expressing the tentative view that the judgment of a knowing impostor is a nullity, and that likewise the decision of a judge exercising a jurisdiction he knew he did not possess would be ‘a decision that never was’.

[18] For reasons which will become apparent when we turn to art 6 of the convention, it is necessary in this case, in contrast to the Fawdry case, not simply to form a view but to reach a conclusion on this question. We would hold that the de facto doctrine cannot validate the acts, nor therefore ratify the authority, of a person who, though believed by the world to be a judge of the court in which he sits, knows that he is not. We accept, on well-known principles, that a person who knows he lacks authority includes a person who has shut his eyes to that fact when it is obvious, but not a person who has simply neglected to find it out. We will call such a person a usurper. d

WAS THE JUDGE A USURPER?

[19] Is it arguable that Judge Seymour was such a person? There is now before the court a witness statement of Emma Millicent Robinson, a barrister in the Government Legal Service, who recounts that she spoke to Judge Seymour on 26 February 2003 about this case. She says: e

‘The judge told me that he was appointed as a judge of the TCC in July 2000. This was his first full-time judicial appointment. The judge recalled that, on his appointment, the judge in charge of the TCC lists (then Dyson J) explained that, during the times when the judge had unexpected capacity in his TCC list, he would be expected to volunteer to assist in the Queen’s Bench Division or the Chancery Division of the High Court. The judge explained that he understood he did have authority to sit in the Queen’s f

- a Bench Division and Chancery Division by virtue of his appointment as a TCC judge alone and that no further authorisation was required.'

She goes on to explain that the TCC is part of the High Court, and that a judge appointed to that court has authority by virtue of s 68 of the 1981 Act to hear and decide TCC business.

- b [20] Mr Macpherson accepts this statement as an admissible and factual account of the state of the judge's knowledge. Mr Sales submits that the judge himself is not open to questioning about it: see Locabail (UK) Ltd v Bayfield Properties Ltd [2000] 1 All ER 65 at 75, [2000] QB 451 at 477. Mr Macpherson has not sought to debate this, but he submits that as evidence it is simply not good enough: Judge Seymour knew that no s 9 authority had been issued to him and
- c should have known that being assigned under s 68 to the TCC did not by itself have the effect that he assumed it did. In so far as this was a matter of fact, there was no error on the judge's part: he knew the facts. In so far as it was an error of law, Mr Macpherson first submitted, it cannot be a proper foundation for the de facto doctrine. He accepted, however, that if this were right the leading New
- d Zealand case of Re Aldridge (1897) 15 NZLR 361 could not have gone the way it did, and for that reason abandoned the point.

- [21] It is important nevertheless that this court should not accept such a concession, at least when it is not dictated by binding authority, without considering whether it is rightly made. We are not bound by Aldridge's case, and
- e in spite of its high standing in the common law on this topic, it is apparent both from it and from the present case that the common law does not—or not yet—have all the answers. The reason why, even so, we would accept the concession is that the basis of the de facto doctrine is not the nature but the occurrence of a mistake as to the judicial authority of the individual concerned.

- f [22] The argument is in our view not advanced by the distinction that Mr Macpherson has sought to make between an error as to appointment and an error as to authority. His suggestion is that cases such as Aldridge's case and State v Carroll (1871) 38 Conn 449 depended on the judge's belief that he had been appointed, not simply (as in the present case) that he had authority. This seems to us a distinction without a difference in the present context.

- g [23] The statute law which authorises some judges, in virtue of their appointment, to exercise one aspect only of the High Court's jurisdiction and requires them to be given separate authority to exercise other aspects of it, is piecemeal and complicated. It is unfortunate but unsurprising that Judge Seymour assumed that his appointment to the TCC, a limb of the High Court,
- h gave him power to sit elsewhere in the High Court without further authorisation. It certainly did not amount, in our judgment, either to knowledge of his own incapacity or to wilful blindness to it.

- [24] We hold that Judge Seymour neither knew nor ought to have known, in the sense that he was ignoring the obvious or failing to make obvious inquiries,
- j that he was not authorised to sit as a judge of the High Court. There is uncontested evidence that but for an oversight in the Lord Chancellor's Department he would have been formally authorised under s 9 of the 1981 Act. He was well qualified to sit. This is therefore not a case of usurpation, nor of lack of the requisite competence or qualification. On established principles of law, Judge Seymour was a judge in fact of the High Court and his judgment therefore a judgment of the High Court.

ARTICLE 6 OF THE CONVENTION

[25] But this is an end of the appeal only if, as Mr Sales submits is the case, the validation of Judge Seymour's status (not merely of his judgment) at common law is cognate with his establishment by law as a tribunal for the purposes of art 6. Mr Macpherson submits that it is not: he argues that the doctrine of de facto authority validates acts done under colour of a supposed but legally non-existent authority, but that it does not create authority in law where none existed—indeed its very premise is the non-existence of true authority in law. Thus in the leading Canadian case Reference re Manitoba Language Rights under the Manitoba Act 1870 (1985) 19 DLR (4th) 1, the Supreme Court of Canada, which had had the benefit of wide-ranging citation of common law authority, said (at 28):

'The application of the de facto doctrine is, however, limited to validating acts which are taken under invalid authority: it does not validate the authority under which the acts took place.'

[26] Article 6 begins:

'1. In the determination of his civil rights and obligations or of any criminal charge against him, everyone is entitled to a fair and public hearing within a reasonable time by an independent and impartial tribunal established by law.'

By s 6 of the 1998 Act:

'(1) It is unlawful for a public authority to act in a way which is incompatible with a Convention right ...

(3) In this section "public authority" includes ... a court or tribunal ...'

[27] Two important questions thus arise. (i) Does the de facto doctrine validate the act or the office? (ii) If it is the latter, is this a sufficient compliance with the requirement of art 6 that a person's civil rights are to be determined by a tribunal established by law?

[28] We put the questions in this way because it is correctly conceded by Mr Sales that if Judge Seymour's acts alone are validated, this is insufficient to comply with art 6: the tribunal itself will by definition not have been established by law. We put them in this order for an equally important reason. The true ambit of the de facto doctrine cannot logically be determined by the requirements of art 6: to do this would be to adjust the common law defensively, not to declare it objectively. It is one thing to bring the substantive doctrines of the common law into harmony with the convention in the manner described by this court in A v B (a company) [2002] EWCA Civ 337 at [4], [2002] 2 All ER 545 at [4], [2002] 3 WLR 542. It is another for a legal system to hold itself to be convention-compliant by ratifying what would otherwise be non-compliant.

DOES THE DE FACTO DOCTRINE VALIDATE THE ACT OR THE OFFICE?

[29] Mr Macpherson, to whose industry we are very much indebted, cites a series of persuasive rulings from other common law jurisdictions. Of these, it is sufficient to refer to the judgment of Butler CJ (with whom the other members of the court agreed) in the Supreme Court of Connecticut in State v Carroll (1871) 38 Conn 449 at 471:

'An officer de facto is one whose acts, though not those of a lawful officer, the law, upon principles of policy and justice, will hold valid so far as they

- a involve the interests of the public and third persons, where the duties of the office were exercised [irregularly].'

[30] There is no need for further citation because Mr Sales accepts that there is no authoritative statement of the de facto doctrine which suggests, at least in terms, that it validates the office and not merely acts done under colour of it. His argument, echoing his submissions in Fawdry and Co (a firm) v Murfitt (Lord Chancellor intervening) [2003] QB 104, is that the former is nevertheless its true logic. Dramatic though this proposition is in the face of centuries of restatements of the doctrine throughout the common law world, it seems to us to be right. The point powerfully made by Mr Macpherson, that the very premise of the de facto doctrine is that there was no legal authority, is not necessarily an answer to it, for the true analysis may be that the judge in fact becomes a judge in law by the operation of the doctrine, and that this is why his acts are valid.

[31] The question whether the de facto doctrine validates the act or the office was left open in the Fawdry case. Hale LJ, whose judgment contains an indispensable account of the origins and development of this branch of the law, concluded (at [36]), albeit with expressed hesitation, that since 'there must be some basis for the authority assumed by the judge ... the rule can be regarded as validating the establishment of the tribunal as well as the acts it performs'. In Reference re Manitoba Language Rights under the Manitoba Act 1870 (1985) 19 DLR (4th) 1, it is noteworthy that the Supreme Court of Canada went on to conclude that the doctrine of necessity permitted it to hold temporarily valid, pending proper re-enactment, the body of legislation which it had found to be constitutionally invalid. In other words, because legal certainty and administrative stability could not tolerate the vacuum, the court itself possessed authority to confer interim validity on Manitoba's legislation.

[32] It seems to us that Mr Sales' analysis makes sense of an otherwise intractable—indeed a logically unintelligible—theory which appears to predicate the validity of a judgment on the very invalidity of its author's office. In its place it postulates, in the interests of certainty and finality, that a person who is believed and believes himself to have the necessary judicial authority will be regarded in law as possessing such authority. If this is the true meaning of the de facto doctrine of jurisdiction, as we would hold it is, then the first question of compatibility with art 6 is answered. The judge in fact is a tribunal whose authority is established by the common law.

DOES A JUDGE IN FACT COME WITHIN ART 6?

[33] The answer to the question of convention-compliance, in our judgment, depends on at least two things: first, what the substantive content of the phrase 'established by law' is; and secondly, whether the de facto doctrine, even in the shape in which we have now construed it, matches that content.

ESTABLISHED BY LAW

[34] There is no decision of either the European Court of Human Rights or the European Commission of Human Rights which deals comprehensively with the content of the expression 'established by law'. But in Zand v Austria (1978) 15 DR 70 at 80 (para 69) the Commission of Human Rights, in debating the status of the Austrian labour courts, which had been set up only under elective ministerial powers, said that the object and purpose of the provision was—

‘that the judicial organization in a democratic society must not depend on the discretion of the Executive, but that it should be regulated by law emanating from Parliament.’

The Court of Human Rights has made it clear (see Sunday Times v UK (1979) 2 EHRR 245) that law declared by the courts ranks for these purposes with that made by Parliament. We do not consider, however, that this passage in Zand’s case (which s 2 of the 1998 Act requires us to take into account) answers the question. First of all, it is addressed to the issue then before the Commission of Human Rights, which concerned the use of ministerial powers to create courts—hence the focus on the executive. Secondly, it seems to us that independence from the executive is what the word ‘independent’ in art 6(1) is principally concerned with. Thirdly, and perhaps most importantly, it is plain that much more than this is involved in the concept of a tribunal established by law. Among other things, the purpose (especially when one remembers the period of European history of which the convention was intended to mark a definitive end) is to ensure that justice is administered by, and only by, the prescribed exercise of the judicial power of the state, not by ad hoc ‘people’s courts’ and the like. Such a principle must be fundamental to any concept of the rule of law. Implicit in it is that the composition and authority of a court must not be arbitrary.

COMPATIBILITY WITH THE CONVENTION

[35] This brings us to the second question: does the de facto doctrine meet this standard? To the extent that, as we hold, it validates the authority of the tribunal and not merely its acts, it does. But Mr Macpherson submits that it does not exclude, as it needs to, a validation of the authority of a person who is so incompetent to sit that to ratify him in office would amount to arbitrariness or irrationality offensive to the rule of law.

[36] This argument is in very large part already addressed by our holding that the doctrine cannot validate the authority of a usurper, for it will be a rare case in which an incompetent person who lacks legal authority does not know that he or she ought not to be sitting as a judge. The freak case of a person without either professional competence or legal authority who believes despite his incompetence that he is authorised to sit as a judge can be addressed if and when it arises. What matters to the present issues is that the de facto doctrine ratifies the authority only of persons believed by themselves and the world to possess the judicial power they are exercising. It does not protect people who have deluded themselves or others into thinking they have authority.

[37] But there is a second and more troubling ground on which Mr Macpherson contends that a judge in fact is not a tribunal established by law. ‘Established’ in his contention requires a tribunal to have been established by the time the individual’s civil rights and obligations come before it. We are not disposed to accept Mr Sales’ argument that the common law gives de facto tribunals this legal status proleptically. To accept this would be to establish, in effect, a prior dispensation for avoidable error, with undesirable consequences for legal certainty and good administration. If the de facto doctrine establishes a tribunal by law, it seems to us that it does so by recognising the authority, in an appropriate and legally controlled situation, of what would otherwise not be a lawful tribunal.

[38] The convention itself is silent on this question. So is the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (New York, 16 December 1966; TS 6

- a (1977); Cmnd 6702), though by art 14(1) it adds the adjective 'competent' to the requisite qualities of a tribunal established by law. But art 47 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union (OJ 2000 C364 p 1), a non-binding instrument adopted by the United Kingdom and the other member states in December 2000, says: 'Everyone is entitled to a fair and public hearing within a reasonable time by an independent and impartial tribunal previously established by law.' This reproduces the language of art 6(1) of the convention with the striking addition of the word 'previously'. If it were part of the language of the convention we might well have been driven to hold that the de facto doctrine did not comply with it. But is it, as Mr Macpherson urges, implicit in the convention? No jurisprudence of the Commission or Court of Human Rights indicates that it is, but that could be because the question has not yet come before either body.
- c [39] We remind ourselves that the convention is not a United Kingdom statute, and that we should be concerned less with close analysis of its language than with the principles which animate it. We remind ourselves that the legal system of every member state will contain ways of dealing with errors and omissions in the appointment of persons to judicial office, whether by ratifying or by nullifying what has happened. Provided that the United Kingdom's legal response, at least as it has developed in England and Wales, is not such as to ratify the acts of usurpers or to operate arbitrarily and is limited, in effect, to the correction of mistakes of form rather than of substance—and in our judgment it meets all these tests—we do not consider that the convention requires the disqualification of a judge purely because his authority was not formally established before he sat.
- e

CONCLUSION

- f [40] A person who sits as a judge of the High Court of England or Wales in the circumstances in which Judge Seymour sat is in our judgment a judge in fact and a tribunal established by law. In spite, therefore, of the novel and difficult issues which this appeal has raised, it must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Kate O'Hanlon Barrister.

Khiaban v Beard

[2002] EWCA Civ 358

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

WARD AND DYSON LJJ

10 MARCH 2003

Practice – Claim – Value of claim – Whether court having power to require claimant to claim sums which he had chosen not to include in his claim form or pleadings – CPR 26.8(2).

The claimant's car was damaged in a collision with the defendant's car. The repair costs of £756 were borne by the claimant's insurer, subject to an insurance excess of £125. In order to keep a minimum the costs of proposed proceedings by the claimant against the defendant, the parties' insurers entered into a memorandum of understanding by which they agreed to abide by the court's decision as to liability in relation to a claim by the claimant to recover the excess. The court's decision would thus determine which insurer would bear the repair costs. Pursuant to that memorandum, the claimant's insurers (being subrogated to the claimant's rights against the defendant) brought proceedings against the defendant in the claimant's name, claiming £155 (ie the £125 excess plus some miscellaneous expenses). After the existence of the memorandum was confirmed to the court, the district judge, acting of her own motion, ordered the claimant to file and serve amended particulars of claim reflecting 'the true value' of the claim. By those amended particulars, the claimant deleted the claim for miscellaneous expenses, but left the claim for £125 unamended. The district judge subsequently struck out the proceedings, holding that the amended particulars of claim did not reflect the value of the claim since they failed to include the full cost of the repairs. On a subsequent application by the claimant to set aside the strike out order, the district judge drew a distinction between subrogated and non-subrogated costs and held that it was for the court to assess the true value of the claim. In reaching that conclusion, she relied on CPR 26.8(2)^a which provided that, when deciding the track for a claim, it was for the court to assess its financial value. The district judge dismissed the application, and the claimant appealed to the Court of Appeal. On the appeal, the court was required to determine whether, in the context of the CPR, a 'claim' included claims not before the court.

Held – In the context of the CPR, the word 'claim' only covered that which the claimant sought to recover through the court, and it was never used in a context which suggested that it included claims which had not been brought before the court in legal proceedings. There was nothing in the general law which positively obliged a claimant to include in his pleaded case all the claims which he could arguably advance against a defendant. Nor was there any such requirement in the CPR. In particular, there was nothing in the language of CPR 26.8 to indicate that the court was concerned with the value of items which were not being

^a Rule 26.8, so far as material, provides: '(1) When deciding the track for a claim, the matters to which the court shall have regard include—(a) the financial value ... of the claim ... (2) It is for the court to assess the financial value of a claim ...'

- a claimed. The court had no power to increase the financial value of a claim in respect of items of claim that had been included in the claim form and the particulars of claim. Still less did it have the power to increase the claim to include items of claim that the claimant had chosen not to include at all. It followed in the instant case that there was nothing in the CPR to justify the decision of the district judge to order the claimant to increase his claim to include
- b the repair costs. Nor was there any reason for distinguishing between subrogated and non-subrogated claims. The parties had done nothing objectionable. The real issue between them was liability, and the parties had been entitled to simplify the claim, limiting the amount claimed to £125. In so doing, they had acted in accordance with the overriding objective in that expense had been saved and the case could be dealt with proportionately. Accordingly, the appeal would be
- c allowed (see [12]–[18], [20]–[22], below).

Notes

For the requirement for the court to assess the financial value of the claim when allocating a case to a track, see 37 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 470.

d

Cases referred to in judgments

B (infants), Re [1965] 2 All ER 651n, [1965] 1 WLR 946.

Henderson v Henderson (1843) 3 Hare 100, 67 ER 313, [1843–60] All ER Rep 378.

e Appeal

The claimant, Mr Khiaban, appealed with permission of District Judge Stephenson from her order in Barnet County Court on 11 February 2002, giving effect to her decision of 25 January 2002, dismissing the claimant's application for an order setting aside an order made by the district judge on 5 November 2001 striking out the claimant's proceedings for damages against the defendant, Tony Beard. The

- f facts are set out in the judgment of Dyson LJ.

Michael Ashe QC and Constance Mahoney (instructed by Websters) for the claimant. The defendant did not appear.

g

DYSON LJ (giving the first judgment at the invitation of Ward LJ).

- [1] This is an appeal from the order of District Judge Stephenson made on 11 February 2002 sitting at Barnet County Court whereby she dismissed the claimant's application to set aside her order dated 5 November 2001 by which she had struck out the claimant's claim on the grounds that the amended particulars
- h of claim did not reflect the full value of his claim. She gave the claimant permission to appeal against her decision of 11 February, and directed that the appeal be transferred to Judge Paul Collins at the Central London County Court. Judge Collins considered that the issue raised by this appeal involved an important point of principle or practice such as to justify the transfer of the appeal
- j to the Court of Appeal under CPR Pt 52, r 14(1)(a).

[2] The action concerns a road traffic accident which occurred on 27 March 2000. As a result of the collision between the vehicles of the two parties, the claimant's vehicle had to be repaired at a cost of £755.89 (including value added tax). The claimant paid an insurance excess of £125, but subject to this, the repair costs were borne by his insurer. The parties' insurers entered into a memorandum of understanding (MOU) by which they agreed to abide by the court's decision as to liability in relation to the claimant's claim to recover the excess from the defendant: the court's decision would determine which insurer would bear the repair costs. Pursuant to the MOU, on 13 December 2000, the claimant's insurer (being subrogated to the claimant's rights against the defendant) issued a claim against the defendant in the name of the claimant. By the claim form, the claimant claimed damages which were quantified at £155.73. This sum comprised £125 in respect of the insurance policy excess, and £25 for miscellaneous expenses. a

b

[3] On 14 July 2001, District Judge Stephenson of her own motion ordered:

'1. By 8 August 2001 the following party or parties will disclose any written or oral agreement between their insurers to refund to the other side's insurers the full cost of vehicle repairs if the insurance policy excess is recovered as a consequence of these proceedings: c

Parties: claimant and defendant.'

[4] On 3 August, the defendant's solicitors confirmed to the court the existence of the MOU. On 17 August, District Judge Stephenson, again acting of her own motion, ordered the claimant to file and serve amended particulars of claim reflecting 'the true value' of the claim together with the appropriate court fee by 4 pm on 14 September, and that 'in default the claim be struck out'. On 13 September, the claimant served his amended claim form and particulars of claim. By his amended particulars of claim, he deleted the claim for miscellaneous expenses, but left the claim for £125 unamended. He added the following words: d
e

'The claimant is comprehensively insured with AXA Insurance and they have paid for the repairs to the vehicle on or about 28th April 2000 in the sum of £738.90. It has been agreed between the claimant and the defendant insurers that they will abide by the courts decision and keep their claim for the repairs to the claimant's vehicle out of the proceedings to keep the costs to a minimum.' f

[5] On 5 November, the district judge struck out the claim for breach of the order of 17 August. The order recited that the district judge found that the amended particulars of claim did not reflect the full value of the claim as they did not include the full cost of vehicle repairs. Brief reasons were annexed to her order. They stated: g

'(a) The value of a claim determines the level of a court fee. This is set out in the County Court Fees Order 1999, SI 1999/689. Schedule 1, para 1.1 refers to commencement of proceedings "to recover a sum of money". If the proceedings have been brought to determine whether a sum of money, that is the full vehicle repair costs, should be paid, the full court fee should be paid. (b) Under CPR 26.8 when deciding the track for a claim, the matters to which the court shall have regard include "(a) the financial value, if any, of the claim". If a claim is to determine liability for a repair bill the court must know the amount of money in issue, that is the total of the bill, not just a segment of it, in other words not just the excess. (c) No provision under the CPR is cited which enables litigants to understate their claims by agreement in order to minimize costs.' h a [6] On 7 November, the claimant gave notice of his intention to apply for an order that the order of November should be set aside on the grounds that the particulars of claim did reflect the full value of the claim. At the hearing on 25 January 2002, the claimant was represented by Mrs Mahoney. The defendant did not appear and was not represented. At the conclusion of the argument, the district judge gave her ruling, but the order was not drawn up until 11 February.
i

b [7] The district judge said that a distinction was to be drawn between a subrogated claim, and one which was not subrogated. It was quite clear in this case that 'what was in dispute' between the two insurers was the total cost of the repair costs. She considered that CPR 26.8(2), which provides that, when deciding the track for a claim, it is for the court to assess the financial value of a claim, supported her view that it was for the court to determine the true value of c a claim. She said:

d 'The difficulty arises with regard to subrogated claims where the outstanding issue of the vehicle excess is used as a peg for the insurance companies to hang their proceedings on with regard to liability. What the insurance companies want is simply the decision as to liability so that, between themselves, be the true cost of what is in dispute £200, £2,000, or whatever, they will get the decision of the court on liability in order to decide who pays up for the full cost of vehicle repairs.'

[8] And later:

e 'The small claims track is particularly wide and it is, it appears, being utilised by insurance companies to get the county courts to make decisions on liability, whatever the size of the claim that they have between themselves, just on the basis of sometimes £100, £125 or £200 excess claims.'

[9] She then touched on the question of court fees, and said:

f 'The other point which I grappled with is what is the role of the court with regard to the payment of the fees when it comes to the decisions of the judiciary. Is it a judicial function to consider whether a higher fee should have been paid because the true value of the claim is much higher? Or is it nothing to do with the judiciary?'

g [10] She concluded by saying that she had not been persuaded to set aside her order. She thought that there may be a lacuna in the CPR, and as I have said, gave permission to appeal.

DISCUSSION

h [11] As before the district judge, so too before this court, the defendant has not appeared and has not been represented. We have, however, been greatly assisted by Mr Michael Ashe QC who appears on behalf of the claimant. Largely for the reasons advanced by Mr Ashe, I consider that the decision of the district judge cannot be supported. The word 'claim' is not defined in the CPR: see Civil Procedure (the White Book) (Autumn 2002) vol 1, p 527 (para 25.12.4) which states:
j

'Rule 2.3(1) defines "defendant" as a person against whom a claim is made. The word "claim" is not defined. When used as a noun in other rules it usually refers to the whole of the case in question (see, for example, r.8.1 and r.26.2) or to a separate cause of action raised in proceedings (see, for example, r.7.3). It therefore appears that, under r.25.12, as under the pre-CPR provision (RSC O.23) a claimant is not entitled to apply for security for costs solely in respect of some interim application initiated by the defendant, for example an application under Pt 17 to amend his defence or under Pt 18 for further information as to the Particulars of Claim (for a case authority on the pre-CPR provision, see Re B (Infants) [1965] 2 All ER 651n, [1965] 1 WLR 946).’

[12] But, although the CPR appear to afford the word ‘claim’ different meanings according to the context in which it appears, nowhere is it used in a context which suggests that it includes claims which are not brought before the court in legal proceedings. Thus, in the context of a road traffic case, ‘claim’ should be construed as meaning a demand made formally through the court by the claimant for a sum to be paid to him or her by the defendant. As Mr Ashe puts it in his skeleton argument—

“‘claim’ in the context of the CPR cannot be said to include any amount which one party may hope to retrieve from another party as a result of a private agreement between the two. It can only cover what the claimant seeks to recover through the court’.

[13] A claimant may have various reasons for not including in his claim heads of damages to which he would arguably be entitled, if he established liability. He may decide that the cost of proving a head of loss is disproportionate to the sum that he thinks he is likely to recover. Or he may decide that the evidence that would have to be adduced in order to prove a head of loss would cause him embarrassment which he wishes to avoid. Or he may decide not to seek to recover a head of loss because he is confident that it will be made good to him by a third party. A claimant is fully entitled to decide what to include in his claim. If he excludes a head of loss from his claim, and he is awarded judgment on his pleaded claim, he will normally be precluded as a matter of law from subsequently starting proceedings to recover the excluded head of loss: see Henderson v Henderson (1843) 3 Hare 100, [1843–60] All ER Rep 378. That is the chance that a claimant must take if he excludes from his claim sums which he could claim from the defendant. But there is nothing in the general law which positively obliges a claimant to include in his pleaded case all the claims which he could arguably advance against a defendant.

[14] The question that arises, therefore, is whether there is anything in the CPR which justifies the conclusion reached by the district judge. It would be very surprising if there were, since such an interference in the autonomy of a claimant to decide what to include in his claim would be a very serious matter indeed. CPR 16.3 provides, so far as material:

‘Statement of value to be included in the claim form

(1) This rule applies where the claimant is making a claim for money.

(2) The claimant must, in the claim form, state—(a) the amount of money which he is claiming; (b) that he expects to recover—(i) not more than £5,000; (ii) more than £5,000 but not more than £15,000; or (iii) more than £15,000; or (c) that he cannot say how much he expects to recover.’

[15] The reference to ‘the amount of money which he is claiming’ supports the view that the amount ‘claimed’ by a claimant is limited for the purposes of the CPR to what is in the claim form. There is nothing in CPR 16.3 to suggest a that the court is in any way concerned with the question whether the claimant should be claiming more than he is in fact claiming.

[16] The district judge was much influenced by CPR 26.8, which deals with matters relevant to allocation to a track. It provides that, when allocating a claim to a track, the court must have regard, inter alia, to its 'financial value'. But there is nothing in the language of CPR 26.8 to indicate that the court is concerned with the value of items which are not being claimed. Indeed, r 26.8(2)(a) goes so far as to require the court to disregard items which are being claimed, but which are not in dispute. The amount 'in dispute' must be limited to that which is included in the claim form or particulars of claim, and is (a) an amount for which the defendant does not admit liability, or (b) a sum in respect of an item forming part of the claim for which judgment has not been entered: see CPR PD 26, para 7.4.

c [17] Nor does CPR PD 26, para 7.3(1) support the conclusion of the district judge. It states: 'Rule 26.8(2) provides that it is for the court to assess the financial value of a claim.' CPR PD 26, para 7.3 amplifies CPR 26.8(2). In particular, PD 26, para 7.3(2) provides:

d 'Where the court believes that the amount the claimant is seeking exceeds what he may reasonably be expected to recover it may make an order under rule 26.5(3) directing the claimant to justify the amount.'

[18] This provision is directed at the case where the court believes that the value of a claim may be overstated. If the draftsman of CPR 26.8 had intended that the court should have the power to increase the value of a claim, it would have been provided for here. In my judgment, the court does not have the power to increase the financial value of a claim in respect of items of claim that are included in the claim form and particulars of claim. Still less does it have power to increase the claim to include items of claim that the claimant has chosen not to include at all.

f [19] As has been seen, the district judge made reference to the court fees, although it is not clear what part, if any, the impact of the amount claimed on court fees played in her reasoning. County Court Fees Order 1999, SI 1999/689, Sch 1, para 1.1 provides that the court is only entitled to demand fees in relation to 'the sum claimed'. Thus, for example, where the sum claimed does not exceed £200, the fee payable is £27. As Mr Ashe submits, it is no part of the judicial function to extract from the parties the maximum possible amount of court fees at the cost of forcing a claimant to claim more than he wishes to claim.

g [20] In my judgment, therefore, there is nothing in the CPR which justified the decision of the district judge to order the claimant to increase his claim to include the repair costs. Nor is there any reason for distinguishing between subrogated and non-subrogated claims. There is nothing objectionable in what the parties did in the present case. Even if the claimant had included the full claim in his claim form and/or particulars of claim, its value would still have been well under £5,000, and, therefore, on the face of it, a case suitable for the small claims track. In any event, the real issue between the parties was liability. The parties h were entitled to simplify the claim, and limit the amount claimed to £125. In so doing, they have acted in accordance with the overriding objective in that expense has been saved and the case can be dealt with proportionately. If the issue of liability were complex and not suitable for the small claims track, then it would be open to the court to allocate the case to a different track: see CPR j PD 26, para 8.1.

[21] I would, therefore, allow this appeal. The district judge was wrong to strike out the claim on the basis that the claim form and the particulars of claim as amended did not reflect the full value of the claim. Nor was she entitled to make an order that the claimant must amend his claim form and particulars of claim to increase the value of the claim. I would set aside the orders of 5 November 2001 and 11 February 2002, and reinstate the claim. a WARD LJ.

[22] I agree. b

Appeal allowed.

James Brooks Barrister.

a Jl MacWilliam Co Inc v Mediterranean Shipping Co SA

The Rafaela S
[2003] EWCA Civ 556

b

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION
PETER GIBSON, RIX LJ AND JACOB J
17, 24 JANUARY, 16 APRIL 2003

c Shipping – Bill of lading – Carriage of goods by sea – Hague Rules – Straight bill of lading – Rules applying to contracts ‘covered by a bill of lading or any similar document of title’ – Status of straight bill of lading – Carriage of Goods By Sea Act 1971, s 1(4) – Hague Rules, art I(b).

d The shipper consigned four containers of printing machinery to the claimant. It was shipped on vessels owned by or demise chartered to the defendant. The bill of lading issued by the defendant named the claimant as the consignee and indicated that the bill was non-negotiable, ie it was a ‘straight’ bill of lading, and the goods could not be transferred by indorsement of the bill. The defendant agreed to carry the goods from the port of loading to the port of discharge which was identified as Felixstowe. The bill also provided that if a final destination were specified the defendant, acting as shippers agent, would arrange for transport from the port of discharge to the destination. Boston, United States, was specified as the final destination. The goods were carried from Durban, South Africa to Felixstowe, where they were discharged and subsequently reshipped to Boston.

e The goods were damaged and proceedings were issued in England. At arbitration, the issue arose as to whether the Carriage of Goods By Sea Act 1971 applied, which, by s 1(3)^a, applied ‘where the port of shipment is a port in the United Kingdom’. Accordingly the question arose as to whether the shipment from South Africa to the United States of America was governed by one contract of carriage or two. If the Act did apply, then s 1(4) (derived from art I(b)^b of the g Hague Rules) applied the Rules if the contract of carriage ‘expressly or by implication [provided] for the issue of a bill of lading or any similar document of title’. The question therefore arose as to whether a straight bill of lading was a ‘bill of lading or any similar document of title’. The arbitrators concluded that the shipment was governed by one contract of carriage and that, in any event, a straight bill of lading was not a ‘bill of lading’ within the Act. The claimant appealed to the judge, who concluded that there had been two separate contracts, but upheld the arbitrators’ decision that a straight bill was not a ‘bill of lading’, and accordingly dismissed the appeal. The claimant appealed to the Court of Appeal on the ground that a straight bill of lading was a ‘bill of lading’ within s 1(4) of the Act, and also within art I(b) of the Rules.

h

j

Held – (1) The carriage of the goods from England to the United States of America was under a separate contract of carriage to that from South Africa to a Section 1, so far as material, is set out at [4] and [82], below

b Article I, so far as material, is set out at [50], below

England. There was nothing to extend the defendant's responsibility as carrier beyond Felixstowe. It was not contracted to carry the goods to Boston until it entered into a new arrangement to on-carry the goods from Felixstowe. Accordingly, there had been a 'port of shipment' within England, and the judge had been correct to conclude that the Act applied (see [24], [25], [27], [28], [156], [159], below). a

(2) A straight bill of lading, although non-negotiable, was to be viewed as a bill of lading within the meaning of the Rules. The Rules were concerned with the content of a contract of carriage in circumstances where such a contract as found in a bill of lading might come to affect a third party into whose hands such a bill was transferred. A named consignee under a straight bill, unless he was the same person as the shipper, was as much a third party as a named consignee under a classic bill. A straight bill, in practice, was used just like a classic bill, as a document against which payment was required and the transfer of which thus marked the intended transfer of property. The shipper and his bankers and insurers needed the same protection as the shipper under a classic bill; and the consignee himself and his insurers in turn needed to have rights against the carrier under the contract of carriage. The practice was also that a straight bill was written on the form of an otherwise classic bill, and required production of the bill on delivery. Furthermore, a straight bill was in principle, function and form much closer to a classic negotiable bill than to a non-negotiable receipt (see [135]–[139], [151], [156], [159], below). b
c
d

(3) A straight bill of lading, having to be produced to obtain delivery, was also a document of title. There was no reason why a document which had to be produced to obtain possession of the goods should not be regarded, in an international convention, as a document of title (see [145], [146], [159] below). e

The claimant's appeal would accordingly be allowed.

Per curiam. Even in the absence of an express provision requiring a straight bill of lading to be produced to obtain delivery, it is in principle a document of title (see [145], [156], [159], below). f

Notes

For bills of lading, see 43(2) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) paras 1532–1541.

For the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act 1971, s1, see 39 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (1995 reissue) 370, 375. g

Cases referred to in judgments

Anders Maersk, The [1986] 1 Lloyd's Rep 483, Hong Kong HC.

Barclays Bank Ltd v Customs and Excise Comrs [1963] 1 Lloyd's Rep 81.

Brij, The [2001] 1 Lloyd's Rep 431, Hong Kong HC. h

Browner International Ltd v Monarch Shipping Co Ltd, The European Enterprise [1989] 2 Lloyd's Rep 185.

Carlberg v Wemyss Coal Co Ltd 1915 SC 616, Ct of Sess.

Cia Portoraffi Commerciale SA v Ultramar Panama Inc, The Captain Gregos [1990] 3 All ER 967, CA. j

Duke of Yare, The (10 April 1997, unreported).

Gardano & Giampari v Greek Petroleum George Mamidakis & Co [1961] 3 All ER 919, [1962] 1 WLR 40.

Glyn Mills Currie & Co v East and West India Dock Co (1882) 7 App Cas 591, [1881–5] All ER Rep 674, HL.

- a* Henderson (CP) & Co v Comptoir d'Escompte de Paris (1873) LR 5 PC 253, PC.
Hugh Mack & Co Ltd v Burns & Laird Lines Ltd (1944) 77 Ll L Rep 377, NI CA.
International Air and Sea Cargo GmbH v The Chitral (Owners) [2000] 1 All ER (Comm) 932.
Kum v Wah Tat Bank Ltd [1971] 1 Lloyd's Rep 439, PC.
Kuwait Petroleum Corp v I & D Oil Carriers Ltd, The Houda [1994] 2 Lloyd's Rep 541, CA.
- b* Lickbarrow v Mason (1787) 2 Term Rep 63, 100 ER 35, [1775–1802] All ER Rep 1.
Marlborough Hill, The v Alex Cowan & Sons Ltd [1921] 1 AC 444, PC.
Maurice Desgagnes, The [1977] 1 Lloyd's Rep 290, Can Fed Ct.
McCarren & Co Ltd v Humber International Transport Ltd and Truckline Ferries (Poole) Ltd, The Vechscroon [1982] 1 Lloyd's Rep 301.
Motis Exports Ltd v Dampskibsselskabet AF 1912, A/S [1999] 1 All ER (Comm) 571; affd [2000] 1 All ER (Comm) 91, CA.
- c* MSC Magallanes, The (16 May 2002, unreported), Rennes CA.
Olivine Electronics Pte Ltd v Seabridge Transport Pte Ltd [1995] 3 SLR 143, Singapore HC.
Parsons Corp v CV Scheepvaartonderneming Happy Ranger [2002] 1 All ER (Comm) 176; rvsd [2002] EWCA Civ 694, [2002] 2 All ER (Comm) 24.
- d* SA Sucre Export v Northern River Shipping Ltd, The Sormovskiy 3068 [1994] 2 Lloyd's Rep 266.
Sanders v Maclean (1883) 11 QBD 327, CA.
Stafford Allen & Sons Ltd v Pacific Steam Navigation Co [1956] 1 Lloyd's Rep 104; affd [1956] 2 All ER 716, [1956] 1 WLR 629, CA.
Stag Line Ltd v Foscolo, Mango & Co Ltd [1932] AC 328, [1931] All ER Rep 666, HL.
- e* Stettin, The (1889) 14 PD 142.
Sze Hai Tong Bank Ltd v Rambler Cycle Co Ltd [1959] 3 All ER 182, [1959] AC 576, [1959] 3 WLR 214, PC.
Thrige v United Shipping Co Ltd (1924) 18 Ll L Rep 6, CA.
Voss v APL Co Pte Ltd [2002] 2 Lloyd's Rep 707, Singapore CA.

f Appeal

The claimant, JI MacWilliam Co Inc, appealed with permission granted by Mance LJ on 19 June 2002 from the decision of Langley J on 17 April 2002 ([2002] EWHC 593 (Comm)) dismissing its appeal from an award by Messrs Hamsher, Mabbs and Moss on 30 May 2001 in an arbitration between the claimant and the defendant, Mediterranean Shipping Co SA, on a preliminary issue arising out of claims for damage to cargo. The facts are set out in the judgment of Rix LJ.

Alistair Schaff QC (instructed by Clyde & Co) for the claimant.
Simon Croall (instructed by Duval Vassiliades) for the defendant.

h

Cur adv vult

16 April 2003. The following judgments were delivered.

RIX LJ.

- j* [1] In 1924 the international maritime community enacted a convention, the International Convention for the Unification of Certain Rules of Law relating to Bills of Lading (Brussels, 25 August 1924; TS 17 (1931); Cmd 3806), intended to regulate the minimum terms by which international shipping contracts of carriage of goods by sea should be governed. That convention, although signed at Brussels, derived, with amendments, from a set of standard rules originally designed for incorporation into bills of lading as a matter of contract which were negotiated at The Hague in 1922. Thus the rules came to be known as the Hague Rules. By art I(b) those rules applied only to contracts of carriage 'covered by a bill of lading or any similar document of title'. It is a matter of some surprise that nearly 80 years later the meaning of that phrase is still controversial. Indeed new forms of shipping documents appear to have caused in recent years an increasing number of cases to reach the courts raising the question whether a bill of lading consigned to a named consignee, a so-called 'straight bill of lading', is a bill of lading within the meaning of the Rules. A straight bill of lading is to be contrasted with an 'order' or bearer bill of lading, each of which permits the transferability of the bill to any number of transferees in succession, respectively by indorsement or delivery. This form of transferability has also traditionally, but idiosyncratically, been referred to as 'negotiability'. Scrutton on Charterparties and Bills of Lading (20th edn, 1996) p 185, explains the point well:

'Note 1 "Negotiable" as a term of art describes an instrument which can give to a transferee a better title than that possessed by the transferor. A bill of lading is not "negotiable" in this sense: the indorsee does not get a better title than his assignor. Indeed a bill of lading is "negotiable" only in a popular, and not in a technical, sense. For it is "negotiable" to the same extent as a cheque marked "not negotiable", i.e it is "transferable".'

The effect of a negotiable bill of lading has been famously described by Bowen LJ in Sanders v Maclean (1883) 11 QBD 327 at 341:

'A cargo at sea while in the hands of the carrier is necessarily incapable of physical delivery. During this period of transit and voyage, the bill of lading by the law merchant is universally recognised as its symbol, and the indorsement and delivery of the bill of lading operates as a symbolical delivery of the cargo. Property in the goods passes by such indorsement and delivery of the bill of lading, whenever it is the intention of the parties that the property should pass, just as under similar circumstances the property would pass by an actual delivery of the goods ... It is a key which in the hands of a rightful owner is intended to unlock the door of the warehouse, floating or fixed, in which the goods may chance to be.'

A straight bill of lading, on the other hand, requires delivery of the goods to the named consignee and (subject to the shipper's ability to redirect the goods) to no other.

[2] The present appeal concerns such a straight bill of lading, under which the shipper, Coniston International Machinery Ltd, of Liverpool (Coniston), consigned four containers of printing machinery to J I MacWilliam Co Inc, of Boston, United States of America (MacWilliam). MacWilliam had purchased the machinery from Coniston under a sale contract cif Boston. The machinery was carried on two vessels each of which was owned by or demise chartered to Mediterranean Shipping Co SA, of Geneva (MSC). One vessel, the Rosemary, carried the machinery from Durban in South Africa to Felixstowe in England, where it was discharged and subsequently reshipped. The other vessel, the Rafaela S, carried the machinery from Felixstowe to its final destination at Boston. On the way, it was badly damaged. The parties to the appeal, which arises, via the Commercial Court, out of a London arbitration, are MacWilliam and MSC. The business issue between the parties is whether the contract of

- a carriage contained in or evidenced by the bill of lading prescribed a package limitation under the Hague Rules, the Hague-Visby Rules, or the United States Carriage of Goods by Sea Act 1936 (the United States Act). The Hague-Visby Rules are an amended version of the Hague Rules, introduced by the Protocol signed at Brussels on 23 February 1968. They contain a more liberal package limitation. The United States Act reflects the earlier limitation regime of the
- b Hague Rules and would limit any recovery to $US 500 per package.

[3] The straight bill of lading issued by MSC to Coniston at Durban on 18 December 1989 (the date, now more than 13 years ago, may be noted) is the only contract document in evidence relating to the carriage. If it governed the complete voyage to Boston, then its terms relate directly to that second leg on which the machinery was damaged. If, however, the position is that it only

c governed the first leg to Felixstowe, then no second bill of lading to cover the on-carriage to Boston was ever issued. It is nevertheless common ground that, in such a case, the carriage on that second leg would be governed by a second contract in the same form as the Durban-Felixstowe bill of lading, mutatis mutandis, in other words by a straight bill of lading.

- d [4] At this stage it is still a matter of mere assumption that MacWilliam has title to sue and that MSC is liable at all for the damaged machinery. However, the parties have decided to determine the package limitation regime as a preliminary issue in the arbitration. That issue ultimately turns on whether the compulsory regime of the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act 1971, which gives to the
- e Hague-Visby Rules the force of law 'where the port of shipment is a port in the United Kingdom' (see s 1(3)), applies to the second leg of the voyage, that from Felixstowe to Boston. MacWilliam submits that the 1971 Act's regime does apply, MSC submits that it does not. That difference in turn raises three questions of some refinement. The first of these is whether the relevant contract of carriage is a single contract from Durban to Boston, or whether the carriage as
- f a whole was covered by two separate contracts, one governing the voyage from Durban to Boston and the other governing the on-voyage from Felixstowe to Boston. The second question, however, is whether the separate contract of carriage which would in that case govern the second leg from Felixstowe to Boston was a contract which 'expressly or by implication provides for the issue of a bill of lading or any similar document of title' (see s 1(4) of the 1971 Act). Seeing
- g that it is common ground that such a contract would have been in the form of a straight bill of lading, the second question is simply whether a straight bill of lading is a 'bill of lading or any similar document of title' within the meaning of the 1971 Act. Since that phrase goes back ultimately to the Hague Rules, the parties are agreed that the second question is asking whether a straight bill of
- h lading is a bill of lading or similar document of title within the meaning of the Hague Rules. If it is not, it is again common ground that the more liberal package regime of the Hague-Visby Rules does not apply.

- [5] The third question only arises if, on the contrary, the second leg was governed by a contract within s 1(4) of the 1971 Act and asks whether, whatever
- j the answer to the first question, and even if therefore there was a single contract for the whole carriage from Durban to Boston, there nevertheless was a 'port of shipment ... in the United Kingdom' within the meaning of s 1(3) of the 1971 Act, namely Felixstowe. MacWilliam submits that there was and that the answer to the first question is therefore ultimately irrelevant. This third question has tended to be obscured below, possibly because it was considered to be bound up with the first question, as I think MSC views it to be, but also perhaps because, in the light of both the arbitrators' and Langley J's decision on the straight bill of lading question, neither the first nor the third questions were decisive. a

[6] Thus it was that the arbitrators (Messrs Mabbs, Hamsher and Moss) defined only two issues in their award as follows: 'Was the shipment from Durban to Boston governed by one contract of carriage or two?' and 'Was the [straight] bill of lading a "bill of lading" within [the 1971 Act]?' b

[7] The answers given by the arbitrators were 'One' and 'No' respectively. Therefore MacWilliam failed, on two separate grounds, to avoid the United States Act's $US 500 per package regime. The arbitrators did not separately address MacWilliam's submission that Felixstowe was in any event a 'port of shipment'.

[8] Permission was given to appeal the award to the Commercial Court ([2002] EWHC 593 (Comm), [2002] 2 Lloyd's Rep 403), where Langley J upheld the arbitrators' answer on the bill of lading issue, and therefore dismissed the appeal, but went on to express his views for differing from the arbitrators on the one contract or two issue. In his view there were two separate contracts. He, however, defined this issue (at [4]) in a way which incorporated MacWilliam's further 'port of shipment' submission, as follows: c

'Whether, as the buyers [Macwilliam] also contended, the "port of shipment" for the carriage of the goods pursuant to that "bill of lading" was a port in the United Kingdom (namely Felixstowe) within s. 1(3) of (the 1971 Act) ("issue 2"). Issue 2 itself depended upon whether there was a single contract of shipment from Durban to Boston or two contracts of carriage from Durban to Felixstowe and Felixstowe to Boston.' d

[9] Permission was again given to MacWilliam to take a second appeal to the Court of Appeal. By a respondent's notice MSC has sought to uphold Langley J's order dismissing the appeal from the award on the alternative ground that the arbitrators were also right on the one contract or two issue. e

[10] The three questions argued on the appeal are very different. The one contract or two issue is a question of construction on the wording of the bill of lading. The straight bill of lading issue is a question of general significance with potentially far-reaching implications. The 'port of shipment' issue has barely been addressed below, but appears to be a mixed question of statutory interpretation and fact. The arbitrators and Langley J dealt with the bill of lading issue first. However, it will not be reached at all unless there is a 'port of shipment' within the United Kingdom. It is therefore logical, but also convenient, to take the two questions which relate to the 'port of shipment' first. It is as well to settle the form of the contract (one contract or two) before asking what its effect is in the light of international convention or domestic statute. In any event, however, I need to begin by setting out the terms of the straight bill of lading. f

THE STRAIGHT BILL OF LADING

[11] The face of the bill of lading contained a series of numbered boxes, in which various details were typed. There was also printed material, as well as several stamped provisions. The document as a whole was headed 'Original BILL OF LADING' and it was given a number in a box headed 'B/L NO'. g

[12] The numbered boxes had printed titles asking for appropriate details to be supplied. Thus box (1) was headed 'Shipper' and had Coniston's name and address inserted in it. Box (2) was headed 'Consignee: (B/L not negotiable unless h

- a "ORDER OF"): it referred to MacWilliam's name and address but did not contain the additional words 'order of'. That was what made the document a straight bill of lading. The terms of box (2), both the printed words and the absence of 'order of' in the typed-in provisions, are the linchpin of MSC's argument on the bill of lading issue. Box (6) was headed 'Vessel' and referred to 'ROSEMARY'. Box (7) gave the 'Port of Loading' as 'DURBAN'; box (8) the 'Port of discharge' as 'FELIXSTOWE'. Box (9) was headed 'Final destination (through transport)' and referred to 'BOSTON'. Against the number (9) was an asterisk, picked up further down the page by the printed information—'If box 5 and/or 9 filled out, this is a through Bill of Lading (see clause 3)'. This provision together with cl 3 (see [17], below) is central to the one contract or two issue. Box (10) was headed 'On-carriage' but was left blank. Box (11) was headed 'Number of Original Bs/L' and was filled out '3 (THREE)'. Box (13) contained the 'particulars furnished by shipper'.
- b
- c

[13] Further unnumbered boxes, left blank, were headed 'Specification of freight and charges', 'Declared Value (See Clause 21)' and 'Signed for the merchants (Compulsory for Italy, Belgium and France)'.

- d [14] In a box above the boxes for 'Place and date of issue' (where 'DURBAN' and '18 December 1989' were inserted) and 'Signed for the Master ... as Agents' (where an agent's stamp and signature were inserted) were three printed paragraphs dealing with receipt, agreement and attestation. The last of these, in essentially standard form, reads as follows:

- e 'In WITNESS whereof the number of Original Bills of Lading stated above [viz three] all of this tenor and date, has been signed, one of which being accomplished, the others to stand void. One of the Bills of Lading must be surrendered duly endorsed in exchange for the goods or delivery order.'

- f [15] Although the freight box was left empty, another box headed 'Freight Payable at:' was completed with the typed word 'DESTINATION'; but another copy of the bill had that word crossed through in manuscript and the word 'Felixstowe' written above it. The words 'FREIGHT PAYABLE DESTINATION' were also typed in the centre of the particulars of the goods.

- g [16] There were also two stamped provisions which were relevant to the one contract or two issue, namely 'On-Carriage to BOSTON to be arranged by M.S.C. Agents' (the word 'Boston' was written into a blank space in this stamp), and 'Cargo to be cleared by U.S. Custom at port of discharge'.

[17] The reverse of the form contained standard conditions in typically small print. It will be sufficient to set out the following:

- h "This contract is between the Merchant and the Master, acting on behalf of the Carrier. Wherever the term "Merchant" occurs in this Bill of Lading (hereinafter "B/L") it shall be deemed to include the Shipper, the Consignee, the holder of the B/L, the receiver and the owner of the goods. "Carrier" shall mean the vessel and her owner or demise charterer for whom the Master has entered into this contract ... MSC shall act as agent of the owner
- j or demise charterer in arranging the transport covered by this B/L ...

1. PARAMOUNT CLAUSE. It is mutually agreed that this Bill of Lading shall have effect subject to the provisions of the International Convention relating to Bills of Lading dated Brussels 25th August 1924 (hereinafter called "Hague Rules"). The Hague Rules shall not apply where ... this bill of lading is subject to any compulsorily applicable enactment, including Hague-Visby

Rules, based on said Hague Rules, 1924. If goods are shipped to or from the United States, this bill of lading shall be subject to US Carriage of Goods by Sea Act 1936. The Carrier's published tariff is incorporated herein and made part of this contract. a

2. LAW AND JURISDICTION. Claims and disputes arising under or in connection with this B/L shall be referred to arbitration in London or such other place as the Carrier in his sole discretion shall designate ... English law shall be applied, unless some other law is compulsorily applicable, except that claims and disputes relating to cargo carried to or from the United States shall be subject to the sole jurisdiction of the US in the US District Court, Southern District of New York, and US law shall be applied. b

3. SUBSTITUTION OF VESSEL, THROUGH TRANSPORT, TRANSSHIPMENT AND FORWARDING. The Carrier agrees to carry the goods from the Port of Loading to the Port of Discharge, and shall have the right at its sole discretion to substitute other vessels, feederships, lighters or other modes of transport for the vessel named herein (Box 6). If boxes 5 and/or 9 are filled out, the Carrier will, acting as shipper's agent, only arrange for transport of the cargo by other carriers from the place of origin to Port of Loading and/or from Port of Discharge to destination, and during such segments of Through Transport, handling and storage of the goods shall be subject to the freight contracts and tariffs of the other carriers. It is expressly understood that the Carrier's liability as "carrier" applies only from the Port of Loading to Port of Discharge under this B/L, and only while the goods remain in its actual custody and control, whether as Carrier or bailee ... c
d
e

21. CLAIMS VALUATION, PACKAGE LIMITATION, TIME-BAR ... Neither the carrier nor the ship shall in any event be or become liable for any loss or damage to or in connection with goods in an amount exceeding Pounds Sterling 100 of lawful tender in the U.K. per package or unit, unless the nature and the value of such goods have been declared by the merchant before shipment and inserted in the B/L. But declaration of value for the purpose of calculation of freight shall not be considered a declaration in the above sense. This limitation of liability shall apply to all contractual claims as well as to any claims arising from other causes. In case goods are shipped to or from the United States, the carrier's liability shall be limited to $500 per package or customary freight unit, unless excess value is inserted on the face hereof and extra charge paid.' f
g

ONE CONTRACT OR TWO?

[18] The arbitrators considered that there was only one contract. Their reasoning started with the words on the face of the form that 'this is a through Bill of Lading', which they considered confirmed the bill's appearance as a 'classic through transport bill' covering the entire carriage from port of loading at Durban to final destination at Boston. There was further support in the fact that freight was only payable at destination, presumably in a single sum (the arbitrators actually state that 'freight was paid in one lump sum'), and in the background sale contract 'cif Boston' which emphasised that intermediate arrangements were of limited if any significance to the shipper and consignee. There remained the stipulation that Felixstowe was the port of discharge together with cl 3. The arbitrators interpreted these provisions, however, as merely giving to MSC the option of making alternative provisions on a second leg h a from Felixstowe to final destination. For that leg MSC was entitled to delegate the obligation to another carrier or to complete the carriage itself. Where MSC opted to complete the carriage itself, it did so under its original contract.
j

[19] Langley J ([2002] 2 Lloyd's Rep 403) came to the opposite conclusion. This was, I think, essentially based on his reading of cl 3 (together with the relevant box entries) as providing for two separate contracts, rather than a single contract under which MSC exercised an option to complete a single voyage by means of transshipment at an intermediate port.

b [20] On this appeal, Mr Simon Croall, on behalf of MSC, has submitted that the arbitrators were right essentially for the reasons given by them. Properly construed in its entirety, the bill of lading issued at Durban evidenced a contract of carriage to ship cargo from Durban to Boston with an option to sub-contract parts of the carriage and in particular the leg from Felixstowe to Boston. c Although cl 3 said nothing about MSC performing that second leg as a carrier in its own ships, as distinct from arranging for transport as the shipper's agent, it was common ground that MSC was entitled to arrange such on-carriage in its own ships. Where it did so, it was still performing the original contract of carriage d under a single through bill of lading for a freight which had been agreed for the whole carriage payable in one sum at final destination in Boston.

[21] Mr Alistair Schaff QC, on the other hand, on behalf of MacWilliam, has supported the conclusion of the judge. He has emphasised that the expression 'through bill of lading' must itself take its colour from the other contractual e provisions and in this case predominantly from cl 3. That clause, when read together with the relevant boxes on the front of the bill, does not provide for a single contract of carriage but for two separate contracts, one from Durban to Felixstowe and the other from Felixstowe to Boston. It may be true that MSC was entitled to arrange that second contract to be with itself, but that should not disguise the fact that such an arrangement must be viewed in exactly the same f light as a new contract arranged through MSC's agency with a different carrier. If the latter would be a separate contract with a separate port of shipment, then so must be the former arrangement. Otherwise the regime under the bill of lading would change depending on the manner in which MSC exercised its option. If it arranged on-carriage with itself, then there would be a single contract g for a voyage from Durban to Boston, with transshipment at Felixstowe, and United States law and jurisdiction would apply under cl 2 and the United States Act would apply under the penultimate sentence of cl 1. If on the other hand, MSC arranged on-carriage with another carrier, then the contract would only be for shipment from Durban to Felixstowe, not to the United States, and London arbitration and English law would apply under cl 2, and there would be a port of h shipment within the United Kingdom which, subject to the straight bill of lading issue, would also invoke the compulsory regime of the 1971 Act. However, law, jurisdiction and the applicable shipping regime must, it was submitted, be established at the outset of the contract, and could not 'float' dependent on subsequent events.

j [22] Two authorities have been cited as throwing some light on this issue. In Stafford Allen & Sons Ltd v Pacific Steam Navigation Co [1956] 1 Lloyd's Rep 104 it would seem that the first carrier's bill of lading provided for shipment at Corinto in Nicaragua, discharge and transshipment at Cristobal (in the Canal Zone) by a named 'on carrier' and a final destination in London. A special clause, cl 11, dealt with the circumstances of transshipment, to the effect that the first carrier made arrangements for the transshipment and on-carriage 'solely as the forwarding agent of the shipper and without any other responsibility whatsoever' and that the transshipment and on-carriage would be subject to 'all the provisions of the regular form of bill of lading' of the second carrier. No further bill of lading was issued, but the second carrier did have a regular form of bill of lading. The plaintiff's cargo was damaged on the second leg and it sued the second carrier. The issue was whether the regime terms of the first carrier's bill of lading applied throughout the voyage to London, or whether the terms of the second carrier's regular bill of lading applied. Sellers J held that the second carrier's terms applied. Nothing more is known about the terms of the first carrier's bill of lading, for instance as to the freight provisions.

[23] In The Anders Maersk [1986] 1 Lloyd's Rep 483, a decision of the Hong Kong High Court, the bill of lading stated that the port of shipment was Baltimore and the port of discharge was Shanghai. The bill gave the carrier a right of transshipment, which it exercised at Hong Kong. It appears to have been described as a through bill of lading. It made no express reference to Hong Kong at all. The plaintiffs' cargo was damaged between Hong Kong and Shanghai. The issue was whether Hong Kong was the 'port of shipment' for the purposes of the Hong Kong equivalent of the 1971 Act. Mayo J held that transshipment was not the same as shipment, and that there had been only one port of shipment and that was Baltimore. Therefore, under the bill of lading terms, the United States Act's $US500 per package limitation applied. Mayo J said (at 486):

'Unless reference is made to the contract between the parties, there would always be a likelihood that there would be an element of uncertainty. The shipper of goods may have no knowledge of the arrangements being made by the carrier, and it would put the shipper in an invidious position if he could only establish his rights by a subsequent re-construction of events which took place without his knowledge. I entirely reject Mr. Tong's argument that shipment includes transshipment. All the references to shipment in the rules are consistent with shipment being confined to the initial shipment referred to in the bill of lading.'

[24] In my judgment, the present case is closer to the situation in the Stafford Allen case than in The Anders Maersk. MSC's bill of lading specifically identifies Felixstowe as the port of discharge. It is true that Boston is also identified as the ultimate destination (as was London in the Stafford Allen case) and that the bill states that it is therefore a 'through Bill of Lading': but for the meaning of that loose and ambiguous expression (see Scrutton pp 369–371) one is immediately referred by the bill's own language ('If box 5 and/or 9 filled out, this is a through Bill of Lading (see clause 3)') to cl 3. That clause then sets out the limits of MSC's obligations as a carrier under its bill. 'The Carrier agrees to carry the goods from the Port of Loading to the Port of Discharge.' Felixstowe, not Boston, is the port of discharge. MSC therefore did not agree to carry the goods to Boston. For the purposes of that voyage to Felixstowe it is entitled to substitute other vessels etc. If box 9 is filled in with a final destination, then 'the Carrier will, acting as shipper's agent, only arrange for transport of the cargo by other carriers ... from Port of discharge to destination', just as in the Stafford Allen case the first carrier acted only as an agent in arranging the on-carriage by the second carrier. Clause 3 continues: 'and during such segments of Through Transport, handling and storage of the goods shall be subject to the freight contracts and tariffs of the other a carriers', again as in the Stafford Allen case the on-carriage from Cristobal was subject to the second carrier's 'regular bill of lading'. The next sentence in cl 3 begins with special emphasis—'It is expressly understood'—and continues 'that the Carrier's liability as "carrier" applies only from Port of Loading to Port of Discharge under this B/L ...'. That is consistent with the point made in the first sentence of the clause, but underlines it by stressing that MSC's liability as a carrier ends at Felixstowe. The clause continues: 'and only while the goods remain in its actual custody and control, whether as Carrier or bailee'. Mr Croall submits that the machinery remained in MSC's custody and control on the Rafaela S on the voyage from Felixstowe to Boston, but that submission ignores the point that the second half of this sentence is an additional limitation on MSC's liability.

c [25] There is nothing in cl 3 to extend MSC's responsibility as carrier beyond Felixstowe. It may be common ground that there was nothing to prevent MSC making a further arrangement for another MSC vessel to perform the on-carriage from Felixstowe, but that is not to be derived from cl 3 itself. In these circumstances, unless some other part of the bill of lading has a preponderant and overriding effect, superseding cl 3, I cannot see how it can be said that the contract evidenced by the bill is a contract of carriage (as distinct from a contract for carriage) beyond Felixstowe.

e [26] Do then the references to freight being payable at destination or anything else on the face of the bill transform the situation? I do not think so. The actual freight arrangements are not known, but the freight tariffs of MSC and any other carriers were incorporated into the bill by language within cl 1 and 3. In practice, however, the freight will have been agreed, probably with Coniston, as part of the background to the sale and carriage. It was obviously not intended in practice for MacWilliam, the buyer, to pay for the freight element of its purchase twice. Nevertheless each carrier would have its remedy against the 'merchant' for freight in accordance with its incorporated tariff, save to the extent that such rights arising under a general incorporation may have been superseded by any special arrangement. Then there is the stamped legend 'On-carriage to Boston to be arranged by M.S.C. agents': that is consistent with cl 3. Finally there is the stamp: 'Cargo to be cleared by U.S. Custom at port of discharge' but that, if a reference to a port in the United States, cannot displace the parties' choice of Felixstowe as the port of discharge, and must be understood to refer instead to port of final destination.

g [27] For these reasons, I conclude that although MSC was contracted to arrange on-carriage to Boston, it was not contracted to carry the machinery to Boston until it entered into a new arrangement at some stage, the details of which are not reported, to on-carry the goods from Felixstowe. That was a separate contract of carriage, which entitled the shipper to demand a bill of lading and therefore, subject to the straight bill of lading issue, meant that the contract was 'covered by a bill of lading' for the purposes of art I of the Hague or Hague-Visby Rules: see Parsons Corp v CV Scheepvaartonderneming Happy Ranger [2002] EWCA Civ 694, [2002] 2 All ER (Comm) 24.

'PORT OF SHIPMENT'

[28] It is convenient to take this issue at this stage, since it is now apparent that it is in truth closely connected with the one contract or two issue. If there are two contracts, then it is hard to see how Felixstowe is not to be regarded as the 'port of shipment' for the purpose of the second contract. The bill of lading which the shipper would have been entitled to have issued to it would presumably have stated Felixstowe as the port of shipment. This would not have been a mere case of transshipment at an intermediate stage of a single contract of carriage, as in The Anders Maersk [1986] 1 Lloyd's Rep 483.

[29] If, on the other hand, the first question had been determined in favour of a single contract, then it may be that the port of shipment issue would not have been so obviously decided in favour of Durban rather than Felixstowe, seeing that the single contract would still have referred to Felixstowe as a port of discharge. If Felixstowe was a port of discharge it could, I suppose, be argued that it was also a port of shipment. However, it would in truth be a port of reshipment. I suspect, therefore, that the answer would have been to regard Durban as the critical port of shipment, otherwise all the problems of a single contract governed by a changing regime, highlighted in Mr Schaff's submissions, would ensue. It is not perhaps impossible to have different parts of a single contract governed by a different legal regime, including a different proper law, although I think that this is more familiar to civil law jurisprudence than to the common law, and I would be sceptical about inferring any such intention on the part of the parties. However, this discussion merely emphasises that ultimately this question could be a matter of statutory interpretation rather than contractual construction. These are waters that the submissions of counsel have not entered. Since it is not necessary to decide whether Felixstowe would be a 'port of shipment' within the meaning of s 1(3) of the 1971 Act on the hypothesis of a single contract of carriage, I would prefer to leave the question undetermined.

[30] The critical question is now whether a straight bill of lading is within the regime of the Hague Rules and thus within the regime of the 1971 Act as well.

IS A STRAIGHT BILL OF LADING A 'BILL OF LADING OR ANY SIMILAR DOCUMENT OF TITLE'?

[31] The submissions of the parties on this issue are essentially straightforward, but have little point of contact. On behalf of MSC, Mr Croall submits that negotiability, or more properly speaking transferability, that is to say the ability to transfer the rights and liabilities under the bill of lading contract by indorsement or delivery to a succession of transferees, is essential to the nature and meaning of a 'bill of lading' properly so-called. It is only such a document that can be called a 'document of title' or at any rate a 'similar document of title', for only such a document is capable of transferring title to the goods concerned. That this is so can be traced back to the time when the law merchant developed the bill of lading and recognised in it a universal custom as to its nature. That this remains the position to this day is confirmed by the Law Commission's and the Scottish Law Commission's report Rights of Suit in Respect of Carriage of Goods by Sea (1991) (Law Com no 196, Scot Law Com no 130) (the Law Commission report) and the ensuing Carriage of Goods by Sea Act 1992, which treat a straight bill of lading as if it were a sea waybill and not a bill of lading. The earlier 1971 Act also treated 'a bill of lading' and 'a non-negotiable document' separately in s 1(6)(a) and (b). As for the Hague Rules themselves, their travaux préparatoires demonstrate that in 1924 those responsible for the formulation of the rules, consistently with the law both before and since, regarded transferability as the essence of a bill of lading.

[32] On behalf of MacWilliam, however, Mr Schaff submits that all this is to ignore matters of greater significance. Although a straight bill of lading cannot be

- a transferred down a series of transferees, it can be transferred at any rate once, namely to the named consignee, and that for the purpose of that limited transfer it performs all the functions of a transferable bill of lading. It is a 'document of title', both for that reason and in any event because the consignee cannot obtain possession of the goods without its presentation (see the attestation clause set out at [14], above). Moreover, the Hague Rules are not concerned with transferability
- b per se, but with securing an international regime of minimum standards as to the substance of the bill of lading contract, so as to protect parties who are not privy to its negotiation themselves but are nevertheless bound by its terms by reason of its transfer to them. That is why as between immediate parties to a charterparty the Hague Rules regime does not apply and they therefore retain complete freedom of contract. However, the Hague Rules' rationale applies
- c equally to the first transferee even if he is also the only possible and last transferee: he, like any subsequent transferee, is not in privity with the shipowner prior to transfer. Moreover, since the Hague Rules are an international convention, they should not be construed too narrowly according to domestic English concepts. In this connection, the MSC bill of lading 'looks and smells' like a bill of lading.
- d As for the travaux préparatoires, they demonstrate that straight bills of lading were recognised in 1924, and that the Hague Rules were intended to embrace them. As for the Law Commission report and the 1992 Act, they come too late to affect the issue, and in any event proceed on a view of English law which either reflects too narrow and domestic a view or may even have proceeded upon a mistake. Thus at least since the Bill of Lading Act 1855 a straight bill of lading was
- e treated in exactly the same way, despite its limited transferability, as a fully 'negotiable' bill.

[33] Mr Croall seeks to answer some of these points as follows. He submits that a first transferee is not to be treated as a 'third party' to the original bill of lading contract since he is an immediate party to an underlying sale of goods

f contract with the shipper and thus can influence the terms of the contract of carriage. As for the attestation clause, he submits that it only applies where the bill of lading is 'negotiable' and that 'duly endorsed' in it therefore means 'duly endorsed as appropriate', which would not be the case where the bill is filled in as a straight bill. As for the 1855 Act, that did not apply to straight bills of lading precisely because they were not fully transferable.

- g [34] The arbitrators agreed with MSC's position. Thus in their reasons they argued as follows:

h '21. We were not impressed by the argument put forward on behalf of the claimants that the Hague-Visby Rules apply to straight-consigned bills of lading because a purposive construction of such conventions is necessary to give effect to the basic intention of redressing the imbalance of bargaining power between carriers and cargo interests. As we have already noted, we regard the primary objective of such international conventions as being to protect the interests of third parties to whom bills of lading can be expected to be negotiated but who do not have any say in the initial bargaining process

j which leads to the issuing of the bill of lading.

22. It did not seem to us to assist the claimants to argue that the bill in this case must be presumed to be a bill of lading properly so described since it stated that it was a bill of lading and resembled in all superficial respects a bill of lading. The fact was that it was on a printed form which was clearly intended to be used for both negotiable and non-negotiable bills. The distinction between negotiable bills of lading and straight-consigned bills or waybills is fundamental and whilst counsel for the respondents was able to refer us to a number of decisions which appeared to support his proposition that the touchstone of the distinction between these two types of bills was that one was a negotiable instrument, the endorsement and delivery of which could affect the property [in] the goods shipped, counsel for the claimants did not seem able to find any persuasive support for his position on the authorities. We found ourselves inescapably drawn to the conclusion that the bill of lading in this case was a straight-consigned bill of lading which was not a document of title.’

[35] In the Commercial Court ([2002] 2 Lloyd’s Rep 403) Langley J also agreed with Mr Croall’s submissions. Langley J put the matter thus:

‘[21] In my judgment Mr. Croall is right and Mr. Schaff wrong in these submissions. A “document of title” in this context is, I think, the antithesis of a document which can evidence the title of only one person. It is general not specific to one person. It is a document by which goods can be transferred by endorsement and delivery of the document itself. A straight consigned bill of lading is not such a document. Indeed the parties to this bill have a choice, exercisable by inclusion in Box (2) of the words “Order of” before naming the consignee, whether or not to constitute the bill a document of title in the sense to which I have referred.

[22] While in terms of strict analysis Mr. Schaff is right that no binding authority has determined the question, the consistent and overwhelming burden of judicial and other legal sources is against his submission.

[23] The established definition of a bill of lading includes the characteristics of “transferability” of title to the goods: Scrutton on Charterparties, 20th ed., art. 2, pp. 1–2; Benjamin’s Sale of Goods, 5th ed. par. 18–007; Carver on Bills of Lading, 1st ed. pars 6–007 and 6–014. The Law Commission Report (Law Com No 196) which led to the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1924 noted, at par. 2.50, that a straight consigned bill of lading was not a document of title at common law. The terms of the 1924 Act itself reflect that in s. 1(2). I also agree with Mr. Croall that the travaux préparatoires for the Hague Rules support the same conclusion. So, too, do the terms of s. 1(6)(b) of COGSA, 1971 itself which make express provision for circumstances in which “a non-negotiable document” may result in application of the Rules.’

[36] In the light of these arguments it is necessary to seek to interpret the Hague Rules by reference not only to their background and own terms and purposes, but also to the subsequent viewpoints expressed in authorities, statutes and textbooks.

THE BACKGROUND TO THE HAGUE RULES

[37] A good place to start is the 1855 Act. This provided in part as follows:

‘WHEREAS by the custom of merchants, a bill of lading of goods being transferable by endorsement, the property in goods may thereby pass to the endorsee, but nevertheless all rights in respect of the contract contained in the bill of lading continue in the original shipper or owner; and it is expedient that such rights should pass with the property ...

1. Consignees, and endorsees of bills of lading empowered to sue.—Every consignee of goods named in a bill of lading, and every endorsee of a bill of a lading, to whom the property in the goods therein mentioned shall pass upon or by reason of such consignment or endorsement, shall have transferred to and vested in him all rights of suit, and be subject to the same liabilities in respect of such goods as if the contract contained in the bill of lading had been made with himself.'

b [38] It will be noted first, that the preamble begins by citing the concept of a transferable bill of lading which by the custom of merchants passes property by its indorsement, but secondly, that s 1 extends the idea of passing contractual rights with the property not only to indorseees but also to consignees 'named in a bill' where property in the goods passes 'by reason of such consignment'. Mr Croall, who is concerned to submit that the expression 'bill of lading' can only properly refer to a fully transferable bill and cannot describe a straight consigned bill, is forced to submit that the expression 'Every consignee named in a bill of lading' does not embrace a bill of lading which is neither an 'order' bill nor a bearer bill. It might be said that this limitation is not immediately apparent in the width of the language used ('Every consignee ... named' (my emphasis)), nor in the purpose of this limitation. Why would Parliament not wish a named consignee under a straight bill of lading to have contractual rights and liabilities under the bill of lading passed to him as well as the property in the goods?

c [39] In CP Henderson & Co v Comptoir d'Escompte de Paris (1873) LR 5 PC 253 the Privy Council had to consider a 'bill of lading ... in the usual form, with this difference, that the words "or order or assigns" are omitted'. The Privy Council was prepared to assume that such a bill was not a negotiable instrument. It said (at 259–260):

f 'It has been argued that, notwithstanding the omission of these words, this bill of lading was a negotiable instrument, and there is some authority at nisi prius for that proposition; but, undoubtedly, the general view of the mercantile world has been for some time that, in order to make bills of lading negotiable, some such words as "or order or assigns" ought to be in them.'

g [40] On the basis of this assumption, the question for decision was the effect of the onward indorsement of such a bill by the consignee to the defendant bank in circumstances where the shipper and consignee had privately agreed that the proceeds of sale of the goods should be remitted to London as security for an advance made by the shipper to the consignee. It was held that such indorsement gave the bank only an equitable right to the goods, but that the bank subsequently added to that a legal title when possession of the goods was actually delivered to it. In such a case, whose title was to be preferred, that of Henderson

h the shipper, or that of the bank, the indorsee? That depended on whether the bank had any notice of the trust in favour of Henderson. It was argued that the omission of the usual words 'or order or assigns' put the bank on inquiry, but that argument was rejected. It was held first, that there was no evidence as to why the words were omitted, and secondly, that even if the omission had been observed, it would not have amounted to notice of the arrangement. This

j litigation did not involve a shipowner and thus cannot throw any direct light on the problem under discussion. It seems however that as late as 1873 the significance of the words 'or order' for the negotiability of a bill of lading was still regarded as unsettled; that such a document, even though assumed not to be a negotiable instrument, was still referred to throughout the Privy Council's opinion as a 'bill of lading'; and that even the use of such a bill did not prevent its indorsement passing an equitable title. There is little support in such treatment for regarding the expression 'bill of lading' as reserved in some way exclusively for the admittedly usual form of a bill to order. a

[41] The researches of Mr Croall, for which I am grateful, have produced an extract from the first edition of Carver's A Treatise on the Law relating to the Carriage of Goods by Sea (1885) p 464 (para 481). He there described the bill of lading as— b

'generally a negotiable instrument, carrying with it the right to demand and have possession of the goods described in it ... But in order that it may have this character, it must, it seems, purport on the face of it to be negotiable ... It usually states that delivery is to be to the "order or assigns" of the consignee, or of the shipper; and words of this kind seem to be essential to the negotiability.' c

[42] Carver then went on to refer to the Henderson case. What may be observed about this description is the careful language that whereas the words 'order or assigns' seem essential to negotiability in the stated sense, it is not suggested that negotiability is essential to the existence of a bill of lading; and Carver was cautious to say that the bill of lading was 'generally' a negotiable instrument. d

[43] In The Marlborough Hill v Alex Cowan & Sons Ltd [1921] 1 AC 444 the question was whether a document, described within itself as a bill of lading but written less usually in the form of a receipt of goods for (rather than of) shipment, was a bill of lading for the purposes of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, which set out the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court for an action in rem. The claim had been brought by consignees or indorsees of such documents, which provided for delivery to the shipper's order. The Privy Council held that it was a bill of lading within the meaning of the Act. Among the incidents of the document noted in the speech of Lord Phillimore was that it purported to be negotiable. It seems to me that the observations of Lord Phillimore offer some assistance to both sides of the argument. Mr Croall prays in aid the comment (at 452) that 'If this document is a bill of lading, it is a negotiable instrument'. On the other hand, Mr Schaff points to passages which stress other incidents of the document as being standard for a bill of lading, such as detailed terms and conditions in familiar form; the fact that the document is called a bill of lading many times in the course of such provisions and that it is made subject to the United States Harter Act 1893 (the Harter Act); the fact that it provides that 'If required by the shipowner, one signed bill of lading, duly endorsed, must be surrendered on delivery of the goods'; and that it 'ends in the time honoured form', viz 'In witness whereof the master or agent of said vessel has signed three bills of lading, all of this tenor and date, of which if one is accomplished, the others shall be void' (see [1921] 1 AC 444 at 452–453). I do not for my part read Lord Phillimore as saying that negotiability is essential to the existence of a bill of lading nor even that it was its defining aspect. If that was so, he would not have to look further. He was rather emphasising that the document would work as merchants would expect a bill of lading to work. Thus he said (at 452): e
f
g
h
j

'Money can be advanced upon it, and business can be done in the way in which maritime commerce has been carried on for at least half a century, throughout the civilised world. Both parties have agreed to call this a bill of lading; both, by its terms have entered into obligations and acquired rights a such as are proper to a bill of lading. All the other incidents in its very detailed language are such as are proper to such a document.'

[44] In my judgment this tells one nothing as to whether a non-negotiable bill of lading could not properly be called such. Indeed, it would be a remarkable thing if a claim by a consignee under a non-negotiable bill of lading would not merit falling under the admiralty jurisdiction.

b [45] In 1924, on the eve of the Hague Rules, Thrige v United Shipping Co Ltd (1924) 18 Ll L Rep 6 suggests that at any rate in England (for the position in the United States, see below) the use of a straight bill of lading was regarded as unusual and its ramifications still unsettled. The plaintiff Thrige was a Danish seller of machinery to a purchaser in England, the Victoria Co. The terms of sale c were cash against documents. Thrige used a Danish line to carry the machinery and took a straight bill of lading which named the Victoria Co as the consignee without any reference to 'or order or assigns'. The goods were discharged at Harwich and proceeded by rail to London, where the Great Eastern Railway delivered them to the Victoria Co without production of the bill of lading, and d Thrige, whose documents had not been taken up, thereby lost the value of the shipment. The role of the defendant line in this matter was obscure: at any rate the actual decision in the case was that no cause of action had been shown against it at all, since it acted as a mere agent without possession of the goods. However, the interest of the case for present purposes is that, of all judges, Scrutton LJ himself was intrigued by the issues which might have arisen if the carrier itself, e the Danish line, had been sued. He described the bill of lading (at 8) as being 'in a very odd and unusual form' in that it was taken neither to the shipper's nor to the consignee's order. At any rate he appears to have been quite comfortable in describing the document as a bill of lading. He went on to say (at 9):

f 'That renders it unnecessary to decide the question which I personally feel considerable interest in, i.e., as to whether, when a bill of lading is made out to a consignee and the property passes on shipment, the shipowner who delivers to the named consignee without production of the bill of lading is or is not guilty of any breach of contract. It is not necessary to decide it; and I only wish to say that if the Stettin case (1889), 14 PD 142, decides there is such a duty, I think the Stettin case may require consideration. I am not expressing g a final opinion, but I do not at present agree that with a statement in the simple form that I have stated it, where the property is passed on shipment and the bill of lading is to a named consignee, the agent of the shipowner gets into any difficulties if he delivers to the named consignee without production of such bill of lading. It is also unnecessary to determine whether such bill of h lading is or is not a negotiable instrument.'

[46] There are a number of separate strands for consideration in that dictum. One raises the question whether the proper analysis of a sale cash against documents is that property passes on shipment (subject to a vendor's lien) or whether property does not pass until the exchange of payment and documents. j Another is the question, which I will consider separately below, whether a carrier under a straight bill of lading is entitled to deliver the goods to the named consignee without production of the bill of lading. On the submissions in this court there is a dispute both as to this issue in itself and also as to whether, if production of the bill of lading remains necessary, this by itself makes a straight bill a 'similar document of title'. What for the present is of particular interest, however, is that as late as 1924 even so hugely experienced a figure as Scrutton LJ himself should be expressing uncertainty as to the effect of a straight bill of lading. a

THE UNITED STATES LAW PRIOR TO THE HAGUE RULES

[47] In the United States, on the other hand, the straight bill of lading was sufficiently recognised at a relatively early stage as to be given specific treatment in the Pomerene Bills of Lading Act 1916 (USC title 49) (the Pomerene Act). It is defined (s 2) as a bill in which it is stated that the goods are consigned or destined to a specified person. Such a bill 'shall have placed plainly upon its face by the carrier issuing it 'nonnegotiable' or "not negotiable"' (see s 6). Section 29 provides: b

'A bill may be transferred by the holder by delivery, accompanied with an agreement, express or implied, to transfer the title to the bill or to the goods represented thereby ...' c

Section 32 provides:

'A person to whom a bill has been transferred, but not negotiated, acquires thereby as against the transferor the title to the goods, subject to the terms of any agreement with the transferor. If the bill is a straight bill such person also acquires the right to notify the carrier of the transfer to him of such bill and thereby to become the direct obligee of whatever obligations the carrier owed to the transferor of the bill immediately before notification ...' d

[48] It appears that under United States law a straight bill of lading within the Pomerene Act is subject to the minimum contractual standards of the Harter Act, s 1 of which applied the Act's scope to 'any bill of lading or shipping document'. The Harter Act was a leading precursor of the Hague Rules. e

THE HAGUE RULES

[49] Scrutton pp 404–417 contains helpful 'Introductory Notes' concerning the history of the Hague Rules both in their original and in their amended form (the Hague-Visby Rules). I would extract the following (pp 404–405): f

'At common law the shipowner, whether he carried the goods under a charterparty or under a bill of lading, could modify his prima facie liability as carrier as much as he wished, and in the course of years the protective exceptions in these documents increased both in number and complexity to such an extent that a careful scrutiny of the documents became necessary in order to ascertain what rights they conferred against the shipowner. So far as charterparties were concerned this was unobjectionable; the decreased liabilities enabled the shipowner to carry at a lower rate of freight and the charterer had ample opportunity of ascertaining the terms of his contract. With bills of lading, however, different considerations arose. Not only were they contracts of carriage but they were also documents of title, which by virtue of mercantile custom and the Bills of Lading Act 1855, passed freely from hand to hand as part of the currency of trade conferring on their holder both rights and liabilities. Thus consignees, bankers and others who had not been parties to the original contract and had no effective control over its terms, became interested in the bill of lading without having had any real opportunity of examining its terms or assessing the value of the security it afforded. In the years before and immediately after the 1914–18 War, as the g a terms of bills of lading became more diverse, the need for standardisation became more and more insistent and an increasing demand was made on the part of importers and exporters for the imposition by legislation, on the lines of the American Harter Act 1893, of certain minimum liabilities of sea-carriers who issued bills of lading.'
h
j

b [50] The distinction drawn between the freedom of contract which was unobjectionable as between immediate parties to a contract of carriage and the need for protection for subsequent transferees is the explanation for a number of the provisions of the Hague Rules. I need to set out the following extracts:

'ARTICLE I

c ... (b) "Contract of carriage" applies only to contracts of carriage covered by a bill of lading or any similar document of title, in so far as such document relates to the carriage of goods by sea, including any bill of lading or any similar document as aforesaid issued under or pursuant to a charterparty from the moment at which such bill of lading or any similar document of title regulates the relations between a carrier and a holder of the same ...

ARTICLE V

e ... The provisions of these Rules shall not be applicable to charterparties, but if bills of lading are issued in the case of a ship under a charterparty they shall comply with the terms of these Rules ...

ARTICLE VI

f Notwithstanding the provisions of the preceding Articles, a carrier, master or agent of the carrier, and a shipper shall in regard to any particular goods be at liberty to enter into any agreement in any terms as to the responsibility and liability of the carrier for such goods ... provided that in this case no bill of lading has been or shall be issued and that the terms agreed shall be embodied in a receipt which shall be a non-negotiable document and shall be marked as such. Any agreement so entered into shall have full legal effect: Provided that this Article shall not apply to ordinary commercial shipments made in the ordinary course of trade, but only to other shipments where the character or condition of the property to be carried or the circumstances, terms and conditions under which the carriage is to be performed, are such as reasonably to justify a special agreement.'

g [51] Thus, arts I(b) and V make it plain both that the Hague Rules do not apply to charterparties at all (because they are only contracts between immediate parties) and that they only apply to bills of lading issued under a charterparty once they have started to regulate the relations between the carrier and a bill of lading holder. This latter rule reflects the doctrine that when a bill of lading is issued to a shipper who is also in charterparty relations with the carrier, then as long as the bill of lading remains in the shipper's hands it operates only as a receipt and does not in the least affect the contractual regime under the charterparty: once, however, the bill of lading is transferred into the hands of a third party, then it springs into life as a separate contract of carriage, which is why it must comply at the outset with the requirements of the Hague Rules. Scrutton (p 424) mentions as an example of 'the moment' from which a bill of lading issued under a charterparty regulates the relations between a carrier and the bill's holder as being— a

‘if the charterer ships goods and takes a bill of lading making the goods deliverable to a named consignee, the time when the bill of lading is delivered to the consignee.’

Unless this text is written on the assumption that a bill of lading must by definition be negotiable, that reads very much like the case of a straight bill of lading. b

[52] This court was not addressed by counsel as to the significance of art VI. I would therefore be reluctant to place too much weight on its terms. It seems to me, however, to be saying that a shipper and a carrier may agree any terms for carriage provided that (i) no bill of lading is issued, (ii) the terms agreed are embodied in a document described instead as a ‘receipt’ and marked as ‘non-negotiable’, and (iii) the shipments concerned are of a special nature such as reasonably to justify a special agreement. This article effectively renders such an exceptional, permissive regime one that exists only at the fringes of carriage by sea. It gives no support to the hypothesis that a straight bill of lading dealing with ordinary commercial shipments would lie outside the international minimum standards of the Hague Rules. c

[53] It may be noted that when the Hague Rules were scheduled to the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act 1924, s 4 of the latter disapplied the final proviso of art VI in relation to any carriage of goods from one port in Great Britain or Northern Ireland to any other such port (or in the Irish Free State), so that in relation to such shipments art VI, which begins with the paramount words ‘Notwithstanding the provisions of the preceding articles’, entitles the shipper and carrier to operate in a regime of complete freedom of contract in relation to goods of any kind, provided only that no bill of lading is issued and instead the terms of carriage are embodied in a receipt marked as non-negotiable. d

THE INTERPRETATION OF THE HAGUE RULES

[54] It is by now well recognised that English statutes which give effect to international conventions need to be interpreted with the international origin of the rules well in mind. In Stag Line Ltd v Foscolo, Mango & Co Ltd [1932] AC 328, [1931] All ER Rep 666, with reference to the Hague Rules themselves as incorporated into the 1924 Act, Lord Atkin said ([1932] AC 328 at 342–343, [1931] All ER Rep 666 at 673): e

‘It will be remembered that the Act only applies to contracts of carriage of goods outwards from ports of the United Kingdom: and the rules will often have to be interpreted in the courts of the foreign consignees. For the purpose of uniformity it is, therefore, important that the Courts should apply themselves without any predilection for the former law, always preserving the right to say that words used in the English language which have already in the particular context received judicial interpretation may be presumed to be used in the sense already judicially imputed to them.’ f

[55] And Lord MacMillan famously said ([1932] AC 328 at 350, [1931] All ER Rep 666 at 677): g

‘As these rules must come under the consideration of foreign Courts it is desirable in the interests of uniformity that their interpretation should not be h

- a rigidly controlled by domestic precedents of antecedent date, but rather that the language of the rules should be construed on broad principles of general acceptance.'

THE TRAVAUX PRÉPARATOIRES OF THE HAGUE RULES

- b [56] Both Mr Schaff and Mr Croall relied on the travaux préparatoires as pointing in their favour, while both recognised that in this area 'only a bull's eye counts'. The arbitrators tended to think that they supported Mr Croall's position, for they said:

- c '... it did seem to us to be clear that there was nothing in these records of the discussions leading to the convention to suggest that the expression "bill of lading" in the strict legal sense was intended to extend to documents which were not negotiable. This was perhaps not surprising, since our understanding is that the overwhelming concern of the international body which were responsible for this convention was to ensure that the progress of international trade was promoted by safe-guarding the rights of third parties to whom bills of lading might be negotiated.'

- d [57] I would readily agree with the last sentiment, but this passage tends to beg two or even three questions at the heart of this case: one is whether, there was in 1924 a 'strict legal sense' limiting the expression 'bill of lading' to a negotiable document: Scrutton LJ's dictum in Thrige v United Shipping Co Ltd (1924) 18 Ll L Rep 6 at 9 would suggest there was not. The second is whether the logic of the legislators of the Hague Rules did not extend to all third parties to whom bills of lading might be transferred, such as a named consignee. The third is whether too narrow a domestic view of things is in any event the correct approach.

- e [58] Langley J ([2002] 2 Lloyd's Rep 403 at [23] (see [35], above)) also considered that the travaux préparatoires supported Mr Croall. It appears, however, that both the arbitrators and the judge had less of the material than was available in this court.

- f [59] As often occurs, the travaux préparatoires are rich in ambiguity. I am not sure that either party has scored a bull's eye. What, however, does I think emerge, and does so with some clarity, is that the assembled representatives were anxious to preserve freedom of contract for immediate parties and protection for third parties (that is not in dispute); that the case of straight bills of lading was discussed in conference, without it must be said an unequivocal result; but also that it is impossible to find any clear statement of an intention to exclude straight bills of lading from the protection of the Hague Rules. I shall try to indicate the basis of these conclusions.

- g [60] At the London Conference held in October 1922 (see Sturley The legislative history of the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act and the travaux préparatoires of the Hague Rules (1990)) a question was asked as to bills of lading issued under charterparties where shipper and receiver are the same person (ie as I suppose, where the shipment is between two branches of the same organisation): what if the bill of lading was not negotiated? Sir Leslie Scott (recently Solicitor-General) said (vol 2, p 391) that in such a case the bill of lading remained a mere receipt and the contract was to be found in the charterparty—

j 'and it is only when it is negotiated ... and gets into the hands of a third party that it will represent the conditions of carriage ... I have always understood up to now that the intention, at The Hague and subsequently, always has been in those cases [ordinary charterparty shipments] to leave freedom of contract unaffected.' a

The chairman (Sir Henry Duke, President of the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division) said (vol 2, p 395):

'At The Hague the view was that there was business which was between two individuals, and with which the Bankers and Insurers and the world at large had nothing to do, where the shipper was the receiver of the goods and was intended to be, and that you need not legislate about them ...' b

[61] That was on 10 October. On 24 October, a discussion was initiated which focused on the 'bill of lading as a negotiable document, bearing the clause "to order"' and the role of a subsequent holder 'who took no part in its drafting' (vol 1, p 349). At one point, however, there was this exchange (vol 1, pp 352–353): c

Mr. de Rousiers.—That is what we understand by "connaissance négociable" (negotiable bill of lading) or "connaissance à personne dénommée" (bill of lading for a designated person). In fact, negotiable bills are the vast majority. d

Mr. Beecher.—In so far as I understand Sir Leslie Scott, he seems to believe that these rules, as they are defined, only apply to bills of lading that are negotiated or negotiable. But the opinion of the London Conference was (and in my opinion, that is essential) that these rules apply to all bills of lading whether negotiable or not. I am told that a bill of lading that is not deemed negotiable in England is so on the Continent. e

The Chairman [Mr. Louis Franck].—Not negotiable, but simply transferable under the rules concerning the transfer of civil obligations according to law.

Mr. Beecher.—But Sir Leslie Scott seems to be mistaken about what we understand as the subject of these rules. This is why I want to know whether the rules apply to all bills of lading indiscriminately, whether negotiable or not. f

The Chairman.—What does the Harter Act say on the matter?

Mr. Beecher.—It applies to all bills of lading indiscriminately.

Sir Leslie Scott.—It is the same here. The rules apply to all bills of lading, but there is nothing in the convention that says that when a charterer by means of his charter party receives a bill of lading from the shipowner, it constitutes a new contract between him and the shipowner.' g

[62] That exchange, between, as it appears, representatives of the United Kingdom, France and the United States, would seem to be directly in point and favours Mr Schaff. On the other hand, just a few pages on (p 385), Mr Franck raises the same question again, with specific reference to art I(b): h

'Let us now return to article 1(b), which we had left to one side. With all possible respect to the authors of this proposal, I do not find it very clear. Do you intend to exclude those bills of lading called, "connaissances à personne dénommée" (bills of lading for a denominated person).' j

[63] To which Sir Leslie Scott replies: 'I believe the French delegation considers the drafting adequate.' It is not clear whether Sir Leslie Scott is saying, consistently with his answer a few short pages before, 'Yes, as the French

- a delegation itself accepts', or whether he is simply failing to answer the question. It would make more sense to suppose the former.

[64] So far, these materials were not before the arbitrators or Langley J. They assist Mr Schaff. Indeed, the exchange quoted at [61], above, taken by itself, could be described as a 'bull's eye'. The balance of the materials discussed below, however, were before the arbitrators and/or Langley J.

- b [65] The conference resumed in October 1923 in Brussels. There was a discussion as to the meaning of 'any similar document of title' in art I(b) (vol 1, pp 432–433):

'Mr. Berlingieri indicated that this idea was expressed in the comments of the German delegation, where it said "document giving to the legitimate holder the right to the goods carried."

- c Sir Leslie Scott added that it was a document that could be negotiated with a banker.

Mr. Ripert asked if one might apply these rules to a nominal (ie a straight) bill of lading?

- d The Chairman replied that one could, except when it was a matter of a non-negotiable bill of lading. In such a case article 6 (see [50], above) would apply.

Mr. Ripert verified that the rules did not apply to a bill of lading that was non-negotiable and felt that this should be pointed out in article 1.

Sir Leslie Scott observed that that happened in article 6.'

- e [66] A few lines later the question was asked what a 'similar document of title' might be. Sir Leslie Scott gave a mate's receipt as an example and added: 'The desire was to avoid the possible side-stepping of the convention by the parties through the adoption of a similar document that was not called a bill of lading.'

- f [67] As far as it goes, this passage might seem to assist Mr Croall rather than Mr Schaff, but it is difficult to interpret, possibly because of terminological uncertainties. A distinction is made between a negotiable and a non-negotiable straight bill. Since a straight or nominal bill is by definition one made out to a named consignee only, what is the difference? It could perhaps depend on the use to which the straight bill is put. Where it is not used with a contract of sale, as where the shipper and receiver are the same person, or perhaps two different companies within the same group, then there might be no question of any transfer of title. Where, however, the bill of lading is used as part of international trade, for instance under a cif sale under which title is not intended to pass save against payment for the documents, then although the bill, not being an 'order' or bearer bill, is not negotiable in the full sense, ie repeatedly transferable, it is transferable once. It may be that 'negotiable' is being used in these passages both in the sense of meaning fully transferable and in the sense of limited transferability. That would at any rate explain why Scrutton LJ in Thrige v United Shipping Co Ltd (1924) 18 Ll L Rep 6 was uncertain whether a straight bill of lading was to be regarded as a negotiable instrument or not (see [45], above). Moreover, the reference to the future art VI is interesting, for that is not concerned with bills of lading at all, and is limited to shipments outside the ordinary course of commerce. It is very difficult indeed to think that straight bills were thought of as falling within that description.

[68] It is also interesting to note that in Sir Leslie Scott's view the expression 'or any similar document of title' was intended as an anti-avoidance device. As such it is a useful one, for where the document can affect title, it has the capacity to affect third parties, who, of course are the object of the conference's concern. a

[69] I think that my understanding of these texts is supported by a further discussion a few pages on (vol 1, pp 435–436) about the language in art I(b) 'from the moment' etc. Article I(b) says 'from the moment at which such bill of lading or similar document of title regulates the relations between a carrier and a holder of the same'. Various expressions were canvassed, such as 'from the moment the bill of lading is negotiated' and 'from the moment it is remitted to a third party'. b
The trouble with the latter was the possibility that a third party 'might be an agent of the shipper'; moreover, where goods were simply sent abroad by a shipper to its own factory, 'there is no third-party interest'. It may not be a coincidence that the enigmatic word 'negotiated' was passed by. At any rate the chairman, Mr Franck, remarked— c

'that it would be up to the courts to decide in each case if there was a bill of lading, that is to say, a document representing the goods on board a specific ship giving title to delivery.'

My understanding is also supported by this passage (vol 1, p 441): d

'The Chairman stated that as soon as a bill of lading could be negotiated, and placed in the possession of a holder, it should conform to the Hague Rules ... No one carried goods without a bill of lading, except in cases that were altogether out of the ordinary, which there is no point discussing here, because the question posed is purely theoretical. In general, the shipper had a bill of lading, and he needed this document of title to receive the goods at their destination, to prove his rights toward the captain, to insure the goods, to get credit. What one more often sees, perhaps, are straight bills of lading, but in every case there was a bill of lading or similar document of title.' (My emphasis.) e

[70] On the other hand, as a matter of counterpoint there is the following passage (from a subsequent day's session) in Mr Croall's favour (vol 1, pp 477–478): f

'The Chairman [Mr. Loder] noted that in the convention everything concerning the bill of lading had been regulated and that article 6 had been inserted later to show that in this case there was freedom of contract. From the time when the bill of lading was negotiable (sic negotiated?), the convention applied. But if there was no bill of lading, it did not apply and freedom of contract still existed. g

Sir Leslie Scott attested that the scope of the convention was just that indicated by Mr. Loder. The possibility existed of issuing a non-negotiable document. Here the term "bill of lading" meant an ordinary bill of lading, that is to say, negotiable. h

Mr. Berlingieri wanted there to be understanding on the meaning of the word negotiable. He would prefer the word "non-transferable" instead of "non-negotiable" because a straight bill of lading could be a negotiable bill of lading provided the transfer formalities were fulfilled. One might therefore evade the convention by always creating a straight bill of lading and by later fulfilling the formalities required for transfer. j

Mr. Franck believed that the concept of the first conference had been for the bill of lading to be "to bearer" or "to order." If it were a straight bill of lading, one might allow transfer by the normal method. It should not be a feared that, by means of transfer under general law, one could evade this provision.'

However, almost immediately another representative, Mr Sohr, noted that—

b 'the express goal of article 3 (sic art III, r 8) had been to prevent frauds and agreements like those indicated by Mr. Berlingieri. It was evident that one could not evade the convention by creating a straight bill of lading and by having recourse to civil transfer. It was still necessary that it should not apply to ordinary commercial cargoes since the last paragraph (sic of art VI) expressly prevented it.'

c [71] That is a statement in Mr Schaff's favour, for it makes a plain distinction between the subject matter of art VI and the ordinary case of a straight bill of lading.

[72] This led to a further discussion of the purpose of art VI. Mr Franck returned (vol 1, pp 478–479) to the charge:

d 'But what was established was that there was no way of evading, by means of this text, the chief object of the convention, which was to protect negotiable bills of lading "to order".

e The Chairman re-affirmed this point of view. The convention only regulated the question of bills of lading. If one was not issued, the absolute freedom of the parties remained. But if one created a bill of lading, it was necessary to do so according to the rules decreed by the convention.

f Mr. Ripert wanted a clear statement on two points. In France there was an important trade with the United States, which imported typewriters, industrial machines, etc. This trade was carried out by firms that shipped these machines to themselves or their branch offices with no intention of transferring the bills of lading to third parties. It should be understood that it was permissible to issue a nominal bill of lading for these machines that did not include the clause "to order" and to which the rules did not apply.

Sir Leslie Scott pointed out that the rules always applied to ordinary commercial cargoes. (My emphasis.)

Mr. Ripert asked what should be understood by exceptional cargoes.

g Sir Leslie Scott cited some examples. Aboard was a cargo of cotton damaged by seawater and there was a desire to reshipe what remained of this damaged cargo. Another example might be the shipment of a product containing some new material when it was not known whether this cargo would suit the ship, for which it might be dangerous. That was an experimental shipment. It was the beginning of what would perhaps later become an ordinary trade, but for the time being it was still an exceptional cargo.

h [73] It seems to me that this passage confirms, what appears to me the natural construction of art VI, that straight bills of lading were not intended to fall within j it. This passage also demonstrates that although a bill of lading under which a shipper ships to himself (the French example of the typewriter trade) would, for reasons quite outside art VI, lie beyond the rules since such a bill of lading would remain a mere receipt, nevertheless, where ordinary commercial cargoes were concerned, the rules were intended to bite, even if, as I would hazard, the bill of lading was a straight (nominal) one.

[74] This is I think confirmed by a further passage, the last that I will cite, a page later (vol 1, p 480) as follows:

‘Mr. Ripert felt that that was not enough because the nominal bill of lading in France could be transferred. Would it be necessary to make the bill of lading completely non-transferable (sic to fall within art VI)?

Sir Leslie Scott stated that a nominal bill of lading fell just as much under the convention as any other bill of lading, even if it had not been transferred.’

[75] In sum, I would regard this material as showing that at the heart of the Conference’s concern was the archetypal fully negotiable, ie repeatedly transferable, bill of lading, which of course was the paradigm case of a document of title and an instrument which therefore would come into the hands of third parties. Such a document was the prime focus of the Hague Rules. On the other hand there were a number of other cases where it is clear that the representatives intended the rules to be disappplied: such as the charterparty, such as the bill of lading issued under a charterparty to a shipper in whose hands it remained a mere receipt, such as a mere receipt marked non-negotiable in the context of out of the ordinary shipments, and such as a bill of lading which could never come into the hands of a third party as a document of title because it was consigned by a shipper only to himself. That left the question: what of a straight bill of lading, which was not a mere receipt in the hands of the original shipper, which was not a consignment by a shipper to himself, and which was not an extraordinary shipment, but an ordinary contract of carriage in international trade pursuant to a sale contract under whose terms title was to remain with the seller/shipper until transfer of the shipping documents, such a document as was in every sense like an ‘order’ bill of lading save that the shipment was consigned to a named consignee and thus could only be transferred once? At the end of the day, I do not think that there is anything in the travaux préparatoires which I have seen which unequivocally states that such a case is outside the scope of the Hague Rules, and there is much in that material which points in the opposite direction.

AUTHORITIES FROM THE HAGUE RULES TO THE 1971 ACT

[76] It took the best part of 20 years for a British court to consider the question of a non-negotiable document by reference to the Hague Rules and then it fell to the Northern Ireland Court of Appeal to do so, in Hugh Mack & Co Ltd v Burns & Laird Lines Ltd (1944) 77 Ll L Rep 377. The shipment was of men’s clothing from Belfast to Glasgow, carried pursuant to a consignment note and receipt stamped ‘Non-negotiable’. The consignment note named consignees in Scotland and stated: ‘Please receive for forwarding per Burns and Laird Lines’ steamers the undernoted goods ...’. These documents were retained by the shipper. The goods were damaged and the shipper claimed against the carrier, which relied on terms incorporated into its receipt. The shipper said that the Hague Rules applied by virtue of the 1924 Act. The claim failed on two grounds. The first was that the consignment note and receipt was not a bill of lading or any similar document of title; the second was that in any event the parties had freedom of contract under art VI as amended in the case of coastal trade within the British Isles and Ireland by s 4 of the 1924 Act. As to the first point Andrews LCJ said (at 383):

‘Such a receipt, even if it can be properly described as a “document of title,” is not “similar to” a bill of lading. It has none of its characteristics. It is different in form; it is given at a different time; it bears no stamp; it does not a acknowledge the goods to be on board any particular ship, nor, indeed, does it acknowledge a shipment on board at all; it is retained by the consignor, not sent to the consignee; above all, it is not a negotiable instrument, the indorsement and delivery of which may affect the property in the goods shipped.'

b [77] Mr Croall relies on that 'above all'; but of course a document which was retained and was never intended to be sent to the consignee as a symbol of the goods could never have affected the property in the goods. It is plain, moreover, that the receipt was never treated as a 'bill of lading' of any kind, nor similar to one.

c [78] Gardano & Giampari v Greek Petroleum George Mamidakis & Co [1961] 3 All ER 919, [1962] 1 WLR 40 is another of the small number of cases in English law which are concerned with straight bills of lading. The shipment in that case was made by Greek Petroleum under a c&f sale contract with the Greek Ministry of Commerce and pursuant to a charterparty between Greek Petroleum and the claimant shipowner, Gardano. The bill of lading simply named the Greek Ministry as consignee. The shipowner argued, in reliance on s 1 of the Bills of d Lading Act 1855 (see [37], above) that the shipper had lost its title to sue as a result of the transfer of the bill of lading to the consignee. That argument failed on a number of grounds, one of which was that s 1 of the 1855 Act did not operate where property had passed under the express terms of the sale contract not on or by reason of the consignment but ex the loading installation. If, however, e Mr Croall were correct in his submissions, s 1 could never have applied in any event. But for the special terms of the sale contract, however, McNair J would have treated it as a typical cif or c&f contract, which he described in these terms ([1961] 3 All ER 919 at 924, [1962] 1 WLR 40 at 52):

f 'It is quite true that in an ordinary contract of sale in the traditional c.i.f or c. & f. form the seller discharges his obligations as regards delivery by tendering a bill of lading covering the goods. It is not necessary for me here to state all the qualifications involved, but the transaction is essentially one which has been correctly described as a sale of goods performed by delivery of documents, and in the normal way the property passes when the documents are taken up.'

g [79] This question was further discussed in the Privy Council in Kum v Wah Tat Bank Ltd [1971] 1 Lloyd's Rep 439 at 446. The documents in that case were mate's receipts stated to be consigned to a named consignee and marked 'non-negotiable'. The case was decided on a different point, but Lord Devlin said:

h 'It is well settled that "Negotiable", when used in relation to a bill of lading, means simply transferable. A negotiable bill of lading is not negotiable in the strict sense; it cannot, as can be done by the negotiation of a bill of exchange, give to the transferee a better title than the transferor has got, but it can by i endorsement and delivery give as good a title. But it has never been settled whether delivery of a non-negotiable bill of lading transfers title or possession at all. The bill of lading obtains its symbolic quality from the custom found in Lickbarrow v. Mason ((1787) 2 Term Rep 63, 100 ER 35) and that is a custom which makes bills of lading "negotiable and transferable" by endorsement and delivery or transmission. To the same effect the Bills of Lading Act, 1855, recites that a bill of lading is by the custom of merchants

"transferable by endorsement". There appears to be no authority on the effect of a non-negotiable bill of lading. This is not surprising. When consignor and consignee are also seller and buyer, as they most frequently are, the shipment ordinarily serves as delivery (Sale of Goods Act, 1893, sect. 32(1)) and also as an unconditional appropriation of the goods (sect. 18, rule 5(2)) which passes the property. So as between seller and buyer it does not usually matter whether the bill of lading is a document of title or not.'

[80] So the point remained undecided. However, I understand Lord Devlin here to be speaking purely generally about the sale of goods issue. I can see no reason why as between a seller and a buyer under a cif sale the usual principle discussed by McNair J in the Gardano & Giampari case does not apply, even in the case of a straight bill. The seller does not wish to part with property unless the buyer pays for the documents, and the seller/shipper who is left with both goods and documents wishes to be protected against losing his goods to a consignee who is allowed to take delivery of them from the ship without production of a bill of lading.

[81] The Maurice Desgagnes [1977] 1 Lloyd's Rep 290 is a decision of the Canada Federal Court. The issue was whether a document, which was not described as a bill of lading, was not issued by or with the authority of the carrier, and which recorded shipment by Canadian General Electric Co at Barrie, Ontario, of goods consigned to itself at St John's, Newfoundland, was a bill of lading within the meaning of the Hague Rules as scheduled to the Canadian Carriage of Goods by Water Act 1970. Reference was made to Hugh Mack & Co Ltd v Burns & Laird Lines Ltd (1944) 77 Ll L Rep 377. Dube J concluded as follows (at 296):

'The document before the Court is not titled "bill of lading" and there is nothing to indicate that the carrier intended it to be a bill of lading. In fact, the defendant carrier in his defence alleges it did not issue a bill of lading. The document has to be considered as a mere receipt given by the forwarder to the shipper, and not a negotiable bill of lading issued by the shipowner and signed by the master or other agent in authority.'

Although relied on by Mr Croall, I do not think that this case takes the matter any further forward at all.

THE CARRIAGE OF GOODS BY SEA ACT 1971

[82] The 1971 Act was the medium by which the Hague-Visby Rules were introduced to English law. As in the case of the 1924 Act, the 1971 Act required a 'bill of lading or any similar document of title'. However, the concept of a 'receipt which is a non-negotiable document marked as such' and which 'expressly provides that the Rules are to govern the contract as if the receipt were a bill of lading' makes its entrance. The relevant provisions are s 1(4) and (6), as follows:

'(4) Subject to subsection (6) below, nothing in this section shall be taken as applying anything in the Rules to any contract for the carriage of goods by sea, unless the contract expressly or by implication provides for the issue of a bill of lading or any similar document of title ...

(6) Without prejudice to Article X(c) of the Rules, the Rules shall have the force of law in relation to—(a) any bill of lading if the contract contained in or evidenced by it expressly provides that the Rules shall govern the contract, a and (b) any receipt which is a non-negotiable document marked as such if the contract contained in or evidenced by it is a contract for the carriage of goods by sea which expressly provides that the Rules are to govern the contract as if the receipt were a bill of lading, but subject, where paragraph (b) applies, to any necessary modifications and in particular with the omission of Article III of the Rules of the second sentence of paragraph 4 and of paragraph 7.'

[83] As for the Hague-Visby Rules scheduled to the 1971 Act, arts I(b), V, and VI remained as they had done under the Hague Rules.

[84] The concept of a receipt which is a non-negotiable document marked as such derives from art VI of the Hague Rules: but there, as in the same article of the Hague-Visby Rules, it was a means for contracting out of the Hague Rules; whereas under s 1(6) it is an alternative means for incorporating the Hague Rules. However, s 4 of the 1924 Act, which disappplied the final proviso of art VI in the case of coastal voyages, now disappears.

[85] Mr Croall relies on the concept of a non-negotiable receipt in s 1(6) as being an indication that a bill of lading within the meaning of the 1971 Act, and therefore, it is suggested, within the meaning of the Hague Rules themselves, is something different from a straight bill of lading. The arbitrators and the judge indorsed that submission. However, I am not convinced by this reasoning. A non-negotiable receipt is not prima facie the same thing as a straight bill of lading. A premise to the contrary would mean that all talk of a straight bill of lading is incoherent, a contradiction in terms, and that would make nonsense of much of the discussion of the issue which I have cited above. There was no investigation in counsel's submissions into the origins of the distinction drawn in s 1(6), but I would hazard that it derives from the previous concepts of art VI and s 4 of the 1924 Act. Article VI says that you are only very exceptionally permitted to avoid issuing a bill of lading where otherwise you would be required to do so, and thus to take yourself outside the Hague Rules, but that when entitled to do so you have to do so in a very clear manner, avoiding the language of bill of lading and making it clear that the document concerned, described as a receipt, is non-negotiable. It is clear from the terms of art VI above and from the travaux préparatoires that art VI is not covering the ground of a straight bill of lading. Section 4 of the 1924 Act said that you could use that device in less restricted circumstances, namely in all coasting voyages between ports in the British Isles including all of Ireland. Section 1(6) of the 1971 Act now provided that the same technique could be used not only to take you outside the Hague Rules but, where the document also makes it clear that the Hague-Visby Rules are to govern as if the document were a bill of lading, to bring you back inside the Hague Rules. It appears that such documents are in use on short journeys, such as cross-Channel trips, where it is not necessary or practicable to employ a bill of lading surrender of which by the receiver is required to obtain delivery of the goods. Nevertheless, there is no inevitable desire in such a trade to stand outside the terms of the Hague Rules; and so special provision was made to allow such documents to come back within the regime of the Hague Rules. See McCarren & Co Ltd v Humber International Transport Ltd and Truckline Ferries (Poole) Ltd, The Vechscroon [1982] 1 Lloyd's Rep 301, where the document covered the carriage of sides of pork from Poole to Cherbourg and was described as a 'commercial vehicle movement order'; and Browner International Ltd v Monarch Shipping Co Ltd, The European Enterprise [1989] 2 Lloyd's Rep 185, where the carriage was of a refrigerated tractor trailer from Dover to Calais under a document described as a consignment note/waybill in respect of a contract which expressly provided that no bill of lading would be issued. It would be quite understandable that the United Kingdom, with its enormous trade between its own islands and the continent, might wish to make special provision for such circumstances.

UP TO THE CARRIAGE OF GOODS BY SEA ACT 1992

[86] In Cia Portoraffi Commerciale SA v Ultramar Panama Inc, The Captain Gregos [1990] 3 All ER 967 there was a claim in tort by purchasers of a cargo of oil which had been carried under bills of lading which incorporated the Hague-Visby Rules. There was an alleged theft of part of the cargo, and the question was whether art III, r 6 of the Hague-Visby Rules barred the claim on the ground that it had not been brought within one year. The Court of Appeal held that it could not finally determine the issue on the present facts, because it was not yet clear whether the claimants were parties to the bills. It was in this context that Bingham LJ said (at 976–977):

‘As s 1(4) of the 1971 Act and art I, para (b) and art X of the rules in particular make clear, the bill of lading is the bedrock on which this mandatory code is founded. A bill of lading is a contractual document with certain commercially well-known consequences when indorsed and transferred. It is not clear to me why the code should treat the existence of a bill of lading as a matter of such central and overriding importance if the code is to apply with equal force as between those who are not parties to the contract which the bill contains or evidences.’

[87] I mention this citation only because it has been relied on in a subsequent case (see [109], below) concerning straight bills of lading as a definitive statement of the meaning of a bill of lading, viz that only a fully negotiable bill which can be transferred by indorsement down a line of transferees is capable of being a bill of lading within the meaning of the Hague Rules. However, it seems to me that all that Bingham LJ was doing, in the context of a case involving receivers of cargo when it was still uncertain whether they had become parties to the bills in question, was to emphasise that a bill of lading, when indorsed and transferred, remained a contractual document to the terms of which subsequent parties were capable of becoming contractually bound as parties to it by ‘commercially well-known consequences’. There is of course no doubt that such a negotiable bill is a paradigm example of a bill of lading. The question remains whether a straight bill of lading, albeit it is capable of being transferred only once to a named consignee, and then by delivery rather than indorsement, also comes within the designation of being a bill of lading.

[88] The 1992 Act was preceded by the Law Commission report. Unlike the 1924 and 1971 Acts, the 1992 Act was not concerned with the content of a contract for the carriage of goods by sea, but, like the 1855 Act, with the transfer of rights and liabilities under it. The 1855 Act, which had tied such transfer to the concept of property passing at the identical time and by reason of a consignment or indorsement, had been shown by the pressure of factual situations to be causing difficult problems relating to title to sue the carrier. For these purposes, in the course of its report the Law Commission not surprisingly discussed the concept a of a bill of lading. Under the heading 'Definition of bill of lading', the Commission wrote (para 2.50):

b 'We have also opted against a definition of "bill of lading", just as there is c no definition under the 1855 Act or the Factors Acts. Under the present law, d a bill of lading is usually identified by reference to its three functions, i.e. that e it is a receipt for the goods, that it usually evidences the contract of carriage f and that it may be a document of title (at least until complete delivery of the g goods has been made to the person entitled thereto). However, to attempt a definition, which would necessarily be elaborate would, we feel, be counterproductive, particularly as there are many documents which are called bills of lading but which are not bills of lading properly so-called: for instance, a standard ocean "shipped" bill of lading is radically different from a so-called "house" bill of lading, which is really no more than a merchant's delivery order. However, clause 1(2) of the Bill stipulates that a bill of lading must be transferable, thus following the preamble to the 1855 Act. A "straight" consigned bill of lading, such as one made out "to X" without any such words as "to order", is not a document of title at common law. It will therefore merely be a receipt for the goods and, in the absence of a charterparty, will usually evidence (in the hands of the shipper) or contain (in the hands of a third party) the terms of the contract of carriage. Hence, it will resemble a sea waybill, apart from the fact that a sea waybill will not normally be presented to the ship to obtain delivery. The main practical consequence of "straight" bills of lading not satisfying clause 1(2) of the Bill is that they will not fall within the ambit of clause 4 of the Bill, relating to the conclusive nature of a bill of lading in the hands of a lawful holder. Were a "straight" bill of lading to be a bill of lading for the purposes of the Bill, it would mean that the holder thereof would have the benefit of clause 4 whereas the consignee named in the sea waybill would not. Apart from being inconsistent with the Hague-Visby Rules, this would be an anomalous result given that "straight" bills of lading and sea waybills are much the same type of document save that the sea waybill is not required to obtain delivery. The contrary argument is that sea waybills should come within the ambit of clause 4, an argument which we have rejected for the reasons given below. In conclusion, we require that a bill of lading must be transferable to fall within the Bill. Where a bill of lading is not transferable, it will undoubtedly fall within the definition of sea waybill to be found in clause 1(3) of the Bill.' (My emphases.)

h [89] I have italicised certain passages on which particular emphasis has been placed by counsel, and which are the subject of dispute. The footnote accompanying the statement that a straight bill of lading 'is not a document of title at common law' cites Benjamin's Sale of Goods (3rd edn, 1987) p 903 (para 1446). The footnote accompanying the statement that for a straight bill of lading to be a bill of lading would be inconsistent with the Hague-Visby Rules
j refers to s 1(6) of the 1971 Act and says that that provision—

'distinguishes bills of lading and non-negotiable (meaning non-transferable) receipts, into which latter category sea waybills or straight bills of lading are capable of falling: see (Browner International Ltd v Monarch Shipping Co Ltd, The European Enterprise [1989] 2 Lloyd's Rep 185) ...'

[90] Mr Schaff relies on the distinction made between a straight bill of lading and a sea waybill to the effect that the former is, although the latter is not, 'required to obtain delivery'. Mr Schaff submits, moreover, that on that basis a straight bill of lading is in any event a document of title similar to a bill of lading within the meaning of the Hague Rules.

[91] In accordance with the recommendations of the Law Commission, the 1992 Act makes a distinction between bills of lading and sea waybills in the following terms of s 1(2) and (3):

'(2) References in this Act to a bill of lading—(a) do not include references to a document which is incapable of transfer either by indorsement or, as a bearer bill, by delivery without indorsement; but (b) subject to that, do include references to a received for shipment bill of lading.

(3) References in this Act to a sea waybill are references to any document which is not a bill of lading but—(a) is such a receipt for goods as contains or evidences a contract for the carriage of goods by sea; and (b) identifies the person to whom delivery of the goods is to be made by the carrier in accordance with that contract.'

[92] It follows that, for the purposes of the 1992 Act, a straight bill of lading cannot be a bill of lading within s 1(2) above, but will be a sea waybill within s 1(3). That, however, will not affect the essence of the subject matter of the 1992 Act, for in either case rights under the respective document can be transferred to the named person to whom delivery is to be made, in the case of the bill of lading if he is its 'lawful holder', and liabilities can then be transferred to that person if he takes or demands delivery of the goods: see s 2 (dealing with rights), s 3 (dealing with liabilities) and s 5(2) (dealing with the meaning of the holder of a bill of lading). When those sections are read, it is perfectly obvious why the more complicated case of the classic bill of lading has been dealt with separately, and the more simple case of the straight bill of lading and/or sea waybill has been addressed in different terms: but both are dealt with essentially to the same ends.

[93] Section 5(5), moreover, states that the 1992 Act takes effect 'without prejudice to the application, in relation to any case, of the rules (the Hague-Visby Rules)' which have the force of law under the 1971 Act. Section 6(2) repeals the 1855 Act.

[94] Thus the 1992 Act is drafted on the basis that a straight bill of lading is not a bill of lading for the purposes of the 1992 Act, but leaves open the question for the purposes of the Hague and Hague-Visby Rules and the 1971 Act.

FROM THE 1992 ACT TO DATE

[95] In the last decade or so a number of cases have been coming to court concerning straight bills of lading. It is not clear why there is this recent proliferation of such cases, as compared with the paucity of them over the previous 150 years or so. It may have something to do with changes in the documentary forms used in connection with carriage by sea. This may in turn have been influenced by the terms of the 1992 Act. The question has arisen in connection with such forms as to whether the Hague-Visby Rules apply. That question has been looked at from the point of view of whether the straight bill of lading is a bill of lading, and also from the point of view of whether the document is a 'similar document of title'. The latter question has been seen possibly to a depend on whether the consignee is obliged to present the document in order to obtain delivery of the goods.

[96] In that connection, it is established law that at any rate in the case of a classic (negotiable) bill of lading the obligation of the ship is to deliver only against its surrender: see SA Sucre Export v Northern River Shipping Ltd, The Sormovskiy 3068 [1994] 2 Lloyd's Rep 266 and Motis Exports Ltd v Dampskibsselskabet AF 1912, A/S [1999] 1 All ER (Comm) 571 (affirmed in the Court of Appeal [2000] 1 All ER (Comm) 91). The relevant authorities are collected in those judgments. It is sufficient to quote from them as follows. In The Sormovskiy 3068 Clarke J said ([1994] 2 Lloyd's Rep 266 at 274):

c 'It makes commercial sense to have a simple rule that in the absence of an express term of the contract the master must only deliver the cargo to the holder of the bill of lading who presents it to him. In that way both the shipowners and the persons in truth entitled to possession of the cargo are protected by the terms of the contract.'

d [97] In The Motis, where the issue was whether the carrier was excused if he without negligence delivered against a forged bill of lading, Stuart-Smith LJ said ([2000] 1 All ER (Comm) 91 at 98 (para 19)):

e 'But it has been established for well over a century that under a bill of lading contract, a shipowner is both entitled and bound to deliver the goods against production of an original bill of lading, provided he has no notice of any other claim or better title to the goods (see Glyn Mills Currie & Co v East and West India Dock Co (1882) 7 App Cas 591, [1881-5] All ER Rep 674, The Stettin (1889) 14 PD 142, Carlberg v Wemyss Coal Co Ltd 1915 SC 616 at 624, Sze Hai Tong Bank Ltd v Rambler Cycle Co Ltd and particularly the passage I have cited ([1959] 3 All ER 182 at 184, [1959] AC 576 at 586), Barclays Bank Ltd v Customs and Excise Comrs [1963] 1 Lloyd's Rep 81 and Kuwait Petroleum Corp v I & D Oil Carriers Ltd, The Houda [1994] 2 Lloyd's Rep 541, esp at 550, 552-553 and 556). It seems probable that the importance of this obligation stems from the negotiable nature of the bill of lading.'

f [98] Mr Croall emphasises that last sentence. Mance LJ said (at 100 (para 8)):

g 'Looking at the matter more broadly, the issue is one of risk. A shipowner issues bills of lading to serve as the key to the goods, and ought usually to be well placed to recognise its own bills of lading ... the bill of lading serves, as it seems to me, an important general role in representing and securing both title and physical possession of goods; although skilled fraud may not be uncommon, the shipowners' construction ... would appear to ... undervalue the importance which both parties must be taken to have attached to the ship's obligation to deliver against presentation of original bills of lading.'

h [99] Mr Schaff emphasises the general principle or philosophy apparent in the citations from the judgments of Clarke J and Mance LJ. He also submits that, against the background of that principle and philosophy, the last sentence in the citation from the judgment of Stuart-Smith LJ should not be understood too narrowly. The traditional importance of the presentation of a bill of lading may stem from its negotiable nature, since the ability to transfer a bearer bill of lading merely by delivery or an 'order' bill of lading merely by indorsement means that the carrier cannot know, save by presentation of the bill, who is ultimately entitled to delivery. However, once the principle is established, then the requirement of presentation ought to apply in any case where the carrier cannot be certain who is entitled to delivery: and that must apply at least to any bill in which the obligation to present the bill in order to obtain delivery is written into the contract—as Mr Schaff submits is the case here, as shown by the attestation clause. After all, in a case where the shipper requires to be paid cash against documents before he is willing to release the bill of lading, the fact that he has named the consignee cannot make any difference.

[100] In this connection The Stettin (1889) 14 PD 142 is of some interest, especially as it is a leading case, cited for instance in both The Sormovskiy 3068 and The Motis. The bill of lading there was issued by the owners of a German flag vessel and covered carriage from London to Stettin. It was made out to a named consignee, S Mendelsohn, 'or to his or their assigns'. Mendelsohn was the agent for Julius Manasse in Breslau, and was instructed by the shipper that on arrival in Stettin he was to arrange for the goods to be sent on by lighter to Manasse in Breslau. No bill of lading was produced by Mendelsohn for delivery, however, and it seems that the shipper was not paid by Manasse. The shipper sued the carrier for misdelivery of the goods. It appears to have been common ground that the bill of lading was governed by German law, of which there was evidence. The defendant shipowner's evidence (at 145) was to the effect that where there was a named consignee 'or order' but the consignee did not indorse the bill (as in that case), the effect was the same as a straight bill of lading ('namens connossement'), viz the shipowner could deliver to the consignee without production of a bill of lading unless told by the shipper not to do so, taking the risk, presumably as against an indorsee, of whether there had been an indorsement or not. The shipper's German law evidence (at 144), however, was that whether the bill was to be regarded as an 'order' bill or a straight bill, the law was the same, viz delivery without production of the bill of lading was not permitted. Butt J gave a short judgment and said (at 147):

'German advocates have been called on both sides, but, as they differ, I must, in this divergence of opinion, decide what, in the result, the German law appears to me to be. Having considered the reasons given by these advocates for their opinions, I have come to the conclusion that, on this point, German law does not essentially differ from English law. According to English law and the English mode of conducting business, a shipowner is not entitled to deliver goods to the consignee without production of the bill of lading. I hold that the shipowner must take the consequences ...'

[101] It seems to me that against the background of the evidence of German law which Butt J was there considering, he was speaking generally of the situation whether the naming of the consignee rendered the applicable rule that of an order bill or a straight bill. I accept that on the facts both German advocates were agreed that the bill of lading in question was an order bill. If, however, the judge had decided the case simply on that basis, then I assume he would have said so. It will be recalled, however, that in Thrige v United Shipping Co Ltd (1924) 18 Ll L Rep 6 Scrutton LJ had said that in the case of a straight bill it was an open question whether delivery could be made without production of the bill of lading, but that he was doubtful whether at any rate in a case where property passed on shipment The Stettin was good authority (see [45], above).

- a [102] This then is the background to a series of modern cases. The first of them comes from Singapore—Olivine Electronics Pte Ltd v Seabridge Transport Pte Ltd [1995] 3 SLR 143. The straight bill of lading in question covered the carriage of a shipment of television sets from Singapore to Russia. The bill of lading contained a clause materially identical to the attestation clause in the present case ('must be surrendered duly endorsed in exchange for the goods').
- b Goh Joon Seng J (at 149) did not consider the shipper's claim for summary judgment for damages for delivery without production of the bill of lading as unanswerable, since the point was still 'somewhat open'.

- [103] The researches of counsel have brought to light a Dutch case decided in 1997, The Duke of Yare (10 April 1997, unreported). Three trailers were shipped from Scheveningen to Great Yarmouth consigned to a named consignee (GE Plastics). The goods were damaged and one issue, although not necessarily decisive of the case, was whether the Hague-Visby Rules were compulsorily applicable by Dutch law. That in turn seems to have depended on whether the document which either had been issued or ought to have been issued was a 'bill of lading or any similar document of title'. The exemplar document was a
- d straight bill or 'rektacognossement'. The court said that such a document—

- 'exists alongside the bearer or order bill of lading. The fact that a straight bill of lading cannot be treated in the same way as a bearer or order bill of lading does not detract from the fact that the present straight bill of lading meets the legal requirements to be considered as such. As opposed to a
- e non-negotiable sea waybill—said document not normally considered a "similar document" in English and Dutch literature—the holder of a straight bill of lading has the exclusive right to delivery of the goods, therefore delivery of the bill of lading is a requirement for obtainment of the load.'

- f [104] It would seem from this that the Dutch court would regard a straight bill of lading as a bill of lading within the meaning of the Hague-Visby Rules and also considers that its surrender is necessary to obtain delivery of the goods.

- [105] In International Air and Sea Cargo GmbH v The Chitral (Owners) [2000] 1 All ER (Comm) 932 the Pakistan National Shipping Corp bill of lading named Al Ghaith as consignee of goods carried on the defendant's vessel from Bremen to Dubai.
- g Goods were damaged during the voyage. The bill of lading was otherwise in conventional form, but the box in which the consignee was to be named said 'If order state notify party' and no notify party was stated. Al Ghaith had nevertheless indorsed the bill to another party. It was submitted by the defendant carrier that Al Ghaith, having indorsed the bill, had no title to sue. Al Ghaith said
- h that its indorsement was ineffective because, since no notify party had been stated, the bill was not to order but a straight bill of lading. The carrier said that the bill remained an order bill because the general printed language of the bill said that delivery was to be 'unto the above-mentioned consignee or to his or their assigns'. David Steel J rejected that argument. He considered (at 938 (para 19)) that the form was drafted to permit its use either as a straight or order bill, and
- j that therefore the more general language 'consignee or ... assigns' should be understood as subject to the implicit words 'as applicable'. Mr Croall relies on this approach for submitting that the attestation clause with its reference to 'duly endorsed' should be similarly understood as subject to the implicit words 'as appropriate', and that where the form is used as a straight bill this clause is simply inapplicable.

[106] That submission was accepted by the arbitrators and by Langley J, in reliance on The Chitral. However, The Chitral was distinguished in Parsons Corp v CV Scheepvaartonderneming Happy Ranger [2002] 2 All ER (Comm) 24 at [28]–[29] on the basis that in that case there was nothing in any consignee or notify box, other than the mere absence of the words ‘or to order’, to suggest that the bill was not negotiable. It seems to me that the present case is again different. It is not in dispute that the bill of lading, as filled out, was not an ‘order’ bill. It follows that it could not be ‘duly endorsed’. But even if the bill had been a classic negotiable bill made out to a named consignee ‘or order’, there is nothing to require it to have been indorsed where it is simply transferred to the consignee (see Benjamin’s Sale of Goods (6th edn, 2002) p 973 (para 18-012)). Therefore, on any view the words ‘duly endorsed’ are subject to the understanding ‘if applicable’. The position remains that the bill of lading stated that one of its three originals, all of which were in fact issued, ‘must be surrendered ... in exchange for the goods’. And why not? In that way the carrier will be assured that he is not delivering to a person without title if the shipper has withheld the bill for the usual reason that he has not been paid; and the shipper will be assured that the goods will not be delivered unless he has been content to transfer the bill. It is not as though a shipper under a straight bill of lading, as well as under an order bill, cannot withhold the goods, or even redirect them, at any rate if notice is given to the carrier: see Benjamin (6th edn) pp 973–974 (para 18-013) and pp 979–980 (paras 18-018 to 18-019). This is because, although the shipper’s contract with the carrier under a straight bill is to deliver to the named consignee, it is construed as a contract to deliver as provided in the bill or as the shipper may direct. Although notice may be required to redirect delivery of the goods, there may well be a dispute about the giving of such a notice and in the meantime a condition of surrender of the bill of lading is the traditional and safe way of policing such matters; and litigation is avoided.

[107] The Brij [2001] 1 Lloyd’s Rep 431 was decided in the Hong Kong High Court. The facts of this case were complicated, because two different sets of bills of lading had been issued for shipments from China to Venezuela. As between the claimant shipper and a freight forwarder called WTW, order bills were issued to the claimant naming the receiver/buyer’s agent, Amaya, as the ‘notify’ party, but leaving the consignee simply ‘to order’ (the ‘Talent bills’). As between WTW and the ship’s operator, however, a further set of bills was issued, but only to WTW and not to the claimant, under which the goods were consigned to Amaya (the ‘CAVN bills’). WTW retained the CAVN bills (they were ‘not meant to be negotiable or to be negotiated’ but were ‘kept in a drawer and not meant to be used’), because they regarded the operative carriage contract as evidenced by the Talent bills, and it was the Talent bills which were forwarded by the claimant under its sale contract to obtain payment from its buyer (see [2001] 1 Lloyd’s Rep 431 at 434). In Venezuela, the goods were delivered to Amaya without production of any bill of lading. The claimant sued on the CAVN bills, not on the Talent bills. Waung J held that the claim in contract under the CAVN bills failed on the ground that the claimant was not a party to them. The claimant also sued in tort and the judge seems to have regarded that issue as dependent on the question whether the CAVN bills were ‘Straight bills or not’. He found that these bills were straight bills, even though the consignee box said ‘or order’, apparently on the basis that the surrounding circumstances showed that they were never a intended to be used. With respect, that seems to me to be a different question from the proper construction of the bills.

[108] Mr Croall, however, relied on The Brij for acceptance there found (also at 434) of the proposition, for which the judge cited Benjamin's Sale of Goods (5th edn, 1997) p 989–990 (para 18-014), that under a straight bill the carrier is bound to deliver to the named consignee without production of the bill. It may b be noted, however, that this statement of Benjamin is at odds with the Law Commission's view (cited at [88], above) that a straight bill differs from a sea waybill in that the former does require its production in order to obtain delivery of the goods. I shall have to refer below to the debate on the subject of straight bills to be found in various textbooks. For the present I would merely comment first, that The Brij does not provide any reasoning, other than its reliance on c Benjamin, to support the proposition in issue; and secondly, that because of its special facts I do not think that The Brij is really of any assistance to the current debate.

[109] In Parsons Corp v CV Scheepvaartonderneming Happy Ranger [2002] 1 All ER (Comm) 176 at first instance Tomlinson J, to whom neither The Chitral nor d The Brij seem to have been cited for they are not mentioned in his judgment, appears (at [23] and [27]) to have founded his decision that a straight bill of lading is not a bill of lading within the meaning of the Hague-Visby Rules on the passage from the judgment of Bingham LJ in Cia Portorasti Commerciale SA v Ultramar Panama Inc, The Captain Gregos [1990] 3 All ER 967 which I have cited at [86], above. However, for the reasons which I have sought to explain at [87], above e I do not think that Bingham LJ there had the problem of a straight bill of lading in mind.

[110] Voss v APL Co Pte Ltd [2002] 2 Lloyd's Rep 707 is a decision of the Singapore Court of Appeal. Mr Voss shipped a Mercedes from Hamburg to f Busan, South Korea, using APL as his carrier. APL issued a bill of lading which named the buyer in the consignee box without the words 'to order'. The bill of lading also provided:

'A set of 3 originals of this bill of lading is hereby issued by the Carrier. Upon surrender to the Carrier of any one negotiable bill of lading, properly endorsed, all others shall stand void.'

g [111] Despite that language, it was not disputed (at 709 (para 10)) that the bill of lading was a straight, non-negotiable, bill. Nor (at 721 (para 49)) does any specific reliance appear to have been placed on the second sentence just cited, as distinct from the issue of the bill in a set of three originals. The full set of bills at all times remained with Mr Voss, for the buyer did not pay. The Mercedes was h released to the buyer without production of the bill of lading. The submissions before the court covered much of the same ground as this present appeal. In a careful judgment, Chao Hick Tin JA, reviewed much of the material considered here either above or (in the case of textbooks) below, including the Rafaela S itself at first instance ([2002] 2 Lloyd's Rep 403) and other citations not here mentioned.

j The question posed (at 715 (para 1)) was 'whether, in relation to a straight bill of lading ... the shipowner may deliver [to the named consignee] without production of the BL'. The submission of the carrier (at 717 (para 15), citing Scrutton p 39 was that a straight bill of lading was in this respect like a sea waybill, where delivery is made to the named consignee on proof of his identity. The submission of the claimant, however, was that production of a straight bill of lading is necessary. That submission appears to have been made and considered as a matter of principle, and not in reliance on the bill's language quoted above ('Upon surrender to the carrier' etc). Chao Hick Tin JA commented, accurately as I would understand the position (at 717 (para 16)): a

'The advantage of resorting to a sea waybill is that it avoids the problems arising from the late arrival of the documentation; its contents can be telexed to the destination. Sea waybills are often used in trades involving short sea voyages, where the carrying ship may arrive at its destination before the shipping documents do.' b

[112] It is as well to bear in mind that the Singapore Court of Appeal was not concerned with the question whether a straight bill is a bill of lading for the purpose of the Hague or Hague-Visby Rules, but only with the more limited question whether production of a straight bill is necessary for delivery of the goods. On that question the court's judgment concluded as follows (at 721-722): c

'48. At the end of the day, it seems to us that the issue must be resolved on the basis of contract law and the intention of the parties. The entire argument of the appellants is that a straight BL is the same as a sea waybill. While it is true that a BL, devoid of the characteristic of negotiability, is substantially similar in effect to that of a sea waybill, that is [not] to say that they are the same. If the parties had intended to create a sea waybill they would have done so. Ordinarily, the main characteristics of a BL are twofold. First, it is negotiable (i.e. transferable). Second, it is a document of title, requiring its presentation to obtain delivery of the cargo. In the case of a straight bill, while the characteristic of transferability is absent, there is no reason why one should thereby infer that the parties had intended to do away with the other main characteristic, i.e. delivery upon presentation. As the Judge below noted, while one cannot indorse a straight bill to transfer constructive possession of the cargo, it does not necessarily follow that the straight bill does not impose a contractual term obligating the carrier to require its production to obtain delivery. d

49. It seems to us that clear words must be present to imply that the parties intended the instrument to be treated, in all respects, as if it were a sea waybill and that its presentation by the named consignee is not necessary. Indeed, if the parties had wanted to have a sea waybill they could have quite easily adopted that format. They would not have issued a BL with three originals. By issuing the instrument as a BL, it must mean that they wished to retain all the other features of a BL, other than the characteristic of transferability ... e

51. Secondly, even looking at the matter from the perspective of the market place, there is much to commend the rule that even in respect of a straight bill presentation of it is a prerequisite to obtaining delivery. If nothing else, the advantage of this rule is that it is simple to apply. It is certain. It would prevent confusion and avoid the shipowners and/or their agents having to decide whether a bill is a straight bill or an order bill [e.g., The Happy Ranger ([2002] 2 All ER (Comm) 24)], and run the risk attendant thereto if the determination they make on that point should turn out to be erroneous. The rule would obviate such wholly unnecessary litigation ... f

a 52. Thirdly, to accept the arguments put forward by APL is to envisage two broad categories of documents which could be used by shippers. The first option is the negotiable BL; in such a situation, delivery of the goods can only be made upon presentation of the BL. The second option for shippers is to use a non-negotiable straight BL or sea waybill; here, the straight BL or waybill need not be produced for delivery of the goods. In essence, APL's scheme envisages that as long as the shipping document is non-negotiable on its face, presentation of the original BL or sea waybill is unnecessary for delivery. We think that this approach is overly restrictive for an unpaid seller who wishes to use a non-negotiable BL while retaining his security for payment.

b 53. Indeed, to hold that a straight BL is not the same as a sea waybill has the advantage of providing such a seller, or in the case of documentary credit, the bank, with some security against default by the buyer, and the buyer of some assurance that the seller has shipped the cargo before he is required to make payment. In short, it gives both the buyer and the seller where they, for their own reasons, want only a straight BL to be issued, a fair measure of protection. That was what Mr. Voss wanted: payment before delivery by carrier. In contrast, the sea waybill is only a contract of carriage whereby the carrier undertakes to deliver the cargo to the person identified by the shipper as entitled to take delivery of the cargo. The sea waybill is retained by the shipper and all the consignee need show to take delivery is proof of his identity. It is a receipt, not a document of title. It, unlike a BL, cannot be used as a security to obtain financing.'

c [113] Thus the Singapore Court of Appeal here put forward three reasons for its decision. The first, is that one of the two critical features of a classic bill of lading is that it is a document of title in the sense that its presentation is necessary to obtain possession of the goods: in the absence of clear words or good reason, that feature should be regarded as surviving in the case of a straight bill of lading. The second, is that such a rule is a good, simple and certain rule: reference was here made to Clarke J in SA Sucre Export v Northern River Shipping Ltd, The Sormovskiy 3068 [1994] 2 Lloyd's Rep 266 at 274. The third, is that such a rule better protects the interests of a seller (and his bank) and buyer.

d [114] Mr Schaff relies on this decision for its demonstration that a straight bill of lading is still, in any event, a document of title. Mr Croall submits that the reasoning is flawed in its reliance on the assumption that a straight bill of lading can survive as a document of title in the absence of negotiability, and that in any event a non-negotiable bill is not a 'similar' document of title for the very reason that it is not negotiable.

e [115] The final authority relied on before us is a French one, The MSC Magallanes (16 May 2002, unreported), a decision of the Court of Appeal of Rennes. The carriage in this case was from Anvers to Durban. Straight bills of lading were issued by the carrier, MSC, and sent by the shipper to the consignee, who was an agent for the buyer. The shipper then decided to divert delivery and notified the carrier to this effect. Nevertheless, the goods were delivered to the consignee, and by the consignee to the buyer. The shipper claimed against the carrier for misdelivery, but failed. The shipper appears to have argued that the bills, not being negotiable, were not documents of title but similar to sea waybills, and that therefore it was open to it to divert the goods even after the bills' transfer, on the basis that the carrier's contract was with it and the carrier was therefore obliged to follow its instructions. The court, however, considered that the bills, albeit 'nominative and non-negotiable', were bills of lading and documents of title for all that, and obliged delivery against and only against their production. The ratio of the decision appears therefore to be in the following paragraphs:

'In effect, [the shipper] having given the original bills of lading and documents of title of the merchandise to [the consignee], MSC could only follow the instructions given by the legitimate bearer of the bills of lading, these documents giving rights. Having lost possession of the bills of lading, [the shipper] no longer had the power to change the instructions given to the carrier regarding the destination of the merchandise being transported ...'

[116] Thus the French Court of Appeal, like the Singapore Court of Appeal, and the Dutch court, appears to have considered that a straight bill of lading remains a document of title, and that its production is necessary for delivery of the goods.

THE TEXTBOOKS

[117] The textbooks which cover this subject provide a rich field for inquiry, and I will try to put the dispute between Mr Schaff and Mr Croall as to the deployment of the opinions of their learned and scholarly authors as straightforwardly as I can.

[118] It is common ground that the textbooks cite negotiability of the order or bearer bill of lading as being the essence of what, for clarity of exposition, may be called a classic bill of lading. Such a bill is also a document of title, because it is the key to the goods in what has been described as a floating warehouse, and under a classic bill of lading that key can be passed on, at any rate until the contract of carriage is fulfilled, again and again. The essential issue for present purposes is whether a straight bill of lading is sufficiently like a classic 'negotiable' bill of lading to be regarded as a bill of lading under the Hague-Visby Rules. Another way, perhaps, of putting the issue is whether the essence of a bill of lading as a document of title is that the key has to be capable of being passed again and again, or whether it is sufficient that it can be passed at least once. In that connection it seems to be common ground that a document which does not have to be produced to the carrier to obtain delivery of the goods cannot be called a document of title. Mr Croall submits, however, that only a document of title which is fully transferable and therefore 'negotiable' can be called a 'similar' document of title. That, however, it seems to me, is to beg the question. If 'negotiability' is existentially critical to a bill of lading, then it is unnecessary to ask separately whether a straight bill of lading is a document of title, because even if it is, it will not be 'similar'.

[119] It seems to me that it is unhelpful to cite passages in the textbooks which describe the features of a classic bill of lading. By definition, such passages will refer to its negotiability. The important passages will be those which describe the features of a straight bill of lading.

[120] Scrutton does not consider the position of a straight bill of lading, save to point out (p 37) that (i) under the 1992 Act, by definition, a straight bill of lading can only be a sea waybill, and (ii) that because a sea waybill within the meaning of the 1992 Act has not at present been established as a document of title by a mercantile custom, therefore it must be doubtful whether it is within the Hague-Visby Rules.

[121] Benjamin's Sale of Goods has a more extensive treatment of the subject. Significantly, the treatment has changed between the fifth edition of 1997 and the sixth edition of 2002. In the fifth edition (pp 989–990 (para 18-014)) this is said, under a heading which mentions both straight bills and sea waybills:

b 'It is not easy to find a suitable term in English law to refer to such bills ...
The essential point is that documents of the present kind differ from order and bearer bills in that they are not transferable by indorsement (where necessary) and delivery. Sea waybills fall into the category of documents of c the present kind and the expression "sea waybills" will be used to refer to them in the following discussion, while the expression "bills of lading" will be used to refer to order or bearer bills. Two things follow from the fact that a document of this kind is not transferable by indorsement and delivery.
First, the consignee (if in possession of the document) cannot, by purporting to transfer it in this way, impose on the carrier a legal obligation to deliver d the goods to another person. Secondly, the shipper cannot oblige the carrier to deliver the goods to a different consignee from the one named merely by indorsing and delivering the bill to that other person; for under a straight bill the carrier is entitled and bound to deliver the goods to the originally named consignee without production of the bill, so that, when he delivers the e goods, he may have no means of knowing of the purported transfer of the bill. This difficulty cannot arise in the case of an order bill, under which the goods are deliverable only on production of the bill.'

It is similarly stated (p 1023 (para 18-044)) that a straight bill or sea waybill—

f 'is not a symbol of the goods because the carrier is entitled and bound to deliver the goods to the named consignee without production of the bill. It follows that a carriage document will not be a document of title in the common law sense if it is expressed on its face to be "non-negotiable".'

[122] I have four comments on these passages. First, understandably in the light of the 1992 Act straight bills are included with sea waybills: but this g categorisation obscures what may be an important difference between them for the purpose of the Hague-Visby Rules. Secondly, the statement that a shipper under a non-negotiable bill cannot oblige the carrier to deliver to someone other than the named consignee merely by indorsing and delivering the bill to another person is true: but that tells you only that the bill is not negotiable and not that h the carrier is bound to deliver to the named consignee without production of the bill. Thirdly, that no authority is mentioned for that last proposition. And fourthly, that it would seem to be accepted that if, contrary to that last proposition, the consignee of a straight bill did have to produce the bill to obtain possession of the goods, then such a bill could be described as a document of title.

j [123] In the sixth edition, however, these passages have been developed and altered. The equivalent paragraphs to 18-014 and 18-044 of the fifth edition are now numbered 18-017 and 18-059. They have become too lengthy to quote in full here, but it may be noted that they discuss some of the recent jurisprudence on straight bills including both this case and Voss v APL Co Pte Ltd, each at first instance (see eg footnotes 4 and 98). Points to note, however, are: (i) that the proposition that a straight bill need not be produced by the consignee in order to take delivery of the goods is founded in the contrast with an order bill on the basis that where a bill may be transferred by order a carrier can never know to whom to deliver unless the bill is produced; but (ii) that production of a straight bill may nevertheless be required by contractual provision under it; and (iii) that it is now allowed that the definitional contrasts of the 1992 Act (and the 1971 Act) do not necessarily mean that 'sea waybills, or similar non-transferable documents, cannot be bills of lading for any legal purposes whatsoever'. So it is expressly contemplated that a straight bill may yet be a document of title for the 'wholly distinct' purpose of the Hague-Visby Rules (pp 1015–1016 (para 18-059)):

'Indeed, to apply the same tests for these two purposes comes dangerously close to the similar link between contractual and proprietary issues made in the Bills of Lading Act 1855, a link which was found to be unsatisfactory and which was therefore severed by the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act 1992. There may be no policy reasons against subjecting parties to a contract contained in or evidenced by a "straight" bill to the contractual regime of the Rules; indeed, the 1971 Act specifically provides that, by the use of appropriate words, the Rules can be made applicable to a "non-negotiable" receipt containing or evidencing a contract for the carriage of goods by sea. But the policy reasons for (or against) applying the Rules to "straight" bills or "non-negotiable" receipts have nothing to do with the question whether such documents are documents of title in the common law sense.'

[124] Carver on Bills of Lading (1st edn, 2001) deals with straight bills (pp 4–6 (paras 1-007 to 1-009) and p 244 (para 6-007)). The distinguished editors of Carver, Professor Sir Guenter Treitel QC and Professor Francis Reynolds QC, are common to the authorship of Benjamin, and the treatment in Carver and in the latest edition of Benjamin is broadly similar. Thus it may be noted that it is stated (p 244 (para 6-007)) that no production of a bill of lading is necessary for delivery under a straight bill, but that it is acknowledged (p 5 (para 1-008)) that the definitions and distinctions of the 1971 and 1992 Acts 'apply only for the purposes of the Acts in which they occur and not for the purposes of other legislation or of rules of common law ...'. There is a full and interesting discussion of the English statutory and common law meanings of 'document of title' (pp 239–242 (paras 6-001 to 6-003)). It is submitted there that the common law meaning is derived from proof of mercantile custom and thus limited narrowly to negotiable bills of lading, whereas the statutory use of the expression is broader and extends for instance to all those documents listed in s 1(4) of the Factors Act 1889, which include 'any bill of lading ... and any other document used in the ordinary course of business as proof of the possession or control of goods ...'. This is an area of debate which counsel have acknowledged by citation of these passages, but into which they have not led us. I would be reluctant to go there without adversarial argument, but I would again hazard the view that the question of 'document of title' within the meaning of the Hague Rules is bound up with the question whether 'bill of lading' is there limited to a negotiable bill. If it is, then there is perhaps good reason to think that 'any similar document of title' is also being used in a limited sense. If, however, it is not, then there may be less reason to think that the latter expression is also so limited. In this connection it is well to remind oneself that the Hague Rules are an international convention and that English common or statutory law is not determinative. On the contrary, it is salutary to bear in mind that the courts of France, Holland and Singapore have a determined that a straight bill of lading does require to be produced for delivery of the goods and on that basis have been prepared to describe such documents as documents of title.

[125] Voyage Charters (2nd edn, 2001) by Cooke, Young, Taylor, Kimball, Martowski and Lambert describes the issue of surrender of a straight bill of lading as 'an open question' (p 480 (para 18.143)):

b 'The one way in which a straight bill of lading differs from an ordinary sea waybill is that, being on a bill of lading form, it usually contains words, such as "one of which being accomplished the others to be void" which indicate that it is to be surrendered on delivery. It is an open question whether the carrier under a straight bill is entitled or obliged to deliver to the named consignee without production of the bill or whether, as in the case of a transferable bill, he should only deliver upon its presentation.'

The same work states (p 484 (paras 18.158–18.159)):

d 'Bills of lading often provide expressly that the goods are to be discharged or delivered upon, and only upon, the surrender of the bill of lading and the standard formula "one of which being accomplished the others to be void" is to the same effect. Furthermore, the status of the bill of lading as a document of title imposes the same requirements ... The present trend of authority greatly favours a clear, simple and strict rule obliging a carrier to require the surrender of a bill of lading before effecting delivery ...'

e [126] Gaskell Bills of Lading: Law and Contracts (2001) helpfully sets out numerous sea waybill forms (pp 726–740 (paras 22.34–22.56)). The BIMCO Blank Back Form begins (para 22.35): 'This Liner Waybill which is not a document of title ...'. It continues (para 22.47): 'The goods will be delivered to the Party named as Consignee or its authorised agent, on production of proof of identity without any documentary formalities ...'. The Genwaybill states (para 22.36): 'This Waybill is a non-negotiable document. It is not a bill of lading ...'. It contains the same passage about delivery as just cited above (para 22.48). The text points out (pp 419, 420 (paras 14.23, 14.24)) that—

g 'In practice, most sea waybills contain express terms allowing delivery merely on proof of identity, without any production of documents such as the waybill itself ... It is unclear whether a carrier is obliged to deliver to the consignee named in a document which is expressly described as a "straight bill", even without production of that bill. Rights of Suit [ie the Law Commission report] seems to assume that a straight bill does have to be presented, while h it is accepted that a waybill does not. It is submitted that the view of Benjamin is to be preferred, on the basis that there is no real distinction between a waybill and a straight bill, and that neither are needed to obtain delivery of the goods (unless the contract so requires).'

j [127] One possible answer to the current case, of course, is that the Rafaela S form of bill of lading, when used as a straight bill, did so require. In that context Gaskell comments as follows (p 420 (para 14.25)):

'In practice, most of the standard form bills [ie bills of lading, not waybills] (which are mainly designed to be negotiable) do contain express terms which singly or together provide that a bill is to be surrendered before goods will be delivered. There is no apparent distinction, as a matter of construction, between cases where the bill is made out to order and when it is consigned "straight" to a named consignee. Thus, the express terms on the surrender of bills such as Conlinebill or the P & O Nedlloyd Bill states that "an original bill of lading, duly endorsed, must be surrendered ...". This clause is to be found on the face of most bills. It might be said that the reference to "duly endorsed" indicates that the term only applies to negotiable and not straight bills. The better view is probably that the carrier is only requiring that any bill presented should apparently entitle the holder to claim delivery (as with a bearer bill), so there is no reason to restrict the application of the clause to negotiable bills when it is well known that the forms could easily be used as non-negotiable documents, e.g. straight consigned bills.'

There Gaskell is in effect discussing this very case, and rejecting Mr Croall's submission that the attestation clause should be regarded as inapplicable.

[128] In any event, I cannot forbear remarking, by reference to the forms of sea waybill set out in Gaskell, that in practice those forms are quite distinct from the (hybrid, order or straight) bill of lading form used in the present case (or in International Air and Sea Cargo GmbH v The Chitral (Owners) [2000] 1 All ER (Comm) 932 and Parsons Corp v CV Scheepvaartonderneming Happy Ranger [2002] 2 All ER (Comm) 24). Whatever the intricacies of the law as discussed in this judgment, I do not regard it as a happy matter that the omission of adding the words 'or order' in the consignee box in this case (or the omission to add a notify party in the form used in The Chitral), either of which could well have happened without any deliberation at all, should have the effect of transforming a contractual document which in every respect looks and reads like a bill of lading into a sea waybill, when a sea waybill commonly takes a totally different form.

[129] Schmitthoff's Export Trade: The Law and Practice of International Trade (10th edn, 2000) states a view (p 292 (para 15-038)) with which Mr Croall submits Benjamin, Carver and Gaskell are at variance, to the effect that—

'Logically, the function of the bill of lading as a document of title is distinct from its negotiable quality. Even a bill of lading which is not made negotiable operates as a document of title, because the consignee named therein can only claim delivery of the goods from the shipowner if able to produce the bill of lading. However, the great practical value of the bill of lading as a means of making goods in transit rapidly transferable is due to the customary combination of the two features of the bill, namely its quasi-negotiability and its function as a document of title.'

[130] I am uncertain to what extent this passage is at variance with the other authors. All the textbooks would seem to accept that if the goods under a straight bill can only be properly delivered against production of the bill, then it is a document of title. There is disagreement, however, as to whether that hypothesis is correct. Again, I am not sure to what extent that disagreement depends on the assumption that a straight bill has nothing to say expressly about use of the document to obtain delivery. Everyone seems to be agreed that if a straight bill expressly provides, as it commonly does, that its surrender is required for delivery to take place, then it is a document of title.

[131] Finally, Tetley Marine Cargo Claims (3rd edn, 1988) casts a comparative eye over the jurisprudence of many countries. Professor Tetley QC states (p 183) that—a 'The named or nominate bill of lading provides for delivery of the goods to a named person, without also specifying "to order or assigns". The nominate bill of lading is a document of title but is not negotiable. The named consignee may obtain delivery of the goods from the carrier upon surrender of the original nominate bill of lading to the carrier.'

b He also says (p 184):

'In the case of a nominate bill, the bill and the title to the goods thereunder can only be transferred once, i.e. from the shipper to the consignee. Thereafter the title to the goods covered by the nominate bill cannot be transferred by the mere delivery of the bill itself ...'

c [132] He points out (p 995) that the United States straight bill under the Pomerene Act is a hybrid, having certain of the qualities of a document of title, and yet it need not be presented to take delivery.

d [133] Mr Croall submitted that the textbooks were almost uniformly in favour of the carrier's case. However, in my judgment the position is more complex and mixed, and it can also be said that, on the basis that the bill of lading expressly requires its surrender to obtain delivery, there is something like uniformity in the opposite direction.

CONCLUSIONS

e [134] The first question is whether a straight bill of lading, but otherwise in the form of any classic bill of lading, is a bill of lading within the meaning of the Hague Rules. If it is, then, it has not been suggested that it should have a different meaning under the 1971 Act, for all that the treatment of the distinction between a bill of lading and a non-negotiable receipt in its s 1(6) may be seen, in retrospect, as a harbinger of the distinction between a bill of lading and a sea waybill to be found in s 1 of the 1992 Act. It is common ground that the point is open. It is open today. It was open and uncertain immediately before the agreement of the Hague Rules.

f [135] In my judgment, a straight bill of lading, for all that it is non-negotiable, should be viewed as a bill of lading within the meaning of the Hague Rules. I say that for the following reasons.

g [136] First, the Hague Rules are predominately concerned with the content of a contract of carriage in circumstances where such a contract as found in a bill of lading may come to affect a third party into whose hands such a bill is transferred. It seems to me to be plain as a matter of common sense but also on a review of the material cited in this judgment, that in this connection a named consignee under a straight bill of lading, unless he is the same person as the shipper, is as much a third party as a named consignee under a classic bill. Therefore I would view such a named consignee under a straight bill as prima facie within the concern of the Hague Rules.

j [137] Secondly, while it is I suppose true that a straight bill of lading can be used in circumstances where there is no intention of transferring it to the consignee, the authorities considered demonstrate that in practice it is used, just like a classic bill, as a document against which payment is required and the transfer of which thus marks the intended transfer of property. Therefore, as Professor Tetley says, its nature is that, although it cannot be transferred more than once, for it is not negotiable, it can be transferred by delivery (just like a classic bill) to the named consignee. In these circumstances, the shipper and his bankers and insurers need the same protection as the shipper under a classic bill; and the consignee himself and his insurers in turn need to have rights against the carrier under the contract of carriage. I can see no reason why straight bills of lading have not always been within the 1855 Act. Those needs are in any event recognised under the 1992 Act. a [138] Thirdly, whatever may be the position as a matter of principle and in the absence of express agreement, the practice appears to be that a straight bill of lading, unlike a mere sea waybill, is written on the form of an otherwise classic bill and requires production of the bill on delivery, and therefore transfer to a consignee to enable him to obtain delivery. (In this respect the position of a straight bill under the Pomerene Act appears to be different, but even so the Harter Act, one of the forerunners of the Hague Rules, would seem to cover straight as well as negotiable bills.) b

c

[139] Fourthly, suppose the question is asked, in the context of the Hague Rules, in these terms: what of the straight bill? Is this a 'bill of lading' or, being non-negotiable, something else, more akin to a non-negotiable receipt? Then, as it seems to me, the straight bill of lading is in principle, function, and form much closer to a classic negotiable bill, than to a non-negotiable receipt, which, to judge from art VI of the Hague Rules, was viewed as something far more exotic. d

[140] Fifthly, the travaux préparatoires of the Hague Rules, despite lacking unequivocal cogency, to my mind are not only consistent with the view I would prefer, but go far to support it.

[141] Sixthly, I am unimpressed by the argument derived from the terms of the 1971 and 1992 Acts. They may reflect a developing English view about how to categorise bills of lading and non-negotiable receipts and sea waybills, but, as the learned authors of Benjamin and Carver point out, they are ultimately dealing with different purposes. In any event, I do not see how they can control the meaning of the Hague Rules, which are not only much earlier, but also of international and not merely domestic scope. e
f

[142] The next question is as to the effect of the attestation clause in the bill of lading in the present case. Is it applicable only to the use of the bill in its negotiable form, or does it survive to control its use as a straight bill? In my judgment, for the reasons stated in [106], above and in Gaskell (see [127], above), the attestation clause is to be construed as applicable in either event. If it had been intended that it should not apply when the bill was used in non-negotiable form, then it could very easily have said so. Against the background of the common forms of sea waybills, it is truly remarkable that it does not say so. g

[143] The third question is, then, whether such a straight bill of lading, which has to be produced to obtain delivery, is a document of title? In my judgment it is. I consider that the authorities and textbooks discussed above support that view. Whatever the history of the phrase in English common or statutory law may be, I see no reason why a document which has to be produced to obtain possession of the goods should not be regarded, in an international convention, as a document of title. It is so regarded by the courts of France, Holland and Singapore. h
j

[144] Is it a 'similar' document of title? If I am right to consider that negotiability is not a necessary requirement of a 'bill of lading' within the meaning of the Hague Rules, then plainly it is. But I also think that the good sense of regarding a straight bill whose production is required for delivery of the goods a as a document of title in turn supports the answer to the prior question of whether a straight bill is a 'bill of lading'.

[145] The final question is whether a straight bill of lading is in principle a document of title, even in the absence of an express provision requiring its production to obtain delivery? It would seem that Voss v APL Co Pte Ltd [2002] 2 Lloyd's Rep 707 concluded that it was (at any rate if it is issued in traditional form in three originals). That was also the view of the Law Commission. It is unnecessary to decide the point, but in my judgment it is. It seems to me to be undesirable to have a different rule for different kinds of bills of lading—which I think was the view of Butt J in The Stettin (1889) 14 PD 142 as well. It is true, as Benjamin states, that in the case of a negotiable bill the carrier needs to have the bill produced in order to be able to police the question of who is entitled to delivery. Yet an analogous problem arises with a straight bill. A shipper needs the carrier to assist him in policing his security in the retention of the bill. He is entitled to redirect the consignment on notice to the carrier, and, although notice is required, a rule of production of the bill is the only safe way, for the carrier as well as the shipper, to police such new instructions. In any event, if proof of identity is necessary, as in practice it is, what is wrong with the bill itself as a leading form of proof? That is of course an inconvenient rule where the carriage is very short, as in cross-Channel shipments, and that is why sea waybills are used in such trades. But it is clear that straight bills are used in intercontinental carriage and therefore the inconvenience argument fades.

[146] I am not unhappy to come to these conclusions. It seems to me that the use of these hybrid forms of bill of lading is an unfortunate development and has spawned litigation in recent years in an area which for the previous century or so has not caused any real difficulty. Carriers should not use bill of lading forms if what they want to invite shippers to do is to enter into sea waybill type contracts. It may be true that ultimately it is up to shippers to ensure that the boxes in these hybrid forms are filled up in the way that best suits themselves; but in practice I suspect that serendipity often prevails. In any event, these forms invite error and litigation, which is best avoided by a simple rule.

RESULT

[147] For these reasons, I conclude that this was a bill of lading or similar document of title to which the Hague-Visby Rules applied. In the circumstances I would allow this appeal.

JACOB J.

[148] This appeal depends first upon the meaning and effect of the document entitled 'Bill of Lading'. It ends with these words:

'In WITNESS whereof the number of Original Bills of Lading stated above ... all of this tenor and date, has been signed, one of which being accomplished, the others to stand void. One of the Bills of Lading must be surrendered duly endorsed in exchange for the goods or delivery order.'

[149] Unless the last sentence is taken as struck out or meaningless, the consignee will not be given the goods by the carrier unless he produces an original bill of lading. No one disputes that would be so if the two little words 'Order of' had been added after the name and address of the consignee in the relevant box. I can see no reason why their omission from that box should have such a striking-out effect on the sentence in question. Langley J said ([2002] EWHC 593 (Comm) at [27], [2002] 2 Lloyd's Rep 403 at [27]):

'But I would add that in any event I do not think the printed words in the bill of lading requiring surrender of the bill against delivery of the goods can bear even the weight which Mr. Schaff seeks to put on them. MSC were obliged to deliver the cargo to and only to the consignees. That obligation and the concomitant entitlement of the consignees is not affected by whether or not the consignee has or surrenders the bill of lading. It is a consequence of the agreement between MSC and the shipper to be found in the fact that the bill of lading names the consignee without the words "Order of". Nor does MSC need the protection of delivering only in exchange for the bill of lading as it would with a transferable bill ... I also agree with the arbitrators that delivery against the bill of lading was not necessary.'

[150] I do not follow this. It is true that without these words the carrier could fulfil his obligation by delivery to the named consignee. But these words add more to the arrangement—that the consignee is not to be given the goods unless he produces an original bill. In practice he will not be able to do that unless he has paid for the goods and been given an original in exchange. The consignor had a real interest in ensuring that the right to possession (which is really what is meant by 'title' here) did not pass until he puts an original bill into the hands of the consignee. That is of course also true in the case of an order bill which in fact has not been indorsed over to a third party: the original consignee cannot obtain delivery without the original bill. Putting it another way, it is not only the carrier who gets protection from the bill. So also does the shipper. I can see no reason why the carrier under this bill would be permitted to make delivery to the named consignee without surrender of an original bill. So the bill is not a mere receipt.

[151] It follows, I think, that the bill is a document of title in the sense that its transfer to the consignee entitles the latter to delivery and is essential to that entitlement. Moreover a consignee who had been given the bill could demonstrate his title to third parties by its production. What he could not do is to transfer title simply by indorsing the bill. He could in principle transfer entitlement as between him and a third party by a separate arrangement between him and the third party, for instance by executing a fresh document (whether bill or deed or whatever). That would not affect the position of the carrier—he remains bound to deliver to the named consignee and none other.

[152] That being the effect of the bill, I turn to consider whether it is a bill of lading or any similar document of title within the meaning of s 1(4) of the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act 1971. That phrase itself derives from art I(b) of the Hague-Visby Rules, scheduled to the Act. Self-evidently it has the same meaning as in those rules. The goods were damaged en route. The consignee/buyers sue the carriers for negligence. If the bill is within the meaning then the Hague-Visby Rules apply with the consequence that liability cannot be capped by anything in the contract of carriage (see art III, para 8). (I note in passing that is somewhat bizarre that the buyers' very title to sue stems from the bill yet it is said that the bill is not a document of title for the purposes of the 1971 Act and the Hague-Visby Rules.)

[153] What then is the purpose of those rules? It is to provide protection from onerous terms in the contract of carriage. The carriers submit that such protection is only to be provided if there is a document of title in the sense of a a document which can be used to convey title generally—a conventional order bill of lading being the paradigm example. But I do not see why. Ask the question ‘who is to be given protection?’ An order bill protects not only the indorsee(s) of the bill but also the original consignee. I can see no rational reason for giving such a consignee protection but not a consignee who is not able to transfer title by indorsement.

b [154] There is another way of looking at it. Suppose the consignee had a say in the terms of the bill of lading. If he wanted the goods purely for himself (for instance special purpose machinery, as may well be the case here) rather than for dealing in (as might be the case with a commodity cargo) there is no reason why he would want the goods delivered to his order. Yet, on the respondent’s argument, unless he asked for those magic words he loses protection. That would be far from self-evident to an ordinary businessman and would be a quite illogical consequence.

c [155] A number of academic authors have, particularly in the last 20 years or so, written opinions to the contrary, as indeed did the Law Commission. But, with respect, I do not find in them a sufficient explanation of why the consignee’s protection against onerous terms in the contract of carriage, or the consignor’s protection in respect of receiving his money before delivery, should depend on whether it is a straight or order bill.

d [156] Accordingly I would allow the appeal on the first point. As to the points raised on the cross-appeal I agree with Rix LJ and have nothing to add.

e PETER GIBSON LJ.

[157] In Parsons Corp v CV Scheepvaartonderneming Happy Ranger [2002] EWCA Civ 694 at [31], [2002] 2 All ER (Comm) 24 at [31] Tuckey LJ said that the question whether a straight bill of lading was a bill of lading or similar document of title within the meaning of s 1(4) of the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act 1971 and the Hague/Hague-Visby Rules was not an easy point. He commented that it would be unwise to assume that the statements in the textbooks (which suggested a negative answer to that question) were correct, and that comment was underlined by Rix LJ (at [49]). Tuckey LJ was unwilling to decide the point in a case in which it did not call for decision. The point does call for decision on this appeal, in which we have had the benefit of admirable argument from Mr Schaff QC for MacWilliam and Mr Croall for MSC. I would pay tribute to their industrious researches which have resulted in all the relevant material being put before us.

g [158] Although we are differing from Langley J and from the arbitrators, Rix LJ’s judgment, with which I am in respectful agreement, is so comprehensive that, subject only to one matter, there is nothing which I would wish to add. That matter relates to the fact that I was a signatory in 1991 to the joint report of the Law Commission and the Scottish Law Commission on Rights of Suit in Respect of Carriage of Goods by Sea (1991) (Law Com no 196, Scot Law Com no 130) (the joint report), on which Langley J relied in reaching his conclusion that the straight bill of lading used in this case was not a bill of lading within the meaning of s 1(4). As will be apparent from my agreement with Rix LJ’s judgment, I am afraid that I now take a different view of some of the statements in para 2.50 of the joint report. Although Dr Eric Clive of the Scottish Law Commission observed in footnote 1 to para 1 of his Note of Partial Dissent that it was at least arguable that a straight bill of lading was a bill of lading for the purposes of the Hague-Visby Rules, I have to say that I do not recall much, if any, discussion on this topic within the Commissions or with the distinguished consultants who assisted the Commissions in the preparation of the joint report. The textbook authorities at that time appeared to be consistent and clear.

a

[159] However, in the light of the material now put before us as analysed by Rix LJ and for the reasons given by him I too would allow this appeal.

b

Appeal allowed.

James Brooks Barrister.

1 May 2003. Rix LJ granted permission to appeal.

a R (on the application of U) v Metropolitan Police Commissioner

R (on the application of R) v Durham Constabulary

b [2002] EWHC 2486 (Admin)

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (DIVISIONAL COURT)

LATHAM LJ AND FIELD J

c 12, 13, 29 NOVEMBER 2002

d Criminal law – Young offender – Final warning scheme – Young offenders suspected of committing indecent assaults – Police failing to warn offenders that administration of final warning leading to entry on sex offenders register – Whether scheme complying with convention rights – Crime and Disorder Act 1998, ss 65, 66 – Human Rights Act 1988, Sch 1, Pt I, art 6.

The claimants, who were both aged 15, were interviewed by the police on suspicion of committing indecent assaults on young girls. The respective police authorities determined that the circumstances justified giving final warnings as e provided for by the Final Warning Scheme established by ss 65^a and 66^b of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998, as amended by s 56 of the Criminal Justice and Court Services Act 2000. The Home Office guidance, which was in effect at the relevant time, provided that a reprimand or warning could only be given if the young person made a clear and reliable admission to all elements of the offence, f having been made aware of the consequences of such an admission. There was, however, no requirement for the young person to consent to a reprimand or final warning. The guidance also advised, that in giving a warning the officer should make clear that if the offence was one covered by the Sex Offenders Act 1997, the young person would be required to register under that Act. Neither claimant was made aware of that requirement and they accordingly applied for judicial review
g contending that the Act and the guidance did not comply, inter alia, with art 6^c of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998). The Secretary of State, the interested party, accepted that art 6 was engaged, but submitted:
h (i) that it was engaged only until such time as the police were satisfied under s 65(1)(e) that it would not be in the public interest for the offender to be prosecuted since that brought to an end the criminal charge in the same way as discontinuance of proceedings; and (ii) that there was no breach of art 6(2) because there was no conviction.

j Held – The administration of a reprimand or warning under s 65 of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998 was the determination of a criminal charge within the meaning of art 6 of the convention. The phrase ‘criminal charge’ had an

a Section 65, so far as material, is set out at [7], below

b Section 66, so far as material, is set out at [7], below

c Article 6, so far as material, is set out at [32], below autonomous meaning under the convention, was determined by reference to substance rather than form and included official notification given to an individual by the competent authority of an allegation that he had committed a criminal offence. Prima facie, therefore, the claimants were entitled to a fair trial of the allegations made against them attended by all the guarantees which were required by the convention. That did not mean, however, that the procedures for cautions, reprimands and final warnings were necessarily in breach of art 6. Indeed the scheme was not itself unlawful as there was nothing in the Act which required the police to proceed without the consent of the offender. The vice lay with the guidance, and the practice adopted pursuant to that guidance. Provided, therefore, there was an effective waiver procedure requiring such consent by the offender, and his or her parent, carer or other appropriate adult, there would be conformity with the convention. Moreover, it might be that if an offender had made a free and reliable admission in the full knowledge of the consequences, the court could, on the facts, conclude that informed consent had been given. Nevertheless, to rely on implied consent, would not be a sufficient safeguard of an offender's convention rights, particularly where the scheme was targeted at children and young persons. In the instant cases, although decisions were taken not to prosecute, the claimants had been required to subject themselves to a procedure which had the effect of publicly pronouncing their guilt of the offence of indecent assault. It followed that they had been denied a right to a trial of the charges against them, and been declared guilty by an administrative process. Accordingly the decisions would be quashed (see [35]–[39], below).

Notes

For effects of reprimands and warnings on young offenders, see 5(3) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 1604.

For the Crime and Disorder Act 1998, ss 65, 66, see 6 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (1999 reissue) 785–787.

For the Human Rights Act 1998, Sch 1, Pt I, art 6, see 7 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2002 reissue) 554.

Cases referred to in judgment

Deweer v Belgium (1980) 2 EHRR 439, [1980] ECHR 6903/75, ECt HR.

R v Greater Manchester Police, ex p R (2000) Independent, 23 October, DC.

R v Metropolitan Police Comr, ex p Thompson [1997] 1 WLR 1519, DC.

Cases also cited or referred to in skeleton arguments

Engel v Netherlands (No 2) (1976) 1 EHRR 706, ECt HR.

Ezeh v UK (2002) 12 BHRC 589, ECt HR.

H and M v DPP [1998] Crim LR 653, CA.

Malmstrom v Sweden (1983) 38 DR 18.

R v Court [1988] 2 All ER 221, [1989] AC 28, [1988] 2 WLR 1071, HL.

R (Bibi) v Newham London BC, R (Al-Nashed) v Newham London BC [2001] EWCA Civ 607, [2002] 1 WLR 237.

Van Raalte v Netherlands (1997) 24 EHRR 503, [1997] ECHR 20060/92, ECt HR.

Wandsworth London BC v Michalak [2002] EWCA Civ 271, [2002] 4 All ER 1136, [2003] 1 WLR 617.

X v Austria (1980) 19 DR 213.

a Applications for judicial review

R (on the application of U) v Metropolitan Police Commissioner

The claimant, U, proceeding by his mother and litigation friend, applied for judicial review of the decision of a police constable in the employ of the defendant, the Metropolitan Police Commissioner, to issue the final warning administered to the claimant on 12 February 2002 pursuant to s 65 of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998, following allegations of indecent assault, and his subsequent decision to refuse to quash the decision on 14 March 2002. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

c R (on the application of R) v Durham Constabulary

The claimant, R, proceeding by his father and litigation friend, applied for judicial review of the decision of a police constable in the employ of the defendant, the Durham Constabulary, to issue the final warning administered to the claimant on 23 January 2002 pursuant to s 65 of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998, following allegations of indecent assault. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

d Marc Willers (instructed by Parker Arrenberg Dawson & Cobb) for the applicant U.
Geoff Knowles (instructed by Gordon Brown Associates, Chester-le-Street) for the applicant R.

e Anne Studd (instructed by David Hamilton) for the defendant in the case of U and (instructed by Chris Southey, Durham) for the defendant in the case of R.
Steven Kovats (instructed by the Treasury Solicitor) for the Secretary of State for the Home Department, the interested party.

Cur adv vult

f 29 November 2002. The following judgment was delivered.

LATHAM LJ.

[1] This judgment is the judgment of the court. These two applications raise important questions of principle and practice in relation to the final warning scheme (the scheme) established by ss 65 and 66 of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998, as amended by s 56 of the Criminal Justice and Court Services Act 2000. The scheme is part of the strategy devised to prevent offending and re-offending by children and young persons. Its aim is to divert children and young persons from their offending behaviour before they enter the court system. It replaced, for children and young persons, the systems of cautions which had previously been in place with a more structured approach intended to prevent re-offending. Depending on the seriousness of the offence, a reprimand is normally given for a first offence and a final warning for a second offence; thereafter the young offender should generally be charged. Following a final warning, the police have a statutory duty to refer the young offender to a youth offending team in order to determine whether or not to provide an intervention programme. The procedures are governed by the provisions of the 1998 Act, and guidance issued under that Act by the Home Office.

[2] As we have said, the scheme replaced for young offenders the system of cautions which remains in place for all other offenders. This latter system is informal, in the sense that it is not underpinned by any statutory provision. The procedures are governed by Home Office circular 18/1994. The critical difference between this system and the scheme is that, under the circular, a caution can only be given if the offender gives his informed consent to being cautioned. Under the scheme, neither the 1998 Act, nor the guidance given by the Home Office makes any provision for such consent. Neither a caution, nor a reprimand or final warning, can, however, be given unless the offender has admitted the relevant offence or offences. a [3] In the two applications with which we are concerned the claimants, both 15 at the relevant time, were suspected of having committed indecent assaults on young girls; in U's case on a station platform; in R's case, at school. Both applicants were interviewed and, it is accepted, admitted that they had committed indecent assaults. They claim, however, that those admissions were the result of inducements rendering them unreliable. The respective police authorities determined that the circumstances justified giving final warnings, which were duly administered. The claimants were then required to register under the provisions of the Sex Offenders Act 1997, a consequence of a final warning of which neither was aware prior to its administration. The defendant disputes the circumstances in which it is said that the admissions were made; and the claimant U led evidence before us that after the final warning had been administered, the officer administering it so acted as to give rise to a legitimate expectation that the decision to administer the warning would be reconsidered. It is accepted on behalf of both defendants that neither of the claimants was asked whether he consented to the administration of the final warning. And in U's case it is accepted that the decision was not in fact reconsidered. b

c
d
e

[4] We therefore have to resolve three separate issues. (a) In relation to each claimant, we have to determine whether or not the defendants were entitled to rely on the admissions. This does not raise any new issue of principle. It is accepted on behalf of the defendants that unless they can establish that the admissions were reliable, in the sense of not having been obtained by reason of an inducement, then one of the preconditions for the administration of a final warning would not have been met. (b) In the case of U, we have to determine whether the evidence supports the assertion that he had a legitimate expectation as to the way his case would be dealt with which was not met by the police, so as to justify this court in concluding that he had been unfairly dealt with. (c) We have to consider the important submission made on behalf of both claimants that the 1998 Act and the guidance given by the Home Office in relation to the scheme do not comply with arts 6, 8 and 14 of the European Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998) in that it is not a precondition of the administration of a final warning that an offender should have given his informed consent to that course being adopted. The particular vice about which both claimants complain is that at no stage was either of them informed of the fact that the administration of the final warning would result in a requirement to register under the 1997 Act. f
g
h

[5] With those preliminary observations we propose to set out the relevant statutory provisions, the terms of the circular and the guidance given by the Home Office before dealing with the factual and legal issues raised by these applications. j

CAUTIONS

[6] Paragraph 2 of the circular provides:

'DECISION TO CAUTION'

2. A formal caution is a serious matter. It is recorded by the police; it should influence them in their decision whether or not to institute proceedings if the person should offend again; and it may be cited in any subsequent court proceedings. In order to safeguard the offender's interests, the following conditions must be met before a caution can be administered—

—there must be evidence of the offender's guilt sufficient to give a realistic prospect of conviction;

—the offender must admit the offence;

—the offender (or, in the case of a juvenile, his parents or guardian) must understand the significance of a caution and give informed consent to being cautioned.'

THE 1998 ACT (AS AMENDED)

[7]

'65. Reprimands and warnings.—(1) Subsections (2) to (5) below apply where—(a) a constable has evidence that a child or young person ("the offender") has committed an offence; (b) the constable considers that the evidence is such that, if the offender were prosecuted for the offence, there would be a realistic prospect of his being convicted; (c) the offender admits to the constable that he committed the offence; (d) the offender has not previously been convicted of an offence; and (e) the constable is satisfied that it would not be in the public interest for the offender to be prosecuted.

(2) Subject to subsection (4) below, a constable may reprimand the offender if the offender has not previously been reprimanded or warned.

(3) The constable may warn the offender if—(a) the offender has not previously been warned; or (b) where the offender has previously been warned, the offence was committed more than two years after the date of the previous warning and the constable considers the offence to be not so serious as to require a charge to be brought; but no person may be warned under paragraph (b) above more than once.

(4) Where the offender has not been previously reprimanded, the constable shall warn rather than reprimand the offender if he considers the offence to be so serious as to require a warning.

(5) The constable shall—(a) where the offender is under the age of 17, give any reprimand or warning in the presence of an appropriate adult; and (b) explain to the offender and, where he is under that age, the appropriate adult in ordinary language—(i) in the case of a reprimand, the effect of subsection (5)(a) of section 66 below; (ii) in the case of a warning, the effect of subsections (1), (2), (4) and (5)(b) and (c) of that section, and any guidance issued under subsection 3 of that section.

(6) The Secretary of State shall publish, in such a manner as he considers appropriate, guidance as to—(a) the circumstances in which it is appropriate to give reprimands or warnings, including criteria for determining—(i) for the purposes of subsection (3)(b) above, whether an offence is not so serious as to require a charge to be brought; and (ii) for the purposes of subsection (4) above, whether an offence is so serious as to require a warning ... (b) the category of constable by whom reprimands and warning may be given; and (c) the form which reprimands and warning are to take and the manner in which they are to be given and recorded ...

(9) Any reference (however expressed) in any enactment passed before or in the same Session as this Act to a person being cautioned shall be construed, in relation to any time after that commencement, as including a reference to a child or young person being reprimanded or warned.

66. Effect of reprimands and warning.—(1) Where a constable warns a person under section 65 above, he shall as soon as practicable refer the person to a youth offending team.

(2) A youth offending team—(a) shall assess any person referred to them under subsection (1) above; and (b) unless they consider it inappropriate to do so, shall arrange for him to participate in a rehabilitation programme.

(3) The Secretary of State shall publish, in such manner as he considers appropriate, guidance as to—(a) what should be included in a rehabilitation programme arranged for a person under subsection (2) above; (b) the manner in which any failure by a person to participate in such a programme to be recorded; and (c) the persons to whom any such failure be notified.

(4) Where a person who has been warned under section 65 above is convicted of an offence committed within two years of the warning, the court by or before which he is so convicted—(a) shall not make an order under subsection (1)(b) (conditional discharge) of section 12 of the Powers of Criminal Courts (Sentencing) Act 2000 in respect of the offence unless it is of the opinion that there are exceptional circumstances relating to the offence or offender which justify its doing so; and (b) where it does so, it will state in open court that it is of that opinion and why it is.

(5) The following, namely—(a) any reprimand of a person under section 65 above; (b) any warning of a person under that section; and (c) any report of a failure by a person to participate in a rehabilitation programme arranged for him under subsection (2) above, may be cited in criminal proceedings in the same circumstances as a conviction of the person may be cited.

(6) In this section “rehabilitation programme” means a programme the purpose of which is to rehabilitate participants and to prevent them from re-offending.’

THE 1997 ACT

[8]

1. Sex offenders subject to notification requirements.—(1) A person becomes subject to the notification requirements of this Part if, after the commencement of this Part ... (c) in England and Wales or Northern Ireland, he is cautioned by a constable in respect of such an offence which, at the time the caution is given, he has admitted.’

[9] The 1998 Act extends this category to those who have been reprimanded or warned under that Act. The consequence, so far as children and young persons who have been so reprimanded or warned is that the notification requirements where the offence is of indecent assault, the offence with which we are concerned, lasts for two-and-a-half years: see ss 1(4) and 4(2) of the 1997 Act.

HOME OFFICE GUIDANCE

a [10] The guidance which was in effect at the relevant time included the following when dealing with the administration of a reprimand or warning:

b '73. In giving a warning, the officer should specify the offence(s) which has lead to it and make clear that ... If the offence is one covered by the Sex Offenders Act 1997, the young person is required to register with the police for inclusion in the Sex Offenders Register (para. 77 below) ...

c 77. The Sex Offenders Act 1997 requires those convicted or cautioned for certain sex offences to notify the police of their details – this now includes offenders who are given a reprimand or warning for offences listed in that Act. The police officer must explain to a young offender and their appropriate adult that on receiving a reprimand or warning for such an offence they will be required to register with the police for inclusion on the sex offenders register. Where the YOT carries out a prior assessment of the young offender who has been reported for a sex offence this is an opportunity for them to explain about the register to the offender and his or her parents.'

d [11] In the current guidance, published in November 2002, those provisions are essentially replicated. However, in dealing with the requirement that the young person must admit the offence, it provides:

e '4.12 A reprimand or warning can be given only if the young person makes a clear and reliable admission to all elements of the offence. This should include an admission of dishonesty and intent, where applicable.

f 4.13 Unlike adult cautions, the young person does not "consent" to a reprimand or final warning. Under the legislation, it is a matter for the police to decide the appropriate disposal in accordance with the statutory criteria.

g 4.14 Young people and their parents/carers or other appropriate adults should have access to the information and the options available including the final warning scheme so that they can make an informed decision before the question as to whether they admit the offence is put to them. For instance they should be aware that the police will decide the appropriate disposal under the final warning scheme in the light of the statutory criteria. The status of a reprimand or final warning should also be explained, including:

- the fact that a record will be kept for a minimum of five years or until the offender reaches 18 years of age whichever is the longer;

- that it can be cited in criminal proceedings;

- in some cases made available to employers;

- if the offence is listed under the Sex Offenders Act 1997, that a reprimand or final warning will also be require them to register with the police for inclusion in the sex offenders register ...'

j GENERALLY

[12] The practical effect of these provisions is that a reprimand or warning is not a conviction, but is entered on the police national computer (PNC) and is therefore available for those who are entitled to inspect the contents of that computer. In particular the information is therefore available to local authorities in the exercise of their powers in relation to education and care of children.

THE FACTS

The claimant U

[13] Two girls complained that they had been indecently assaulted by being inappropriately touched on 16 May 2001 at New Cross Gate train station. U was arrested on 14 November 2001 and was bailed to return to the police station for interview on 24 November 2001, when he was accompanied by a solicitor, Mrs Gale. He was interviewed, and denied both allegations. He was bailed again to attend an identification parade. On 25 January 2002 U, again accompanied by Mrs Gale, was identified by one of the two girls but not the other. After the identification, there was a conversation between Mrs Gale and PC Wratten in which, according to Mrs Gale, PC Wratten indicated that if U was minded to admit the matter then he would be re-interviewed and provided that he made admissions on tape, the matter would be dealt with by way of a final warning. She then saw U and told him what PC Wratten had said. She explained the effect of a final warning, but did not tell him of the requirements under the 1997 Act, of which she was herself at the time unaware. She told us that U was concerned about going to court because it would take time. She told him that although that was understandable, it was not a basis on which he should make such a major decision. She advised him that a final warning would be less detrimental to him than a conviction.

[14] U was then interviewed on tape. He admitted that he had been on the platform at New Cross Gate at the time, and that he had put his hand up a girl's skirt and pinched her. He stated that he had not said this before because he was scared. He said that he understood that it was wrong. After the interview, PC Wratten said that he would grant bail to U to return to the police station, which Mrs Gale and U understood to be for the purposes of administering the final warning.

[15] After that attendance, Mrs Gale wrote a note which reads:

'Attend PC Ratten [sic]

He has checked with the girls and their parents and the Sergeant and takes the view that the matter is suitable for a final warning. I attended the client and reported the above. "U" indicated that he was willing to admit the offence on tape in consideration of getting a final warning. He decided to do this —to avoid lengthy proceedings

—to avoid the risk of a conviction thereby acquiring a criminal record.'

[16] PC Wratten told us that after the positive identification, he spoke to his sergeant and they decided that U should be re-interviewed. He spoke to Mrs Gale. He said that he told her the only disposal option was to charge U but that if an admission was made then there would be a further option, that of a warning. He denied having said to Mrs Gale that if U admitted the offence, he would be given a warning. His evidence was that this was a decision which could not be made by him, but had to be made by him in conjunction with his sergeant.

[17] Having heard both Mrs Gale and PC Wratten give evidence, we are satisfied PC Wratten's recollection is not correct. Mrs Gale made it clear to us that she did not consider at the time that PC Wratten was doing anything wrong, indeed she considered that he was being helpful. None the less she was satisfied that she had been given an assurance that if U admitted the offence, he would be a given a final warning. Her evidence is fully borne out by the contents of her note; and we accept it.

[18] U eventually attended at Southwark Police Station for the purposes of the administration of the final warning. The matter had been transferred from PC Wratten to PC Sharpe, who was a police officer trained in the administration of such warnings. U arrived early with his foster mother. PC Sharpe was not aware that Mrs Gale was due to attend. He accordingly administered the warning. Mrs Gale unfortunately arrived late, as did U's natural mother who had also been informed of U's appointment. By then U and his foster mother had left. Mrs Gale and U's mother met PC Sharpe who informed them of what had happened. U's mother became extremely upset. She said that she was not in favour of the final warning having been administered. PC Sharpe, according to Mrs Gale, then informed U's mother that U had been told to attend at Catford Police Station to sign on the sex offenders register. This upset U's mother further. PC Sharpe, according to Mrs Gale, then said that he could always cancel the final warning and he would not complete the paperwork until U's mother had had an opportunity to hear the admission which U had made. PC Sharpe told us that as d he had not given any promise to either Mrs Gale or to U's mother but had been prepared to delay completing the paperwork to give U's mother an opportunity to hear the admissions U had made on tape. He told us that he had waited for five days and then notified the PNC of the warning.

[19] We have come to the conclusion that PC Sharpe did not give to either Mrs Gale or to U's mother any unequivocal promise which could give rise to a legitimate expectation of a sort which would justify this court in concluding that there had been any unfairness in the way in which U had been dealt with. The warning had been properly administered. PC Sharpe was seeking to cope as best e he could, with what had undoubtedly become a fraught situation.

[20] On 14 February 2002, Mrs Gale wrote to U asking him to contact her to f discuss what had happened. U went to see her on 28 February 2002. He told her that he had only admitted the offence to receive a final warning and that he was in fact not guilty. He made it clear that he was not happy about going on the sex offenders register for a period of two-and-a-half years. Despite being advised that if the final warning was set aside, the matter would probably go to court and he might be convicted, he said that he had decided that he wanted the final warning g cancelled and that he wanted the matter to go to court. It was in those circumstances that the judicial review proceedings were commenced.

R's claim

[21] In November 2001, a number of girls made complaints of what they h considered to be indecent assaults by R. They were all girls who were at school with R and made their complaints originally to the school itself. As a result R was excluded from school. The complaints were reported to the police. Five girls were interviewed on videotape; and their complaints were sufficiently serious for the police to investigate. In January 2002, WPC Cummins, now detective j constable, telephoned R's stepfather asking him if he would be prepared to take R to the police station for interview. His evidence was that in the course of that telephone conversation, he asked what was likely to happen. He told us that at that time the family were under considerable stress, and R himself was in a very distraught state. The stepfather's evidence was that WPC Cummins had told him that the parents did not want the matter to go any further and that because R had no criminal record or history of behaviour of this type, depending on admissions that he made, he would be likely to be given a 'caution'. Accordingly he was prepared to take R to the police station. R was interviewed on 11 January 2002. He told us that he was at no time told what the consequences of a caution might be. In particular he was not told that one of the consequences would be a requirement to register under the 1997 Act. He said that in the light of what he had been told by WPC Cummins, he did not consider it necessary to obtain legal advice. Had he been told of the consequence of a caution he would undoubtedly have done so.

[22] During the course of the interview, R admitted to what he described as 'horseplay', such as ping-pong bra straps, and touching the girls on the bottom playfully, which he did not consider to have any sexual connotation; none the less he admitted having touched girls on the breast. It is not suggested on behalf of R that the contents of the interview do not constitute admissions of indecent assault. It is clear that they do.

[23] DC Cummins told us that she had certainly spoken to R's stepfather to ask him if he was willing to accompany R to the police station. She said, however, that she had at no stage given any indication to R's stepfather as to the possibility of a final warning until after the interview. She was adamant that at no time before then was any indication given to R's stepfather of what the possible outcomes of any interview might be. Having heard both R's stepfather and DC Cummins, we are satisfied that she did not at any stage before the interview give any indication that if R made admissions in interview, he would receive a caution or final warning. The contents of the interview are themselves instructive. It is plain that in large part, R was seeking to minimise what had happened. There is nothing to suggest that he was making any admissions in order to obtain some benefit for himself.

[24] The final warning was given to R on 29 January 2002. His stepfather told us that he was not then told of the consequence of a final warning, namely that R would have to register under the 1997 Act. It was only when the youth offending team came to his home later in February 2002 that that requirement was made plain. There is no doubt that he reacted strongly to this information. Despite the fact that it is suggested that he had been provided with information at the time of the final warning as to this requirement, we are satisfied from the evidence of those who were there at the time, that neither he nor his wife were aware of that information until the attendance of the youth offending team. It was as a result of what he was then told that he saw solicitors and these proceedings were commenced.

THE ISSUES

[25] The second issue which we have identified, which relates to U only, we have already disposed of in dealing with the facts. As we have said, there is no factual basis upon which U could claim that he had a legitimate expectation that his final warning would be reconsidered which would justify this court in intervening.

[26] Before dealing with the first and third issues, it is worth putting them in their context. The underlying complaint in these proceedings is that neither claimant was made aware at any time during the procedure that the consequences of a final warning would be a requirement to register under the 1997 Act. Mrs Gale told us frankly that she had not known of this requirement.

a Had she known, she may well have given advice to U in different terms. As far as R is concerned, his stepfather told us that he would have sought legal advice, particularly as it was hoped that R would join the forces on leaving school and he would have wanted to discover whether the effect of registering under the 1997 Act would create a problem. Leaving aside the legal niceties for the moment, b both claimants say that it is simply unfair to obtain an admission of an offence and then proceed administratively to what is in effect a public declaration of guilt, with the particular consequences for those charged with sex offences, without at any stage spelling out those consequences. It is submitted that, at the very least, those consequences should have been spelt out before each of the claimants was interviewed. The main thrust, however, of the claimants' submissions is that no c final warning should have been given without the express informed consent of the claimants.

[27] Turning then to the first issue, it is common ground that the police are not entitled to rely, when determining whether or not to administer a reprimand or a final warning, on an admission procured by way of an inducement so rendering the admission unreliable. This court so held in R v Metropolitan Police d Comr, ex p Thompson [1997] 1 WLR 1519. In that case a police inspector determined that a caution was the appropriate way of dealing with an offender and then, on interview, asked him whether he was willing to accept a caution, telling him that by accepting the caution he was admitting the offence. The court held that the cautioning procedure was predicated upon a reliable admission and e genuine consent. The court considered that as a result there were, essentially, two vices in the procedure in fact adopted. First, the consent thereby obtained could not be said to have constituted a reliable admission. Second, the procedure had conflated two separate steps in a proper cautioning process. The admission of guilt was a precondition to a decision to administer a caution; and accordingly there should have been an admission before formal consideration was given to f proceeding by way of caution.

[28] In the case of U, our conclusions of fact are such that both vices exist in his case. PC Wratten together with the sergeant, had decided that a final warning was an appropriate disposal before interviewing U. But, more important, that had been conveyed to Mrs Gale in circumstances which were clearly capable of amounting to an inducement when that information was relayed to U. In all the g circumstances, we consider that the admission was not a reliable admission and could not, accordingly, properly found a decision to administer a final warning.

[29] The position is different in the case of R. We are satisfied that there was no inducement offered to R prior to or at the time of his making the relevant admissions. Accordingly, the police were entitled to rely on them. However, h that still leaves the question of the effect of the fact that nothing was said about the consequences that might flow from those admissions. In R v Greater Manchester Police, ex p R (2000) Independent, 23 October, this question arose under the procedure for administering cautions. At the time that the applicant in that case admitted the offence, he was not made aware of the requirement to j register under the 1997 Act in the event of a caution. He and his father were, however, made aware of that requirement at the time that they were asked to consent to a caution. The court held that the police, in informing them of the requirement before asking for the consent to a caution, had satisfied the requirement of the circular to obtain informed consent and that the caution was accordingly lawful. The court, however, said that it would have been preferable if that requirement had been made clear before the interview in which the admission was made. Laws LJ, in agreeing with the lead judgment of Rafferty J, said:

‘There is no escape from the application of the notification provisions contained in the 1997 Act to caution juveniles. On the facts here the police should certainly have made that clear on 17 June. I desire only to emphasise my respectful view that the decision of this court in Ex p Thompson was not intended to discourage recourse to sensible and practical exchanges between police, suspect and the legal advisor in a case where a caution is in prospect in appropriate disposal of the case, but it is of the greatest importance that a caution should not be offered as an inducement for the making of a confession.’

[30] Paragraph 4.14 of the new Home Office guidance, which we have set out (see [11], above) is clearly intended to address this problem, which is more acute in the context of the scheme in the light of the fact that informed consent is not a precondition of a reprimand or final warning. The new guidance meets the first of the complaints of the claimants to which we referred in [25], above. Further, provided that the information is conveyed to the child or young person and those with him in a way which does not give any indication that an admission will result in a reprimand or final warning, the formula proposed could not amount to an inducement rendering any admission unreliable. There is no doubt, however, that the police must be scrupulously careful not to give any indication as to the likely form of disposal in the event of an admission, because if they do they run the risk that any admission upon which they subsequently rely will be open to challenge.

[31] However, we do not consider that that failure to warn of the consequences of a reprimand or a final warning could render the decision to reprimand or administer a final warning unlawful as a matter of domestic law. The preconditions set out in the 1998 Act and the guidance in effect at the time were met in R’s case. And the scheme, as defined by the 1998 Act and the guidance does not require the young offender’s consent. The most important question of principle in this case is whether or not this consequence gives rise to a breach of any of the provisions of the convention, which is the third issue which we have to determine.

[32] It is the claimants’ contention that the scheme even as presently devised does not conform to the requirements of art 6, art 8 and art 14 of the convention. These provide as follows:

‘Article 6

Right to a fair trial

1. In the determination of his civil rights and obligations or of any criminal charge against him, everyone is entitled to a fair and public hearing within a reasonable time by an independent and impartial tribunal established by law ...
2. Everyone charged with a criminal offence shall be presumed innocent until proved guilty according to law ...

Article 8

Right to respect for private and family life

1. Everyone has the right to respect for his private and family life, his home and his correspondence.

2. There shall be no interference by a public authority with the exercise of this right except such as is in accordance with the law and is necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security, public safety or the economic well-being of the country, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others ...

Article 14

Prohibition of discrimination

The enjoyment of the rights and freedoms set forth in this Convention shall be secured without discrimination on any ground such as sex, race, colour, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, association with a national minority, property, birth or other status.'

[33] The first and main submission on behalf of the claimants is that the whole process involved in the scheme is subject to the provisions of art 6. It is submitted that for the purposes of that article, the process constitutes the determination of a criminal charge within the meaning of that phrase in the convention, requiring its determination by an independent and impartial tribunal. It is accepted that this does not give the claimants an absolute right to a trial. The police would be entitled at any time to discontinue proceedings against them. But, they submit, this is not what the scheme involves. The scheme results in what is in effect a public declaration of guilt by an administrative process and accordingly breaches both art 6(1) and (2). It would be otherwise, it is accepted, if the claimants had given informed consent to disposal of the matter under the scheme so that they could properly be said to have waived their art 6 rights. As for art 8, it is submitted that the requirements resulting from a reprimand or final warning are capable of affecting the claimants' private and family life, and, even if proportionate, are discriminatory, in that adults, who are subject to the system of cautions are given the opportunity to decide whether or not to accept a caution, whereas children and young persons are not. Further the scheme discriminates between adults and children and young persons by denying to the latter the right to consent, so that they are discriminated against in relation to their arts 6 and 8 rights.

[34] The Secretary of State, who appears because of the potential challenge to the legislation, accepts that art 6 is engaged, but submits that it is engaged only until such time as the police are satisfied under s 65(1)(e) of the 1998 Act that it would not be in the public interest for the offender to be prosecuted. It is submitted that this brings to an end the criminal charge in the same way as discontinuance of proceedings. Further, it is submitted that there is no breach of art 6(2) because there has been no conviction. It is accepted that art 8 is also engaged, but it is submitted that in so far as there is interference with the individual's private or family life, that interference is proportionate in the public interest. As to art 14, it is submitted that there is no question of discrimination.

The system of cautions and the scheme are different in kind. The scheme is a structured approach to the problems presented specifically by children and young persons and cannot be equated to the system of cautions for adults. a

[35] We have no doubt that the Secretary of State is right to concede that art 6 is engaged. The phrase 'criminal charge' has an autonomous meaning under the convention, which is determined by reference to substance rather than form. In Deweer v Belgium (1980) 2 EHRR 439 at 459 (para 46), the court defined it as 'the official notification given to an individual by the competent authority of an allegation that he has committed a criminal offence'. b

[36] Prima facie, therefore, the claimants were entitled to a fair trial of the allegations made against them attended by all the guarantees which are required by the convention. There is, however, no doubt that that is not an absolute right. The police would have been entitled to decide not to prosecute and discontinue the proceeding: see Deweer's case (at 460–461 (para 49)). But that is not what happened in the present case. Although the decision was taken not to prosecute, the claimants were required to subject themselves to a procedure which had the effect of publicly pronouncing their guilt of the offence of indecent assault. That was the consequences of the final warnings being recorded on the PNC, so that the fact of the final warnings became available not only in the event of future offending, but also to all those who have access to the PNC. It seems to us that these consequences prima facie constituted a breach of art 6(1) and (2). The claimants were denied a right to a trial of the charges against them, and declared guilty by an administrative process. c

[37] That does not mean, however, that the procedures for cautions, reprimands and final warnings are necessarily in breach of art 6. It would be unfortunate if they were. For they provide significant advantages both to the public, and to the individual offender. They constitute a sensible means of ensuring that resources are not wasted on cases where the paraphernalia of the court appearance is unnecessary given the character of the individual and the nature of the charge; and in the case of the scheme, this has the further clear policy objective of seeking to prevent re-offending by children and young persons. From the offender's point of view, it results in the matter being dealt with expeditiously and does not result in a conviction, which undoubtedly has more serious consequences than a caution, reprimand or final warning. d

[38] The European Court of Human Rights recognised in Deweer's case, (again at 460–461 (para 49)), that the domestic legal systems of the contracting states frequently provide mechanisms by which a person may waive his right to have his case dealt with by a court. However, the court stated that any such mechanism must be looked at with care so as to ensure that any waiver has not been the result of constraint. Accordingly the scheme, and the system of cautions, can only conform with the convention if their procedures can properly be said to amount to such a waiver. In our view an effective waiver requires informed consent by the offender to the procedure being adopted, as in the case of cautions. This conclusion does not, however, mean that the scheme itself is unlawful in the sense that the 1998 Act does not conform with the convention. There is nothing in the 1998 Act which requires the police to proceed without the consent of the offender. The vice lies in the guidance, and the practice adopted pursuant to that guidance. In the two cases with which we are concerned, there has clearly been no informed consent, so that there has been a breach of the claimants' art 6 rights. Accordingly the decisions must be quashed. In these e a circumstances, we do not consider that it is necessary to come to any conclusion as to the arguments based upon arts 8 and 14.

[39] However, the conclusion that we have reached that informed consent is required before the procedure can comply with art 6 does not mean that in every case where a reprimand or final warning has been given, there has been a breach of the offender's convention rights. The procedure adopted by the police may well in any particular case have resulted in informed consent being given. For example, where an offender has made a free and reliable admission in the full knowledge of the consequences, it may well be that the court could on the facts conclude that informed consent has indeed been given. But to rely on implied consent in that way would not, in our view, be a sufficient safeguard of an offender's convention rights, particularly bearing in mind the fact that the scheme is targeted at children and young persons. The appropriate practice must be to ensure that before a reprimand or final warning is administered, the offender and his or her parent, carer or other appropriate adult should be told of the consequences, and asked whether or not they consent to that course being taken.

d Applications granted.

Dilys Tausz Barrister.

SCT Finance Ltd v Bolton

[2002] EWCA Civ 56

COURT OF APPEAL (CIVIL DIVISION)

WALLER, RIX LJ AND WILSON J

16 JANUARY 2002

Costs – Order for costs – Discretion – Judge ordering detailed assessment of costs on standard basis – Judge placing quantified limit on costs unsuccessful defendant should pay – Whether placing of limit within judge’s discretion – CPR 1.1(2)(c), 44.3 – CPR PD 44.

Costs – Third party – Assessment of third party costs – Presence of party ultimately paying costs at assessment hearing – Action to be taken where party ultimately paying costs not present at assessment hearing – CPR 3.1(7).

The defendant purchased a car by way of hire purchase. The distributors, V, had sold the car to the dealers, H, who arranged a hire purchase arrangement through the claimant company. As a result of problems he was experiencing with the car, the defendant ceased payments to the claimant. The claimant issued proceedings for the outstanding balance of £351. The defendant issued a defence and a counterclaim for damages. In order better to defend the counterclaim, the claimant issued Pt 20 proceedings against H. In turn, H issued Pt 20 proceedings against V for the same purpose. Judgment was given on the claim, and the counterclaim was dismissed. The judge went on to make an order for costs. Estimated bills of costs were provided by the claimant in the sum of £9,000, by H in the sum of £24,000 and by V in the sum of £18,000. The judge ruled that the costs of each Pt 20 defendant should move up the line of defendants, with the result that the bill of costs of the claimant would include those of both H and V. The judge directed himself that, by CPR 44.3(6), he had the power to limit the costs in some way. He ruled that the costs of the claimant, which would include those of H and V, should be subject to a detailed assessment on the standard basis and paid by the defendant, but that the defendant’s liability would be limited to £15,000, because the costs had been allowed to escalate out of proportion to the amount at stake, and also because of the defendant’s limited means. The claimant appealed on the grounds that the imposition of such a limit was wrong in law or beyond a reasonable exercise of the judge’s discretion.

Held – Although CPR 44.3(6) did not specifically cover an order placing a limit on costs, the rule was not exhaustive of the orders it was possible to make, and there was no doubt that by virtue of CPR 44.3(1)(b) a court could validly identify a quantified ceiling on costs. However, because the judge had ordered a detailed assessment of costs on the standard basis, only those costs which were proportionate would be allowed under CPR 44. Moreover, by virtue of CPR PD 44, the provisions of, inter alia, CPR 1.1(2)(c), which stated that cases should be dealt with in a way proportionate to the financial position of each party, were to be applied. It followed, therefore, that the judge’s attempt to allow for a perceived lack of proportion to the amount in issue and to the defendant’s means by limiting the amount payable was unprincipled, since that same lack of proportion was already fully allowed for by virtue of detailed assessment on a standard basis

- a having been ordered. The limit on the amount payable by the defendant would therefore be removed, and the defendant would be liable for all the costs of the claimant as assessed on the standard basis (see [25], [36], [40], [47], [52], [54], below).

- b Per curiam. Where litigation involves a chain of Pt 20 parties and costs are ordered to move up the line of defendants with a final order against one party, all such costs should be assessed together and the party ultimately paying such costs should be present at the assessment hearing. Where such a party is not present, it is possible to use CPR 3.1(7) to revoke such an assessment and allow a new assessment by a district judge (see [56]–[59], below).

Notes

- c For the assessment of costs and factors to be taken into account in deciding the amount of costs, see 10 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) paras 22, 23.

Case referred to in judgments

- d Johnson v Ribbins (Sir Francis Pittis & Son (a firm), third party) [1977] 1 All ER 806, [1977] 1 WLR 1458, CA.

Appeal

- e The claimant, SCT Finance Ltd (the hire-purchase company) appealed from the decision of Judge Elly in the Reading County Court on 9 March 2001, whereby he allowed the hire-purchase company's claim against the defendant, John Bolton, in respect of arrears of instalments owing on a motor car, dismissed the defendant's counterclaim and limited the costs recoverable by the claimant to £15,000. The facts are set out in the judgment of Wilson J.

- f Rosana Bailey (instructed by Sechiari, Clark & Mitchell, Cardiff) for the hire-purchase company.
The defendant appeared in person.

WALLER LJ.

- g [1] I will ask Wilson J to deliver the first judgment.

WILSON J.

- h [2] This is an appeal brought with leave of the single Lord Justice from the county court in relation to costs. As such, it is overcast, from start to finish, by the heavy burden faced by any appellant in establishing that the judge's decision falls outside the discretion in relation to costs conferred upon him under CPR 44.3(1). For reasons of general policy, namely that it is undesirable for further costs to be incurred in arguing about costs, this court discourages such appeals by interpreting such discretion very widely.

- j [3] The appeal is brought by SCT Finance Ltd (the hire-purchase company) from the order of Judge Elly in the Reading County Court on 9 March 2001. Before the judge were proceedings brought by the hire-purchase company against Mr Bolton, who, in April 1995, had bought from it a car on terms as to hire purchase. As a result of a counterclaim made by Mr Bolton, the hire-purchase company issued a CPR Pt 20 claim against WR Hammant Ltd (the dealers) through whom Mr Bolton had bought the car. As a result of the Pt 20 claim against them, the dealers in turn issued a Pt 20 claim against Volkswagen Group UK Ltd (the distributors) who had sold the car to them.

[4] The substantive result of the proceedings, against which there is no appeal, was that judgment be given on the claim by the hire-purchase company against Mr Bolton in the sum of £351; and that the counterclaim and the two successive claims under Pt 20 be dismissed. Then came the orders for costs. They were: (a) that the distributors' costs be paid by the dealers, subject to detailed assessment on the standard basis; (b) that the dealers' costs be paid by the hire-purchase company, subject to detailed assessment on the standard basis and so as to include the costs payable by the dealers pursuant to (a); and (c) that the hire-purchase company's costs be paid by Mr Bolton, subject to detailed assessment on the standard basis and so as to include the costs payable by the hire-purchase company pursuant to (b) but subject also to (i) postponement referable to costs incurred while Mr Bolton was in receipt of public funds for the prosecution of his counterclaim; and (ii) an overall ceiling of £15,000.

[5] The hire-purchase company accepts the validity of the limitation at (i), made pursuant to what is now s 11 of the Access to Justice Act 1999. Mr Bolton appears to have been publicly funded for the prosecution of his counterclaim between about November 1999 and February 2000, namely before the vast bulk of the costs had been incurred by any of the other parties. So the hire-purchase company does not expect that the effect of that limitation will be to postpone recovery of any significant amount of its costs. Its appeal is against the limitation at (ii), namely the overall ceiling of £15,000. In circumstances in which the estimates placed before the judge of the costs of the distributors were about £18,000, of the dealers were about £24,000 and of the hire-purchase company itself referable to the counterclaim were about £9,000, the hire-purchase company alleges that, in imposing a ceiling of £15,000 upon its recovery against Mr Bolton, the judge exceeded the generous ambit of his discretion.

[6] The story begins in April 1995 when Mr Bolton informed the dealers that he wanted to buy a new SEAT Cordoba 1.6 CLX motor car on hire purchase. SEAT cars are manufactured in Spain, in effect by Volkswagen. The dealers arranged the purchase through the hire-purchase company. So the dealers bought the car from the distributors and sold it to the hire-purchase company, who leased it to Mr Bolton; and in May 1995 Mr Bolton took delivery of it. It had then travelled 30 miles.

[7] Mr Bolton, including his family, used the car extensively. By May 1996 he had travelled over 21,000 miles in it; and by May 2000 he had travelled 110,000 miles in it.

[8] In the years following his acquisition of the car, Mr Bolton had a number of problems with its brakes. Inspections and repairs were undertaken. Late in 1996 he complained to the dealers about an alleged design fault in the brakes. The dealers caused an officer of the distributors' technical division to inspect it. There the matter seemed to rest.

[9] In January 1998 Mr Bolton ceased to make his monthly payments to the hire-purchase company. He had come to the view that the new car which he had contracted to buy in April 1995 on hire purchase should have been fitted with an air bag and an air-conditioning unit. By letter dated 14 May 1998, SEAT UK disabused him of the validity of that view. But, erroneously (as it was later to transpire), it added that, though bought in April 1995, the car that was sold to him would have been built to the specification set in June 1994. Mr Bolton later a discovered that under such specification the car should have been fitted with a sun roof and with a driver's seat the height of which was adjustable. In the interim, however, namely with effect from July 1998, he resumed payments to the hire-purchase company. He again stopped making such payments in January 1999.

b [10] In July 1999 the hire-purchase company issued the proceedings against Mr Bolton in the Reading County Court in respect of arrears of instalments. The claim was for £917. By his defence in August 1999, Mr Bolton correctly pointed out that there had been a duplication in the calculation of the claim amounting to £266, which reduced it to £651. Indeed, following the issue of the proceedings, he paid a further £300 against what was owed, thereby reducing it to £351. More importantly Mr Bolton filed a counterclaim for damages not exceeding £10,000, c by which he claimed that: (a) in lacking a sun roof and an adjustable driver's seat, the car was not in accordance with the specification for which he had contracted; and (b) in relation to problems with the brakes, rear wheel bearings and wiring faults in the boot, the car had been neither of merchantable quality nor fit for its purpose at the time of its acquisition in 1995.

d [11] The hire-purchase company filed a defence to the counterclaim. For obvious reasons it had no internal knowledge of the matters raised in the counterclaim. Before, however, issuing proceedings under Pt 20 against the dealers, it sought to compromise the litigation with Mr Bolton. By letters in January 2000, expressly made under CPR Pt 36, Mr Bolton, through his then solicitors, offered to settle the litigation for a net payment to him of £3,000 and, e by contrast, the hire-purchase company offered to settle it on the basis that neither party should make any payment to the other. Neither offer was acceptable to the other. Thereupon, namely in April 2000, the hire-purchase company issued Pt 20 proceedings against the dealers. This move prompted the proceedings issued in July 2000 by the dealers, again under Pt 20, against the distributors. By these successive proceedings, Mr Bolton's complaints about f the nature and quality of the car which he had acquired over four years earlier were passed down the contractual line for the distributors to answer.

g [12] Following issue of its proceedings, the hire-purchase company's claim had been allocated to the fast track. In July 2000, however, that company, apparently worried by the escalation of costs, issued an application for the proceedings to be re-allocated to the small claims track. It argued that, even on Mr Bolton's case, his counterclaim had a value of not more than £5,000. It seems that it was the dealers who opposed re-allocation to the small claims track. At all events the district judge directed that the proceedings should remain in the fast track and indeed that, in the event of failure to reach agreement, whether h between the experts who had by then been consulted on behalf of Mr Bolton and of the two Pt 20 defendants referable to the matters raised by the counterclaim or between Mr Bolton and the hire-purchase company referable to the amount of the claim, the proceedings should be re-allocated to the multi-track.

j [13] In November 2000 Mr Bolton wrote to the effect that he refused to agree the amount of the claim against him and that he had instructed his expert not to consider material produced (as he said, late) by the expert for the Pt 20 defendants. The result was that the proceedings were indeed re-allocated to the multi-track, down which they travelled to hearing and judgment on 7, 8 and 9 March 2001. Separate counsel appeared for the hire-purchase company, the dealers and the distributors. Mr Bolton, by then without public funding, appeared in person.

[14] By his substantive judgment dated 8 March, the judge, without difficulty, computed the value of the claim at £351. The difficulties for Mr Bolton in advancing a counterclaim about the nature or quality of a car purchased over four years earlier and after he had travelled over 100,000 miles in it were obvious. In fact when, outside court, the two experts were at last in a position to discuss matters, they agreed that in 1995 the car had been fit for its purpose and of merchantable quality. Further evidence from the distributors led them and the judge to accept that, contrary to the letter from SEAT UK dated 14 May 1998, neither a sun roof nor an adjustable driver's seat was within the specification of the model offered for sale to the public and sold to Mr Bolton in April 1995. So, at the end of the second day of the hearing, for those reasons alone, the judge dismissed the counterclaim.

[15] On the third day the judge addressed the issues of costs. Before him had been placed the three estimates of costs referable to the counterclaim and to its consequential proceedings under Pt 20, to which I have already referred and which amounted in all to about £51,000.

[16] Early in his substantive judgment at the end of the second day, the judge had, reasonably, used strong language by which to draw attention to the disparity between the costs incurred and the sums at stake in the proceedings. He said:

'Unfortunately, because there was a counterclaim made, which was limited in its amount to £10,000 in total, the finance company joined in the garage, the garage have joined in the manufacturers and, on the basis of what has been put before me up to now in respect of costs, we have a situation where we have costs claims before me of something of the order of over £50,000. On top of that there is whatever Mr Bolton may have personally expended on his solicitors and, on top of that, whatever has been paid under the legal aid scheme, as it then was, to those solicitors. I have to say that it is a very unattractive situation in which we find ourselves, where somebody is going to pick up bills for something of the order of £50,000 in costs—whether that turns out to be Mr Bolton or whether it turns out to be to be one of the other parties to the proceedings, but however the cake is cut, there is still that amount of money which has been spent on a debt which started on a claim of just under £1,000. It has been accepted it was overcalculated because of a double charge for fees, and should have been started at £651, in respect of which £300 has since been paid. I do not know what anybody who is not a lawyer sitting in this court could be thinking about when they hear that, for sake of £350 outstanding, somebody is picking up bills totalling over £50,000. It is a monstrous situation. But that is the position in which I am told we find ourselves here.'

[17] In his judgment on costs the judge first addressed the distributors' claim for costs and decided that, notwithstanding that the letter dated 14 May 1998, for which they had in effect been responsible, had been the source of protracted confusion, they should be paid their costs. He also decided that the dealers should be paid their costs. But by whom should the costs of the distributors and the dealers be paid? The hire-purchase company argued that in each case any order for such costs should be made directly against Mr Bolton. But the distributors and the dealers each argued that any such order should go up the line, ie that the costs of the distributors be paid by the dealers and that the costs of the latter be paid by the hire-purchase company.

a [18] Accepting that he had a discretion to favour either route, the judge chose the latter. He held that, in that it had been reasonable for the dealers to join the distributors, the costs awarded to them against the hire-purchase company should include the costs payable by them to the distributors. Of the costs payable under each of these two orders, he directed detailed assessment on the standard basis. He added:

b 'I have remarked on the size of the bills. As I have said already, and I repeat for the sake of clarity, they do look high. They certainly look high against the amounts which are at stake. But that does not mean to say that they are not justifiable. That is a matter which the district judge will have to determine. I leave to the district judge the determination of the question of c whether or not they should be reduced having regard to the overall requirement that costs should bear some relative resemblance to the claim which they are being incurred to meet.'

[19] Then the judge addressed the claim for costs made by the hire-purchase company against Mr Bolton referable to the counterclaim, it being in effect
d agreed that it should receive only fixed costs referable to the claim. The judge concluded that, in that Mr Bolton had lost the counterclaim, it was clearly right in principle that he should pay the hire-purchase company its costs thereof on the standard basis. He reminded himself of the statutory protection for Mr Bolton referable to costs incurred while he was publicly funded. He concluded that it
e had been reasonable for the hire-purchase company to issue proceedings under Pt 20 against the dealers, with the result that such costs as were awarded to the hire-purchase company should include such costs as it was required to pay to the dealers. He continued as follows:

f 'The only remaining question is whether or not I should have regard to any sort of limit on the costs, because I do have to take into account the various circumstances which are set out in CPR 44.3 with regard to costs. For example, conduct of the parties, whether a party has succeeded in part of his case, and so forth. I also can, under r 44.3(6), make an order which is a power of limiting the costs in some way. It does seem to me that it is right that I g should do that in this case. I am concerned about the fact that all this expense has been incurred. Whilst I have to acknowledge that I cannot say that Hammants, nor Volkswagen, or either of them, should not have been joined into the proceedings, it does seem to me that, in doing so, and in the general conduct of these proceedings, the costs have been allowed to escalate out of proportion to the amounts at stake. It seems to me that it is right, in dealing h with a litigant—and this is not just a case of because Mr Bolton is in person and is clearly not a man of means—that I make this decision. But it does seem to me that there ought to be an overall limit on his liability. I would put that at the sum of £15,000. In doing that, I have related that to the amounts which are said to have been at stake on the counterclaim and also j the fact of the number of parties involved.'

[20] From that passage I collect two reasons for the judge's imposition of the ceiling of £15,000. The main reason was that 'the costs have been allowed to escalate out of proportion to the amounts at stake'. But the judge added: '... this is not just a case of because Mr Bolton is in person and is clearly not a man of means ...'

[21] The use of the word 'just' suggests to me that Mr Bolton's perceived lack of means was a subsidiary reason for the decision. a

[22] One of the major points made on behalf of the hire-purchase company in this appeal is that there is an anomaly written across this part of the judge's order. He was, in reality, addressing three sets of costs for which ultimately Mr Bolton was to be liable; and his concern was that they had escalated out of proportion to the amounts at stake. Yet, if it was appropriate for him so to do, the judge b allowed for this factor against only one of the successful parties, being, I might add, that party whose estimate of costs was lowest. The costs payable to the distributors and to the dealers, both in effect by the hire-purchase company, were not the subject of a ceiling; but those payable to the hire-purchase company were the subject of a ceiling and at first sight a very low one. If, for the sake of c argument, this was the appropriate mechanism by which the judge would cut out such costs as were out of proportion to the amounts at stake, the effect was that the costs of the distributors and of the dealers escaped his knife and that the consequence of any lack of proportionality in the amount of their costs was visited upon the hire-purchase company.

[23] The judge was right to conclude that the normal principle is that the costs of successful defendants brought in under what is now Pt 20 of the CPR pass up the line to the principal defendant: see Johnson v Ribbins (Sir Francis Pittis & Son (a firm), third party) [1977] 1 All ER 806, [1977] 1 WLR 1458. Indeed in the present type of case it can be argued that, in the configuration of contracts entered into in April 1995, it was the hire-purchase company who chose to enter into a d contract with the private individual with all the attendant risks of irrecoverability of the costs of any forensic conflict with him. Nevertheless, had it been appropriate for the judge to have placed some ceiling on Mr Bolton's liability for the three sets of costs, there was a strong argument that his discretion should have been so exercised as to make the three orders for costs directly against him, each the subject of a ceiling in terms of a figure or a percentage. e

[24] The bigger question, however, is whether any ceiling was appropriate at all. f

[25] In this regard it is necessary to address certain of the provisions in r 44.3, as indeed the judge purported to do. As he rightly observed, the general discretion to make an order for costs under para (1) includes, by virtue of para (6)(b), an order for 'a stated amount in respect of another party's costs'. g There has been discussion this morning as to whether those words are apt to cover an order for detailed assessment subject to the ceiling of a stated amount. It may be that, on a strict view, they are not thus apt. But para (6) identifies seven types of order which the general discretion under para (1), derived from s 51(1) of the Supreme Court Act 1981, is said only to 'include'. Paragraph (1)(b) of r 44.3 h provides that the court has discretion as to the amount of costs payable by one party to another; and I have no doubt that a court can properly identify the amount thus payable as being such costs as are calculated by detailed assessment but subject to a quantified ceiling. So in my view the judge had ample discretion to make the order which he did.

[26] But the manner by which such discretion should be exercised is subject to j other paragraphs of the rule. The starting point is to be collected from para (2):

'If the court decides to make an order about costs—(a) the general rule is that the unsuccessful party will be ordered to pay the costs of the successful party; but (b) the court may make a different order.'

[27] Paragraph (4) provides:

- a 'In deciding what order (if any) to make about costs, the court must have regard to all the circumstances, including—(a) the conduct of all the parties; (b) whether a party has succeeded on part of his case, even if he has not been wholly successful; and (c) any payment into court or admissible offer to settle made by a party which is drawn to the court's attention (whether or not made in accordance with Part 36).'
- b

[28] The reference to the conduct of the parties in para (4)(a) is amplified in para (5) in terms which it is unnecessary to set out.

- c [29] One of Miss Bailey's complaints on behalf of the hire-purchase company is that the judge failed to discharge his duty under para (4). She says in particular that he failed to advert to the fact, which was clearly brought to his attention, that in January 2000, before the significant costs had been incurred, Mr Bolton had refused to accept the Pt 36 offer of her client, whereunder both claim and counterclaim be discontinued with no order for costs. In my view there is considerable force in that point. Although para (4) does not purport to provide a comprehensive definition of the circumstances relevant to the exercise of the discretion, a proper consideration of all three factors there particularised affords no ammunition whatever for Mr Bolton in opposing full application of the general rule.
- d

- e [30] In my view, however, there is a more fundamental objection to the judge's imposition of the ceiling. The objection is born of the fact that he had already ordered that all three sets of the costs of the successful parties be subject to detailed assessment on the standard basis. What then is the standard basis under the CPR? Rule 44.4 provides as follows:

- f '(1) Where the court is to assess the amount of costs (whether by summary or detailed assessment) it will assess those costs—(a) on the standard basis; or (b) on the indemnity basis, but the court will not in either case allow costs which have been unreasonably incurred or are unreasonable in amount ...
- g (2) Where the amount of costs is to be assessed on the standard basis, the court will—(a) only allow costs which are proportionate to the matters in issue; and (b) resolve any doubt which it may have as to whether costs were reasonably incurred or reasonable and proportionate in amount in favour of the paying party.'

- h [31] Therefore, under the standard basis, costs can be allowed only if they are proportionate to the matters in issue. That means, as is made clear by r 44.5(1)(a), that both the nature of the work in respect of which the costs were incurred and the amount of such costs must be proportionate.

[32] Section 11.1 of the practice direction (CPR PD 44) supplementary to Pt 44 explains the operation in this respect of rr 44.4 and 44.5:

- j 'In applying the test of proportionality the court will have regard to rule 1.1(2)(c). The relationship between the total of the costs incurred and the financial value of the claim may not be a reliable guide. A fixed percentage cannot be applied in all cases to the value of the claim in order to ascertain whether or not the costs are proportionate.'

[33] Rule 1.1(2)(c) provides that dealing with a case justly, in accordance with the overriding objective of the rules, includes, so far as is practicable—

'dealing with the case in ways which are proportionate—(i) to the amount of money involved; (ii) to the importance of the case; (iii) to the complexity of the issues; and (iv) to the financial position of each party ...'

[34] Thus the principal effect of the judge's decision, clearly correct, to direct assessments of costs on the standard, rather than the indemnity, basis was to require the costs assessor to disallow costs which, on an overall rather than mechanical view, were disproportionate to the matters in issue and indeed to disallow them if he remained in doubt on the point. Interestingly, even the financial position of Mr Bolton was, to some extent, to figure in that inquiry by virtue of r 1.1(2)(c)(iv).

[35] In the course of argument Waller LJ canvassed with Miss Bailey whether it could be considered proportionate to the matters in issue for her client and both the Pt 20 defendants all to have briefed separate counsel for the hearing. Miss Bailey indicated that there were, or may have been, conflicts which required the three parties to have separate representation. Nevertheless that is the sort of feature to which I would expect any inquiry into proportionality to pay close regard.

[36] It follows, in my view, that the ceiling of £15,000 imposed by the judge was, with respect, unprincipled. It purported to make allowance for perceived lack of proportion in the amount of the costs in circumstances where his directions for standard assessments had already made full allowance for any such lack of proportion. The ceiling would have effect only to the extent that the costs assessor had been satisfied that costs which were proportionate to the matters in issue had been incurred in a sum exceeding £15,000. The effect of the ceiling would in that event be to excise from Mr Bolton's liability the excess element of the proportionate costs and would thus be contrary to the judge's primary reason for imposing it. Furthermore, to the limited, and in my view controversial, extent to which it was proper for the judge also to have regard to Mr Bolton's perceived lack of means, that factor would also figure in the assessor's appraisal of proportionality.

[37] Mr Bolton has filed a respondent's notice by which he seeks to uphold the judge's ceiling by reference to arguments not referred to by the judge.

[38] Mr Bolton, who has appeared, as he did before the judge, in person before us and who has addressed us with great clarity and civility, complains, first of all, that the hire-purchase company failed to comply with the majority of the interlocutory directions which had been made in the proceedings. The only clear example of this alleged default is its failure to serve its expert's report and statements from its witnesses of fact and to give disclosure within various dates prior to 22 December 1999 which had been set in an order dated 14 October 1999. That related to the period prior to the issue of the Pt 20 proceedings; and it must not be forgotten that the hire-purchase company had no internal knowledge of the matters raised in the counterclaim. Indeed it is clear that during the period of that delay it was making what may now be seen to have been a very reasonable offer to settle the proceedings prior to any significant proliferation of costs. In my view it cannot be said that its failure to meet those deadlines had any significant impact on the development of the litigation.

[39] Mr Bolton's other arguments are that, in seeking at a hearing in February 2000 to obtain permission to issue its Pt 20 proceedings against the dealers, the hire-purchase company misrepresented part of the procedural history to the district judge and that, having secured such permission, it failed by some three a weeks to issue the proceedings within the time which he set. These might have been regarded as insubstantial points, not related to the proliferation of costs, had it not been for a suggestion by Mr Bolton, hotly disputed by the hire-purchase company, that the misrepresentation, if such it was, was deliberate and that its failure to issue within the time set, which is far from established to my satisfaction, was sought to be masked by a fax document which the hire-purchase company forged. These two suggestions of serious forensic misconduct were articulated by Mr Bolton before the judge. Had they been established to his satisfaction, they would, I have no doubt, have figured in his judgment and probably have been reflected to some extent in his award. In my view it is impossible for this court to proceed on the footing of the accuracy of those suggestions.

c [40] I therefore propose that this appeal be allowed and that the provision which imposed the ceiling of £15,000 upon Mr Bolton's liability for costs be set aside.

d [41] It remains for me only to add a footnote arising from the fact, of which Miss Bailey told us this morning, that a detailed assessment of the costs of the dealers was purported to be conducted by a district judge on 2 November 2001. The purported assessment has resulted in a certificate that the hire-purchase company is obliged to pay the dealers' costs in a sum of about £17,000.

[42] The assessment seems to me to be both curious and unfortunate.

e [43] It is curious because, as Miss Bailey assures us, it does not purport to include the liability of the dealers for the costs of the distributors, which of course fall, under the order of the circuit judge, to be included in the sum payable to the dealers by the hire-purchase company. In other words the district judge was presumably addressing a bill in a total analogous to the estimate of £24,000 placed by the dealers before the circuit judge; and the effect of his assessment was f apparently to reduce that bill by about £7,000. This court is not in a position to comment upon whether such a reduction properly reflects the exercise which fell to be undertaken by the district judge, particularly with regard to proportionality.

g [44] The assessment is also unfortunate because Mr Bolton tells us that he was given no notice of it; and that the bill of costs which was the foundation of it was never served upon him. It would have been clear to the district judge, from perusal of the circuit judge's order, that in principle the ultimate payer of all the costs was Mr Bolton. So, whether or not he was aware that the ceiling imposed by the circuit judge was under appeal, the district judge should, in my view, have ordered that Mr Bolton be treated as a 'relevant person' within r 47.6(2) and section 32.10(1)(c) of the practice direction supplementary to it. As such a person, h he should have been served by the dealers with notice of commencement and with their bill and, in the event of his serving points of dispute, he should have been given notice of the assessment hearing.

i [45] I also consider that it would have been far preferable for the district judge to consider the matters of proportionality and of reasonableness in a contemporaneous assessment of all sets of costs of the three successful parties. It is unclear why, for example, the costs of the distributors have not been the subject of assessment. It goes without saying that, if such is to be explained by reference to some agreement as to the amount of their costs reached with the dealers and with the hire-purchase company, Mr Bolton, who has not been party to it, would still in any event be entitled to the protection of a detailed assessment.

[46] In the above circumstances, and on the basis that the asserted absence of service on Mr Bolton is true, I would expect the circuit judge to be receptive to an application by Mr Bolton for permission to appeal against the assessment and for an extension of time for doing so.

RIX LJ.

[47] I agree. The judge, by his order for costs, in the knowledge that some £50,000 had been estimated as incurred in costs by the hire-purchase company, the dealer and the distributor, permitted full recovery by the dealer and the distributor, for whose costs the hire-purchase company would become liable, but prevented the hire-purchase company from recovering any more than a maximum of £15,000 against Mr Bolton.

[48] Whatever justice this may have done to Mr Bolton, it was a prima facie injustice to the hire-purchase company as between it and the dealer and the distributor, unless perchance the judge had been able to conclude that, and had articulated reasons why, the litigation had been conducted in such a way as to justify such a prima facie anomaly. But he articulated no reasons to explain this anomaly.

[49] In making such an order for costs, CPR 44.3(4) requires the judge ('must') have regard to all circumstances, including the conduct of all the parties and any admissible offer to settle made by a party which is drawn to the court's attention.

[50] However, the judge, in that part at the end of his judgment on costs in which he imposed the £15,000 ceiling, made no criticism of the hire-purchase company's conduct, nor did he take into account Mr Bolton's threefold refusal to accept a drop-hands offer made to him at an early stage by the hire-purchase company. Nor did the judge have regard to the facts (a) that the hire-purchase company's estimate of costs was substantially less than the estimate of either the dealer or the distributor, and (b) that, on the merits of Mr Bolton's counterclaim, the hire-purchase company was merely piggy in the middle and that the real dispute involved the dealer and the distributor.

[51] In these circumstances the judge failed, in my judgment, to take into account all that he was required to take into account, and arrived at an order for costs which was wholly unreasonable and unjust as against the hire-purchase company.

[52] For these reasons, in addition to those given by my Lord, I would allow this appeal and remove the £15,000 ceiling contained in the judge's order.

[53] The question of proportionality, as well as that of the reasonableness of the costs claimed, all rolled up as they are into the hire-purchase company's costs, must, in the event, be resolved at the assessment stage. In that connection I hope that the assessment of the dealer's costs will prove to be no ultimate impediment to a fair and just resolution of the ultimate assessment of all the parties' costs which Mr Bolton will have to pay.

WALLER LJ.

[54] I also agree that, having allowed for the recovery of costs up the chain, as the judge had done, without any cap on any individual claim, it was wholly wrong to cap the recovery of the hire-purchase company so far as Mr Bolton was concerned, and I agree with the reasons given by both Wilson J and Rix LJ for that result.

a [55] I would just add, however, a word on an aspect which has concerned me and which relates to the footnote to the judgment of Wilson J.

b [56] Where litigation has involved a chain of CPR Pt 20 parties, and where costs orders are made up a chain, with a final order being made incorporating all those costs against one party, two things seem to me to be obvious. First, when making an assessment of those costs, where questions of proportionality and reasonableness will arise, all such costs should be assessed together. Second, it seems to me to be obvious that the ultimate payer has the most interest in arguing questions of reasonableness or questions of proportionality.

c [57] Now, without the final costs certificate that we were shown this morning in relation to the dealer's costs, there would be no difficulty in dealing with these costs in accordance with those obvious points. But what of this final cost certificate? Does it place any impediment? It seems to me that one might rely on CPR 3.1(7). That is a provision which says: 'A power of the court under these Rules to make an order includes a power to vary or revoke the order.'

d [58] I cannot find referred to in the notes to the CPR, a decision which I understand to exist of Neuberger J's, which essentially says that you cannot construe that power as allowing any court at any time simply to reverse itself if it happens to change its mind. With respect I follow the logic of that decision, and I am not seeking to suggest that there is anything wrong with Neuberger J's view.

e [59] But where, as in this case, one has a situation where one party was not present when the assessment took place, and was indeed, as I have sought to suggest, the party with the most interest in being entitled to argue about proportionality and reasonableness, it seems to me possible that r 3.1(7) could be invoked. I would suggest indeed that the parties should be sensible, and see the logic that Mr Bolton should have been present, and should go, by agreement, before the district judge to set aside that final certificate.

f [60] If the parties cannot agree, or if the district judge cannot be persuaded to use that power, then I agree with Wilson J that the only other course is for there to be an appeal from that order. Again I would hope that a circuit judge would give permission to appeal, even if it is out of time, having regard to the fact that Mr Bolton only heard of the existence of that final costs order today when the matter was produced before us.

g [61] The position then should be that the costs judge should be able to consider all the bills of the distributor, the dealer and the hire-purchase company together, and should be able to consider questions of proportionality and reasonableness, and should, in particular, be able to consider whether it was really right that three lots of lawyers were necessary to be present to fight this case against Mr Bolton.

h [62] I perhaps should add one footnote to this footnote, which is that, of course, as the judge was concerned about the enormity of costs that were incurred in relation to a very small claim, I, too, am concerned that by inviting a further process of assessment of costs, one is inviting a further incurring of costs in relation to the assessment of costs in relation to the fighting of a very small claim. Maybe the only answer to that is for the parties to consider the questions of proportionality and reasonableness for themselves, and consider whether it is not possible to reach some form of agreement in relation to costs so that those further costs are not incurred.

j [63] That, I should say, would only be possible if Mr Bolton sees, as I suggest he should see, that if he had accepted a CPR Pt 36 offer now many months ago, all these costs could have been saved, and we would not be here today. Thus he would have to accept that a considerable proportion of the costs must be borne by him. a

Appeal allowed.

James Brooks Barrister.

Warriner v Warriner
[2002] EWCA Civ 81

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION
MUMFORD, LATHAM AND DYSON LJJ

24 JANUARY 2002

Damages – Personal injury – Amount of damages – Discount rate for future pecuniary loss – Statutory provision permitting court to take into account rate of return different from that prescribed by Lord Chancellor if it were ‘more appropriate to the case in question’ – Meaning of ‘more appropriate in the case in question’ – Damages Act 1996, s 1 – Damages (Personal Injury) Order 2001.

After suffering serious brain damage in an accident, the claimant, who had a life expectancy of a further 46 years, brought a claim for damages in excess of £3m—a sum based on a discount rate of 2%. Under s 1(1)^a of the Damages Act 1996, the court was required, when determining the rate to be expected from the investment of a sum awarded as damages for future pecuniary loss in an action for personal injury, to take into account such rate of return as might from time to time be prescribed by the Lord Chancellor. Section 1(2) provided that sub-s (1) did not prevent the court taking a different rate of return into account if any party to the proceedings showed that it was ‘more appropriate to the case in question’. Pursuant to s 1(1), the Lord Chancellor prescribed a single discount rate of 2.5%. In setting that rate, the Lord Chancellor stated that it would eliminate the scope for uncertainty and argument about the applicable rate, and that he particularly had in mind larger awards that were intended to cover longer periods. At a case management conference, the judge made an order permitting the claimant to adduce an expert report which concluded that 2% was the more appropriate discount rate for the quantification of her future losses. The defendant appealed, contending that the report did not raise a prima facie case for a rate of 2% rather than 2.5%. The claimant contended that a lower rate was appropriate because of her long life expectancy and the size of her claim. In considering those submissions, the Court of Appeal was required to provide guidance as to the meaning of the phrase ‘more appropriate in the case in question’ in s 1(2) of the 1996 Act.

Held – In deciding whether a rate different from that prescribed by the Lord Chancellor in the 2001 order was ‘more appropriate in the case in question’ within the meaning of s 1(2) of the 1996 Act, the court had to have regard to the reasons given by him in arriving at that rate. If the case in question fell into a category that the Lord Chancellor had taken into account and/or there were special features of the case which (i) were material to the choice of the rate of return and (ii) were shown, from an examination of the Lord Chancellor’s reasons, not to have been taken into account, then a different rate of return might be ‘more appropriate’. If s 1(2) were construed in that way, it was likely that there would be comparatively few cases in which that provision would be successfully invoked, at least while the 2.5% rate and the Lord Chancellor’s reasons for it continued to apply. Such a construction accorded with and promoted the policy considerations which informed the Lord Chancellor's decision to choose the single rate of 2.5%, namely that the certainty of such a rate was desirable, that it would facilitate settlements and that it would result in saving the expense of expert evidence at trial. In the instant case, the circumstances relied upon by the claimant were not sufficient, even arguably, to justify applying a discount rate of 2% rather than 2.5%. Claims by claimants with life expectancies of between 30 and 50 years were not uncommon. Nor were claims in the range of £2m to £3m. Claims of that kind were included in the category which the Lord Chancellor particularly had in mind when setting the rate at 2.5%, and the expert report had not identified any special features which took the case outside the classes of case that the Lord Chancellor had taken into account. Accordingly, the appeal would be allowed (see [33], [35], [37], [39]–[41], [43]–[47], below).

^a Section 1, so far as material, is set out at [9], below

Wells v Wells, Thomas v Brighton Health Authority, Page v Sheerness Steel Co plc [1998] 3 All ER 481 and Warren v Northern General Hospital NHS Trust (No 2) [2000] 1 WLR 1404 considered.

Notes

For calculating future pecuniary loss in personal injury cases, see 12(1) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 881.

For the Damages Act 1996, s 1, see 13 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2000 reissue) 616.

For the Damages (Personal Injury) Order 2001, see 5 Halsbury's Statutory Instruments (2002 issue) 482.

Cases referred to in judgments

Warren v Northern General Hospital NHS Trust (No 2) [2000] 1 WLR 1404, CA.

Wells v Wells, Thomas v Brighton Health Authority, Page v Sheerness Steel Co plc [1998] 3 All ER 481, [1999] 1 AC 345, [1998] 3 WLR 329, HL.

Cases also cited or referred to in skeleton arguments

Butani v Camden London BC [2000] CA Transcript 1112, CA.

Page v Smith [1995] 2 All ER 736, [1996] AC 155, [1995] 2 WLR 644, HL.

Skrine & Co v Euromoney Publications plc [2001] EWCA Civ 1479, [2001] All ER (D) 134 (Oct).

Thomas v Wignall [1987] 1 All ER 1185, [1987] QB 1098, [1987] 2 WLR 930, CA.

Van Oudenhoven v Griffin Inns Ltd [2000] 1 WLR 1413, CA.

Appeal

The defendant, Geoffrey Warriner, appealed from the order of Judge Murphy QC, sitting as a judge of the High Court on 22 October 2001, permitting the parties to adduce expert forensic accountancy evidence in relation to the discount rate to be applied in a claim for damages for personal injury brought by the claimant, Dianna Wendy Warriner. The facts are set out in the judgment of Dyson LJ.

John Leighton Williams QC and Anthony Seys Llewellyn (instructed by Beachcroft Wansbroughs) for the defendant.

Laura Cox QC and Patricia Hitchcock (instructed by Irwin Mitchell, Sheffield) for the claimant.

MUMMERY LJ.

[1] I will ask Dyson LJ to give the first judgment.

DYSON LJ.

- a [2] The claimant suffered serious brain damage in a road traffic accident on 20 February 1998. It is said on her behalf that she currently has a life expectancy of 46 years. Her affairs are now administered by the Court of Protection. She commenced proceedings against the defendant in 1998. The defendant has admitted liability, but quantum remains in issue.
- b [3] A case management conference was held on 22 October 2001 by Judge Murphy QC sitting as a deputy judge of the High Court. The claimant wished to rely on the expert evidence of Mr Hogg dated 19 October 2001. In his report, Mr Hogg states that in his opinion multipliers assessed on the basis of a 2.5% discount rate are unfair for claimants who are awarded large sums of damages which are expected to compensate them for future losses over a long period of
- c time. It is his opinion that in cases such as that of this claimant, the appropriate discount rate for the quantification of future losses is 2%, and not 2.5%, the figure stated by Lord Irvine of Lairg LC in the Damages (Personal Injury) Order 2001, SI 2001/2301 (the 2001 order) that was made on 25 June 2001, and to which I shall come shortly. Mr Hogg's report was first disclosed to the defendant at the
- d hearing of the case management conference. The judge made various case management decisions. These included an order that:

‘1. Evidence from a forensic accountant being necessary, the parties have permission to adduce evidence from forensic accountants dealing with the issue of the discount rates to be applied when assessing future loss multipliers.’

- e
- [4] Mr Hogg's report was duly served on the defendant on 22 October.
- [5] The defendant had objected to the order permitting forensic accountancy evidence in relation to the discount rate issue on the grounds that the application was too late. It was said that it was wrong to allow evidence on an issue of such
- f great importance and complexity to be admitted so shortly before the trial, which at that time was due to start on 14 November. No objection was taken on 22 October on the basis that the evidence should not have been admitted because it did not support a case that had real prospects of success that the discount rate should be 2% rather than 2.5%.
- g [6] On 26 October, the claimant served a revised schedule of damages based on a 2% discount rate. The schedule pleads substantial sums under heads which are typical for this type of case, including claims for the cost of future care and for loss of future earnings. On the basis of a 2% discount rate, the total sum claimed is in excess of £3m. On any view, this is a substantial claim. It was conceded on behalf of the defendant before the judge that it was worth more than £1m.
- h [7] On 29 October, an application was made to the judge on behalf of the defendant that he should reconsider his decision to permit evidence from expert accountants as to the correct discount rate. But the judge held that, since the order of 22 October had been drawn up, he had no jurisdiction to reconsider the matter. It is clear, however, that even if he had reconsidered the matter, he
- j would not have reached a different conclusion, since he refused the defendant permission to appeal his earlier decision. He gave these reasons for refusing permission to appeal:

‘The claimant asserted that this was an exceptional case for the purposes of the discount rate to be applied. Section 1(2) of the Act contemplates there being exceptional cases. The difference in damages could be as much as

£500,000. I gave permission for the evidence to be heard and permitted the [defendant] reasonable time for obtaining [his] own expert. Overriding principle applies.’ a

[8] He adjourned the hearing of the trial of quantum until February 2002. The defendant was later given permission to appeal against the decision of 22 October by Hale LJ.

[9] The Act to which the judge was referring was the Damages Act 1996, which so far as material provides: b

‘1.—(1) In determining the return to be expected from the investment of a sum awarded as damages for future pecuniary loss in an action for personal injury the court shall, subject to and in accordance with the rules of court made for the purposes of this section, take into account such rate of return (if any) as may from time to time be prescribed by an order made by the Lord Chancellor. c

(2) Subsection (1) above shall not however prevent the court taking a different rate of return into account if any party to the proceedings shows that it is more appropriate in the case in question.’ d

[10] As I have said, on 25 June 2001 Lord Irvine LC made the 2001 order prescribing a rate of 2.5%. His reasons for selecting that figure were published on 27 June. The following day, an error in calculating the figure for the three-year average yield on index-linked government stock (ILGS) which formed an important part of Lord Irvine LC’s decision was brought to his attention. On 27 July, Lord Irvine LC published fresh reasons for the figure of 2.5% based on the accurate three-year average yield. e

[11] It is necessary to refer to some passages in Lord Irvine’s reasons. He said that he had decided to set a single rate to cover all cases:

‘It will eliminate scope for uncertainty and argument about the applicable rate. Similarly, I consider it is preferable to have a fixed rate, which promotes certainty and which avoids the complexity and extra costs that a formula would entail ...’ f

[12] He recognised that the rate would be bound to be applied in a range of different circumstances over a period of time: that was why he set the rate to the nearest 0.5%. He said that he had decided that he should— g

‘set a rate which should obtain for the foreseeable future. I consider it would be very detrimental to the reasonable certainty which is necessary to promote the just and efficient resolution of disputes (by settlement as well as by hearing in court) to make frequent changes to the discount rate. Therefore, whilst I will remain ready to review the discount rate whenever I find there is a significant and established change in the relevant real rates of return to be expected, I do not propose to tinker with the rate frequently to take account of every transient shift in market conditions.’ h

[13] Later he said: j

‘Setting a single rate to cover all cases, whilst highly desirable for the reasons given above, has the effect that the discount rate has to cover a wide variety of different cases, and claimants with widely differing personal and financial characteristics. Moreover, as has become clear from the consultation exercise (including responses by expert financial analysts to questions which a I posed them), the real rate of return on investments of any character (including investments in Index-Linked Government Securities) involves making assumptions for the future about a wide variety of factors affecting the economy as a whole, including for example the likely rate of inflation. In these circumstances, it is inevitable that any approach to setting the discount rate must be fairly broad-brush. Put shortly, there can be no single "right" answer as to what rate should be set. Since it is in the context of larger awards, intended to cover longer periods, that there is the greatest risk of serious discrepancies between the level of compensation and the actual losses incurred if the discount rate set it not appropriate, I have had this type of award particularly in mind when considering the level at which the discount rate should be set.'

c [14] Lord Irvine LC then explained in some detail why he had alighted on 2.5% rather than any other rate. He took a simple average of ILGS yields at an assumed rate of inflation of 3%, and arrived at an average gross yield of 2.46%. He concluded, therefore, that the net average yield on ILGS as adjusted to take account of tax lies in the range of 2% to 2.5%. Given that the rate was to be set to the nearest 0.5%, the choice lay between 2% and 2.5%. He then explained in detail why he opted for 2.5% rather than 2%. In summary, he gave these reasons: (a) the market in ILGS was at present distorted, so that the prevailing yields were artificially low; (b) the Court of Protection, even in the wake of the decision of the House of Lords in Wells v Wells, Thomas v Brighton Health Authority, Page v Sheerness Steel Co plc [1998] 3 All ER 481, [1999] 1 AC 345 had continued to invest on behalf of claimants in multi-asset portfolios, such that real rates of return well in excess of 2.5% could be expected; and (c) it was likely that 'real' claimants with large awards of compensation would not be advised to invest solely or even primarily in ILGS, but rather in a mixed portfolio.

f [15] Finally Lord Irvine said:

'Finally, in deciding that a single rate of 2.5% should have been set by me on 25 June 2001, I have borne in mind that it will, of course, remain open for the Courts under section 1(2) of the Damages Act 1996 to adopt a different rate in any particular case if there are exceptional circumstances which justify it in doing so.'

g [16] I turn now to Mr Hogg's report.

h [17] Mr Hogg referred to Lord Irvine's rate of 2.5% and said that Lord Irvine had based his reasoning on the average gross redemption yield on ILGS in the previous three years. In section 3 of his report, taking Lord Irvine's gross yield figure of 2.46%, he considered the impact of taxation on the claimant's case on the assumption of different levels of award. He arrived at returns net of tax of 1.86%, 1.97% and 2.12% on the basis of awards of £2.75m, £2m and £1m respectively.

j [18] In section 4, he adapted the gross yield of 2.46% to the claimant's circumstances. The only circumstance that he identified was her 46-year life expectancy. He noted that Lord Irvine had given equal weighting to the yields of each of the 12 ILGS stocks that he had taken into account in arriving at his figure of 2.46%, and said that in the case of this claimant the portfolio of ILGS should be weighted towards stocks with the longest maturity dates. He said (para 4.4):

'The weighting adopted by the Lord Chancellor may give a fair result for some claimants but not for those whose damages have to last for long periods. As Mrs Warriner's damages have to last 46 years her portfolio of ILGS would be heavily weighted towards the stocks with the longest maturity dates. I illustrate this in the following table.'

[19] He then set out a table showing an estimated gross yield of 2.18% for Mrs Warriner over a 46-year period on the basis of what Mr Hogg considered to be more realistic weightings. He increased this to 2.21% to take account of the fact that her claim for loss of earnings was in respect of a shorter period than her claim for care costs. Finally, Mr Hogg took taxation into account and said that she would achieve a net return of 1.63% on an award of 2.75m invested in ILGS, 1.74% on £2m and 1.885% on £1m. He set out his conclusions at section 5. These included:

'5.4 In my opinion the method adopted by the Lord Chancellor for arriving at the gross ILGS yield is unfair for claimants whose damages have to last for a long period.'

[20] On behalf of the defendant, Mr Leighton Williams QC submits that the judge should not have allowed the claimant to adduce the evidence of Mr Hogg on the discount rate issue because (a) the application for permission to admit it was too late and (b) the claimant has not in any event raised a prima facie case for a rate of 2% rather than 2.5%. Counsel did not develop his first ground. The decision of the judge was an exercise of discretion in case management. It is common ground that this court will not interfere with the exercise of case management powers unless it is shown that the decision that is challenged was plainly wrong. In my judgment, this decision was not plainly wrong on the grounds that the application was too late. I say no more about the first ground of appeal.

[21] I turn to the substantive ground that was developed by Mr Leighton Williams. He submits that it is not open to the claimant to seek to show by means of the evidence of Mr Hogg that Lord Irvine LC has fixed a rate that is 'wrong' or 'unfair'. The rate of 2.5% is now law, and must be applied until and unless it is changed, subject only to showing that this rate is not appropriate in the case in question under s 1(2) of the 1996 Act. The present case, where it is said that the claimant has a life expectancy of 46 years, is not unusual and is typical of cases that Lord Irvine had 'particularly in mind' when setting the rate at 2.5%. A central purpose of having a fixed rate for all types of cases is to achieve certainty. It is only in a very exceptional case that a different rate should be adopted.

[22] Mr Leighton Williams refers to Warren v Northern General Hospital NHS Trust (No 2) [2000] 1 WLR 1404. That was a case decided after Wells v Wells [1998] 3 All ER 481, [1999] 1 AC 345 (in which the House of Lords had laid down the guideline rate of 3%), but before Lord Irvine LC set the rate at 2.5%. In Warren's case, the claimant contended that damages should be assessed on the basis of a discount rate of 2% rather than 3% in accordance with Wells' case. The argument was that the discount rate should be reduced to counteract the effect of the higher rate tax on the award. The Court of Appeal rejected the argument. Stuart-Smith LJ gave the judgment of the court. He said ([2000] 1 WLR 1404 at 1408 (para 13)):

'The need for certainty to facilitate settlements coupled with the undesirability of extensive evidence from accountants, actuaries or economists with a view to persuading the courts to change the discount rate, a militates strongly against any court seeking to do so before the Lord Chancellor has acted under the Act of 1996.'

[23] He said (at 1411 (para 17)) that in Wells' case, the House of Lords came down firmly in favour of an overall rate of 3% 'save in very exceptional cases', and that this must mean that funds which fall within 0.5% of the norm of 3% should not be regarded as exceptional, let alone very exceptional. The court rejected the argument that the fact that the claim was in excess of £3m made it exceptional so as to justify a departure from the 3% norm.

b [24] Although Warren's case was decided before Lord Irvine LC prescribed the 2.5% rate, Mr Leighton Williams relies on it as showing that there is nothing exceptional about the present case, and that there is no real prospect that the trial judge would award damages on the basis of a discount rate other than 2.5%.
c Accordingly, the judge was in error in making the order permitting evidence to be adduced by forensic accountants.

[25] Mr Leighton Williams criticises Mr Hogg for failing to take into account all of the reasons given by Lord Irvine for prescribing the rate of 2.5%; in particular, he makes the point that Mr Hogg focused exclusively on Lord Irvine's reference to the average gross yield of 2.46% without also recognising that Lord Irvine took a number of other factors into account in arriving at his rate of 2.5%.
d He also submits that Mr Hogg has not identified any features of the present case which make it one to which s 1(2) of the 1996 Act should apply.

[26] On behalf of the claimant, Miss Cox QC submits that the decision that is e challenged on this appeal is a case management decision, and that the court should only interfere with it if satisfied that the judge was plainly wrong. She says that the question of whether the discount rate should be 2% or 2.5% is one that should be determined by the judge at trial after hearing expert evidence. Mr Hogg has raised at least a prima facie case for 2% on the facts of the present case. The difference between an award on the basis of 2% and an award on the f basis of 2.5% is very substantial.

[27] She submits that s 1(2) of the 1996 Act does not require the claimant to show that there are exceptional circumstances which justify a lower rate than 2.5%. All that the claimant has to show is that a lower rate is 'more appropriate in the case in question'. The claimant does not attack the rate chosen by Lord
g Irvine. She does, however, say that a lower rate is more appropriate by reason of the particular circumstances of the case. These are the combination of a long life expectancy and a claim for damages in excess of £3m. She submits that Mr Hogg's report raises a prima facie case, or a case that has a real prospect of success, and that the particular circumstances of the claimant's case make it more appropriate to use a rate of 2% than 2.5%. It is at least arguable that the claimant h will not receive full and just compensation if her award is based on the 2.5% rate. It would be wrong in principle to prevent the trial judge from hearing evidence and a full argument on the point.

CONCLUSION

j [28] In Wells' case [1998] 3 All ER 481, [1999] 1 AC 345 the House of Lords laid down a guideline discount rate of 3% that was to be applied generally until Lord Irvine LC prescribed a rate pursuant to s 1(1) of the 1996 Act. Their Lordships recognised that a single rate was a somewhat rough and ready instrument, but they embraced it on policy grounds. These grounds were that the certainty of such a rate was desirable, would facilitate settlements, and result in saving the expense of expert evidence at trial: see per Lord Lloyd of Berwick [1998] 3 All ER 481 at 493, [1999] 1 AC 345 at 373, and per Lord Steyn who said ([1998] 3 All ER 481 at 506, [1999] 1 AC 345 at 388):

‘My Lords, until the Lord Chancellor takes action under his statutory powers it is essential that there should be a firm and workable principle. It should be general and simple in order to enable settlement negotiations and litigation to be conducted with the benefit of a reasonable degree of predictability of the likely outcome of a case. While acknowledging an element of arbitrariness in any figure, I am content to adopt about 3% as the best present net figure. For my part I would derive that rate from the net average return index-linked government securities over the past three years. While this figure of about 3% should not be regarded as immutable, I would suggest that only a marked change in economic circumstances should entitle any party to reopen the debate in advance of a decision by the Lord Chancellor. The effect of the decision of the House on the discount rate, together with the availability of the Ogden tables, should be to eliminate the need in future to call actuaries, accountants and economists in such cases.’

[29] Lord Clyde said ([1998] 3 All ER 481 at 514, [1999] 1 AC 345 at 397):

‘The certainty of the result should produce economies in achieving agreement and settlement which should outweigh any rough edges of imprecision. Of course such a formula should not be seen as set in stone. It can serve as a general guide, open to modification and adjustment to meet the demands of particular cases.’

[30] Finally, Lord Hutton said ([1998] 3 All ER 481 at 519, [1999] 1 AC 345 at 404):

‘I further consider that in order to promote and facilitate settlements and to simplify the assessment of damages in actions which come on for trial the rate of 3% taken by this House in the present appeals should be applied in other cases notwithstanding fluctuations in the return on ILGS until the Lord Chancellor prescribes a different rate pursuant to his power under s 1 of the Damages Act 1996 or unless there is a very considerable change in economic circumstances.’

[31] These policy considerations were articulated and applied by this court in Warren’s case [2000] 1 WLR 1404, as has already been seen. In that case, the court interpreted Wells’ case as saying that the overall rate of 3% should be applied save in ‘very exceptional cases’.

[32] The same policy considerations informed Lord Irvine LC’s decision to choose the single rate of 2.5%. This is clear from the passages that I have already quoted from his reasons published on 27 July 2001. It is also clear that, in arriving at the figure of 2.5%, he took into account the fact that it remains open to the court under s 1(2) of the 1996 Act to adopt a different rate if there are ‘exceptional circumstances which justify it in doing so’. These policy considerations are no less important since Lord Irvine prescribed the 2.5% rate on 25 June 2001 than they were before.

[33] We are told that this is the first time that this court has had to consider the 1996 Act, and that guidance is needed as to the meaning of ‘more appropriate in the case in question’ in s 1(2). The phrase ‘more appropriate’, if considered in isolation, is open-textured. It prompts the question: by what criteria is the court to judge whether a different rate of return is more appropriate in the case in

- a question? But the phrase must be interpreted in its proper context, which is that Lord Irvine LC has prescribed a rate pursuant to s 1(1) and has given very detailed reasons explaining what factors he took into account in arriving at the rate that he has prescribed. I would hold that in deciding whether a different rate is more appropriate in the case in question, the court must have regard to those reasons. If the case in question falls into a category that Lord Irvine did not take into account and/or there are special features of the case which (a) are material to the choice of rate of return and (b) are shown from an examination of Lord Irvine's reasons not to have been taken into account, then a different rate of return may be 'more appropriate'.

- [34] Miss Cox criticises Lord Irvine LC for using the phrase 'exceptional circumstances' at the end of his reasons when referring to s 1(2) of the 1996 Act. So did Lord Brennan in the debate in the House of Lords on 29 November 2001 when an opposition motion that the order be revoked and a rate of 2% be substituted was rejected (see 629 HL Official Report (cols 531–532)). It is true that the phrase 'exceptional circumstances' does not appear in the 1996 Act. But in my judgment Lord Irvine must have meant by 'exceptional circumstances' no more than special circumstances not taken into account by him in fixing the rate of 2.5%. If 'exceptional circumstances' is understood in that way, the phrase is, in my view, a helpful explanation of the meaning of the subsection.

- [35] If s 1(2) is interpreted in this way, it is likely that it will be in comparatively few cases that s 1(2) will be successfully invoked, at any rate as long as the 2.5% rate and Lord Irvine's reasons for it continue to apply. The construction that I have given to s 1(2) seems to me to accord with and promote the policy considerations to which I have already referred. A generous and open-ended interpretation of s 1(2) would undermine the policy that was clearly articulated by Lord Irvine in his reasons, and by the courts before that.

- [36] I turn now to consider whether the report of Mr Hogg raises a case that has a real prospect of success of showing that a lower rate than 2.5% is more appropriate in this case.

- [37] Miss Cox relies on the fact that the claimant has a life expectancy of 46 years and that the sum claimed was in excess of £3m. In my view, these circumstances are not sufficient, even arguably, to justify applying a discount rate of 2% rather than 2.5%. I note in passing that in Warren's case the claimant had a life expectancy of 47 years and the sum awarded at trial on the basis of the 3% rate was £3.1m. The court rejected the argument that the case was exceptional such that, on application of the principles stated in Wells' case, a rate lower than 3% should be adopted. In Warren's case, it was argued (as before us) that, unless a lower rate was taken, the claimant would be undercompensated and suffer injustice. The response of the court was that prudent investment of a very large fund could take care of all but the most exceptional circumstances.

- [38] One of the factors taken into account by Lord Irvine in arriving at a rate of 2.5% was that prudent investment by the Court of Protection would enable a rate of return at or above 2.5% to be achieved comfortably. Of greater importance is the fact that, as has been seen from one of the passages that I have quoted earlier, Lord Irvine was alive to the very point that Miss Cox makes, namely that it is in the context of larger awards intended to cover longer periods that there is the greatest risk of serious discrepancies between the level of compensation and the actual losses incurred if the discount rate set is not appropriate. Lord Irvine said in terms that he had this type of award 'particularly in mind' when considering the level at which the discount rate should be set.

[39] Miss Cox makes the valid point that Lord Irvine does not say what he meant by 'larger awards, intended to cover longer periods'. How large? How long? But claims by claimants with life expectancies of between 30 and 50 years are by no means uncommon, nor are claims in the range of £2m to £3m. I cannot accept that claims of this kind were not included in the category which Lord Irvine had particularly in mind when setting the rate at 2.5%. In my judgment Mr Hogg has not identified any special features of this case which take it outside the classes of case that Lord Irvine took into account when fixing the rate. In truth, it seems to me that, despite Miss Cox's disavowal, Mr Hogg's report is, on analysis, more a criticism of Lord Irvine's rate itself. It is noteworthy that on Mr Hogg's approach, the net return for the claimant even if her award were no more than £1m would be below 2% and would, in his view, justify invoking s 1(2).

[40] To summarise, therefore, I consider that there is nothing in the particular facts of this that makes it more appropriate to apply a lower rate than 2.5%. I would allow the appeal on this basis. It is true that this involves interfering with a case management decision. But the argument before the judge was limited to the delay point, although he made reference to s 1(2) in his judgment. Of particular significance is the fact that he was not shown Lord Irvine's reasons, and did not have the benefit of the detailed submissions that were made by counsel in this court.

LATHAM LJ.

[41] I agree. In this area certainty is extremely important. It enables cases to be settled with confidence, and it produces fairness as between litigants.

[42] Prior to the making of the Damages (Personal Injury) Order 2001, SI 2001/2301 by Lord Irvine of Lairg LC under the Damages Act 1996, the court applied the conventional discount rate (for many years 4.5% and latterly 3%) across the board, save in exceptional circumstances: see Wells v Wells, Thomas v Brighton Health Authority, Page v Sheerness Steel Co plc [1998] 3 All ER 481, [1999] 1 AC 345 and Warren v Northern General Hospital NHS Trust (No 2) [2000] 1 WLR 1404. Nothing in the 1996 Act suggests to me that it was Parliament's intention that this general policy should in any way be diluted. That, indeed, is clearly the view of Lord Irvine, as set out in the reasons that he gave. In that I consider him to have been correct.

[43] It is against that policy background, therefore, that the words in s 1(2) of the 1996 Act fall to be construed. The phrase 'more appropriate', as explained by Dyson LJ, has to be read in conjunction with the reasons given by Lord Irvine LC for choosing the particular rate of return that he has. It follows that it is difficult to see how a case falling squarely within the category of case envisaged by Lord Irvine, in which he has given a reasoned justification for the prescribed rate, could be said to be one in relation to which that prescribed rate is inappropriate in the absence of special features.

[44] Turning to the present appeal, it is clear that the judge's decision was made without the benefit of Lord Irvine's reasons. We are, therefore, entitled to consider afresh the appropriate order to make. Although the court should always be careful when seeking to restrict the ambit of evidence, it can and should do so if there is no real prospect of the evidence having any effect on the issues to be tried. The evidence of Mr Hogg raises no special features which take this case outside the category of those in receipt of large awards specifically referred to by Lord Irvine in his reasons, as explained by Dyson LJ. Lord Irvine explains fully

- a* why he considered that the 2.5% rate of return is appropriate for them, and refers to the fact that proper advice is likely to result in a wider spread of investment than solely in index-linked stock. Lord Irvine indeed went further in his reasons for prescribing the rate of 2.5% than merely his calculation based upon the rate of return from index-linked stock. Mr Hogg's report makes no reference to those matters and does not seek to deal with them in any way.
- b* [45] It follows, in my judgment, that there is no material before the court to suggest that 2.5% is inappropriate. It follows that the report of Mr Hogg would have no effect on the issue before the court.
- [46] Accordingly I would allow the appeal.

MUMMERY LJ.

- c* [47] I agree with both judgments. The appeal is allowed.

Appeal allowed.

James Brooks Barrister.

R v Threapleton

[2001] EWCA Crim 2892

COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION

WALLER LJ, ROUGIER AND STANLEY BURTON JJ

20 NOVEMBER, 19 DECEMBER 2001

Sentence – Confiscation order – Order for costs – Judge making costs order before determination of amount payable under confiscation order – Whether order for costs lawful – Criminal Justice Act 1988, s 72.

The defendant was charged with corruptly giving a bribe to a local government employee. He was convicted at a retrial, and in August 2000 was sentenced to 18 months' imprisonment (reduced on appeal in December 2000 to 12 months' imprisonment), and ordered to pay £15,000 towards the costs of the prosecution. In January 2001 a confiscation order was made against him under the Criminal Justice Act 1988 in the sum of £15,000. The defendant appealed, inter alia, against the costs order, on the ground that it was unlawful because: (i) being an 'order for payment' within s 72(5)(b)^a of the 1988 Act it should not, by reason of s 72A(9)^b, have been made until after the making of the confiscation order, and (ii) that by making the confiscation order after the costs order, the judge had been unable to fulfil his duty under s 72(5) to take the confiscation order into account when making the order for costs. It was submitted on behalf of the Crown that the same costs order could lawfully have been made by the judge in January 2001, and that the court should exercise its power under s 11(3) of the Criminal Appeal Act 1968 to make an order for costs that could have been made by the Crown Court on that occasion.

Held – Having regard to the provisions of s 72 of the 1988 Act, the costs order was one that could not lawfully have been made. On the assumption that s 11(3) of the 1968 Act conferred on the court the power to make an order which could have been made by the Crown Court, it would not, however, be right for the court to exercise that power. To do so would be to condone the fact that the requirements of the 1988 Act had not been complied with. Those requirements were not merely formal: they were intended to ensure that the determination of the amount payable under a confiscation order had priority over any order which came within s 72(5)(b). The amount payable under the confiscation order depended on the defendant's realisable property, or the amount that might be realised at the time the order was made, and the effect of the statutory procedure was that such property should not have been depleted by an order for costs when the determinations required for the making of a confiscation order were made. In the instant case it was not certain that, had the correct procedure been followed, the same order for costs would have been made. The judge would in all probability have determined that a greater sum be paid under the confiscation order, since at that stage the defendant's property would not have been depleted by, nor would it have been liable to be depleted by, any previous costs order. Accordingly, the costs order made by the judge would be quashed (see [20], [22], below).

^a Section 72(5) is set out at [16], below

^b Section 72A(9) is set out at [18], below

Notes

- a For the making of a confiscation order, see 11(2) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue), para 1285.

For the Criminal Justice Act 1988, s 72, see 12 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2002 reissue) 951.

b Cases referred to in judgments

R v Efonayi (1994) 16 Cr App R (S) 380, CA.

R v Ross [2001] EWCA Crim 560, [2001] 2 Cr App Rep (S) 484.

Appeal and application

- c The appellant, Michael Threapleton, appealed with leave granted by Judge Heppel QC from his order of 4 August 2000 in the Crown Court at Hull, requiring the appellant to pay the sum of £15,000 towards the costs of his prosecution for bribery following his conviction on 27 July 2000 and applied for leave to appeal against a confiscation order made by Judge Heppel QC sitting in the Crown Court at Hull on 26 January 2001 made under the Criminal Justice Act 1988 in the sum of £15,000. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

Peter Binder (assigned by the Registrar of Criminal Appeals) for the appellant.

Nicholas Dean (instructed by the Crown Prosecution Service) for the Crown.

- e 20 November 2001. The court announced that the appeal would be allowed and the application for leave to appeal would be refused for reasons to be given later.

19 December 2001. The following judgment of the court was delivered.

f STANLEY BURNTON J.

[1] The court has before it: (a) the appellant's appeal, with leave of the single judge, against a costs order made against him by Judge Heppel QC on 4 August 2000, ordering him to pay the sum of £15,000 towards the costs of the prosecution; (b) an application by the appellant for leave to appeal against a confiscation order made under the Criminal Justice Act 1988 by Judge Heppel on 26 January 2001 in the same sum of £15,000.

- g [2] At the conclusion of the hearing of the appeal and the application for leave to appeal, we stated that the appeal against the costs order would be allowed and we refused leave to appeal against the confiscation order. We said that we would give our reasons in writing, and we now do so.

h THE PROCEEDINGS IN THE CROWN COURT

- j [3] On 27 July 2000 at the Crown Court at Hull the appellant was convicted at a retrial before Judge Heppel of corruptly giving a bribe to a Roger Dearnley, an employee of Doncaster Metropolitan Borough Council. The particulars of the offence specified in the indictment as amended were as follows:

'Michael Threapleton, on or about 5 February 1993 corruptly gave Roger Dearnley who at that time held public office in the employment of Doncaster Metropolitan Borough Council, a gift, reward or advantage namely a Fiat Uno motor car, registration number J640 AWB, as a reward for business contracts on behalf of Doncaster Metropolitan Borough Council being awarded to Executive Security Limited by Roger Dearnley or with his assistance or as an inducement to Roger Dearnley to award or assist in awarding further contracts to Executive Surveillance and Security Ltd.' a [4] The appellant was sentenced to 18 months' imprisonment, subsequently reduced by the Court of Appeal to 12 months. His co-accused Roger Dearnley was also convicted of corruption. The other, Roger Bodill, had been acquitted at an earlier trial.

[5] On 4 August 2000 Judge Heppel made the costs order against the appellant referred to above. b

[6] On 19 December 2000 the full court allowed the appellant's appeal against sentence to the extent of reducing the term of imprisonment to one of 12 months. His appeal against the costs order was adjourned pending the conclusion of the confiscation proceedings. c

[7] On 26 January 2001 Judge Heppel made the confiscation order referred to above.

THE FACTS

[8] About September 1990 Dearnley began work as a principal valuer for the Doncaster Metropolitan Borough Council (Doncaster MBC). He reported to a chief valuation officer, but still had important responsibilities for property managed by Doncaster MBC. One of the properties Dearnley managed was known as the Mexborough Business Centre, and he was responsible for letting out business units, collecting rent and security services. In June 1991 Dearnley had instructed one of his staff to invite tenders for security services at the Mexborough Business Centre and a number of companies were approached. Executive Security Contracts Ltd (ESC), run by a man named Dack was not approached. The parent company of ESC was EFM Holdings Group, and Threapleton was a director. d

[9] On 2 August 1991, Doncaster MBC received a letter from ESC addressed to Dearnley quoting a rate of £4.00 per hour. The previous company, which had been charging £3.60 per hour, was dismissed and ESC were appointed to take over the security contract. No formal contract ever seemed to be drawn up, and ESC simply began to invoice Doncaster MBC for the services they provided. At the time ESC were expecting to invoice Doncaster MBC for about £36,000 pa, but the amounts paid grew each year. In the year 1991–1992 Doncaster MBC paid £52,000, in 1992–1993 that grew to about £130,000 and in 1993–1994 to about £385,000. Dearnley was involved in authorising much of that expenditure. e

[10] Once ESC started working for Doncaster MBC it was well placed to take on other work offered by the council. From August 1991 Doncaster MBC paid ESC and Executive Surveillance and Security Ltd (ESSL) approximately £1m. Beyond invoices the business generated little by way of documentation or formal agreements. f

[11] By late 1992 and early 1993 Dearnley had built up a close link with ESC and he proposed that a more sophisticated security system be set up at the Mexborough Business Centre. It was about this time that Dearnley was introduced to Threapleton, who was planning to set up ESSL. g

[12] At about this time Dearnley had a car which he described as 'a banger'. He could not afford to buy a new car, but was entitled to apply to Doncaster MBC for a loan to purchase a car. In December 1992 he applied for a loan, which was supported by an invoice from Imola Sports Ltd. This was another company in the EFM group, which was run by Mr Bodill. On 4 December 1992, Dearnley signed an agreement with Doncaster MBC to borrow £5,445 to purchase a Fiat Uno motor car. He returned the cheque and a second cheque was issued. In h a February 1993, Threapleton purchased a Fiat Uno motor car from GT Cars and arranged payment of a finance agreement through his personal bank account. He gave the vehicle to Dearnley who paid nothing for the vehicle or the use of it. When Dearnley was required to provide information regarding his purchase of the car, he maintained the pretence that he had used the loan to purchase the Fiat Uno. He in fact used the money obtained to clear a number of debts.

b [13] In February 1993, Threapleton set up ESSL and took with him many of the staff from ESC and a number of their existing clients, including Doncaster MBC. No formal tendering process took place.

c [14] In June 1993 two elderly-persons homes closed. At the instigation of Dearnley ESSL took over guarding those premises. The rate paid to ESSL, as agreed and arranged through Dearnley, was higher than the rate paid to the previous companies. Dearnley also helped ESSL obtain the contract for a video surveillance system at Mexborough Business Centre. Only ESSL quoted for the work. As part of wider investigations, the police began to look at ESSL's dealing with Doncaster MBC.

d [15] The appeal against the costs order is put on two bases. The first is that the order was unlawful: it is submitted that no costs order should have been made until after the making of the confiscation order, if any.

[16] Section 72(5) of the Criminal Justice Act 1988 reads as follows:

e 'Where a court makes a confiscation order against a defendant in any proceedings, it shall be its duty, in respect of any offence of which he is convicted in those proceedings, to take account of the order before—
(a) imposing any fine upon him; (b) making any order involving any payment by him, other than an order under section 35 of the Powers of Criminal Courts Act 1973 (compensation orders); or (c) ... but subject to that shall leave the order out of account in determining the appropriate sentence or other manner of dealing with him.'

f [17] The order for costs in this case was an order for payment by him within s 72(5)(b).

g [18] Section 72(5) is modified by s 72A in cases where the court postpones the determinations that are required by s 71 (namely whether the defendant has benefited from any relevant criminal conduct and the amount to be recovered in his case) for specified periods as permitted by s 72A, and sentences the defendant before making a confiscation order as permitted by s 72A(7). The court proceeded under s 72A in the present case, and the court proceeded to sentence the appellant before making the confiscation order. Section 72A(8) and (9) are as follows:

h '(8) Where the court has so proceeded—(a) subsection (1) of section 71 above shall have effect as if the words from "before sentencing" onwards were omitted; (b) that section shall further have effect as if references to an offence that will be taken into consideration in determining any sentence included references to an offence that has been taken into account; and j (c) section 72(5) above shall have effect as if after "determining" there were inserted "in relation to any offence in respect of which he has not been sentenced or otherwise dealt with".

(9) In sentencing, or otherwise dealing with, the defendant in respect of the offence, or any of the offences, concerned at any time during the specified period, the court shall not—(a) impose any fine on him; or (b) make any such order as is mentioned in s 72(5)(b) or (c) above.'

The 'specified period' is the period, following conviction, of the postponement of the determinations of the defendant's benefit and the amount to be recovered from him: see s 72A(1). a

[19] Mr Binder submitted that the confiscation order must be made before any order for costs. Here it was made afterwards. The judge was accordingly unable to fulfil his duty under s 72(5) by taking it into account when making the order for costs. More obviously, the order was made in breach of the prohibition in s 72A(9). He also submitted that the costs order was a wrongful exercise of the judge's discretion. b

[20] Mr Dean conceded, as was inevitable, that the judge should not have made the costs order before making the confiscation order. It follows that the order was one that could not lawfully have been made, and that it must be quashed: cf R v Ross [2001] EWCA Crim 560, [2001] 2 Cr App Rep (S) 484. c

[21] We mention that the relevant provisions of the 1988 Act were not brought to the judge's attention by counsel. We emphasise that it is the duty of counsel for both the prosecution and the defence to bring such provisions to the attention of the court, and they should have done so on 4 August 2000 when the judge raised the possibility of his making an order for costs before dealing with confiscation. d

[22] Mr Dean submitted that although the order made on 4 August 2000 had to be quashed, the same order could lawfully have been made by the judge on 26 January 2001; that this court has power under s 11(3) of the Criminal Appeal Act 1968 to make an order for costs that could have been made by the Crown Court on that occasion; that in view of the identity of the sums ordered to be paid as costs and under the confiscation order this court could be confident that if no costs order had been made by the judge on 4 August 2000 he would have made the same order on 26 January 2001; and that this court should therefore make the same order for costs as that made on 4 August 2000. Assuming that s 11(3) of the 1968 Act does confer such power on this court, we do not think that it would be right to exercise it. To do so would be to condone the fact that the requirements of the 1988 Act were not complied with. Those requirements are not merely formal: they are intended to ensure that the determination of the amount payable under a confiscation order has priority over, in this case, an order for the payment of costs. The amount payable under the confiscation order depended on the realisable property of the defendant (or 'the amount that might be realised at the time the order [was] made' (see s 71(6)), and the effect of the statutory procedure is that that property should not have been depleted by an order for costs when the determinations required for the making of a confiscation order are made. Furthermore, we are not satisfied that if the correct procedure had been followed, the same order for costs would have been made. The judge would in all probability have determined that a greater sum be paid by the appellant under the confiscation order, since at that stage his realisable property had not been depleted by, or was not liable to be depleted by, any previous costs order. e
f
g
h

[23] In view of our decision on the first point, it is unnecessary to deal with the question of the judge's exercise of discretion, other than to say that, apart from the failure to comply with the requirements of the 1988 Act, we see no basis for interfering with his decision. j

THE CONFISCATION ORDER

[24] The appeal against the confiscation order is put on the basis that the judge was bound to proceed on the basis of the version of the facts charged before the jury most favourable to the defendant. The way in which the count was left to a the jury created alternative bases upon which the jury could convict. On the basis of the first alternative facts charged, the car was given as reward for business contracts awarded in the past to ESC, Mr Dack's company. On this basis, it is argued, the appellant derived no benefit from the corrupt act, and indeed the Crown did not allege that he had. On the alternative facts charged, the appellant b derived benefit from the moneys received by his company, ESSL, as a result of the corrupt gift of the car to Dearnley. Mr Binder submitted that since the judge had no way of knowing the basis of the jury's verdict, he was required to adopt the view of the facts most favourable to the accused.

[25] The judge decided he was bound as a matter of strict law to approach the question of whether or not the appellant benefited from the corruption and to what extent in the way that Mr Binder submitted, the way most favourable to the c accused. He turned therefore to the argument that the appellant only intended to reward Dearnley for past favours done and that he therefore received no benefit from those favours.

[26] The judge held that the test under s 71(4) of the 1988 Act is an objective one and the accused's intention is therefore irrelevant: if any benefit in fact d accrued to the accused, and the facts of the case taken globally pointed to a causal link between the offence and that benefit, then the accused had in fact benefited as a result of the offence within the terms of the section. He found that even if the car was given as a reward for past services to ESC it led to the promotion of the interests of ESSL with consequential advantage to Threapleton. He said:

e 'Mr Grenfell, for the appellant, argues: to the extent that the defendant may have gained from the placing by the council of contracts with Executive Surveillance and Security Ltd, he would not have gained those benefits from the commission of the offence as he intended it should be committed, that is to say simply by rewarding Dearnley for past favours done for Executive f Security Contracts Ltd. In my judgment that approach is wrong in law. The test under s 71(4) of the Criminal Justice Act 1988 is a purely objective one.
The way in which the defendant may have intended to commit the offence, and whether he intended to get something out of it, or what he intended to get out of it, is irrelevant. If benefit in fact inures to the defendant, and the facts globally taken in the case point to a causal link between the offence and g the benefit, then in my judgment he has received benefit "as a result of" the offence. In my judgment, even if the car was given as a reward, or a thank you, to Dearnley for services to Executive Security Contracts Ltd, it did, on my findings of fact, lead to the promotion of the interests of Executive Surveillance and Security Ltd, with consequential advantage to Threapleton.
h In my judgment, the overwhelming thrust of the totality of the evidence pointed that way, particularly when one considers the time at which the car was given, in the context of the setting-up of the second company. And, indeed, to hold that no benefit flowed from the reward given to Dearnley for past services would, in my judgment, be to fly in the face of common sense j in the circumstances of this case.'

[27] The judge calculated the benefit by reference to the evidence led at trial on behalf of the appellant that the contracts placed by Doncaster MBC with ESSL amounted to 25% of the company's turnover. During the period from the gift to arrest the prosecution calculated the benefit to the company, to Threapleton, as £308,000. This comprised partly consultancy fees and partly payments to the company for purchases that were to the benefit of the appellant personally. The judge, adopting a broad-brush approach, reduced this sum to £260,000, of which 25% were derived from trading with the local authority resulting from the corrupt gift. The judge therefore calculated the appellant's benefit as the sum of £65,000. That calculation is not challenged on behalf of the appellant: the submission made on his behalf is that no such calculation was permissible. Having considered the assets available (ie the relevant realisable property of the appellant), the judge took account of the costs order he had made and the legal costs the appellant had incurred in his defence, and made an order for the payment of the sum of £15,000.

[28] We reject the submission that in making a confiscation order the judge is bound to approach the case on the version of the facts before the jury most favourable to the defendant. R v Efonayi (1994) 16 Cr App R (S) 380, relied upon by Mr Binder, was concerned with sentencing in the strict sense of the word, ie a sentence of imprisonment. The principle applied in the context of that case does not apply in the present context. Section 71 of the 1988 Act imposes a duty on the court to make the determinations specified in sub-ss (1A), (1B) and (6), ie whether the defendant has benefited from any relevant criminal conduct, the amount of that benefit and the amounts that might be realised at the time the order is made. In the case of the Crown Court, the court there means the trial judge, and does not include the jury. The same determinations fall to be made under s 72A, where the determinations are postponed. The fact that the determinations are separate from the trial process itself is emphasised by s 71(7A) of the 1988 Act, which provides that the standard of proof required to determine any question arising under Pt VI of the Act is that applicable in civil proceedings.

[29] In any event, however, the question required to be answered in this case was not whether the car was a gift for past favours or an inducement for future favours, but whether the offender benefited from the conduct of which he was found guilty, and if so, by sub-s (6), the amount of that benefit and the amount appearing to the court to be the amount that might be realised when the order was made. Those are the questions that the judge addressed. The jury were not concerned whether, if they found that the car was given as a reward for past services, its gift had resulted in subsequent financial benefit for the appellant, or whether, if they found that the car was given as an inducement to Dearnley to award or assist in awarding further contracts to ESSL, Dearnley had in fact awarded or assisted in awarding such contracts to ESSL, and if he did whether and to what extent the appellant benefited from that.

[30] The question required to be determined by the judge was not whether the car was a gift for past favours or an inducement for future favours, but whether the offender benefited from the conduct of which he was found guilty, ie the corrupt gift of the car to Dearnley, and if so, by sub-s (6), the amount of that benefit and the amount appearing to the court to be the amount that might be realised when the order is made. Those are the questions that the judge addressed. In doing so, he assumed that a valid costs order had been made against the appellant; but that incorrect assumption led to a smaller confiscation order than would otherwise have been made.

[31] It follows that there are no grounds for impugning the confiscation order.

Appeal allowed, application for leave to appeal refused.

a Société Eram Shipping Co Ltd and others v Compagnie Internationale de Navigation

[2003] UKHL 30

b HOUSE OF LORDS

LORD BINGHAM OF CORNHILL, LORD NICHOLLS OF BIRKENHEAD, LORD HOFFMANN, LORD HOBHOUSE OF WOODBOROUGH AND LORD MILLETT

17, 18 MARCH, 12 JUNE 2003

c Execution – Third party debt order – Debts owing or accruing from foreign judgment debtors – Third party bank incorporated and resident in Hong Kong but having place of residence in England – Judgment debtors having accounts with third party bank in Hong Kong – Whether court having jurisdiction to make third party debt order final – CPR 72.4(2).

d The judgment creditor, a Romanian company, obtained judgment in a French court against the judgment debtors, a company and an individual resident in Hong Kong. The judgment debtors did not satisfy the judgment and the judgment creditor registered it in the High Court under the provisions of the Civil Jurisdiction and Judgments Act 1982. One or other of the judgment debtors held an account in Hong Kong with the third party, a bank. The debt due from the third party to the judgment debtors on that account was situated in Hong Kong and was governed by the laws of Hong Kong. The judgment creditor successfully applied, without notice, to the High Court for an interim third party debt order under CPR 72.4(2)^a in respect of the debt owed by the third party to the judgment debtors in Hong Kong. At a hearing to decide whether the interim third party order should be made final, the judge declined to make a final order, and set aside the interim order. He considered that the third party would be at risk of having to pay twice, once in London and again in Hong Kong, and was reluctant to exercise jurisdiction over foreigners in relation to their conduct outside the territorial jurisdiction of the court. The judgment creditor's appeal to the Court of Appeal was allowed. The court discounted the risk that the third party might have to pay twice, and placed reliance on the existence of a restitutionary remedy available to the third party in Hong Kong. The third party appealed to the House of Lords.

h Held – It was not open to the court to make a third party debt order under CPR Pt 72 in a case where it was clear or it appeared that the making of the order would not discharge the debt of the third party to the judgment debtor according to the law which governed that debt. If, however, the English court did have jurisdiction to make such an order, the objections to its exercising such a jurisdiction to do so would be very strong on grounds of principle, comity and convenience.

j The importance which the Court of Appeal had attached to the supposed availability to the third party of a restitutionary remedy in Hong Kong if the third party made or was compelled to make payment to the judgment creditor under an English order appeared to reflect some misunderstanding of the procedure. The order took effect against the property of the judgment debtor. The property of the third party was in no way involved, save by the diminution of its debt to the judgment debtor. If the effect of an order in the instant case would be to compel the third party to disburse its own funds, that would be a very clear indication that the order was one which should never have been made. The order of the Court of Appeal would accordingly be set aside and the judge's order restored (see [26]–[31], [54], [59], [62]–[65], [68]–[70], [84], [107]–[109], [113], below.

a CPR 72.4(2) is set out at [12], below

Decision of the Court of Appeal [2001] 2 All ER (Comm) 721 reversed.

Notes

For third party debt orders, see 17(1) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) paras 251, 266.

Cases referred to in opinions

Anisimic Ltd v Foreign Compensation Commission [1969] 1 All ER 208, [1969] 2 AC 147, [1969] 2 WLR 163, HL; rvsg [1967] 2 All ER 986, [1968] 2 QB 862, [1967] 3 WLR 382, CA.

Babanaft International Co SA v Bassatne [1989] 1 All ER 433, [1990] Ch 13, [1989] 2 WLR 232, CA.

Ballantine v Golding (1784) Cooke's Bankrupt Laws 419.

Baltic Shipping v Translink Shipping Ltd [1995] 1 Lloyd's Rep 673.

Bartley v Hodges (1861) 1 B & S 375, 121 ER 754.

Bonalumi v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [1985] 1 All ER 797, [1985] QB 675, [1985] 2 WLR 722, CA.

Burrows v Jemino (1726) 2 Stra 733, 93 ER 815.

Chatterton v Watney (1881) 17 Ch D 259, CA.

Choice Investments Ltd v Jeromnimon (Midland Bank Ltd, garnishee) [1981] 1 All ER 225, [1981] QB 149, [1980] 2 WLR 80, CA.

Combined Weighing and Advertising Machine Co, Re (1889) 43 Ch D 99, CA.

Deutsche Schachtbau- und Tiefbohrgesellschaft mbH v Shell International Petroleum Co Ltd (t/a Shell International Trading Co) [1988] 2 All ER 833, [1990] 1 AC 295, [1988] 3 WLR 230, HL.

Ellis v M'Henry (1871) LR 6 CP 228.

Galbraith v Grimshaw [1910] 1 KB 339; aff'd [1910] AC 508.

Gardiner v Houghton (1862) 2 B & S 743, 121 ER 1247.

General Horticultural Co, Re, ex p Whitehouse (1886) 32 Ch D 512.

International Tin Council, Re [1987] 1 All ER 890, [1987] Ch 419, [1987] 2 WLR 1229.

Interpool Ltd v Galani [1987] 2 All ER 981, [1988] QB 738, [1987] 3 WLR 1042, CA.

Joachimson (N) v Swiss Bank Corp [1921] 3 KB 110, [1921] All ER Rep 92, CA.

Kuwait Oil Tanker Co SAK v Qabazard [2003] UKHL 31, [2003] 3 All ER 501, [2003] 3 WLR 14.

Lewis v Owen (1821) 4 B & Ald 654, 106 ER 1076.

Liberian Insurance Agency Inc v Mosse [1977] 2 Lloyd's Rep 560.

London (Mayor etc) v Cox (1867) LR 2 HL 239.

London Corp v London Joint Stock Bank (1881) 6 App Cas 393, HL.

MacKinnon v Donaldson Lufkin & Jenrette Securities Corp [1986] 1 All ER 653, [1986] Ch 482, [1986] 2 WLR 453.

Martin v Nadel (Dresdner Bank, garnishees) [1906] 2 KB 26, [1904–7] All ER Rep 827, CA.

Odwin v Forbes (1817) Buck 57, PC.

Phillips v Allan (1828) 8 B & C 477, 108 ER 1120.

Phillips v Eyre (1870) LR 6 QB 1, Ex Ch.

Potter v Brown (1804) 5 East 124, 102 ER 1016.

- a* Pritchett v English and Colonial Syndicate [1899] 2 QB 428, CA.
Quelin v Moisson (1828) 1 Knapp 265, 12 ER 320.
R v Grossman (1981) 73 Cr App R 302, CA.
R v Jameson [1896] 2 QB 425.
Rasu Maritima SA v Perusahaan Pertambangan Minyak Dan Gas Bumi Negara (Pertamina) and Government of Indonesia (as interveners) [1977] 3 All ER 324, [1978] QB 644, [1977] 3 WLR 518, CA.
- b* Richardson v Richardson (National Bank of India Ltd, garnishee) [1927] P 228, [1927] All ER Rep 92.
Rogers v Whiteley [1892] AC 118, HL; affg (1889) 23 QBD 236.
SCF Finance Co Ltd v Masri (No 3) [1987] 1 All ER 194, [1987] QB 1028, [1987] 2 WLR 81, CA.
- c* Smith v Buchanan (1800) 1 East 6, 102 ER 3.
Swiss Bank Corp v Boehmische Industrial Bank [1923] 1 KB 673, CA.
Wood v Dunn (1866) LR 2 QB 73.
Zoneheath Associates Ltd v China Tianjin International Economic and Technical Co-operative Corp [1994] CLC 348.
- d* Cases also referred to in list of authorities
Airbus Industrie GIE v Patel [1998] 2 All ER 257, [1999] 1 AC 119, [1998] 1 WLR 686, HL.
AS-Autoteile Service GmbH v Malhé Case 220/84 [1985] ECR 2267.
Bank of China v NBM LLC [2001] EWCA Civ 1933, [2002] 1 All ER 717, [2002] 1 WLR 844.
- e* Camdex International Ltd v Bank of Zambia [1996] 3 All ER 431, [1998] QB 22, [1996] 3 WLR 759, CA.
Chase Manhattan Bank NA v FDC Co Ltd [1985] HKC 470, HK CA.
Colquhoun v Brooks (1888) 21 QBD 52, CA; affd (1889) 14 App Cas 493, [1886–90] All ER Rep 1063, HL.
- f* Damayanti Kantilal Doshi V Indian Bank [1999] 4 SLR 1, Sing CA.
Denilauler v SNC Couchet Frères Case 125/79 [1980] ECR 1553, ECJ.
Kuwait Oil Tanker Co SAK v Qabazard [2002] EWCA Civ 34, [2001] 1 All ER (Comm) 351.
Libyan Arab Foreign Bank v Bankers Trust Co [1989] 3 All ER 252, [1989] QB 728, [1989] 3 WLR 314.
- g* Owens Bank Ltd v Bracco [1992] 2 All ER 193, [1992] 2 AC 443, [1992] 2 WLR 621, HL.
Power Curber International Ltd v National Bank of Kuwait SAK [1981] 3 All ER 607, [1981] 1 WLR 1233, CA.
Reichert v Dresdner Bank AG Case C-261/90 [1992] ECR I-2149.
Rossano v Manufacturers Life Insurance Co Ltd [1962] 2 All ER 214, [1963] 2 QB 352, [1962] 3 WLR 157.
- h* Soinco SACI v Novokuznetsk Aluminium Plant [1998] 2 Lloyd's Rep 337, CA.
Tai Hing Cotton Mill Ltd v Liu Chong Hing Bank Ltd [1985] 2 All ER 947, [1986] AC 80, [1985] 3 WLR 317, PC.
Vinall v De Pass [1892] AC 90, HL.
- j*

Appeal

The appellant third party, Hong Kong and Shanghai Banking Corp Ltd (HSBC), appealed with permission of the Appeal Committee of the House of Lords given on 21 August 2002 from a decision of the Court of Appeal (Schiemann, Mance and Keene LJ) on 7 August 2001 ([2001] EWCA Civ 17, [2001] 2 All ER (Comm) 721) allowing the appeal of the respondent judgment creditor, Société Eram Shipping

Co Ltd, from the decision of Tomlinson J on 23 January 2001 ([2001] 1 All ER (Comm) 843) whereby he refused to make a garnishee order (now a third party debt order) made on 4 April 2000 against the judgment debtors, Compagnie Internationale de Navigation, Société Ocean Link Ltd and Mr Yoon Sei Wha, and against HSBC, absolute. The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Bingham of Cornhill. a

John Higham QC and Christopher Harrison (instructed by Stephenson Harwood) for the third party. b

Hugo Page (instructed by Penningtons) for the judgment creditor.
The judgment debtors did not appear.

Their Lordships took time for consideration. c

12 June 2003. The following opinions were delivered.

LORD BINGHAM OF CORNHILL.

[1] My Lords, this appeal is against the making of what was formerly called a garnishee order absolute but is now called a final third party debt order. When they were begun the proceedings were governed by a procedure since replaced by a procedure very similar in substance but expressed in different language, and I shall so far as possible use the new terminology. The feature of the order which gives rise to controversy is that it was made in relation to a foreign debt. The House is called upon to consider the power of the English court to make an order in such a case and, if there is power, the manner in which it should be exercised. d
e

[2] The appellant is the Hong Kong and Shanghai Banking Corp Ltd, a company incorporated in Hong Kong and carrying on a banking business there and elsewhere. It has a branch in London and is registered in England under s 691 of the Companies Act 1985. The appellant would formerly have been called 'the garnishee' but is now to be called 'the third party', by which term I shall describe it. f

[3] Société Eram Shipping Co Ltd is a Romanian shipping company. I shall refer to it as 'the judgment creditor'.

[4] Société Oceanlink Ltd and Mr Yoon Sei Wha are a company and an individual resident in Hong Kong. I shall refer to them as 'the judgment debtors'. A third company against which the judgment creditor also issued proceedings may be ignored for present purposes. The judgment debtors have played no part in these proceedings at any stage. g

[5] The judgment creditor claimed demurrage against the judgment debtors and obtained judgment against them in the Brest Commercial Court for some $US101,000 and 5,000 French francs. The judgment debtors did not satisfy the judgment and the judgment creditor registered it in the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court under the provisions of the Civil Jurisdiction and Judgments Act 1982. h

[6] One or other of the judgment debtors holds an account in Hong Kong with the third party. The debt due from the third party to the judgment debtors on this account is situated in Hong Kong and is governed by the law of Hong Kong. j

[7] The judgment creditor could have obtained a third party debt (or garnishee) order in Hong Kong against the third party in respect of the debt due from the third party to the judgment debtors. Under the law and procedure of Hong Kong it was open to the judgment creditor to obtain such an order after applying to the Hong Kong court for registration and enforcement of the Brest

a judgment or after suing in Hong Kong on the judgment registered in the Queen's Bench Division. The judgment creditor did not adopt those procedures. Instead, it applied to the High Court in England for an interim third party debt order (then called a garnishee order nisi) in respect of the debt owed by the third party to the judgment debtors in Hong Kong. The application was made in the usual way without notice to the third party, and an order was made that all debts accruing to the judgment debtors from the third party be attached to answer the Brest judgment registered in the High Court; and also that the third party attend on an application by the judgment creditor that the third party pay to the judgment creditor the debt due from the third party to the judgment debtors or so much thereof as might be sufficient to satisfy the judgment and the costs of the third party debt order (or garnishee) proceedings.

c [8] A hearing took place before Tomlinson J sitting in the Commercial Court to decide whether the interim third party debt order should be made final (or the garnishee order nisi be made absolute). The undisputed evidence was that under the law and procedure of Hong Kong a third party debt (or garnishee) order made in England did not have the effect of extinguishing the third party's (or d garnishee's) Hong Kong debt to a judgment debtor in Hong Kong. Nor would the Hong Kong court give effect to an English third party debt (or garnishee) order by reciprocal enforcement or action. Having reviewed the authorities, the judge declined to make a final third party debt order and he set aside the interim order. His essential reasons (elaborated in a very convincing judgment) were, first, that he considered the third party to be at risk of having to pay twice (once e in London in compliance with the English order if made, and again in Hong Kong at the suit of the judgment debtors), and secondly out of reluctance to exercise jurisdiction over foreigners in relation to their conduct outside the territorial jurisdiction of the court (see [2001] 1 All ER (Comm) 843). On appeal by the judgment creditor the Court of Appeal (Schiemann, Mance and Keene LJJ) f reversed the judge's decision (see [2001] EWCA Civ 1317, [2001] 2 All ER (Comm) 721). In a judgment of the court delivered by Mance LJ the risk that the third party might have to pay twice was discounted and reliance was placed on the existence of a restitutionary remedy available to the third party in Hong Kong.

g [9] The third party challenges the Court of Appeal judgment, contending that the English court had no jurisdiction to make an order in this case and that, if it did, it should have exercised its discretion against making an order. The judgment creditor rejects these contentions, submitting that the Court of Appeal reached the correct conclusions for the reasons which it gave.

THE ATTACHMENT OF DEBTS

h [10] As many a claimant has learned to his cost, it is one thing to recover a favourable judgment; it may prove quite another to enforce it against an unscrupulous defendant. But an unenforceable judgment is at best valueless, at worst a source of additional loss. This was a problem which our Victorian forebears addressed with characteristic energy and pragmatism. The Judgments Acts of 1838 and 1840 allowed choses in action to be taken in execution. Then, in j the Common Law Procedure Act 1854, a new garnishee procedure was introduced. The essential features of this procedure were laid down in ss 61–63 and 65 of the Act:

'61. It shall be lawful for a Judge, upon the ex parte Application of such Judgment Creditor, either before or after such oral Examination, and upon Affidavit by himself or his Attorney stating that Judgment has been recovered, and that it is still unsatisfied, and to what Amount, and that any other Person is indebted to the Judgment Debtor, and is within the Jurisdiction, to order that all Debts owing or accruing from such third Person (hereinafter called the Garnishee) to the Judgment Debtor shall be attached to answer the Judgment Debt; and by the same or any subsequent Order it may be ordered that the Garnishee shall appear before the Judge or a Master of the Court, as such Judge shall appoint, to show Cause why he should not pay the Judgment Creditor the Debt due from him to the Judgment Debtor, or so much thereof as may be sufficient to satisfy the Judgment Debt.

62. Service of an Order that debts due or accruing to the Judgment Debtor shall be attached, or Notice thereof to the Garnishee, in such Manner as the Judge shall direct, shall bind such Debts in his Hands.

63. If the Garnishee does not forthwith pay into Court the Amount due from him to the Judgment Debtor or an Amount equal to the Judgment Debt, and does not dispute the Debt due or claimed to be due from him to the Judgment Debtor, or if he does not appear upon Summons, then the Judge may order Execution to issue, and it may be sued forth accordingly, without any previous Writ or Process, to levy the Amount due from such Garnishee towards Satisfaction of the Judgment Debt ...

65. Payment made by or Execution levied upon the Garnishee under any such Proceeding as aforesaid shall be a valid Discharge to him as against the Judgment Debtor to the Amount paid or levied, although such Proceeding may be set aside or the Judgment reversed.'

[11] The procedure so established was regulated by the Rules of Court scheduled to the Supreme Court of Judicature Act 1875 when that Act took effect, and by the Rules of the Supreme Court promulgated in 1883 when those replaced them. In each of these codes of rules Ord 45 regulated garnishee proceedings. When the rules were revised in 1965 (Rules of the Supreme Court (Revision) 1965, SI 1965/1776, made under s 99 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act 1925), Ord 45 was substantially reproduced as Ord 49. It is apparent from the terms of rr 1(1) and (2), 3 and 8 of this order as last amended in 1981 that the nature of the 1854 procedure remained essentially unchanged:

'Attachment of debt due to judgment debtor

1.—(1) Where a person (in this order referred to as "the judgment creditor") has obtained a judgment or order for the payment by some other person (in this order referred to as "the judgment debtor") of a sum of money amounting in value to at least £50, not being a judgment or order for the payment of money into court, and any other person within the jurisdiction (in this order referred to as "the garnishee") is indebted to the judgment debtor, the court may, subject to the provisions of this order and of any enactment, order the garnishee to pay the judgment creditor the amount of any debt due or accruing due to the judgment debtor from the garnishee, or so much thereof as is sufficient to satisfy that judgment or order and the costs of the garnishee proceedings.

(2) An order under this rule shall in the first instance be an order to show cause, specifying the time and place for further consideration of the matter, and in the meantime attaching such debt as is mentioned in paragraph (1) or so much thereof as may be specified in the order, to answer the judgment or order mentioned in that paragraph and the costs of the garnishee proceedings.

Service and effect of order to show cause

3.—(1) Unless the court otherwise directs, an order under rule 1 to show cause must be served—(a) on the garnishee personally, at least 15 days before the time appointed thereby for the further consideration of the matter; and (b) on the judgment debtor, at least 7 days after the order has been served on the garnishee and at least 7 days before the time appointed by the order for the further consideration of the matter.

(2) Such an order shall bind in the hands of the garnishee as from the service of the order on him any debt specified in the order or so much thereof as may be so specified.

Discharge of garnishee

8. Any payment made by a garnishee in compliance with an order absolute under this order, and any execution levied against him in pursuance of such an order, shall be a valid discharge of his liability to the judgment debtor to the extent of the amount paid or levied notwithstanding that the garnishee proceedings are subsequently set aside or the judgment or order from which they arose reversed.

[12] CPR Pt 72 came into effect on 25 March 2002. Entitled ‘Third Party Debt Orders’, this part replaced Ord 49. But although the terminology was changed, the nature of the procedure was not, as is clear from rr 72.1(1), 72.2(1) and (2), 72.4 and 72.9:

‘72.1 Scope of this Part and interpretation

(1) This Part contains rules which provide for a judgment creditor to obtain an order for the payment to him of money which a third party who is within the jurisdiction owes to the judgment debtor ...

72.2 Third party debt order

(1) Upon the application of a judgment creditor, the court may make an order (a “final third party debt order”) requiring a third party to pay to the judgment creditor—(a) the amount of any debt due or accruing due to the judgment debtor from the third party; or (b) so much of that debt as is sufficient to satisfy the judgment debt and the judgment creditor’s costs of the application.

(2) The court will not make an order under paragraph 1 without first making an order (an “interim third party debt order”) as provided by rule 72.4(2) ...

72.4 Interim third party debt order

(1) An application for a third party debt order will initially be dealt with by a judge without a hearing.

(2) The judge may make an interim third party debt order—(a) fixing a hearing to consider whether to make a final third party debt order; and (b) directing that until that hearing the third party must not make any payment which reduces the amount he owes the judgment debtor to less than the amount specified in the order.

(3) An interim third party debt order will specify the amount of money which the third party must retain, which will be the total of—(a) the amount of money remaining due to the judgment creditor under the judgment or order; and (b) an amount for the judgment creditor's fixed costs of the application, as specified in the relevant practice direction. a

(4) An interim third party debt order becomes binding on a third party when it is served on him.

(5) The date of the hearing to consider the application shall be not less than 28 days after the interim third party debt order is made ...

72.9 Effect of final third party offer b

(1) A final third party debt order shall be enforceable as an order to pay money.

(2) If—(a) the third party pays money to the judgment creditor in compliance with a third party debt order; or (b) the order is enforced against him, the third party shall, to the extent of the amount paid by him or realised by enforcement against him, be discharged from his debt to the judgment debtor. c

(3) Paragraph (2) applies even if the third party debt order, or the original judgment or order against the judgment debtor, is later set aside.'

[13] As the cited provisions made clear, the procedure has from the beginning made provision for a two-stage process, first an order nisi or interim order, then an order absolute or final order. The decided cases leave no room for doubt about the legal effect of each of these orders. d

[14] Section 62 of the 1854 Act describes the order nisi as binding the judgment debtor's chose in action in the hands of the garnishee. The effect of the order, as Chitty J put in Re General Horticultural Co, ex p Whitehouse (1886) 32 Ch D 512 at 515, is 'to give the judgment creditor execution against the debts owing to his debtor'. In Rogers v Whiteley [1892] AC 118 at 121 Lord Halsbury LC spoke of the order attaching all debts, and Lord Watson (at 122) said: e

'The effect of an order attaching "all debts" owing or accruing due by [the garnishee] to the judgment debtor is to make the garnishee custodian for the Court of the whole funds attached; and he cannot, except at his own peril, part with any of those funds without the sanction of the Court.' f

As Lord Morris put it (at 123):

'... all debts due and owing by the above-named garnishee are attached to answer the judgment creditor's demand—that is, they are all captured for the purpose of afterwards answering that demand.' g

In Galbraith v Grimshaw [1910] 1 KB 339, Farwell LJ pointed out that the order nisi— h

'does not, it is true, operate as a transfer of the property in the debt, but it is an equitable charge on it, and the garnishee cannot pay the debt to any one but the garnishor without incurring the risk of having to pay it over again to the creditor.'

Atkin LJ made the same point in Joachimson (N) v Swiss Bank Corp [1921] 3 KB 110 at 131, [1921] All ER Rep 92 at 102: 'The service of the order nisi binds the debt in the hands of the garnishee—that is, it creates a charge in favour of the judgment creditor.' The point was again made by Lord Denning MR in Choice Investments Ltd v Jeromnimon (Midland Bank Ltd, garnishee) [1981] 1 All ER 225 at 227, [1981] QB 149 at 155: j

[Service of the order nisi] prevents the bank from paying the money to its customer until the garnishee order is made absolute, or is discharged ... The money at the bank is then said to be “attached” ... But the “attachment” is not an order to pay. It only freezes the sum in the hands of the bank until the order is made absolute or is discharged. It is only when the order is made absolute that the bank is liable to pay.’

[15] The effect of the order absolute has been similarly explored in the authorities. It was pointed out in Re Combined Weighing and Advertising Machine Co (1889) 43 Ch D 99 that the order does not operate as a transfer of the garnishee’s debt but attaches the debt and confers a right of execution only. Cotton LJ explained in Chatterton v Watney (1881) 17 Ch D 259 at 262:

‘The effect of a garnishee order is to bind the debt attached and to prevent the creditor from receiving it; and when it is made absolute it gives the judgment creditor a right to recover payment from the garnishee, and by rule 8 it is provided that payment made by the garnishee under the proceeding shall be a valid discharge to him as against the judgment debtor. There is nothing in the terms of the General Order to affect any security for the debt, it only takes away the right of the judgment debtor to receive the money and gives the judgment creditor a right to receive it. It has not the effect of transferring the security, nor does it give the person who obtained the garnishee order any right to the security or any claim against the land comprised in it.’

Lindley MR defined the effect of the order absolute very succinctly in Pritchett v English and Colonial Syndicate [1899] 2 QB 428 at 433:

‘... the order is, in substance, not an order to pay a debt, but an order on the garnishees, the syndicate, to hand over something in their hands belonging to [the judgment debtor] to [the judgment creditor].’

[16] In a much-quoted passage of his judgment in Ellis v M’Henry (1871) LR 6 CP 228 at 234, Bovill CJ sitting in the Court of Common Pleas said:

‘In the first place, there is no doubt that a debt or liability arising in any country may be discharged by the laws of that country, and that such a discharge, if it extinguishes the debt or liability, and does not merely interfere with the remedies or course of procedure to enforce it, will be an effectual answer to the claim, not only in the courts of that country, but in every other country. This is the law of England, and is a principle of private international law adopted in other countries. It was laid down by Lord King, in Burrows v. Jemino ((1726) 2 Stra 733); by Lord Mansfield, in Ballantine v. Golding ((1784) Cooke’s Bankrupt Laws 419); by Lord Ellenborough, in Potter v. Brown ((1804) 5 East 124, 102 ER 1016); by the Privy Council, in Odwin v. Forbes ((1817) Buck 57); and in Quelin v. Moisson ((1828) 1 Knapp 265 at 266, 12 ER 320); and by the Court of Queen’s Bench in the case of Gardiner v. Houghton ((1862) 2 B & S 743, 121 ER 1247); and by the Court of Exchequer Chamber, in the elaborate judgment delivered by my Brother Willes, in Phillips v. Eyre ((1870) LR 6 QB 1 at 28). Secondly, as a general proposition, it is also true that the discharge of a debt or liability by the law of a country other than that in which the debt arises, does not relieve the debtor in any other country: Smith v. Buchanan ((1800) 1 East 6, 102 ER 3); Lewis v. Owen ((1821) 4 B & Ald 654); Phillips v. Allan ((1828) 8 B & C 477, 108 ER 1120); Bartley v. Hodges (1861) 1 B & S 375, 121 ER 754.)' a

This statement remains good law. In Martin v Nadel (Dresdner Bank, garnishees) [1906] 2 KB 26, [1904–7] All ER Rep 827, where a garnishee order was sought in England against the London branch of a German bank to attach a balance owed to the judgment debtor by the Berlin branch of the bank, Vaughan Williams LJ said ([1906] 2 KB 26 at 29): b

‘It appears to me to be clear that a garnishee order is of the nature of an execution, and is governed by the lex fori; and by international law an execution which has been carried into effect in a foreign country under foreign law, and has taken away part of a man’s property, is not recognised as binding. There can be no doubt that under the rules of international law the Dresdner Bank could not set up, in an action in Berlin, the execution levied in this country in respect to this debt. If we consider the converse case it is clear, to my mind, that we should take that view of a similar transaction occurring abroad.’ c

Stirling LJ was of the same mind ([1906] 2 KB 26 at 31): d

‘On the facts of this case the debt of the bank to Nadel would be properly recoverable in Germany. That being so, it must be taken that the order of this Court would not protect the bank from being called on to pay the debt a second time.’ e

It is evident that the Hong Kong law and procedure (recorded in [8], above) which deny recognition to a third party debt or garnishee order made in England in relation to a debt sited in Hong Kong is not an unusual or idiosyncratic rule but one which reflects general international practice.

[17] The House was referred to no reported case in which the English court has made a final third party debt order or garnishee order absolute in relation to a foreign debt, although (with one exception) the refusal has been put on discretionary grounds; and discretion has been exercised against the making of an order even where the debt to be attached is situated in this country where it has appeared that the third party, despite the discharge of its debt to the judgment debtor as a matter of English law, may be at risk elsewhere of compulsion to pay a second time. f

[18] In Martin v Nadel, to which reference has already been made, an absolute order was refused because the garnishee bank was at risk of having to pay twice and the making of an order in such circumstances was ‘inequitable’ and ‘contrary to natural justice’ ([1906] 2 KB 26 at 30–31). In Swiss Bank Corp v Boehmische Industrial Bank [1923] 1 KB 673 the situation was different, because the debt was situated here in England. Bankes LJ pointed out this distinction and its importance (at 678–679): g

‘If the debt is situate, or in other words if it is properly recoverable, in this country, then it would be discharged by payment under an order of our Courts and the garnishee need have no fear of being required to pay it a second time; but if the debt is situate, that is properly recoverable, in a foreign country, then it is not discharged by payment in this country under an order of the Courts of this country, and the debtor may be called upon to pay it over again in the foreign country. There is no doubt as to the effect of payment made under a garnishee order here. It is clearly a discharge pro h a tanto of the debt ... There is a vital distinction between the facts of that case [Martin v Nadel] and the facts of the present case ... That was a debt situate in Berlin, being properly recoverable in Berlin. That was the debt sought to be garnished. Here the debt sought to be garnished was a debt situate in England being properly recoverable in England. In this case the debt can be properly discharged in England. In Martin v Nadel the debt could be properly discharged only in Berlin.

Scrutton LJ (at 680–681) said that—

c ‘the Court will not make absolute a garnishee order where it will not operate to discharge the garnishee in whole or pro tanto from the debt; it will not expose him to the risk of having to pay the debt or part of it twice over.’

Scrutton LJ considered this (at 681) to be ‘well established as a principle of discretion on which the Court acts’.

d [19] The exception mentioned in [17], above, is found in Richardson v Richardson (National Bank of India Ltd, garnishee) [1927] P 228, [1927] All ER Rep 92, in which a bank owed debts to a judgment debtor customer on accounts held both in London and in Africa. It was accepted that the former were subject to a garnishee order. The dispute concerned the latter. Hill J said ([1927] P 228 at 235, [1927] All ER Rep 92 at 96):

e ‘The bank is no doubt indebted to the judgment debtor and the bank is within the jurisdiction. The Order deals with the case where “any other person is indebted to the judgment debtor and is within the jurisdiction”. But both in principle and upon authority, that means “is indebted within the jurisdiction and is within the jurisdiction”. The debt must be properly recoverable within the jurisdiction. In principle, attachment of debts is a form of execution, and the general power of execution extends only to property within the jurisdiction of the Court which orders it. A debt is not f [properly] within the jurisdiction if it cannot be recovered here.’

Hill J was accordingly ([1927] P 228 at 236, [1927] All ER Rep 92 at 96)—

g ‘of opinion that moneys held by the bank to the credit of the judgment debtor at the African branches cannot be made the subject of a garnishee order, for they are not a debt recoverable within the jurisdiction.’

He went on to hold that, if he was wrong in that conclusion, he would exercise his discretion against the making of an order.

h [20] In SCF Finance Co Ltd v Masri (No 3) [1987] 1 All ER 194, [1987] QB 1028, the Court of Appeal (Slade and Ralph Gibson LJ and Sir John Megaw) differed from the view taken by Hill J, while accepting ([1987] 1 All ER 194 at 205, [1987] QB 1028 at 1044) that in a case where the garnishee was not indebted within the jurisdiction that might be relevant to the exercise of the court’s discretion. Since, in that case, the debt in question was an English debt, the court’s jurisdiction in relation to foreign debts did not fall for decision. Nor did it in Interpool Ltd v Galani [1987] 2 All ER 981, [1988] QB 738, which concerned the examination of a judgment debtor under RSC Ord 48 and not the making of a garnishee order under Ord 49. As Balcombe LJ observed at the end of the judgment of the court (given on behalf of Lloyd LJ and himself) ([1987] 2 All ER 981 at 985, [1988] QB 738 at 743):

'The use of Ord 48, in English enforcement proceedings, in order to discover the existence of foreign assets, does not confer, or purport to confer, jurisdiction on the English court in relation to enforcement proceedings in any other country in which those assets may be situate.'

But, referring to the absence of any requirement in Ord 49, r 1(1) that the garnished debt as well as the garnishee must be properly within the jurisdiction, the court made reference to the SCF Finance case and described the decision in Richardson v Richardson as 'no longer good law' ([1987] 2 All ER 981 at 983, [1988] QB 738 at 741).

[21] Reference should be made to the decision of the House in Deutsche Schachtbau- und Tiefbohrgesellschaft mbH v Xas Al-Khaimah National Oil Co [1988] 2 All ER 833, [1990] 1 AC 295. That case concerned a garnishee order absolute made in respect of a debt situated in England, and the House was not called upon to consider the position where foreign debts were in issue. But a majority of the House agreed with the opinion of Lord Goff of Chieveley, who referred ([1988] 2 All ER 833 at 850, [1990] 1 AC 295 at 350) to the court's 'discretionary power to make a garnishee order absolute' and concluded that it would be 'inequitable' ([1988] 2 All ER 833 at 853, 854–855, [1990] 1 AC 295 at 353, 355) to do so—

'where the payment by the garnishee under the order absolute will not necessarily discharge his liability under the attached debt, there being a real risk that he may be held liable in some foreign court to pay a second time.'
(See [1988] 2 All ER 833 at 854–855, [1990] 1 AC 295 at 355.)

Unsurprisingly, in the light of these authorities, the English court continued to exercise its discretion against the making of orders in relation to debts with a foreign situs: see, for example, Zoneheath Associates Ltd v China Tianjin International Economic and Technical Co-operative Corp [1994] CLC 348.

EXTRA-TERRITORIAL JURISDICTION

[22] In the course of argument before the House on this appeal, attention was drawn to a line of authority not directly related to garnishee or third party debt orders but bearing on the exercise by the English court of powers affecting the conduct of foreigners outside its jurisdiction. R v Grossman (1981) 73 Cr App R 302 concerned an application made against Barclays Bank in London to obtain inspection of an account held at a branch of the bank in the Isle of Man. The Civil Division of the Court of Appeal (Lord Denning MR, Shaw and Oliver LJ) which determined the application was later held to have lacked jurisdiction to do so (see Bonalumi v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [1985] 1 All ER 797, [1985] QB 675) but no doubt has been thrown on the opinions expressed (see (1981) 73 Cr App R 302 at 308–309). The Manx branch was to be considered a different entity from the bank's head office in London and any order in respect of the production of the books should be made by the Manx court and not the English court. Otherwise there was a risk of jurisdictional conflict which must be avoided. R v Grossman was cited and relied on by Hoffmann J in MacKinnon v Donaldson Lufkin & Jenrette Securities Corp [1986] 1 All ER 653, [1986] Ch 482, where a plaintiff in an English action had obtained an order against an American bank, served on its London office, requiring production of books and papers at its New York head office. Hoffmann J pointed out the distinction between 'personal jurisdiction (ie who can be brought before the court)' and 'subject matter jurisdiction (ie to what extent the court can claim to regulate the conduct of those persons)' ([1986] 1 All ER a 653 at 657, [1986] Ch 482 at 493). He held ([1986] 1 All ER 653 at 658, [1986] Ch 482 at 493):

‘In principle and on authority it seems to me that the court should not, save in exceptional circumstances, impose such a requirement upon a foreigner, and, in particular, upon a foreign bank. The principle is that a state should refrain from demanding obedience to its sovereign authority by foreigners in respect of their conduct outside the jurisdiction.’

b The judge went on ([1986] 1 All ER 653 at 658, [1986] Ch 482 at 494) to explain the rationale of the principle:

c ‘The need to exercise the court’s jurisdiction with due regard to the sovereignty of others is particularly important in the case of banks. Banks are in a special position because their documents are concerned not only with their own business but with that of their customers. They will owe their customers a duty of confidence regulated by the law of the country where the account is kept. That duty is in some countries reinforced by criminal sanctions and sometimes by “blocking statutes” which specifically forbid the bank to provide information for the purpose of foreign legal proceedings (compare s 2 of our Protection of Trading Interests Act 1980). If every country where a bank happened to carry on business asserted a right to require that bank to produce documents relating to accounts kept in any other such country, banks would be in the unhappy position of being forced to submit to whichever sovereign was able to apply the greatest pressure.’

d [23] Similar reticence was approved by the Court of Appeal (Kerr, Neill and Nicholls LJ) when considering worldwide Mareva injunctions in Babanaft International Co SA v Bassatne [1989] 1 All ER 433, [1990] Ch 13. The court accepted that there was nothing to preclude English courts from granting Mareva-type e injunctions against defendants extending to assets outside the jurisdiction, but insisted ([1989] 1 All ER 433 at 444, [1990] Ch 13 at 32 per Kerr LJ) that—

‘there can be no question of such orders operating directly upon the foreign assets by way of attachment, or upon third parties, such as banks, holding the assets. The effectiveness of such orders for these purposes can only derive from their recognition and enforcement by the local courts, as should be made clear in the terms of the orders to avoid any misunderstanding suggesting an unwarranted assumption of extraterritorial jurisdiction.’

g Nicholls LJ was similarly concerned ([1989] 1 All ER 433 at 453, [1990] Ch 13 at 44) at the ‘extraterritorial vice’ of unqualified orders. He pointed out ([1989] 1 All ER 433 at 454, [1990] Ch 13 at 46):

‘The enforcement of the judgment in other countries, by attachment or like process, in respect of assets which are situated there is not affected by the order. The order does not attach those assets. It does not create, or purport to create, a charge on those assets, nor does it give the plaintiff any proprietary interest in them. The English court is not attempting in any way to interfere with or control the enforcement process in respect of those assets.’

j As is well known, this judgment was reflected in what became the standard form of Mareva injunction order, until further protection was afforded to those holding overseas assets of persons subject to Mareva injunctions pursuant to the judgment of Clarke J in Baltic Shipping v Translink Shipping Ltd [1995] 1 Lloyd's Rep 673. a

CONCLUSION

[24] To resolve the issues arising between the judgment creditor and the third party in this appeal it is in my opinion necessary to return to very basic first principles. A garnishee or third party debt order is a proprietary remedy which operates by way of attachment against the property of the judgment debtor. The property of the judgment debtor so attached is the chose in action represented by the debt of the third party or garnishee to the judgment debtor. On the making of the interim or nisi order that chose in action is (as it has been variously put) bound, frozen, attached or charged in the hands of the third party or garnishee. Subject to any monetary limit which may be specified in the order, the third party is not entitled to deal with that chose in action by making payment to the judgment debtor or any other party at his request. When a final or absolute order is made the third party or garnishee is obliged (subject to any specified monetary limit) to make payment to the judgment creditor and not to the judgment debtor, but the debt of the third party to the judgment debtor is discharged pro tanto. b
c
d

[25] As appears from the provisions of primary and subordinate legislation cited in [10]–[12], above, the discharge of the third party or garnishee on making payment to the judgment debtor under a final or absolute order has been an integral feature of this procedure from the beginning. In s 65 of the 1854 Act, in Ord 45, rr 8 and 7 of the 1875 and 1883 rules respectively, in Ord 49, r 8 of the 1965 rules and in CPR 72.9 the discharge of the third party or garnishee has been expressed as a necessary consequence of the making of the order ('shall'). e

[26] It is not in my opinion open to the court to make an order in a case, such as the present, where it is clear or appears that the making of the order will not discharge the debt of the third party or garnishee to the judgment debtor according to the law which governs that debt. In practical terms it does not matter very much whether the House rules that the court has no jurisdiction to make an order in such a case or that the court has a discretion which should always be exercised against the making of an order in such a case. But the former seems to me the preferable analysis, since I would not accept that the court has power to make an order which, if made, would lack what has been legislatively stipulated to be a necessary consequence of such an order. I find myself in close agreement with the opinion of Hill J in Richardson v Richardson, subject only to the qualification (of little or no practical importance) that an order may be made relating to a chose in action sited abroad if it appears that by the law applicable in that situs the English order would be recognised as discharging pro tanto the liability of the third party to the judgment debtor. If (contrary to my opinion) the English court had jurisdiction to make an order in a case such as the present, the objections to its exercising a discretion to do so would be very strong on grounds of principle, comity and convenience: it is contrary in principle to compel a bank to pay out money owed by a customer if its liability to its customer is not reduced to the same extent; it is inconsistent with the comity owed to the Hong Kong court to purport to interfere with assets subject to its local jurisdiction; and the judgment creditor has a straightforward and readily available means of enforcing its judgment against the assets of the judgment debtors in Hong Kong. f
g
h
j

[27] It is of course true, as the judgment creditor argued and as was accepted in the SCF Finance case [1987] 1 All ER 194 at 205, [1987] QB 1028 at 1044, that the

a legislation has from the beginning stipulated that the third party or garnishee should be within the jurisdiction but not that the debt to be attached should be within the jurisdiction. This seems to me a point of very little weight. The language used in 1854 has, until very recently, been reproduced with remarkably little change, and I think it rather unlikely that Parliament in 1854 was directing its mind to garnishees served within the jurisdiction but owing debts to the judgment debtor abroad. Since no order attaching a foreign chose in action has been made in any reported case, there can have been no pressing need for the Rules Committee to clarify any suggested ambiguity in the rules.

[28] The Court of Appeal attached importance to the supposed availability to the third party of a restitutionary remedy in Hong Kong if the third party made (or was compelled to make) payment to the judgment creditor under an English order. This appears to me, with respect, to reflect some misunderstanding of the procedure. For, as already emphasised, the order takes effect against the property of the judgment debtor. Its effect is to enable the judgment creditor to take the property of the judgment debtor. The property of the third party is in no way involved, save by the diminution of its debt to the judgment debtor. Yet a disbursement of its own resources, compelled by law, is the ground relied on to support the third party's putative claim against the judgment debtors in Hong Kong. If, as in my opinion would be so, the effect of an order in this case would be to compel the third party to disburse its own funds, that would be a very clear indication that the order was one which should never have been made. The judge's reasoning on this point was, in my opinion, entirely sound.

e [29] The Court of Appeal also placed reliance on the third party's standard terms and conditions. It is unnecessary to set these out. They do not entitle the third party to make deductions from the judgment debtors' account which are not authorised by the law applicable to that account. They do not, in other words, override the rule that an English third party debt or garnishee order is not recognised in Hong Kong.

f [30] At first instance the judge treated the issue before him as one of discretion, as on existing authority he was bound to do, and gave compelling reasons why an absolute order should not be made. I would for my part accept those reasons did I not consider that he had no jurisdiction to make an absolute order. I would allow the third party's appeal with costs in the Court of Appeal and before the House, set aside the order of the Court of Appeal and restore the order of the judge in so far as it set aside the garnishee order nisi, ordered that there be no absolute order and awarded costs to the third party, summarily assessed, against the judgment creditor.

h LORD NICHOLLS OF BIRKENHEAD.

[31] My Lords, I have had the opportunity of reading in draft the speeches of my noble and learned friends Lord Bingham of Cornhill and Lord Hoffmann. For the reasons they give, with which I agree, I too would allow this appeal.

j LORD HOFFMANN.

[32] My Lords, the question in this appeal is whether the court can make a third party debt order under CPR Pt 72 in respect of a foreign debt. By a foreign debt, I mean for present purposes a debt which is payable in a foreign country and governed by the foreign law. Different considerations may apply in cases in which one of these conditions is missing but I put them aside because the facts of the present case are both simple and typical. The judgment creditor is seeking to enforce a French judgment which has been registered in this country. It wishes to use the third party debt procedure to execute against money standing to the debtor's credit in an account with the Hong Kong and Shanghai Banking Corp Ltd (the bank) at its principal office in Hong Kong. The credit balance is a debt payable by the bank to the debtor in Hong Kong and governed by Hong Kong law.

[33] Part 72 came into force on 25 March 2002, replacing RSC Ord 49 (garnishee proceedings), under which provisions the judgment creditor's application was made on 3 April 2000. But there is no material difference between the two sets of rules. Rule 72.2(1) gives the court power to order a third party to pay to the judgment creditor 'the amount of any debt due or accruing due to the judgment debtor from the third party'. RSC Ord 49, r 1(1) provided that if a person within the jurisdiction (the garnishee) was 'indebted to the judgment debtor', the court could order him to pay the debt to the judgment creditor. Rule 72.9(2) now provides that, if the third party pays money to the judgment creditor in compliance with the order, he shall to that extent 'be discharged from his debt to the judgment debtor'. Likewise, RSC Ord 49, r 8 provided that any payment made by a garnishee in compliance with an order 'shall be a valid discharge of his liability to the judgment creditor to the extent of the amount paid'.

[34] So despite its very recent enactment and modern language, the third party debt order is a process of execution which goes back far into English legal history. RSC Ord 49 is derived from the provisions of ss 61 to 70 of the Common Law Procedure Act 1854. These provisions were enacted on the recommendation of the Second Report of the Royal Commission on the Superior Courts of Common Law (1853), which included Jervis CJ, Martin B, Sir Alexander Cockburn and the future Bramwell B and Willes J. The commissioners said (p 38):

'[W]e may suggest, that the remedies of creditors against the property of their debtors might be made more extensive by enabling a creditor after judgment to attach debts and monies of his debtor in the hands of third persons, and so obtain satisfaction of his judgment. We are not aware of any process, either in the superior courts of law or equity, in suits between subject and subject, by which this can directly be done, though the course of proceeding under writs of execution at the suit of the crown, and by way of foreign attachment in the mayor's court of London and some other cities, as well as in the courts of many foreign countries, shows that such a remedy would be practicable and useful.'

[35] The procedure called foreign attachment, to which the commissioners referred and on which the procedure under the 1854 Act was modelled, had existed by immemorial custom in London and other cities. The custom had been certified by the Recorder of London in 1481 but went back much further; enthusiastic City historians traced it to the Roman occupation and even to the laws of Troy (see London (Mayor etc) v Cox (1867) LR 2 HL 239 at 256).

[36] Foreign attachment of debts was primarily an interlocutory process to compel the defendant's appearance and provide security for judgment but, in the event of default by a defendant, it was also a process of execution. Besides being a model for the 1854 garnishee order, foreign attachment as an interlocutory process had further offspring in the shape of the Mareva injunction: see Lord Denning MR in Rasu Maritima SA v Perusahaan Pertambangan Minyak Dan Gas Bumi Negara (Pertamina) and Government of Indonesia (as interveners) [1977] 3 All ER

324 at 331, [1978] QB 644 at 657–658. But the attachment of foreign debts raises similar issues of principle at whatever stage in the proceedings the debts are attached and the decisions on the scope of foreign attachment are therefore still relevant.

[37] Exorbitant claims of jurisdiction by the Mayor of London's Court, allegedly founded upon the custom of foreign attachment, were challenged in London (Mayor etc) v Cox (1867) LR 2 HL 239. The result of that case was overdetermined because none of the three parties resided in the City and neither the judgment debt nor the garnishee's debt had accrued there. The House of Lords held that the court had no jurisdiction to grant a foreign attachment and issued a writ of prohibition. The principal ground of decision was that the Mayor's Court, being a local court, could not establish jurisdiction over a non-resident defendant merely by serving a garnishee notice upon another non-resident who was physically present in the City and was alleged to owe him a debt. But Willes J, who gave the opinion of the judges which was adopted by the House, also dealt (at 268) with the position of the garnishee whose foreign debt to the judgment debtor the court was purporting to attach:

'A foreign banker, of whom as banker it may be said "pecunia est alter sanguis", passing through London, may be called upon, at the suit of some other foreigner, of whom he never heard, and the validity of whose claim he is not to be permitted to dispute, to pay in London in cash what he might at home have paid in paper; and if, to get rid of annoyance, or relying upon English justice, he pays, his customer may afterwards insist ... in a foreign court that the debt or the party was not subject to the jurisdiction.'

[38] The second ground of decision was therefore (at 274–275) that a foreign attachment could not be made against a garnishee merely on account of his physical presence in the jurisdiction:

'It appears, therefore, to be in accordance with authority and good sense to hold that a man who could not be sued in London by his own creditor cannot by the mere act of using the Queen's highway through the City ... become liable to be stayed there under the custom of the place by the alleged creditor of his creditor.'

[39] In London Corp v London Joint Stock Bank (1881) 6 App Cas 393 the scope of foreign attachment again came before the House of Lords. This time the question was whether a corporation could be a garnishee. The House decided that it could not because, according to the custom, the only means of compulsion which could be used to obtain payment of the debt from a garnishee was his physical detention. It followed that there was no way of making a corporation pay. This meant that if it did pay, it would not be able to defend a subsequent claim by his creditor on the ground that it had been compelled by law to pay. The House decided that this was fatal to the use of foreign attachment, because it was essential to the procedure that the payment by the garnishee should discharge its debt to the judgment debtor. 'The garnishee', said Lord Blackburn (at 415)—

'if he is to be obliged to pay the money, must be discharged from paying it to his creditor. Now the garnishee cannot, according to the authorities, or to reason, set himself free towards his creditor by making any voluntary payment: it must be a compulsory payment; a payment under compulsion of law or else he is not discharged.'

[40] Lord Watson likewise said (at 421):

a

‘In considering the merits of that part of the case it is very necessary to keep in view that which has been already referred to by both my noble and learned friends, namely, that it is of the essence of this custom that execution may follow upon the order directed to the garnishee, in the event of his not obeying that order and failing to hand over the goods of the defendant, or to pay the money of the defendant to the plaintiff. That is necessary, because the courts of law have held that, unless he so deliver or pay under compulsion, he is not discharged. The custom would not be a reasonable one unless it went the length of affording protection to the garnishee when he obeys the order of the court.’

b

c

[41] This objection that a corporate debtor could not be compelled to satisfy a foreign attachment did not of course apply to post-judgment attachment under the statutory garnishee procedure, which by then was contained in Ord 45 of the Rules of Court scheduled to the Supreme Court of Judicature Act 1875. The rules made express provision for ordinary execution against a garnishee who did not pay, whether he was a corporate or a natural person. And, as I have mentioned, they also provided expressly that a garnishee who paid under the order should be discharged from his debt. But the question is whether, in the case of a foreign debt, these provisions are sufficient to satisfy the principle that the garnishee can be made to pay only if he will be discharged from payment to his creditor.

d

e

[42] This was the question considered by the Court of Appeal in the important case of Martin v Nadel (Dresdner Bank, garnishees) [1906] 2 KB 26, [1904–7] All ER Rep 827. The judgment debtor lived in Berlin, where he maintained an account with the Dresdner Bank. Judgment was entered against him in an action in London; he appealed unsuccessfully to the Court of Appeal and then to the House of Lords, which required him to give security for costs by depositing £200 in court and providing a bank recognisance for £500. The latter was provided by the bank’s London branch against the security of the same amount deposited with the branch in Berlin. The appeal was dismissed and the costs paid out of the money in court and £300 paid by the London branch under the recognisance. This left the judgment debtor with just under £200 in his account in Berlin. The judgment creditor obtained a garnishee order against the bank attaching the balance in Berlin. But the bank appealed and the Court of Appeal set the order aside.

f

g

[43] Counsel for the bank argued that the German courts might recognise the judgment against Mr Nadel, because he had submitted to the jurisdiction, but not the garnishee order ‘which forms part of a code relating to execution’. Counsel for the judgment creditor argued that the balance was not really a foreign debt because Nadel could have sued for it in England as money had and received to his use.

h

[44] Vaughan Williams LJ said ([1906] 2 KB 26 at 29):

j

‘It appears to me to be clear that a garnishee order is of the nature of an execution, and is governed by the lex fori; and by international law an execution which has been carried into effect in a foreign country under foreign law, and has taken away part of a man’s property, is not recognized as binding. There can be no doubt that under the rules of international law the Dresdner Bank could not set up, in an action in Berlin, the execution levied in this country in respect to this debt.’

a [45] It would, I think, have been open to the Court of Appeal to say that when RSC Ord 45, r 2 referred to 'all debts' owing or accruing from a third party, they did not include foreign debts—at any rate, not foreign debts in the sense in which I have been using that expression. It is true that the language is entirely general, but, as Millett J said in Re International Tin Council [1987] 1 All ER 890 at 901, [1987] Ch 419 at 450:

b 'It is one thing to give effect to plain and unambiguous language in a statute. It is quite another to insist that general words must invariably be given their fullest meaning and applied to every object which falls within their literal scope, regardless of the probable intentions of Parliament.'

c [46] Against the background of private international law and the principles which garnishee proceedings had inherited from foreign attachment, there were good arguments for saying that foreign debts did not fall within the scope of the rule. But the Court of Appeal did not take this course. Instead, it said that the judgment creditor did not have a right to a garnishee order ex debito justitiae. It was a matter of discretion and the court should not make an order when it would be inequitable to do so. Both Vaughan Williams LJ and Stirling LJ said that it would be inequitable to make an order which left the bank still liable to an action in Berlin.

e [47] Martin v Nadel was distinguished by the Court of Appeal in Swiss Bank Corp v Boehmische Industrial Bank [1923] 1 KB 673, in which the Swiss bank had obtained an English judgment against a bank in Prague. It executed upon the judgment by a garnishee order against the Prague bank's account with the London Merchant Bank in London. Again there was no problem about the jurisdiction of the English court to enter judgment: the Prague bank had submitted to the jurisdiction. But the London Merchant Bank appealed against the garnishee order on the ground that it could still be held liable for the same debt in Prague. Bankes LJ said that the debt owed by the London bank, being properly recoverable in England, was situated in England and therefore discharged by compliance with the garnishee order, not only as a matter of English law but under international law which it could be assumed would be applied in all other countries. In Martin v Nadel, on the other hand, the debt was situated in Germany and as a matter of international law would not be treated anywhere outside England as having been discharged by an English garnishee order. Scrutton LJ (at 680–681) again identified the matter as being one of discretion:

h 'The court will not make absolute a garnishee order where it will not operate to discharge the garnishee in whole or pro tanto from the debt; it will not expose him to the risk of having to pay the debt or part of it twice over. That is well established as a principle of discretion on which the court acts.'

j [48] In Richardson v Richardson, however, Hill J gave the principle a harder edge. Mrs Richardson had divorced her husband living in East Africa and obtained an order for costs. To enforce it, she applied for a garnishee order against his money in the Mombasa and Dar-es-Salaam branches of the National Bank of India, which had its head office in London. The judge said ([1927] P 228 at 235, [1927] All ER Rep 92 at 96) that 'in principle and upon authority', the words 'is indebted to the judgment debtor' in RSC Ord 45 meant 'is indebted within the jurisdiction':

'In principle, attachment of debts is a form of execution, and the general power of execution extends only to property within the jurisdiction of the Court which orders it. A debt is not property within the jurisdiction if it cannot be recovered here. As a matter of authority, the case of Martin v. Nadel, as explained by Swiss Bank Corporation v Boehmische Industrial Bank, and the decision and judgments in that case show that the Order does not apply unless the debt is properly recoverable within the jurisdiction.'

[49] The question of whether the matter was one of jurisdiction or discretion was considered by the Court of Appeal in the SCF Finance case. Leggatt J gave judgment against Mr Masri for over $US900,000. His wife had $US400,000 in an account with the London branch of the United Arab Bank. The judge held that she was estopped from denying that this money belonged beneficially to Mr Masri. Leggatt J treated the money as a debt owed by the wife to the husband and made a garnishee order against it. The difficulty was that both of them lived in Jordan and so, it was said, the debt was a foreign debt, situate and recoverable in Jordan. But, said Ralph Gibson LJ ([1987] 1 All ER 194 at 205–206, [1987] QB 1028 at 1044):

'[The issue estoppel] has established that, as between the two of them and as a matter of English law, the debt due from the Arab Bank, which is a debt arising in this country, is due to the first defendant and therefore available to be attached in satisfaction of the judgment debt due from him to the plaintiffs. Nothing ... has given us the least reason to suppose that the second defendant could be at any risk of being ordered to pay the debt a second time to her husband.'

[50] As I read this passage, the court was treating the garnishee order as operating, not so much on a debt between wife and husband, but on the debt owed by the bank, which Mrs Masri was estopped from claiming was owed to her rather than the judgment debtor. On this basis the debt was clearly not a foreign debt and there was no difficulty about the attachment. The court did, however, say that it thought Hill J was wrong in Richardson's case to say that there was no jurisdiction to attach foreign debts. It was, as the court had said in Martin v Nadel, a matter of discretion. This view was repeated by Balcombe LJ giving the judgment of the court in Interpool Ltd v Galani [1987] 2 All ER 981 at 983, [1988] QB 738 at 741.

[51] In Deutsche Schachtbau-und Tiefbohrergesellschaft mbH v Shell International Petroleum Co Ltd (t/a Shell International Trading Co) [1988] 2 All ER 833, [1990] 1 AC 295 Hobhouse J said that one could confidently regard Martin v Nadel as establishing that—

'if in accordance with the conflict of law rules recognised by the English courts, the garnishee order absolute will not suffice to discharge the liability of the garnishee and the garnishee will continue to be exposed to a risk of being held liable for the debt by a foreign court of competent jurisdiction, a garnishee order will not be made.'

[52] What was more controversial was whether one should assume that foreign courts would act in accordance with recognised conflict of laws rules or whether one should also refuse to make a garnishee order if there appeared a risk that the garnishee, although discharged in accordance with English conflict rules, would be exposed to a second claim in a foreign court which did not give effect a to them. On this point the House of Lords were divided, Lord Templeman taking the former view and the other members of the House the latter. Lord Oliver of Aylmerton said ([1988] 2 All ER 833 at 845, [1990] 1 AC 295 at 343):

b 'It has to be recognised that a debt is a species of property which may be recoverable by legal process from a debtor in more than one jurisdiction and it would be entirely inequitable that the garnishee should, by process in different jurisdictions properly conducted in accordance with the local law, be compelled to pay twice over in order that a judgment with which he has no connection whatever should be satisfied at his expense. If the reality is that this is likely to be the result, the fact that the particular foreign legal process is not one which commends itself to our jurisprudence is really immaterial.'

c [53] In analysing the authorities, Lord Goff of Chieveley said that the question was always whether it would be inequitable to make the garnishee order absolute. It would generally be inequitable to do so if the garnishee would have to pay the debt twice over. In deciding whether this might happen, the normal assumption was that any foreign court, in accordance with general principles of private international law, would treat the debt as discharged if three conditions were satisfied: (1) the English court had international jurisdiction to enter judgment against the debtor; (2) the situs of the debt was England; and (3) the effect of payment under the garnishee order in English law was to discharge the debt. Lord Goff then considered whether this assumption should be made in every case: was compliance with the three criteria both necessary and sufficient? Lord Goff did not express a view as to whether compliance was necessary, although he noted the court in Martin v Nadel had not simply applied the three criteria as a matter of private international law but had considered whether in fact a payment under the garnishee order would be recognised by a court in Berlin as discharging the local debt. This suggests that if the evidence of foreign law had shown that, contrary to the general principles of private international law, the foreign court would have treated the debt as discharged, it would have been acceptable to make the garnishee order absolute. But the real issue in the case was whether compliance was sufficient. Lord Goff said ([1988] 2 All ER 833 at 854–855, [1990] 1 AC 295 at 355) that it was not:

g '[T]he principle which is here being applied is that a garnishee order absolute should not be made where it is inequitable to do so, and further that it is accepted in the authorities that it is inequitable so to do where the payment by the garnishee under the order absolute will not necessarily discharge his liability under the attached debt, there being a real risk that he may be held liable in some foreign court to pay a second time. To deprive the garnishee of the benefit of this equity merely because the court which may hold him liable a second time is not acting in accordance with accepted principles of international law would not be right, especially bearing in mind that the garnishee is a wholly innocent party who has been dragged into somebody else's dispute, and that the judgment creditor has the opportunity of seeking elsewhere for assets of the judgment debtor which he may seize in satisfaction of the judgment debt.'

j [54] My Lords, so far I have been considering the matter, as almost all the authorities have done, as one of fairness and equity between the parties. But there is another dimension. The execution of a judgment is an exercise of sovereign authority. It is a seizure by the state of an asset of the judgment debtor to satisfy the creditor's claim. And it is a general principle of international law that one sovereign state should not trespass upon the authority of another, by attempting to seize assets situated within the jurisdiction of the foreign state or compelling its citizens to do acts within its boundaries. a [55] In the modern world, banking is perhaps the strongest illustration of the importance of mutual respect for national sovereignties. There are nearly 500 foreign banks in London, to say nothing of British banks with branches overseas. Banking is a highly regulated activity and each head office or branch has to comply with the laws of the jurisdiction in which it operates. If the courts of one country in which a bank operates exercise no restraint about using their sovereign powers of compulsion in relation to accounts maintained with that bank at branches in other countries, conflict and chaos is likely to follow. b

c

[56] There is already a hint of this in Willes J's example of the foreign banker (cuius pecunia est alter sanguis) who was entitled to say civis Romanus (or wherever) sum and not be mulcted by foreign attachment in the City of London on account of an alleged debt owing at his foreign place of business. But sensitivity to foreign sovereignty appears most clearly in the rules which have been developed for that younger offspring of foreign attachment, the Mareva injunction or freezing order. Unlike the case of its elder sibling, there is no question of a freezing order putting a bank in the position of having to pay twice. Nevertheless, unless carefully limited, a freezing order applying to foreign banking debts can put the bank in the position of having to choose between being in contempt of an English court and having to dishonour its obligations under a law which does not regard the English order as a valid excuse. d
e

[57] So in Babanaft International Co SA v Bassatne [1989] 1 All ER 433 at 446, [1990] Ch 13 at 35 the late Kerr LJ, who was a master of international commercial law, said:

'Unqualified Mareva injunctions covering assets abroad can never be justified, either before or after judgment, because they involve an exorbitant assertion of jurisdiction of an in rem nature over third parties outside the jurisdiction of our courts.' f

[58] The result was that freezing orders have been tailored to make it clear, first, that they do not affect anyone outside the jurisdiction unless enforced by a court of the relevant country and, secondly, that they do not prevent third parties such as foreign banks, which have an English presence and are therefore subject to the jurisdiction, from complying with what they reasonably believe to be their obligations under the law of the situs or proper law of the debt or any order of a local court: see Baltic Shipping v Translink Shipping Ltd [1995] 1 Lloyd's Rep 673. g
h

[59] The conclusion I draw from this survey of principle and authority is that there are strong reasons of principle for not making a third party debt order in respect of a foreign debt. I agree with my noble and learned friend Lord Millett that the application of such principles is not at all the same as the exercise of a discretion. To that extent, the references to a discretion in cases like the SCF Finance case and Interpool Ltd v Galani [1987] 2 All ER 981, [1988] QB 738 are misleading. On the other hand, a principle is not the same as a statutory rule restricting the jurisdiction. It may have to give way to some other overriding principle. But I find it hard to think what such a principle might be. Until this case there was no reported instance in which the normal principle had not been applied. j

a [60] That brings me to the judgments in the present case. The bank produced uncontradicted evidence that by Hong Kong law the garnishee order would not discharge the debt owing by the bank to the judgment debtor in Hong Kong. Tomlinson J refused to make the order absolute on the ground that the bank would be at risk of having to pay its customer again in Hong Kong. But the Court of Appeal reversed his decision and granted the order.

b [61] In a judgment given by Mance LJ the Court of Appeal reasoned as follows: (1) the Hong Kong court would recognise the underlying judgment in the French court; (2) it would therefore recognise that the judgment debtor was indebted to the creditor; (3) if the bank paid pursuant to the garnishee order, it would have paid the judgment debtor's debt under compulsion of law; (4) a person who pays the debt of another under compulsion of law can claim reimbursement by a restitutionary action; (5) this applies equally when the compulsion is applied by a foreign law; (6) Hong Kong law on this point can be assumed to be the same as English law; (7) therefore if the bank were sued by the judgment debtor in Hong Kong it could set off its restitutionary claim and would not have to pay twice; (8) there was no infringement of Hong Kong sovereignty because the bank was being required to pay in England, not Hong Kong.

c [62] The argument does not lack novelty and ingenuity but I respectfully think it is flawed because it travesties the nature of a third party debt order. The essence of such an order is that it is execution in rem against the property of the judgment debtor, against a res or chose in action which belongs to him and which is within the jurisdiction of the court making the order. As the Royal Commissioners said in 1853, it is an attachment of 'monies of [the] debtor in the hands of third persons' (see [34], above). It is true that once the judgment debtor's chose in action has been captured or attached, the court will realise it or turn it to account by ordering the third party to pay the debt to the judgment creditor. But that is a process of realisation in the same way as the sale of a chattel belonging to the debtor which has been taken in execution. It is not a personal claim against the third party. The third party pays with his own money only in the same sense as a bank upon which a cheque has been drawn by a customer in credit pays with its own money. But the substance of the matter is that the judgment creditor is paid with the debtor's money, as the drawee of the cheque is paid with the customer's money.

e [63] The discharge of the third party's indebtedness effected by CPR 72.9(2) (formerly RSC Ord 49, r 8) is therefore an essential part of the execution. As Lord Blackburn said in London Corp v London Joint Stock Bank (1881) 6 App Cas 393 at 415, the garnishee, 'if he is to be obliged to pay the money, must be discharged from paying it to his creditor'. It is this which ensures that the creditor is paid with the debtor's money and not the third party's.

f [64] It is not in my opinion an adequate substitute for this protection to argue that if the third party has to pay out of his own money, he will acquire a restitutionary claim in personam which he can set off against the debt. In the domestic context, such a claim is impossible. As Tomlinson J said in this case g ([2001] 1 All ER (Comm) 843 at 851):

'The fact that it is ... of the essence of the procedure that the garnishee thereby obtains a good discharge against his own creditor means that he has no need of a restitutionary claim against his creditor ... Indeed, it can readily be seen that it would in fact be wholly inimical to the structure of the garnishee jurisdiction if ... a garnishee were by payment to the judgment creditor to obtain the right to a restitutionary claim against the judgment debtor ... A claim in restitution could only be consistent with the garnishee remaining liable to the judgment debtor ...'

[65] Paradoxically, therefore, the restitutionary claim postulated by the Court of Appeal can exist only in a foreign law. In the present case, the Court of Appeal inferred its existence in the law of Hong Kong from the decision of Donaldson J in Liberian Insurance Agency Inc v Mosse [1977] 2 Lloyd's Rep 560, in which he began his judgment by saying that the facts were probably unique and that he certainly hoped they were. That is not a promising introduction if one is looking for universally applicable principles of law. The facts were that Liberian insurance brokers had been held liable in a Liberian court to pay a cargo claim alleged to be owing to the insured plaintiff by underwriters in London. The brokers were obliged to satisfy the claim in Liberia. Having done so, they sued the underwriters in London on the ground that they had paid their debt under compulsion of law. Donaldson J said that compulsion under a foreign law could found a restitutionary claim but dismissed the action on the ground that the underwriters would have had a good defence to a claim by the insured.

[66] The claim against the brokers, whatever its merits, was an ordinary in personam contractual claim over which the Liberian court undoubtedly had jurisdiction. It is therefore not surprising that Donaldson J was prepared to recognise it as creating a legal obligation to pay. But there is no in personam claim against the bank in this case. The bank owes the judgment creditor nothing. The third party debt jurisdiction is, as I have said, execution in rem against the chose of action. If the English court has no jurisdiction over the debt, I do not understand why a foreign court should recognise the third party's obligation to pay as having been under compulsion of law. Under generally accepted conflict of law rules, it is simply an unlawful seizure. The notion that one can justify the attachment of a foreign debt by imputing to the foreign law recognition of an exorbitant order for the purpose of founding a claim of payment under compulsion of law is in my opinion quite unreal.

[67] The Court of Appeal rejected the suggestion that it was infringing the sovereignty of Hong Kong by saying that it was not ordering the bank to do anything in Hong Kong. All it had to do was to pay money in London. On this ground it distinguished cases like R v Grossman (1981) 73 Cr App R 302 and MacKinnon v Donaldson Lufkin & Jenrette Securities Corp [1986] 1 All ER 653, [1986] Ch 482 in which courts had refused to order banks to produce information about accounts held in foreign jurisdictions. But this distinction depends upon treating the third party debt order simply as an order against the bank instead of what it really is, namely, a process of execution by the attachment of property of the judgment debtor. Once the true nature of the order is understood, it becomes plain that an order in respect of a foreign debt is an attempt to levy execution on an asset in the foreign jurisdiction, which infringes the principle of international law applied in R v Grossman and MacKinnon's case.

[68] I would therefore regard this as a straightforward case governed by Martin v Nadel (Dresdner Bank, garnishees) [1906] 2 KB 26, [1904-7] All ER Rep 827. In cases in which the debt is plainly foreign, I find it hard to imagine a case in which such an order could be made. I do not find the example of the Panamanian debt given by the Court of Appeal persuasive. It was said that if the third party owing money to the judgment debtor was a Panamanian company which had no assets other than an account in a bank in London, it would be justifiable to make

- a the order and execute against the third party's assets in London. But that would still leave the Panamanian company exposed to proceedings by the judgment debtor in Panama to recover the same debt. I do not see why it would be equitable to put the Panamanian company, which has nothing to do with the basic dispute, into a position of insolvency in Panama so that the creditor's claim can be satisfied in London.
- b [69] For these reasons I would allow the appeal and discharge the garnishee order.

LORD HOBHOUSE OF WOODBOROUGH.

- c [70] My Lords, in full agreement with the opinions of my noble and learned friends Lord Bingham of Cornhill and Lord Hoffmann, I too would allow the appeal and make the order proposed. I am also in broad agreement with what my noble and learned friend Lord Millett is to say in his opinion.

- d [71] I will, however, add two observations relevant to this and similar cases. The first relates to the situs of a debt. In the present case there is no dispute that the situs of the relevant debt is Hong Kong and not England. (The same is true, mutatis mutandis, in the parallel case concerning UBS AG (see Kuwait Oil Tanker Co SAK v Qabazard [2003] UKHL 31, [2003] 3 All ER 501).) But it is still necessary to understand why this is so. Stirling LJ in Martin v Nadel (Dresdner Bank, garnishees) [1906] 2 KB 26 at 31, like others before and since, found it most appropriate to refer to the work Dicey and Morris on the Conflict of Laws. I will do the same, using the thirteenth edition (2000).

- e [72] Rule 112 states that 'choses in action generally are situate in the country where they are properly recoverable or can be enforced'. The text amplifies this in relation to debts, saying, 'a debt is [generally] situate in the country where the debtor resides ... It may not, however, be the only place: English courts may take jurisdiction against non-residents on the basis of temporary presence', or under f the CPR or the Brussels or Lugano Conventions. Nevertheless, this possibility does not make the debt situate in England if the debtor is not resident here. But, generally speaking, 'for the purpose of determining situs, a corporation is resident wherever it carries on business' (pp 925–926):

- g 'Where ... the debtor has two or more places of residence and the creditor either expressly or impliedly stipulates for payment at one of them, then the debt will be there situate. This refinement is important in connection with bank accounts where (as in English law) under the applicable law of the contract between banker and customer the bank's obligation to repay is performable primarily at the branch where the account is kept, and accordingly in such a case all accounts kept at a particular branch are to be held there situate ... Where the debtor has more than one place of residence but there is no express or implied promise to pay at any one of them then the debt is situate at that place of residence where it would be paid in the ordinary course of business.' (See pp 926–927.)

- j [73] The third party debtor, garnishee, is a corporation. It is incorporated in Hong Kong where it presumably has its head management. But it has places of business in England and is registered as an overseas company under Pt XXIII of the Companies Act 1985. The English courts accordingly have jurisdiction. The company can be served within the jurisdiction and has one or more places of business here. If the company were an ordinary trading company and the debt it owed to the judgment debtor an ordinary commercial debt, say, payment for a service rendered or goods supplied, the judgment debtor could have sued the company and recovered the debt in England and could have argued that the company had sufficient residence here to make England the or a situs of the debt. But, with banks and the debts of banks to their customers, the debt is, absent some special agreement, repayable at the branch where the customer's account is kept and the situs of the debt is in that country. This has a double significance. It is part of and defines the substantive obligation of the bank to its customer and it identifies the situs of the debt for the purposes of private international law. The authorities cited, in particular London (Mayor etc) v Cox (1867) LR 2 HL 239, Martin v Nadel, Swiss Bank Corp v Boehmische Industrial Bank [1923] 1 KB 673 and Richardson v Richardson (National Bank of India Ltd, garnishee) [1927] P 228, [1927] All ER Rep 92, demonstrate this. The recognition of what is the substantive obligation of the bank is an essential part of the analysis.

[74] In the present case (and in the UBS AG case (see Kuwait Oil Tanker Co SAK v Qabazard, [2003] 3 All ER 501)), the third party debtor is a bank and the debt (or alleged debt) is one owing by the bank to its customer (the judgment debtor) at a branch in another country. This is an important fact because to make a garnishee or third party debt order requiring payment of the debt in this country (probably also translating it into sterling) is to impose on the bank an obligation which it has never assumed. It is not an obligation which the customer (the judgment debtor) could have asserted let alone enforced against the bank. This shows the fundamental objection to the reasoning and decision of the Court of Appeal. Nothing could be a better illustration of the disregard of this truth than the order actually made by the Court of Appeal which would convert the bank's relationship to its customer from that of banker and customer to that of claimant and respondent in restitution litigation. Nor is maintaining respect for the actual obligation of the bank an academic point. There may be a whole number of practical reasons why the bank's contract must be respected: local law, local regulation, currencies, tax, exchange control, insolvency rules, confidentiality and so on. One can also ask why is it that the judgment creditor is so reluctant to enforce his judgment in the country where the debt is payable which in the present case it is accepted that it could have easily done. But the most important point is that the order would purport to enforce a supposed right which did not exist and the judgment debtor did not possess. This is unprincipled and in the true sense exorbitant. Another way of stating the same point is that the application for the third party debt (garnishee) order lacked subject matter.

[75] The other additional observation I would make is that the possible question of subject-matter jurisdiction is always important. There are relatively few examples in English procedural law but the present case is one of them for the reasons my noble and learned friends have already given. Subject-matter jurisdiction also has a major role under the Brussels and Lugano Conventions. A garnishee or third party debt order will result in an enforceable liability in personam of the third party to the judgment creditor which is amenable to execution (Re Combined Weighing and Advertising Machine Co (1889) 43 Ch D 99; Pritchett v English and Colonial Syndicate [1899] 2 QB 428), but it does not follow that only personal jurisdiction is relevant as is illustrated by Babanaft International Co SA v Bassatne [1989] 1 All ER 433, [1990] Ch 13. This is the misunderstanding which has led to the erroneous dicta in SCF Finance Co Ltd v Masri (No 3) [1987] 1 All ER 194, [1987] QB 1028 and Interpool Ltd v Galani [1987] 2 All ER 981, [1988] QB 738 and the mistaken criticism of what Hill J said in Richardson v Richardson. It is unfortunate also that what Lord Goff said in Deutsche Schachtbau-und

- a* Tiefbohrergesellschaft mbH v Shell International Petroleum Co Ltd (t/a Shell International Trading Co) [1988] 2 All ER 833, [1990] 1 AC 295 should have been cited without having regard to what that case was about. The debt was a commercial debt with an admitted situs in England. It was properly recoverable in England and the order made by the English court would discharge the debt. The question which arose was the exceptional one whether there was a real and substantial risk that
- b* the garnishee, Shell, would nevertheless, in a foreign country, be compelled to pay the debt again. This did not raise a question of jurisdiction or lack of subject matter but more simply the, in that case, difficult question whether it was equitable in the discretion of the court to make the garnishee order. Lord Goff was not expressing a view about the question which the present appeal raises.

c LORD MILLETT.

[76] My Lords, the question in this appeal is whether an English court can properly make a garnishee order absolute (now known as a final third party debt order) in respect of a foreign debt, in this case a sum standing to the credit of the judgment debtor in an overseas bank account and so situate abroad.

- d* [77] In formulating the question in this way I have deliberately avoided using the slippery word 'jurisdiction', a word which is 'used in a variety of senses and takes its colour from its context' (Anisminic Ltd v Foreign Compensation Commission [1967] 2 All ER 986 at 994, [1968] 2 QB 862 at 889 per Diplock LJ). The expression 'the jurisdiction of the court' connotes its authority to decide a case or make an
- e* order having legal effect. But it is possible to distinguish between two different senses in which the expression is used. The first is where the jurisdiction of the court is statutory or is excluded or limited by statute. Two examples may be given. One occurs because statute has given the county court exclusive jurisdiction to make a possession order against the tenant of rent-controlled
- f* property, with the result that the ordinary jurisdiction of the High Court to make such an order is excluded. The present case provides a second example, for under the terms of the relevant rules of court the power of the court to make a third party debt order is and always has been expressly limited to the case where the third party (garnishee) is within the jurisdiction, with the result that the power of the court to make such an order against a third party who is outside the
- g* jurisdiction is excluded. In such cases, where the limits of the court's jurisdiction are imposed ab extra, the lines of demarcation are defined. The court has jurisdiction within the prescribed limits and none outside them.

- [78] But the word 'jurisdiction' is also used in a different sense to connote the territorial reach of the legislative powers of Parliament and the adjudicative
- h* powers of the court. In these cases jurisdictional limits are self-imposed as a matter of principle and in order to conform to the norms of international law. In his book Further Studies in International Law (1990) p 4, Dr Mann wrote:

- j* 'International jurisdiction is an aspect or an ingredient or a consequence of sovereignty ... laws extend so far as, but no further than, the sovereignty of the State which puts them into force nor does any legislator normally intend to enact laws which apply to or cover persons, facts, events or conduct outside the limits of his State's sovereignty. This is a principle or, perhaps one should say, an observation of universal application. Since every State enjoys the same degree of sovereignty, jurisdiction implies respect for the corresponding rights of other States. To put it differently, jurisdiction involves both the right to exercise it within the limits of the State's sovereignty and the duty to recognise the same right of other States. a

Or, to put the same idea in positive and negative form, the State has the right to exercise jurisdiction within the limits of its sovereignty, but is not entitled to encroach upon the sovereignty of other States.'

[79] The principle was succinctly stated by Lord Russell of Killowen CJ in R v Jameson [1896] 2 QB 425 at 430. In describing the canon of statutory construction that, if another construction be possible, general words in an Act of Parliament will not be construed as applying to foreigners in respect of acts done by them outside the dominions of the enacting power, he observed: b

'That is a rule based on international law by which one sovereign power is bound to respect the subjects and the rights of all other sovereign powers outside its own territory.' c

[80] The near universal rule of international law is that sovereignty, both legislative and adjudicative, is territorial, that is to say it may be exercised only in relation to persons and things within the territory of the state concerned or in respect of its own nationals. But in terms of domestic law these limits are self-imposed. A sovereign legislature has power under its domestic law to disregard them and a court of 'unlimited jurisdiction' (that is to say one which has power to decide the limits of its own jurisdiction) cannot be said to lack power to do so. Where the court observes the limits imposed by international law it may be a matter for debate whether it has no jurisdiction or has a jurisdiction which it refrains from exercising as a matter of principle. But it needs to be appreciated that, whether the court disclaims jurisdiction or merely declines to exercise it, it does so as a matter of principle and not of discretion. d

[81] I make no excuse for labouring this point, because the issue in the present case has been seen as turning on the distinction between 'jurisdiction' and 'discretion', whereas in truth it turns on the distinction between the court's duty to disclaim or decline jurisdiction as a matter of principle and its power to do so as a matter of discretion. e

[82] In the present case the debt in question consists of a sum standing to the credit of the judgment debtor in an account at a bank in Hong Kong. Like many international banks, the bank has a branch in London and is accordingly within the jurisdiction of the English court. The Court of Appeal, reversing Tomlinson J, held that a third party debt order could properly be made against it. It observed that the requirement that the third party be within the jurisdiction of the court was the only express jurisdictional requirement in the Rules, and this was satisfied. There was no requirement that the debt itself be situate here. Prima facie, therefore, the court had jurisdiction to make the order. f

[83] The Court of Appeal reasoned that in making the order it was merely exercising in personam jurisdiction against a third party within the jurisdiction. It acknowledged that the order would not have the usual consequence of extinguishing the debt owing by the third party to the judgment debtor, since the evidence showed that the courts of Hong Kong would not recognise or give effect to the English order. But it followed that the order would not have extra-territorial effect. The English court would not be entrenching on the jurisdiction of the courts of Hong Kong, since it would not order the bank to do anything in Hong Kong. It would merely order the bank to pay a sum of money to the judgment creditor in England, and leave it to the bank to recoup itself out of the g a sum standing in its books to the credit of the judgment debtor. There would be no difficulty in its doing so, since it could rely on the law of restitution (which was the same in Hong Kong as in England) and the terms of its banking contract with the judgment debtor to allow the necessary set-off. Clearly the English court ought not to make an order if there were any danger that the third party might be called upon to pay twice. But this was a matter of discretion, not jurisdiction.

b [84] My Lords, this reasoning is coherent and intelligible, and if it reflected the true nature of a third party order I would accept it. But an immediate question presents itself. What justification can there possibly be for ordering the third party to discharge the judgment debt out of its own money? The third party is a stranger to the transaction which gave rise to the judgment debt. Before the order was made it was under no obligation to the judgment creditor, with whom c it may have transacted no business and of whom it may have had no knowledge. On the Court of Appeal's analysis the order of the English court creates the obligation which it then compels the third party to satisfy. The only justification which is put forward for this extraordinary process is that the third party is indebted in a like sum to the judgment debtor. But since, as the Court of Appeal d accepts, that debt is not extinguished by the order, it is impossible to see how its existence can serve to justify the process.

[85] The order in the present case was made under RSC Ord 49, the terms of which have been set out by my noble and learned friend Lord Bingham of Cornhill and which I need not repeat. As he has shown, it was in substantially the same terms as its predecessors and can be traced back to the Common Law
e Procedure Act 1854. The editorial introduction to Ord 49 in the White Book explained the order as follows:

'If a judgment debtor is owed money by another, the judgment creditor can obtain an order that that other (referred to in O.49 as "the garnishee") should discharge the debt by payment direct to the judgment creditor.'

f An introductory note to Ord 49 described its object in the following terms:

'It should always be borne in mind that the object and intention of the process is to render "debts" as a form of property available in execution. This marks both the nature of the process and its limitations.'

g [86] These two passages indicate the true nature of a third party debt order. It is a process of execution which enables a judgment creditor to obtain satisfaction of his judgment debt out of money owed to the judgment debtor. The court does not order the third party to pay the judgment creditor out of its own money, but to discharge the debt which it owes to the judgment debtor by payment of that h debt to the judgment creditor. The subject matter of execution is a chose in action, which like land cannot be seized; but the procedure is modelled on the process of obtaining execution against land with such modifications as are necessary to reflect the difference in the nature of the asset. As in the case of land execution is effected in two stages. The first stage takes the form of an order nisi
j (or interim order) which creates a charge on the asset to be executed against and gives the judgment creditor priority over other claimants to the asset; and the second stage takes the form of an order absolute (or final order) which brings about the realisation of the asset and the payment of the proceeds to the judgment creditor.

[87] That this is the nature of the process appeared plainly from the wording of ss 61 and 62 of the 1854 Act. Section 61 authorised the court to order that debts owing to the judgment debtor 'be attached to answer the judgment debt'; and s 62 provided that service of the order nisi on the garnishee 'shall bind such debts in his hands'. The word 'attached' still appeared in Ord 49, r 1(2), which provided that the order nisi should have the effect of 'attaching' the debt to answer the judgment. The 'attachment' of a chose in action is the equivalent of the seizure of a tangible asset. A third party debt order 'attaches', that is to say appropriates, the debt owing to the judgment debtor to answer the judgment debt. This is the classic method of creating an equitable charge over a debt or fund. It creates a proprietary interest by way of security in the debt or fund and gives priority to the claim of the judgment creditor to have his debt paid out of the fund before all other claims against it including that of the judgment debtor himself. Order 49, r 8 provided that any payment made by the garnishee in compliance with an order absolute should operate to discharge pro tanto its liability to the judgment debtor. a

b
c

[88] Two things follow. First, a third party debt order is not an in personam order against the third party; it has proprietary consequences and takes effect as an order in rem against the debt owed by the third party to the judgment debtor. Secondly, the discharge of the debt is an integral part of the scheme of the order, which first creates and then realises a proprietary interest in the debt and makes the proceeds available to the judgment creditor. d

[89] The process has been so described in numerous authorities. In Chatterton v Watney (1881) 17 Ch D 259 at 260 Sir George Jessel MR said that the effect of a garnishee order 'is to declare the debt bound'; while Cotton LJ, rejecting the idea that the order operates to assign the debt to the judgment creditor, said (at 262) that— e

'The effect of a garnishee order is to bind the debt attached and to prevent the creditor from receiving it; and when it is made absolute it gives the judgment creditor a right to recover payment from the garnishee, and by rule 8 it is provided that payment made by the garnishee under the proceeding shall be a valid discharge to him as against the judgment debtor. There is nothing in the terms of the General Order to affect any security for the debt, it only takes away the right of the judgment debtor to receive the money and gives the judgment creditor a right to receive it.' f
g

[90] In Re General Horticultural Co, ex p Whitehouse (1886) 32 Ch D 512 at 515 Chitty J said that the effect of an order nisi 'was to give the judgment creditor execution against the debts owing to his debtor' and held that the rule was settled that the order charged only 'what the judgment debtor can himself honestly deal with'. This was clearly seen as a rule of law and not a matter of discretion. h

[91] In Rogers v Whiteley (1889) 23 QBD 236 Lindley LJ considered the case where money in the bank account included money of which the judgment debtor was trustee. That money, Lindley LJ said (at 238), could not be ordered to be paid to the judgment creditor who obtained the charging order: 'he can only obtain payment out of the debtor's own money'. j

[92] In the same case the House of Lords held that a garnishee order nisi which was unlimited in amount made against a bank attached the whole of the money in the account, and that the bank was entitled to dishonour cheques which the judgment debtor drew on the balance over and above the amount of the judgment debt. Lord Watson said ([1892] AC 118 at 122):

- a 'The effect of an order attaching "all debts" owing or accruing due by him to the judgment debtor is to make the garnishee custodian for the court of the whole funds attached; and he cannot, except at his own peril, part with any of those funds without the sanction of the court.'

Lord Morris said that on the plain meaning of the order in that case (at 123):

- b '... all debts due and owing by the above-named garnishee are attached to answer the judgment creditor's demand—that is, they are all captured for the purpose of afterwards answering that demand.'

Their Lordships observed that it would be open to the judge to frame the order so that the amount of the debts attached should be limited to an amount sufficient to answer the judgment, and that in that particular case he ought to have done so. That suggestion has been adopted in the modern form of order.

- c [93] In Galbraith v Grimshaw [1910] 1 KB 339 at 343 Farwell LJ stated in terms that a garnishee order nisi creates an equitable charge on the debt owed by the bank to the judgment debtor. In that case the judgment debtor had become bankrupt in Scotland after the making of an order nisi but before an order absolute. Farwell LJ said (at 344):

- e 'It is said that the debt is now the property of the plaintiff as the trustee in the bankruptcy of the judgment debtors; but it is property which is subject to a charge, and there is nothing in the Scotch Act which entitles the trustee to receive that property until he has paid off that charge.'

Affirming the decision of the Court of Appeal Lord MacNaghten said ([1910] AC 508 at 512) that the Scottish Court—

- f 'must take the assets of the bankrupt such as they were at [the date of the bankruptcy] and with all the liabilities to which they were then subject. The debt attached by the order nisi was at the date of the sequestration earmarked for the purpose of answering a particular claim—a claim which in due course would have ripened into a right.'

- g [94] The position would have been different had it been an English bankruptcy by reason of s 45 of the Bankruptcy Act 1883 (now s 183 of the Insolvency Act 1986). This gives an executing judgment creditor priority in the bankruptcy of the judgment debtor provided that execution is complete before the commencement of the bankruptcy. It is to be observed that s 183, like its predecessors, provides that execution against a debt is completed when the debt is received, not when the judgment debt is satisfied. The two are, of course, supposed to take place at the same time; but if the third party is compelled to satisfy the judgment debt without obtaining a release of its own indebtedness to the bankrupt, it will be at risk of having its right of recoupment reduced to a right of proof in the bankruptcy.

- j [95] In Joachimson (N) v Swiss Bank Corp [1921] 3 KB 110 at 131, [1921] All ER Rep 92 at 102 Atkin LJ repeated that service of the order nisi 'binds the debt in the hands of the garnishee—that is, it creates a charge in favour of the judgment creditor'.

[96] The two-stage process was explained by Lord Denning MR in characteristically simple language in Choice Investments Ltd v Jeromnimon (Midland Bank Ltd, garnishee) [1981] 1 All ER 225 at 226–227, [1981] QB 149 at 154–155:

‘The word “garnishee” is derived from the Norman-French. It denotes one who is required to “garnish”, that is, to furnish a creditor with the money to pay off a debt. A simple instance will suffice. A creditor is owed £100 by a debtor. The debtor does not pay. The creditor gets judgment against him for the £100. Still the debtor does not pay. The creditor then discovers that the debtor is a customer of a bank and has £150 at his bank. The creditor can get a “garnishee” order against the bank by which the bank is required to pay into court or direct to the creditor, out of its customer’s £150 [my emphasis], the £100 which he owes to the creditor. There are two steps in the process. The first is a garnishee order nisi. Nisi is Norman-French (sic). It means “unless”. It is an order upon the bank to pay the £100 to the judgment creditor or into court within a stated time, unless there is some sufficient reason why the bank should not do so. Such reason may exist if the bank disputes its indebtedness to the customer for some reason or other ... On making the payment, the bank gets a good discharge from its indebtedness to its own customer—just as if he himself directed the bank to pay it. If it is a deposit on seven-days’ notice, the order nisi operates as the notice.’

[97] These passages are inconsistent with the notion that the order merely operates in personam against the person of the judgment creditor and has no effect upon the debt itself; many of the cases would have been decided differently if this were the case. A third party debt order requires the third party to pay the debt it owes to the judgment debtor to the judgment creditor instead—which has no adverse consequences to it—not merely to pay a sum equal to the debt out of its own pocket, which could be seriously prejudicial to its interests. This is what justifies the order, as Lindley LJ explained in Pritchett v English and Colonial Syndicate [1899] 2 QB 428 at 433:

‘It is quite true that before that order was made there was no debt owing by [the third party] to [the judgment creditor]: the debt was owing by [the judgment debtor]; and the order is, in substance, not an order to pay a debt, but an order on the [third party] to hand over something in their hands belonging to [the judgment debtor] to [the judgment creditor].’

The discharge of the debt owed by the third party to the judgment debtor is not, therefore, merely a fortunate consequence of the order but a necessary and integral part of it. It is what justifies the making of the order and makes it a process of execution against the assets of the judgment debtor.

[98] If the debt is situate and payable overseas, however, it is beyond the territorial reach of our courts. The books contain many statements to this effect. In Ellis v M’Henry (1871) LR 6 CP 228 at 234 Bovill CJ said:

‘In the first place, there is no doubt that a debt or liability arising in any country may be discharged by the laws of that country, and that such a discharge, if it extinguishes the debt or liability, and does not merely interfere with the remedies or course of procedure to enforce it, will be an effectual answer to the claim, not only in the courts of that country, but in every other country. This is the law of England, and is a principle of private international law adopted in other countries ... Secondly, as a general proposition, it is also true that the discharge of a debt or liability by the law of a country other than that in which the debt arises, does not relieve the debtor in any other country ...’

a [99] Time and again in the early nineteenth century the English courts held that a debt payable in England was not discharged by a foreign bankruptcy. In Smith v Buchanan (1800) 1 East 6 at 11, 102 ER 3 at 5 Kenyon CJ expostulated:

b 'It might as well be contended that if the State of Maryland had enacted that no debts due from its own subjects to the subjects of England should be paid, the plaintiff would have been bound by it. This is the case of a contract lawfully made by a subject in this country, which he resorts to a Court of Justice to enforce; and the only answer given is that a law has been made in a foreign country to discharge these defendants from their debts on condition of their having relinquished all their property to their creditors. But how is that an answer to a subject of this country suing on a lawful contract made here? How can it be pretended that he is bound by a condition to which he has given no assent either express or implied?'

c [100] Before the present case a garnishee order has been sought against a foreign debt in only two reported cases, and in neither case was the application successful. In Martin v Nadel (Dresdner Bank, garnishees) [1906] 2 KB 26, [1904-7] d All ER Rep 827 the order was sought against the London branch of a German bank where the judgment debtor maintained an account. The application was refused. Vaughan Williams LJ said ([1906] 2 KB 26 at 29):

e 'There can be no doubt that under the rules of international law the Dresdner Bank could not set up, in an action in Berlin, the execution levied in this country in respect to this debt. If we consider the converse case it is clear, to my mind, that we should take that view of a similar transaction occurring abroad.'

Stirling LJ said ([1906] 2 KB 26 at 31):

f 'Mr Dicey, at p 318 of his treatise on the Conflict of Laws, points out the rule of law that debts or choses in action are generally to be looked upon as situate in the country where they are properly recoverable or can be enforced. On the facts of this case the debt of the bank to Nadel would be properly recoverable in Germany. That being so, it must be taken that the order of this court would not protect the bank from being called on to pay the debt a second time.'

g [101] In Richardson v Richardson (National Bank of India Ltd, garnishee) [1927] P 228, [1927] All ER Rep 92, where a garnishee order was sought against bank accounts in Kenya and Tanganyika. Hill J refused to make the order, holding that he had no jurisdiction to make it. The debts, he said, 'cannot be made the subject of a garnishee order, for they are not a debt recoverable within the jurisdiction'.

h [102] Martin v Nadel was distinguished in Swiss Bank Corp v Boehmische Industrial Bank [1923] 1 KB 673 because the debt was payable in England. Bankes LJ explained that the distinction was critical (at 678-679):

j 'The decision of that question depends upon where the debt sought to be attached is situate. If the debt is situate, or in other words if it is properly recoverable, in this country, then it would be discharged by payment under an order of our Courts and the garnishee need have no fear of being required to pay it a second time; but if the debt is situate, that is properly recoverable, in a foreign country, then it is not discharged by payment in this country under an order of the Courts of this country, and the debtor may be called upon to pay it over again in the foreign country. There is no doubt as to the effect of payment made under a garnishee order here. It is clearly a discharge pro tanto of the debt ... That was a debt situate in Berlin, being properly recoverable in Berlin. That was the debt sought to be garnished. Here the debt sought to be garnished was a debt situate in England being properly recoverable in England. In this case the debt can be properly discharged in England. In Martin v Nadel the debt could be properly discharged only in Berlin.' a

Scrutton LJ (at 680–681) referred to—

'the decision in Martin v Nadel, that the court will not make absolute a garnishee order where it will not operate to discharge the garnishee in whole or pro tanto from the debt; it will not expose him to the risk of having to pay the debt or part of it twice over. That is well established as a principle of discretion on which the court acts.' c

[103] By this time the law was regarded as settled. Whatever the theoretical extent of the court's jurisdiction, in practice it would not make a third party order where the debt was situate abroad, because (in the words of Scrutton LJ) 'it' (that is to say the order) 'will not operate to discharge the garnishee in whole or pro tanto from the debt'. d

[104] Unfortunately what had become the settled practice of the court for more than 50 years has been put in doubt in more recent cases: SCF Finance Co Ltd v Masri (No 3) [1987] 1 All ER 194, [1987] QB 1028 and Interpool Ltd v Galani [1987] 2 All ER 981, [1988] QB 738. In neither case did the question arise for decision. The former concerned a debt which was (or was treated as being) situate in England, while the latter concerned the examination of the judgment debtor under RSC Ord 48 and not the making of a garnishee order under Ord 49. In each case the Court of Appeal held that there was no requirement that the debt owing to the judgment debtor must be properly recoverable within the jurisdiction. The court would not make an order where the debt was recoverable abroad if this would expose the third party to the risk of having to pay the debt or part of it twice over, but this was a matter of discretion not jurisdiction. To resist an order the third party would have to show that the risk was a real and substantial one. In so far as Richardson v Richardson was authority to the contrary it was to be taken as no longer good law. f

[105] In Deutsche Schachtbau-und Tiefbohrgesellschaft mbH v Shell International Petroleum Co Ltd (t/a Shell International Trading Co) [1988] 2 All ER 833, [1990] 1 AC 295, which also concerned a debt situate in England, Lord Goff of Chieveley referred in passing ([1988] 2 All ER 833 at 850, [1990] 1 AC 295 at 350) to the court's 'discretionary power to make a garnishee order absolute' and said ([1988] 2 All ER 833 at 854–855, [1990] 1 AC 295 at 355) that it would be 'inequitable' to make such an order where there was 'a real risk that [the third party] may be held liable in some foreign court to pay a second time'. There is no doubt, of course, that the court's power to make an order in the case of an English debt is discretionary. The present question is different. It is whether its power to refuse an order in the case of a foreign debt is discretionary. Lord Goff was not concerned with such a question. More significantly, Lord Goff enumerated the conditions on which he would expect a foreign court to give effect to an order of the English court. One of them was that the debt was situate in England. g

[106] My Lords, I think that the more recent cases are based on a misreading of the judgments of the Court of Appeal in Martin v Nadel and the Swiss Bank case. h a It is true that in the former case Vaughan Williams LJ ([1906] 2 KB 26 at 30) refused the order on the ground that it would be 'inequitable' to order the third party to pay the money to the execution creditor when the payment 'would leave [it] still liable to an action to recover the same debt brought in a competent court' abroad; while Stirling LJ ([1906] 2 KB 26 at 31) held that it would be 'inequitable and contrary to natural justice' to make an order which 'would not protect the b [third party] from being called on to pay the debt a second time'. In the latter case Scrutton LJ ([1923] 1 KB 673 at 681) put the matter as a 'principle of discretion on which the court acts' in one passage, but he said elsewhere (at 683) that Martin v Nadel was a case where 'the debt was not an English debt and was not one on which the English courts could exercise jurisdiction'.

c [107] But it is not just a matter of language. The reasoning in those cases does not support the gloss which has been put upon them. The judgments were directed to the territorial reach of the court's jurisdiction, and were founded on the rule of international law that a debt can be discharged only by the law of the place where it is recoverable. There was no attempt to evaluate the risk that the third party might be compelled to pay twice. It was enough that the English court could not itself protect the third party and discharge the debt by the force d of its own order. In Martin v Nadel Vaughan Williams LJ placed reliance on the statement of Channell B giving the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber in Wood v Dunn (1866) LR 2 QB 73 at 80 that—e 'the law will never compel a person to pay a sum of money a second time which he had paid once under the sanction of a court having competent jurisdiction ...' (My emphasis.)

[108] This is an important qualification. Just as the English court would not regard a foreign court as being a court of competent jurisdiction to discharge a debt recoverable here, so a foreign court would not regard our court as

f competent to discharge a debt recoverable there; and that was sufficient in itself to preclude the making of the order in respect of a foreign debt. Although in places this was described as a matter of discretion and in other places as a matter of principle, I think that the rationale was based on principle.

[109] However that may be, I have no doubt that the issue should be regarded as one of principle. Our courts ought not to exercise an exorbitant jurisdiction contrary to generally accepted norms of international law and expect a foreign court to sort out the consequences. I do not share the Court of Appeal's confidence that the bank would have a restitutionary remedy under the law of Hong Kong. The cases indicate that it would not have such a remedy under English law in the converse case; compulsion of law connotes compliance with h the order of a court of competent jurisdiction. It cannot safely be assumed that a foreign court would regard compliance with an order of a court whose jurisdiction it did not recognise as a sufficient basis for a restitutionary claim. Nor do I understand how a bank can properly debit a customer's account if it is not authorised to do so by the law which governs the account.

j [110] But it goes further than this. A restitutionary claim normally yields a personal remedy not a proprietary one. If the third party debt order does not have extra-territorial effect in the place where the account is kept, then the account itself is not affected by the order. Such an order cannot give priority in the judgment debtor's bankruptcy or over other execution creditors in the foreign jurisdiction. Indeed, having regard to the terms of s 183 of the Insolvency Act 1986, I do not see how it would prevail even against an English bankruptcy.

The order must, as the Court of Appeal appreciated, operate in personam and compel the third party to make payment out of its own money with only such rights of recourse against the judgment debtor as the foreign court or the English law of bankruptcy may allow. a [111] But this would not be to execute the judgment against the assets of the judgment debtor. It would not be a process of execution at all. As I have explained, the discharge of the debt owed by the third party to the judgment debtor is not merely a normal consequence of the order but the critical feature which makes the process one of execution. If the court cannot discharge the debt by force of its own order, it cannot make the order. If the debt is situate abroad, the court should not seek to evaluate the risk of the third party being compelled to pay twice. The only relevant question is whether the foreign court would regard the debt as automatically discharged by the order of the English court. Since this would be most unusual, it would be for the judgment creditor to establish. b

c

[112] I wish to add one thing more. RSC Ord 49 has now been replaced by CPR Pt 72, which is cast in more modern language. It is common ground that, as the editorial introduction states, the basic purpose of the rule remains unchanged. Unfortunately all reference to attachment has been dropped, and there is no longer any indication that the order has proprietary consequences. The words which formerly created an equitable charge at the interim stage have been replaced by a power to grant an injunction, which is normally a personal remedy. The straightforward language of Pt 72 is deceptive. Its true nature cannot easily be understood without a knowledge of its history and antecedents. I do not, with respect, regard this as an altogether satisfactory state of affairs. d
e

[113] For these reasons, and for the further reasons contained in the speeches of my noble and learned friends Lord Bingham of Cornhill and Lord Hoffmann, I would allow the appeal, set aside the order of the Court of Appeal, and dismiss the application for a garnishee order. f

Appeal allowed.

Kate O'Hanlon Barrister.

a Kuwait Oil Tanker Co SAK and another v Qabazard and another

[2003] UKHL 31

b HOUSE OF LORDS

LORD BINGHAM OF CORNHILL, LORD NICHOLLS OF BIRKENHEAD, LORD HOFFMANN, LORD HOBHOUSE OF WOODBOROUGH AND LORD MILLETT

17–19 MARCH, 12 JUNE 2003

c Execution – Third party debt order – Debts owing or accruing from foreign judgment debtors – Third party bank incorporated and registered in Switzerland but having place of business in England – Judgment debtors having accounts with third party bank in London and Switzerland – Whether court having jurisdiction to make third party debt order final – Civil Jurisdiction and Judgments Act 1982, s 3A, Sch 3C, art 16(5).

d Judgment was given against the judgment debtor in the Commercial Court in 1998. An appeal was dismissed in 2000. Since then the judgment creditor had been trying to find assets of the judgment debtor against which to execute. The judgment creditor suspected that the judgment debtor might have money in accounts at a branch of the third party bank. On an application by the judgment creditor for a third party debt order to be made absolute, the judge said it was e clear that the relevant accounts, if any, were in Switzerland. The third party argued that the court had no jurisdiction to make a third party debt order (i) because of the provisions of art 16(5)^a of the Convention on Jurisdiction and the Enforcement of Judgments in Civil and Commercial Matters 1988 (the Lugano Convention) (as set out in Sch 3C to the Civil Jurisdiction and Judgments Act 1982), to which Switzerland and the United Kingdom were parties; and f (ii) because it would be inequitable to make a third party debt order which would have the consequence of requiring the third party to pay the judgment creditor any money which might be standing to the credit of the judgment debtor in Switzerland, since it would be at risk of having to pay twice. The judge said that on balance he did not think that the Lugano Convention deprived him of g jurisdiction, but that there was a real risk that the third party would be exposed to proceedings by the judgment debtor and to other sanctions under Swiss law. He therefore dismissed the application and discharged the interim third party debt order. The judgment creditor appealed. The Court of Appeal held that art 16(5) was no obstacle to the exercise of the jurisdiction as the place where the h third party debt order was being enforced was England. On the question whether the third party was likely to have to pay twice, the court remitted the matter to the judge for further consideration as to whether Swiss law would recognise a restitutionary claim which the third party would be able to set off against a claim for payment of the debt. The third party appealed.

j Held – (1) It was not correct to characterise the third party debt order as a claim in personam made against the third party in England. It was enforcement of the judgment in rem against the debt, which in the instant case was situated in Switzerland. Article 16(5) therefore conferred exclusive jurisdiction on Switzerland (see [5]–[8], [16], [18]–[20], below).

a Article 16(5), so far as material, is set out at [4], below

(2) The Swiss debts, if any, were foreign debts and would not be discharged by compliance with the English order. Accordingly, the judge's order discharging the third party debt order would be restored (see [8], [17]–[20], below); Société Eram Shipping Co Ltd v Compagnie Internationale de Navigation [2003] 3 All ER 465 applied. a

Decision of the Court of Appeal [2002] 1 All ER (Comm) 351 reversed. b

Notes

For third party debt orders, see 17(1) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) paras 251–266.

For the Civil Jurisdiction and Judgments Act 1982, Sch 3C, art 16(5), see 11 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2000 reissue) 1210. c

Cases referred to in opinions

AS-Autoteile Service GmbH v Malhé Case 220/84 [1985] ECR 2267, ECJ.

Babanaft International Co SA v Bassatne [1989] 1 All ER 433, [1990] Ch 13, [1989] 2 WLR 232, CA. d

Denilauler v Snc Couchet Frères Case 125/79 [1980] ECR 1553, ECJ.

Reichert v Dresdner Bank AG Case C-261/90 [1992] ECR I-2149, ECJ.

Société Eram Shipping Co Ltd v Compagnie Internationale de Navigation [2003] UKHL 30, [2003] 3 All ER 465, [2003] 3 WLR 21; rvsg [2001] EWCA Civ 1317, [2001] 2 All ER (Comm) 721. e

Cases also referred to in list of authorities

Airbus Industrie GIE v Patel [1998] 2 All ER 257, [1999] 1 AC 119, [1998] 2 WLR 686, HL. f

Baltic Shipping Co v Translink Shipping Ltd and Translink Pacific Shipping Ltd [1995] 1 Lloyd's Rep 673.

Bank of China v NBM LLC [2001] EWCA Civ 1933, [2002] 1 All ER 717, [2002] 1 WLR 844. g

Camdex International Ltd v Bank of Zambia (No 3) [1997] CLC 714, CA.

Chase Manhattan Bank NA v FDC Co Ltd [1985] 2 HKC 470, Hong Kong CA.

Chatterton v Watney (1881) 17 Ch D 259, CA.

Choice Investments Ltd v Jeromnimon (Midland Bank Ltd, garnishee) [1981] 1 All ER 225, [1981] QB 149, [1981] 2 WLR 80, CA. h

Colquhoun v Brooks (1888) 21 QBD 52, CA; affd (1889) 14 App Cas 493, [1886–90] All ER Rep 1063, HL.

Damayanti Kantilal Doshi v Indian Bank [1999] 4 SLR 1, Sing CA.

Deutsche Schachtbau- und Tiefbohrgesellschaft mbH v Ras Al Khaimah National Oil Co [1987] 2 All ER 769, [1990] 1 AC 295, [1987] 3 WLR 1023, CA; rvsd [1988] 2 All ER 833, [1990] 1 AC 295, [1988] 3 WLR 230, HL. i

Ellis v M'Henry (1871) LR 6 CP 228.

Galbraith v Grimshaw [1910] 1 KB 339, CA; affd [1910] AC 508, [1908–10] All ER Rep 561, HL.

General Horticultural Co, Re, ex p Whitehouse (1886) 32 Ch D 512.

Interpool Ltd v Galani [1987] 2 All ER 981, [1988] QB 738, [1987] 3 WLR 1042, CA. j

Joachimson (N) v Swiss Bank Corp [1923] 3 KB 110, [1921] All ER Rep 92, CA.

Kuwait Oil Tanker Co SAK v Qabazard [2002] EWCA Civ 34, [2002] 1 All ER (Comm) 351.

Liberian Insurance Agency Inc v Mosse [1977] 2 Lloyd's Rep 560.

Libyan Arab Foreign Bank v Bankers Trust Co [1989] 3 All ER 252, [1989] QB 728, [1989] 3 WLR 314.

- a MacKinnon v Donaldson Lufkin & Jenrette Securities Corp [1986] 1 All ER 653, [1986] Ch 482, [1986] 2 WLR 453.
- Martin v Nadel (Dresdner Bank, garnishees)* [1906] 2 KB 26, [1904–7] All ER Rep 827, CA.
- Owens Bank Ltd v Bracco (No 2)* Case C-129/92 [1994] 1 All ER 336, [1994] QB 509, [1994] 2 WLR 759, [1994] ECR I-117, ECJ.
- Power Curber International Ltd v National Bank of Kuwait SAK* [1981] 3 All ER 607, [1981] 1 WLR 1233, CA.
- b Pritchett v English and Colonial Syndicate [1899] 2 QBD 428, CA.
- R v Grossman* (1981) 73 Cr App R 302, CA.
- Richardson v Richardson (National Bank of India Ltd, garnishees)* [1927] P 228, [1927] All ER Rep 92.
- c Rogers v Whiteley (1889) 23 QBD 236, CA; affd [1892] AC 118, [1891–4] All ER Rep 682, HL.
- Rossano v Manufacturers Life Insurance Co Ltd* [1962] 2 All ER 214, [1963] 2 QB 352, [1962] 3 WLR 157.
- SCF Finance Co Ltd v Masri (No 3) (Masri, garnishee)* [1987] 1 All ER 194, [1987] QB 1028, [1987] 2 WLR 81, CA.
- d Soinco SACI and Eural KFT v Novokuznetsk Aluminium Plant (No 2) [1998] 2 Lloyd's Rep 346, CA.
- Swiss Bank Corp v Boehmische Industrial Bank* [1923] 1 KB 673, CA.
- Tai Hing Cotton Mill Ltd v Liu Chong Hing Bank Ltd* [1985] 2 All ER 947, [1986] AC 80, [1985] 3 WLR 317, PC.
- e Vinall v De Pass [1892] AC 90, HL.
- Zoneheath Associates Ltd v China Tianjin International Economic and Technical Co-operative Corp* [1994] CLC 348.

Appeal

- f UBS AG appealed with the permission of the Appeal Committee of the House of Lords given on 1 July 2002 from the order of the Court of Appeal (Peter Gibson, Laws and Longmore LJ) on 25 January 2002 ([2002] 1 All ER (Comm) 351) allowing the appeal of the judgment creditors, Kuwait Oil Tanker Co SAK and Sitka Shipping Inc (KOTC), from the order of Langley J on 23 March 2001 ([2001] IL Pr 719) whereby he decided not to make absolute a garnishee order (now a third party debt order) against the London branch of UBS AG in respect of accounts held by the judgment debtors, Hassan Ali Hassan Qabazard and Abdul Fattah Al-Bader. The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Hoffmann.

Laurence Rabinowitz QC (instructed by Allen & Overy) for UBS.

- h Mark Hoyle and David Holloway (instructed by Waterson Hicks) for KOTC.
- The judgment debtors did not appear.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

- j 12 June 2003. The following opinions were delivered.

LORD BINGHAM OF CORNHILL.

[1] My Lords, I gratefully adopt and need not repeat the account given by my noble and learned friend Lord Hoffmann of the facts, history and issues in this appeal.

[2] For reasons given by the House in Société Eram Shipping Co Ltd v Compagnie Internationale de Navigation [2003] UKHL 30, [2003] 3 All ER 465 I think it clear that the English court had no jurisdiction to make a garnishee order absolute in this case. Had the matter been one of discretion there were strong reasons for not making such an order, and Langley J was right to decline to do so. a

[3] This case, however, differs from the Société Eram case in one significant respect: that the United Kingdom is a party to the Lugano Convention on Jurisdiction and the Enforcement of Judgments in Civil and Commercial Matters 1988 (as set out in Sch 3C to the Civil Jurisdiction and Judgments Act 1982), incorporated into English law by s 3A of the Civil Jurisdiction and Judgments Act 1982 as amended (the Lugano Convention), and Switzerland (where the chose in action which the judgment creditors seek to attach is situated) is also a party. Thus the question of jurisdiction to make the order sought must be considered not simply as one of English law or private international law as applied in England and Wales but as one governed, or potentially governed, by obligations binding on the United Kingdom by virtue of international convention. b
c

[4] Two provisions of the Lugano Convention are relevant. First, art 16(5) confers 'exclusive jurisdiction, regardless of domicile ... in proceedings concerned with the enforcement of judgments' on 'the courts of the Contracting State in which the judgment has been or is to be enforced'. Secondly, art 19 provides: d

'Where a court of a Contracting State is seised of a claim which is principally concerned with a matter over which the courts of another Contracting State have exclusive jurisdiction by virtue of Article 16, it shall declare of its own motion that it has no jurisdiction.' e

Thus if the order which the judge was asked to make in this case involved the enforcement of a judgment he had no choice but to accept jurisdiction if the United Kingdom was the contracting state in which the judgment was to be enforced or renounce jurisdiction in favour of Switzerland if it was not. f

[5] The opinions of the House in the Société Eram case indicate that Switzerland is the state in which enforcement will take place because it is there that the debt is situated upon which it is sought to execute. English authority points towards that conclusion: see, for example, Babanaft International Co SA v Bassatne [1989] 1 All ER 433 at 446, 454, [1990] Ch 13 at 35, 46. While the House was referred to no foreign authority which could be said to show international endorsement of that approach, such material as there is appears to support it rather than otherwise. g

[6] In his authoritative report on the Brussels Convention on Jurisdiction and the Enforcement of Judgments in Civil and Commercial Matters 1968 (as set out in Sch 1 to the 1982 Act) (the Brussels Convention) (OJ 1979 C59 p 1), Mr Jenard commented (p 36) on art 16(5) of that convention (which is in the same terms in the Lugano Convention) in these terms: h

'Enforcement of judgments

Article 16(5) provides that the courts of the State in which a judgment has been or is to be enforced have exclusive jurisdiction in proceedings concerned with the enforcement of that judgment. What meaning is to be given to the expression "proceedings concerned with the enforcement of judgments"? It means those proceedings which can arise from "recourse to force, constraint or distraint on movable or immovable property in order to ensure the effective implementation of judgments and authentic instruments". Problems arising out of such proceedings come within the exclusive j a jurisdiction of the courts for the place of enforcement. Provisions of this kind appear in the internal law of many Member States.'

The recourse to which the author refers would, on facts such as those here, take place in Switzerland. The judgment of the European Court of Justice in Denilauler v Sno-Couchet Frères Case 125/79 [1980] ECR 1553 was not directed to the interpretation of art 16(5), but the observations (at 1570 (para 16)) would apply with added force to execution:

c 'The courts of the place or, in any event, of the Contracting State, where the assets subject to the measures sought are located, are those best able to assess the circumstances which may lead to the grant or refusal of the measures sought or to the laying down of procedures and conditions which the plaintiff must observe in order to guarantee the provisional and protective character of the measures ordered.'

The opinion of the Advocate General (Lenz) in AS-Autoteile Service GmbH v Malhé Case 220/84 [1985] ECR 2267 at 2271 was to similar effect:

d 'Furthermore, the particular areas which fall under Article 16, certain disputes regarding tenancies, companies, registers, industrial property and the enforcement of judgments, are matters which, because of their particular difficulty or complexity, require that the court having jurisdiction should be particularly familiar with the relevant national law.'

e Reichert v Dresdner Bank AG Case C-261/90 [1992] ECR I-2149 was a case concerned with art 16(5) of the Brussels Convention, among other articles. In the course of its judgment the European Court of Justice said (at 2182 (para 26)):

f 'From that point of view it is necessary to take account of the fact that the essential purpose of the exclusive jurisdiction of the courts of the place in which the judgment has been or is to be enforced is that it is only for the courts of the Member State on whose territory enforcement is sought to apply the rules concerning the action on that territory of the authorities responsible for enforcement.'

g It would appear that very much the same considerations of principle, comity and convenience as underlie the English law are reflected in the jurisprudence on the Brussels and Lugano Conventions also.

[7] I would accordingly allow the appeal and make the order which Lord Hoffmann proposes.

h LORD NICHOLLS OF BIRKENHEAD.

[8] My Lords, I have had the opportunity of reading in draft the speeches of my noble and learned friends Lord Bingham of Cornhill and Lord Hoffmann. I agree that, for the reasons they give, this appeal should be allowed.

j LORD HOFFMANN.

[9] My Lords, Mr Qabazard conspired with others to defraud the Kuwait Oil Tanker Co SAK and Sitka Shipping Inc (KOTC) of large sums of money. On 16 November 1998 Moore-Bick J gave judgment against him for over $US130m. An appeal was dismissed in May 2000 ([2000] 2 All ER (Comm) 271). Since then, KOTC have been trying to find assets of Mr Qabazard against which to execute. By December 2000 they had found and recovered a mere £140,000.

[10] Ten years earlier Mr Qabazard, in his own name and also under an alias, maintained accounts with UBS AG (UBS, formerly Union Bank of Switzerland) in London and Geneva. Documents obtained by KOTC showed that in November 1990 he transferred $US34.5m from his London account to his Swiss account. KOTC suspected that he might still have money in accounts at one or other of the branches of UBS. On 19 December 2000 KOTC issued an application under RSC Ord 49, r 2 for a garnishee order in respect of all debts due from UBS to Mr Qabazard. On 21 December 2000 Tomlinson J made an order nisi under r 1(2) calling upon UBS to show cause as to why the order should not be made absolute. The order nisi was served upon UBS at its branch office in London. UBS responded with a witness statement by its legal counsel saying that: (1) the London branch held no account in the name of Mr Qabazard or his alias and (2) UBS was prohibited by Swiss law from disclosing whether he had an account at a branch in Switzerland.

[11] The application to make the garnishee order absolute was heard by Langley J on 23 March 2001 ([2001] IL Pr 719). The judge said that it was clear that the relevant accounts, if any, were in Switzerland. Nothing had been found in England. So the question was whether an English court should make a garnishee order in respect of money held by the judgment debtor in a Swiss bank account.

[12] UBS argued that the court had no jurisdiction to make such an order because art 16(5) of the Lugano Convention on Jurisdiction and the Enforcement of Judgments in Civil and Commercial Matters 1988 (as set out in Sch 3C to the Civil Jurisdiction and Judgments Act 1982) (the Lugano Convention), to which Switzerland and the United Kingdom are parties, provides that 'in proceedings concerned with the enforcement of judgments, the courts of the Contracting State in which the judgment has been or is to be enforced' shall have exclusive jurisdiction. The attachment of money in a Swiss bank account was enforcement of the judgment in Switzerland and therefore within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Swiss courts.

[13] In the alternative, UBS said that it would be inequitable to make a garnishee order which had the consequence of requiring it to pay KOTC any money which might be standing to the credit of Mr Qabazard in Switzerland because UBS would be at risk of having to pay twice. RSC Ord 49, r 8 provides that payment by a garnishee under an order absolute is a valid discharge of his liability to the judgment debtor. But, under general rules of private international law, the discharge cannot affect a debt which (like money in a Swiss bank account) is neither situate in England nor governed by English law. It would not provide UBS with a defence to a claim by Mr Qabazard in a Swiss court.

[14] Langley J said that, 'on balance', he did not think that the Lugano Convention deprived him of jurisdiction. A garnishee order against UBS in London would not infringe Swiss sovereignty by applying a foreign enforcement procedure within its jurisdiction. It operated only indirectly on the Swiss account. But he accepted that on the evidence of the Swiss conflict of laws and its banking laws, there was a real risk that UBS would be exposed to proceedings by Mr Qabazard and to other sanctions under Swiss law. He therefore dismissed the application to make the garnishee order absolute and discharged it.

[15] By the time the case came before the Court of Appeal, a different constitution had decided Société Eram Shipping Co Ltd v Compagnie Internationale de Navigation [2001] EWCA Civ 1317, [2001] 2 All ER (Comm) 721, which is the subject of the other appeal in which your Lordships are giving judgment today. Following that decision, Longmore LJ, who gave the judgment of the court, held that the place where the garnishee order was being enforced was England. It was

- a there that UBS was being required to pay. Article 16(5) was therefore no obstacle to the exercise of jurisdiction. On the contrary, it conferred exclusive jurisdiction upon the English court. On the question of whether UBS was likely to have to pay twice, the Court of Appeal remitted the matter to the judge for further consideration as to whether Swiss law would recognise a restitutionary claim such as the court in the Société Eram case had considered that the garnishee would be able to set off against a claim for payment of the debt.

- b [16] My Lords, I think it is clear that neither of these reasons can stand with the judgments which have been given today in the Société Eram case ([2003] UKHL 30, [2003] 3 All ER 465). It is not correct to characterise the garnishee or third party debt order as a claim in personam made against the third party in England. It is enforcement of the judgment in rem against the debt, which in this case is situated in Switzerland. Article 16(5) therefore confers exclusive jurisdiction on Switzerland and it is understandable that UBS's Swiss law expert should have said that a Swiss court would regard the order as an infringement of its sovereignty. Indeed, the judgment of the Court of Appeal produces the extraordinary result that the courts of any member state in which UBS maintains a branch have exclusive jurisdiction under art 16(5) to make a garnishee or similar order in respect of a debt in Switzerland—a strange form of exclusivity.

- c [17] The other point is also governed by your Lordships' judgment in the Société Eram case. The Swiss debts, if any, are foreign debts and will not be discharged by compliance with the English order. So even without art 16(5), Langley J was right not to make the order.

- d [18] I would therefore allow the appeal and restore the order of Langley J discharging the garnishee order.

LORD HOBHOUSE OF WOODBOROUGH.

- e [19] My Lords, for the reasons given by my noble and learned friends Lord Bingham of Cornhill and Lord Hoffmann, I too would allow the appeal and make the order proposed.

LORD MILLETT.

- f [20] My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speeches of my noble and learned friends, Lord Bingham of Cornhill and Lord Hoffmann. I agree with them, and for the reasons they give I too would allow the appeal.

- g [21] The case is governed by the decision of your Lordships in Société Eram Shipping Co Ltd v Compagnie Internationale de Navigation [2003] UKHL 30, [2003] 3 All ER 465, but is a fortiori. The debt is situate in Switzerland, like the United Kingdom a party to the Lugano Convention on Jurisdiction and the Enforcement of Judgments in Civil and Commercial Matters 1988 (as set out in Sch 3C to the Civil Jurisdiction and Judgments Act 1982) (the Lugano Convention). The case is therefore governed by art 16(5) of the Lugano Convention, which is given the force of law in the United Kingdom by s 3A of the Civil Jurisdiction and Judgments Act 1982. In the present case, therefore, the limits of the court's jurisdiction to enforce its judgments are not a matter of self-restraint, but are imposed from without by convention and statute. Since the judgment creditor is seeking to execute a judgment against the property and not the person of the judgment debtor, and the property in question is situate in another convention state, the court is bound to decline jurisdiction.

Appeal allowed.

R v Sekhon and others

R v McFaul

R v Knights and another

[2002] EWCA Crim 2954

COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION
LORD WOOLF CJ, HOLLAND AND KEITH JJ
4, 5 NOVEMBER, 16 DECEMBER 2002

Sentence – Confiscation order – Postponement of confiscation proceedings – Whether non-compliance with statutory procedural requirements for postponement of confiscation proceedings going to court’s jurisdiction – Whether court having to specify period of postponement when deciding to postpone confiscation proceedings – Criminal Justice Act 1988, s 72A.

Where it is necessary to postpone confiscation proceedings brought under the Criminal Justice Act 1988, all that is strictly required, under s 72A^a of the Act, to give the court jurisdiction is a decision to postpone. Such a decision requires no particular form of words. When the court is considering whether to postpone confiscation proceedings and whether there are exceptional circumstances justifying a postponement extending beyond the period otherwise prescribed, the issues arising are of the same type that courts are regularly required to determine when engaged in case management, and strict compliance with procedural requirements relating to issues of that nature would not normally be expected to go to jurisdiction. Any default on the judge’s part can be satisfactorily dealt with on appeal when it is to be expected that the court will examine the circumstances and not focus on technicalities. The issue will be: what does justice require having regard to the Parliamentary code? Similarly, a failure to specify a period of postponement can be made a matter of complaint by appeal to the Court of Appeal after a confiscation order has been made, and the order can be quashed if justice so requires. However, the statement of a period of postponement is not critical for establishing jurisdiction, and the order will stand if no injustice is involved (see [37], [48], below).

R v Palmer (No 1) [2003] 1 Cr App R (S) 572 disapproved.

R v Miranda [2000] 2 Cr App R (S) 347, R v Davies [2002] 1 WLR 1806 and R v Martin [2002] 2 Cr App R (S) 122 doubted.

Notes

For confiscation orders, see 11(2) Halsbury’s Laws (4th edn reissue) para 1284.

Section 72A of the Criminal Justice Act 1988 has been repealed with effect from 24 March 2003 by the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002, s 456, Sch 11, para 17(2)(a).

Cases referred to in judgment

A-G’s Ref (No 3 of 1999) [2001] 1 All ER 577, [2001] 2 AC 91, [2001] 2 WLR 56, HL.
Brayhead (Ascot) Ltd v Berkshire CC [1964] 1 All ER 149, [1964] 2 QB 303, [1964] 2 WLR 507, DC.

^a Section 72A is set out at [11], below

- a* Liverpool Borough Bank v Turner (1861) 30 LJ Ch 379, 45 ER 715, LC.
London and Clydeside Estates Ltd v Aberdeen DC [1979] 3 All ER 876, [1980] 1 WLR 182, HL.
R v Barwick [2001] 1 Cr App R (S) 445, CA.
R v Cole [1998] All ER (D) 142, (1998) Independent, 30 April, CA.
R v Copeland [2002] EWCA Crim 736, [2002] 2 Cr App R (S) 512.
- b* R v Davies [2001] EWCA Crim 2902, [2002] 1 WLR 1806.
R v Farooki (1983) 77 Cr App R 257, CA.
R v Immigration Appeal Tribunal, ex p Jeyanthan, Ravichandran v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [1999] 3 All ER 231, [2000] 1 WLR 354, CA.
R v Kelly [2000] 2 Cr App R (S) 129, CA.
- c* R v Lingham [2001] 1 Cr App R (S) 158, CA.
R v Martin [2001] EWCA Crim 2761, [2002] 2 Cr App R (S) 122.
R v Miranda [2000] 2 Cr App R (S) 347, CA.
R v Palmer (No 1) [2002] EWCA Crim 2202, [2003] 1 Cr App R (S) 572.
R v Phillips [2001] EWCA Crim 2790, [2002] 2 Cr App R (S) 49.
R v Pisciotto [2002] EWCA Crim 1592, [2003] 1 Cr App R 68.
- d* R v Ross [2001] EWCA Crim 560, [2001] 2 Cr App R (S) 484.
R v Sheerin (1976) 64 Cr App R 68, CA.
R v Soffe (1982) 75 Cr App R 133, CA.
R v Spring Hill Prison Governor, ex p Sohi [1988] 1 All ER 424, [1988] 1 WLR 596, DC.
R v Steele, R v Shevki [2001] 2 Cr App R (S) 178, CA.
- e* R v Tugel [2000] 2 All ER 872, CA.
R v Urbanowski [1976] 1 All ER 679, [1976] 1 WLR 455, CA.

Appeals and applications for leave to appeal

- f* R v Sekhon and ors
 Daljit Singh Sekhon, Shangara Singh and Satnam Singh appealed, and Gurdev Singh Dhnoay applied for leave to appeal, against the confiscation orders made against them under the Criminal Justice Act 1988 by Judge Wood in the Crown Court at Newcastle-upon-Tyne on 9 June 1999 following their pleas of guilty in September 1998 to offences of cheating the public revenue. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.
- g*

R v McFaul

- Kevin McFaul applied for leave to appeal against the confiscation order made against him under the Drug Trafficking Act 1994 by Judge Clifton in the Crown Court at Liverpool on 10 April 2000 following his conviction on 8 November 1999 of an offence of conspiracy to supply diamorphine. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.
- h*

R v Knights and anor

- j* Richard Michael Knights and Kevin Maguire appealed against the confiscation orders made against them under the Criminal Justice Act 1988 by Judge Haworth in the Crown Court at Kingston-upon-Thames on 30 July 2001 following Knights' plea of guilty on 10 July 2000 to an offence of being knowingly concerned in dealing with goods which were chargeable with duty and had not been paid with intent to defraud, and Maguire's conviction of the same offence on 12 October 2000. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

Balbir Singh (instructed by Murria Solicitors, Birmingham) for Sekhon. a Avtar Bhatoa (instructed by Bassra Solicitors, Bradford) for Shangara Singh.
Robert Rhodes QC and Simon Taylor (instructed by Pannone & Partners, Manchester) for Satnam Singh.

Sunit Sandhu (instructed by Harbans Singh, Birmingham) for Dhnoay.

Jason Smith (instructed by Brian Jackson & Co, Liverpool) for McFaul.

Christopher Campbell-Clyne (instructed by Harkavys) for Knights. b

Jo Boothby (instructed by Clive Gomes) for Maguire.

David Perry and John Muir (instructed by the Solicitor for Customs and Excise) for the Crown in the cases of Sekhon, Shangara Singh, Satnam Singh and Dhnoay.

Michael Brompton (instructed by the Solicitor for Customs and Excise) for the Crown in the cases of Knights and Maguire. c

Cur adv vult

16 December 2002. The following judgment of the court was delivered.

LORD WOOLF CJ. d

INTRODUCTION

[1] One of the most successful weapons which can be used to discourage offences that are committed in order to enrich the offenders is to ensure that if the offenders are brought to justice, any profit which they have made from their offending is confiscated. It is therefore not surprising that Parliament has repeatedly enacted legislation designed to enable the courts to confiscate the proceeds of crime. e

[2] Regrettably a series of cases have come before the courts recently which reveal that the prosecuting authorities, including the advocates appearing for them, have been attaching far too little significance to ensuring that confiscation proceedings are effective. A series of cases have resulted in orders for the confiscation of substantial sums being set aside for the failure to adhere to procedural requirements that are often of a technical nature. f

[3] Furthermore, until Mr Perry was instructed to appear in the present cases, on behalf of the prosecution, important arguments as to the effect of non-compliance with procedural requirements were not placed before the courts. g

[4] These repeated failures on the part of prosecuting authorities should not be allowed to continue. The sort of mistakes being made are apparent from the cases to which it will be necessary to refer in this judgment which relates to appeals arising out of three prosecutions. The first prosecution is in respect of Daljit Singh Sekhon, Satnam Singh, Shangara Singh and Gurdev Singh Dhnoay. The second prosecution relates to Kevin McFaul and the third prosecution to Richard Michael Knights and Kevin Maguire. h

[5] It is convenient before turning to the circumstances of these cases to set out the statutory framework. It is also desirable to consider the large body of case law that has accumulated around that legislation. In relation to both the legislation and the case law we are indebted to Mr Perry for the account that he provided. In the description that we now provide, we rely heavily on his extremely helpful submissions. It is necessary to refer to the successive legislation because even in relation to the same trial different legislation can apply to different defendants because of the dates on which their respective provisions came into force. j

THE BACKGROUND TO THE LEGISLATION

- a* [6] The 1988 Act: an overview of the provisions. (i) The Hodgson Committee report The Profits of Crime and their Recovery (1984) made a number of recommendations which form the background to confiscation provisions in the Criminal Justice Act 1988. It is the 1988 Act as subsequently amended with which we are concerned in these appeals. (ii) The report recommended the repeal of the criminal bankruptcy order and its replacement with a sentence of confiscation designed to catch the profits of major crime. Following these recommendations, a confiscation regime was introduced in relation to drug trafficking by the Drug Trafficking Offences Act 1986. As well as including the powers of restraint and confiscation, that Act also contained a statutory assumption to the effect that a drug trafficker's assets were the proceeds of crime and therefore liable to confiscation. (iii) The 1988 Act introduced a new power to make a confiscation order in the case of certain crimes other than drug trafficking offences. The confiscation provisions in the 1988 Act, as originally enacted, applied mainly to offenders in the Crown Court and only in cases where the defendant had benefited by at least £10,000 from the offence (see s 71). In such cases the maximum amount of the confiscation order was the amount of the benefit or the extent of the realisable property, whichever was the lesser. (iv) The procedure for making a confiscation order involved the prosecution serving a notice (see s 72) and, thereafter, was subject to a procedure requiring further statements and counter-statements to establish the extent of the defendant's benefit (see s 73). (v) Section 74 provided rules for calculating the 'amount that might be realised' and contains provisions designed to defeat sham transactions. (vi) Confiscation orders were to be enforced as unpaid fines (see s 75) but it was also provided that a receiver might be appointed to realise the defendant's property in order to apply it in satisfaction of the order (see ss 80–82). (vii) The pre-trial restraint of property was provided for in ss 76–79. Two forms of order were introduced. f First, a restraint order, which may be used to prevent dealing with designated property and, secondly, the charging order which may be used to impose a charge on designated property to preserve assets for a future confiscation order. (viii) The provisions of the 1988 Act most relevant to the issues raised in these appeals are ss 71 and 72 that are in Pt VI of the Act. We refer to them initially in their unamended form.

g

SECTION 71 OF THE 1988 ACT

[7] Section 71, so far as material, provides as follows:

- h* '(1) The Crown Court and a magistrates' court shall each have power, in addition to dealing with an offender in any other way, to make an order under this section requiring him to pay such sum as the court thinks fit.

- (2) The Crown Court may make such an order against an offender where—(a) he is found guilty of any offence to which this Part of this Act applies; and (b) it is satisfied—(i) that he has benefited from that offence or from that offence taken together with some other offence of which he is convicted in the same proceedings, or which the court takes into consideration in determining his sentence, and which is not a drug trafficking offence; and (ii) that his benefit is at least the minimum amount ...

j

(4) For the purposes of this Part of this Act a person benefits from an offence if he obtains property as a result of or in connection with its commission and his benefit is the value of the property so obtained.

(5) Where a person derives a pecuniary advantage as a result of or in connection with the commission of an offence, he is to be treated for the purposes of this Part of this Act as if he had obtained as a result of or in connection with the commission of the offence a sum of money equal to the value of the pecuniary advantage. a

(6) The sum which an order made by a court under this section requires an offender to pay must be at least the minimum amount, but must not exceed—(a) the benefit in respect of which it is made; or (b) the amount appearing to the court to be the amount that might be realised at the time the order is made, whichever is the less. b

(7) For the purposes of this Part of this Act the minimum amount is £10,000 ...’ c

Thus, by reason of s 71, before a court had power to make a confiscation order the court had to be satisfied that the defendant had benefited by at least £10,000. This followed a recommendation made by the Hodgson Committee which had been in favour of limiting the power to make confiscation orders by reference to a sum of money so as to prevent its operation in impracticable small cases. d

SECTION 72 OF THE 1988 ACT

[8] Section 72, so far as material, provides:

‘(1) A court shall not make a confiscation order unless the prosecutor has given written notice to the court to the effect that it appears to him that, were the court to consider that it ought to make such an order, it would be able to make an order requiring the offender to pay at least the minimum amount. e

(2) If the prosecutor gives the court such a notice, the court shall determine whether it ought to make a confiscation order ...

(4) If the court determines that it ought to make such an order, the court shall, before sentencing or otherwise dealing with the offender in respect of the offence or, as the case may be, any of the offences concerned, determine the amount to be recovered in his case by virtue of this section and make a confiscation order for that amount specifying the offence or offences ...’ f

Under s 72(1) and (2) the procedure for making an order was dependent on the prosecution giving notice that there were likely to be sufficient assets to meet it. Where such a notice was given, the court was bound to consider the making of an order. By s 71(4) the court was required to determine the amount to be recovered and make a confiscation order before sentencing or otherwise dealing with the offender. g
h

THE CRIMINAL JUSTICE ACT 1993

[9] Part III of the Criminal Justice Act 1993 (ss 27–35) made significant changes to Pt VI of the 1988 Act. The principal changes that were made to the confiscation regime were twofold: (i) the standard of proof required to determine any question as to whether a person had benefited, and whether his benefit was at least the minimum amount and the amount to be recovered, was to be that applicable in civil proceedings (see s 71(7A) of the 1988 Act as inserted by s 27 of the 1993 Act); (ii) the court was given power to postpone a determination of the amount which might be recovered until after the court had sentenced the defendant (see s 72A of the 1988 Act as inserted by s 28 of the 1993 Act). j a [10] The power to order postponement was enacted to give the sentencing court the flexibility to sentence the offender, so that he might not be left in a state of uncertainty, before proceeding to confiscation. Under the 1988 Act in its original form (and under the Drug Trafficking Offences Act 1986 in its original form) the sentencing court was prevented from proceeding to sentence until the court had gone through the procedural steps involved in confiscation. This often b meant that sentence was adjourned for a considerable period of time in order to enable the parties to prepare and present evidence and arguments.

SECTION 72A OF THE 1988 ACT

[11] Section 72A, (in its unamended form) so far as material, provides as follows:

c (1) Where a court is acting under section 71 above but considers that it requires further information before—(a) determining whether the defendant has benefited as mentioned in s 71(2)(b)(i) above; (b) determining whether his benefit is at least the minimum amount; or (c) determining the d amount to be recovered in his case by virtue of s 72 above, it may, for the purposes of enabling that information to be obtained, postpone making that determination for such period as it may specify.

(2) More than one postponement may be made under subsection (1) above in relation to the same case.

e (3) Unless it is satisfied that there are exceptional circumstances, the court shall not specify a period under subsection (1) above which—(a) by itself; or (b) where there have been one or more previous postponements under subsection (1) above or (4) below, when taken together with the earlier specified period or periods, exceeds six months beginning with the date of conviction.

f (4) Where the defendant appeals against his conviction, the court may, on that account—(a) postpone making any of the determinations mentioned in subsection (1) above for such period as it may specify; or (b) where it has already exercised its powers under this section to postpone, extend the specified period.

g (5) A postponement or extension under subsection (1) or (4) above may be made—(a) on application by the defendant or the prosecutor; or (b) by the court of its own motion.

(6) Unless the court is satisfied that there are exceptional circumstances, any postponement or extension under subsection (4) above shall not exceed the period ending three months after the date on which the appeal is determined or otherwise disposed of.

h (7) Where the court exercises its powers under subsection (1) or (4) above, it may nevertheless proceed to sentence, or otherwise deal with, the defendant in respect of the offence or any of the offences concerned.

j (8) Where the court has so proceeded, section 72 above shall have effect as if—(a) in subsection (4), the words from “before sentencing” to “offences concerned” were omitted; and (b) in subsection (5), after “determining” there were inserted “in relation to any offence in respect of which he has not been sentenced or otherwise dealt with”.

(9) In sentencing, or otherwise dealing with, the defendant in respect of the offence, or any of the offences, concerned at any time during the specified period, the court shall not—(a) impose any fine on him; or (b) make any such order as is mentioned in s 72(5)(b) or (c) above.

(10) In this section references to an appeal include references to an application under section 111 of the Magistrates' Courts Act 1980 (statement of case by magistrates' court). a

(11) In this section, "the date of conviction" means—(a) the date on which the defendant was convicted of the offence concerned, or (b) where he was convicted in the same proceedings, but on different dates, of two or more offences which may be taken together for the purposes of subsection (2) or, as the case may be, (3) of section 71 above, the date of the latest of those convictions. b

Section 72A gave the sentencing court the power to postpone the confiscation proceedings. The court may order one or several postponements providing the total period does not exceed six months from the date of conviction, though even then that time limit can be extended if there are 'exceptional circumstances'. c

THE PROCEEDS OF CRIME ACT 1995

[12] The 1988 Act was further amended by the Proceeds of Crime Act 1995. (It had also been amended by the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994, but the amendments effected by that Act are not directly material to the issues raised in these appeals.) d

[13] Section 1 of the 1995 Act made a number of changes to s 71 of the 1988 Act and these changes may be summarised as follows: (i) a duty was placed upon the court to exercise its powers to embark upon confiscation proceedings in every case in which written notice had been given by the prosecutor; (ii) the court was given a power to institute confiscation proceedings of its own volition; (iii) the minimum figure of £10,000 was abolished. Thus, s 71(1) of the 1988 Act now provides: e

'(1) Where an offender is convicted, in any proceedings before the Crown Court or a magistrates' court, of an offence of a relevant description, it shall be the duty of the court—(a) if the prosecutor has given written notice to the court that he considers that it would be appropriate for the court to proceed under this section, or (b) if the court considers, even though it has not been given such notice, that it would be appropriate for it so to proceed, to act as follows before sentencing or otherwise dealing with the offender in respect of that offence or any other relevant criminal conduct.' f

[14] Section 2 of the 1995 Act inserted s 72AA into the 1988 Act to provide for confiscation in relation to a course of criminal conduct. g

[15] Section 3 of the 1995 Act amended s 73 of the 1988 Act (effect of provision of statement by prosecutor) and provided for the service on the court and defendant of statements from the prosecutor. h

[16] Section 4 of the 1995 Act inserted s 73A into the 1988 Act so as to empower the court to order the defendant to provide information to assist it in carrying out its functions under Pt VI of the 1988 Act.

[17] Sections 5–10 of the 1995 Act amended the 1988 Act in relation to such matters as the review and revision of confiscation orders, the enforcement of confiscation orders and the variation of confiscation orders. j

[18] Part VI of the 1988 Act came into force on 3 April 1989. The amendments made by the 1993 Act, which were of a procedural nature, came into force on 3 February 1995 (see the Criminal Justice Act 1993 (Commencement No 8) Order 1995, SI 1995/43); the amendments made by the 1995 Act came into force on 1 November 1995 (see the Proceeds of Crime Act 1995 (Commencement) Order

- a 1995, SI 1995/2650). The amendments to the 1988 Act made by the 1995 Act apply when the offences of which the accused is convicted were committed on or after 1 November 1995.

THE HUMAN RIGHTS ACT 1998

- b [19] In addition to the domestic legislation, in the Sekhon appeal there is reliance on art 6 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the 1998 Act). However, because of the conclusions which we have come to it is not necessary to deal with this issue.

THE ARGUMENT ON THE LEGISLATION

- c [20] In all the cases before us the argument turned on whether the confiscation proceedings had taken place in accordance with the procedure set out in the 1988 Act in the amended form appropriate to the particular appellant. It was only when Mr Perry came on the scene that the prosecution case was advanced in what we are satisfied is the appropriate manner by the following issues. (i) Did the confiscation proceedings take place in accordance with the procedures set out in the 1988 Act, and, in particular, did the sentencing judge properly postpone the confiscation hearing? (ii) If the confiscation proceedings did not take place in accordance with the procedures set out in the 1988 Act, were the confiscation orders in each case nevertheless lawfully made?

- e [21] Before examining the statutory provisions further, let us try to explain why the second issue is all important when considering whether a court has been deprived of jurisdiction to make a confiscation order.

(i) The starting point is that the court is seized of a general criminal jurisdiction over the proceedings. The confiscation proceedings are ancillary to the main proceedings.

- f (ii) The courts have been given by Parliament jurisdiction to make confiscation orders where a defendant has been found guilty and a defendant has benefited from the crime of which he has been found guilty.

(iii) It is in those circumstances obvious that what Parliament intends is that a confiscation order should be made by the court, if a defendant has been found guilty and has benefited from his crime, absent any indication to the contrary.

- g (iv) Parliament can make provision itself as to the procedure to be followed before a confiscation order is made or it can give the power to another body, such as a rule committee, to lay down rules of procedure. However, in criminal proceedings those rules are frequently contained in primary legislation, but they remain none the less rules of procedure.

- h (v) The purpose of rules of procedure is not usually to give or take away a court's jurisdiction. It is the substantive provisions of the legislation creating the power or duty of the court which have given the jurisdiction, here under sub-ss (1) and (2) of s 71 above. What the procedural provisions are doing is to provide a convenient and just machinery enabling the court to exercise its jurisdiction.

j (vi) The procedural provisions can be, but usually are not, conditions that have to be fulfilled to give the court jurisdiction. More usually procedural provisions do no more than: (a) enable the court if they are not complied with to make orders to require something to be done if it has not been done in accordance with the statutory provisions or (b) in the same circumstances to dismiss the proceedings.

(vii) Neither (a) nor (b) above happens automatically in the absence of the proceedings being abandoned. What is required is for the court to come to a decision (usually on the application of the prosecution or defence) to take action (a) or (b) above. What action the court takes will depend on what is just in all the circumstances.

(viii) If there is no application made (see sub-para (vii), above) but the next steps set out in the procedural provisions take place, the step that is not taken as it should have been can usually be ignored. It is no longer relevant even though Parliament has said it 'must' or 'should' be taken. This is because its objective of moving the procedure forward is no longer required. We would not regard this outcome to involve a 'waiver'.

(ix) It is because of the matters set out in sub-para (viii), above, that procedural steps usually do not go to jurisdiction. The difficulty arises because Parliament does not often expressly indicate what procedural steps are to result in proceedings becoming, in effect, a nullity if they are not taken. It is left to the courts to infer what Parliament intended to happen if a procedural requirement is not complied with. Deducing what Parliament intended can be difficult. It may be helpful if it is remembered that (a) the use of mandatory terms is far from decisive and (b) substantive provisions giving the court its jurisdiction are not to be automatically defeated in the ordinary way by non-compliance with procedural requirements unless this is necessary to achieve the statutory purpose.

[22] It is unfortunate that the second issue was not previously advanced on behalf of the Crown. Mr Perry submits there are two facets to the second issue, the first being that breaches of apparently absolute statutory requirements do not necessarily deprive the court of jurisdiction and the second is dependent on the doctrine of waiver. That doctrine plays no part in our decisions in these appeals but we recognise that in other cases it could be important.

[23] In relation to the second issue Mr Perry submits that if even the most trivial breach of an apparently absolute requirement had the effect of vitiating the relevant proceedings the consequences would be out of all proportion. Here, he relies upon Bennion on Statutory Interpretation (3rd edn, 1997) and the following statement of principle (p 31):

'Where a requirement arises under a statute, the court, charged with the task of enforcing the statute, needs to decide what consequence Parliament intended should follow from failure to implement the requirement. This is an area where legislative drafting has been markedly deficient. Drafters find it easy to use the language of command. They say that a thing "shall" be done. Too often they fail to consider the consequence when it is not done. What is not thought of by the drafter is not expressed in the statute. Yet the courts are forced to reach a decision. It would be draconian to hold that in every case failure to comply with the relevant requirement invalidates the thing done. So the courts' answer has been to devise a distinction between mandatory and directory duties.'

[24] He also refers to numerous authorities which deal with the distinction between 'mandatory and directory duties' including in relation to the time limit specified in the Crown Court Rules 1982, SI 1982/1109 (see R v Urbanowski [1976] 1 All ER 679, [1976] 1 WLR 455, R v Spring Hill Prison Governor, ex p Sohi [1988] 1 All ER 424, [1988] 1 WLR 596) and as to the time for preferring a bill of indictment in the Indictment (Procedure) Rules 1971, SI 1971/2084 (see R v Sheerin (1976)

a 64 Cr App R 68, R v Soffe (1982) 75 Cr App R 133 and R v Farooki (1983) 77 Cr App R 257).

[25] There is no doubt that difficulties for courts exist in applying the distinction between mandatory requirements, on the one hand, and directory requirements on the other. Even if the terms 'directory' and 'mandatory' are not used the problem remains of answering the question: 'What is the effect of non-compliance with procedural requirements?' What is necessary as indicated by Lord Campbell LC in Liverpool Borough Bank v Turner (1861) 30 LJ Ch 379 at 381, 45 ER 715 at 718, is 'to try to get at the real intention of the legislature, by carefully attending to the whole scope of the statute to be construed'.

c [26] In a case in which the Secretary of State had failed to apply for leave to appeal on the form prescribed by statutory instrument, the Court of Appeal (Civil Division) in the case of R v Immigration Appeal Tribunal, ex p Jeyanthan, Ravichandran v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [1999] 3 All ER 231 at 235–236, [2000] 1 WLR 354 at 359 took very much the same view in a judgment of Lord Woolf MR. What was stated is as follows:

d 'Because of what can be the very undesirable consequences of a procedural requirement which is made so fundamental that any departure from the requirement makes everything that happens thereafter irreversibly a nullity it is to be hoped that provisions intended to have this effect will be few and far between. In the majority of cases, whether the requirement is categorised as directory or mandatory, the tribunal before whom the defect is properly raised has the task of determining what are to be the consequences of failing to comply with the requirement in the context of all the facts and circumstances of the case in which the issue arises. In such a situation that tribunal's task will be to seek to do what is just in all the circumstances (see Brayhead (Ascot) Ltd v Berkshire CC [1964] 1 All ER 149, [1964] 2 QB 303 applied by the House of Lords in London and Clydeside Estates Ltd v Aberdeen DC [1979] 3 All ER 876, [1980] 1 WLR 182).'

This statement has since had the benefit of the endorsement of Lord Steyn in the House of Lords in A-G's Ref (No 3 of 1999) [2001] 1 All ER 577 at 583, [2001] 2 AC 91 at 117.

g [27] In relation to the procedural requirements which Parliament has imposed it is possible fairly readily to come to certain conclusions. These are as follows. (i) Since the 1988 Act was passed, Parliament has been attaching increasing importance to courts being in a position to make confiscation orders. For that reason it has relaxed the requirements of the order having to be made as part of the original sentencing process. In the 1988 Act in its unamended form, the court h was unable to proceed to sentence until the court had gone through the procedural steps and dealt with confiscation. The subsequent amendments gave the court power to adjourn sentencing but care was taken to specify the limits on the power to postpone its decision to order confiscation. (See s 28 of the 1993 Act and the terms of s 72A of the 1988 Act inserted by s 28.) This process was j continued by the 1995 Act which extended the court's powers. (ii) Parliament was intent on ensuring that wherever practicable the process of making a confiscation order and sentencing should be linked. It can be readily understood why Parliament should have adopted this course. After all, it is important that the defendant should know as soon as practicable what are the consequences to him of his conviction. Parliament, therefore, when it did relax the requirements did tend to require the court to be satisfied that if it was to grant a postponement or extension there were 'exceptional circumstances' to justify this (see e.g. s 72A(3) and (6)). a [28] On the other hand we suggest that it would not have been the intention of Parliament to exclude the jurisdiction of the court in relation to the making of confiscation orders because of procedural defects of a technical nature that caused no injustice to the defendant. In this context it is interesting to note that certainly this is not Parliament's intention now. The most recent legislation in this area is the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002. Section 14(11) of that Act provides: b

'A confiscation order must not be quashed only on the ground that there was a defect or omission in the procedure connected with the application for or the granting of a postponement.'

[29] We would expect a procedural failure only to result in a lack of jurisdiction if this was necessary to ensure that the criminal justice system served the interests of justice and thus the public or where there was at least a real possibility of the defendant suffering prejudice as a consequence of the procedural failure. c

[30] Having set out this general approach, it is convenient to return to the procedural requirements themselves. Here it is important to note that s 71 of the 1988 Act is dealing with the jurisdiction of the court. It does contain provisions which undoubtedly have to be complied with to give the court jurisdiction to make an order. The defendant must have been found guilty of the required offence. In addition, the court must be satisfied that the offender has benefited from the offence to the required extent. Section 72, on the other hand, is dealing with procedure and procedural requirements do not usually go to jurisdiction. d

[31] Notwithstanding the actual language of s 72(1) which read literally is mandatory in its terms, we would not regard it as likely that Parliament would, for example, be concerned to deprive the court of jurisdiction because of defects in the contents of the written notice which is required by s 72(1). The notice, which does not have to be given to the defendant, starts the procedure and avoids the court being involved in confiscation proceedings if the prosecutor thinks that the court would not be able to order the defendant to pay more than £10,000. Furthermore, once the 1995 Act was in force, this is the almost inevitable conclusion because not only was the court required to exercise its powers when a notice had been given it had power to exercise its powers of its own volition. e

[32] It seems to us that the non-jurisdictional nature of the requirements of s 72 is supported by the decision of the Court of Appeal in R v Urbanowski [1976] 1 All ER 679, [1976] 1 WLR 455. That was a case in which the court was considering s 7(4) of the Courts Act 1971 which provides: f

'The trial of a person committed by a magistrates' court ... (b) shall, unless the Crown Court has otherwise ordered, begin not later than the expiration of the prescribed period beginning with the date of his committal ...' g

[33] Rule 19 of the Crown Court Rules 1971, SI 1971/1292 prescribed a period of 56 days. Scarman LJ in giving judgment said of the subsection ([1976] 1 All ER 679 at 681, [1976] 1 WLR 455 at 458): h

'It seems to us plain that s 7(4) of the 1971 Act is primarily addressed to the Crown Court, and obliges the court to take steps to ensure that cases are begun within the prescribed period. Accordingly in our view this provision, being addressed to the court and its officials, is directory and not mandatory; j a and it follows from that view of the subsection that it is open to the Crown Court to grant an extension of time if it thinks fit after the expiration of the prescribed period.'

THE CASE LAW

b [34] Having made these general observations it is next important to look at the relevant case law. The general effect of the decisions on postponement of the confiscation proceedings can be summarised as follows: (i) the postponement of confiscation proceedings must be ordered by a judicial decision (see R v Steele, R v Shevki [2001] 2 Cr App R (S) 178, R v Ross [2001] EWCA Crim 560, [2001] 2 Cr App R (S) 484); (ii) whilst no particular form of words is required, the decision to postpone must be made manifest (R v Steele and R v Ross).

c [35] Turning to individual cases, the case which it is convenient to take first, because it contains a statement in the judgment of the court given by Judge LJ with which we would respectfully agree, is R v Cole [1998] All ER (D) 142, (1998) Independent, 30 April. It was a case where the trial judge had become ill after a difficult and complex trial. The issue was whether this constituted exceptional circumstances in parallel legislation dealing with drug trafficking. Judge LJ stated:

e '... s 3 therefore creates a convenient code which permits the court to pass an appropriate sentence before having determined whether to make a confiscation order under s 2, and simultaneously maintains the necessary control over the process which could otherwise become protracted and ultimately unfair ... The court should normally deal with a confiscation order within six months of the conviction. In exceptional circumstances this period may be exceeded. The judgment whether circumstances are exceptional or not must be made by the court considering whether to make a confiscation order, and the decision must be made before the six-month period has elapsed ... here the judge was in hospital on the date when he had indicated that he would determine the confiscation issue. Of course it might have been the defendant who was ill and unfit to attend court. For that matter it might equally have been counsel who the defendant wished to appear for him. Having studied the statutory code we do not consider that it was intended or drafted so as to preclude the listing officer making sensible arrangements for the conduct of Crown Court business, normally after discussion with the trial judge or the resident judge ...'

g [36] This subject was again addressed by Judge LJ in R v Steele [2001] 2 Cr App R (S) 178 to which we have already referred (see [34], above). This is a case also decided under the Drug Trafficking Act 1994 rather than under the 1988 Act. However, Judge LJ again sets out what should be the general approach which is relevant to the similar statutory provisions we are considering. He said (at 194):

j 'Confiscation orders should normally form part of the ordinary sentencing process. For lack of appropriate information, this will often be impractical. If the conditions in section 3(1) or section 3(4) are satisfied, and within six months of conviction, the court may decide that the determination should be postponed. Unless the circumstances are exceptional this should not extend beyond six months after conviction. These decisions involve the court's discretion, judicially exercised when the statutory conditions are present, taking full account of the preferred statutory sequence as well as the express direction in the statute that save in exceptional circumstances confiscation determinations should not be postponed for more than six months after conviction. So far as practicable, adjournments which would have the effect of postponing the determination beyond that period, or in exceptional cases, beyond the period envisaged when the decision to postpone was made, should be avoided. Nevertheless when the circumstances in an individual case compel an adjournment which would have this effect, then whether or not the information gathering process has been completed, it may be ordered, for example, to take account of illness on one side or the other, or the unavailability of the judge, without depriving a subsequent order for confiscation of its validity.’ a

b

[37] We refer to both of the judgments of Judge LJ. As it appears to us, they make it clear that the consideration of whether there should be a postponement of the confiscation proceedings and whether there are exceptional circumstances involve just the type of issue that courts regularly are required to determine when engaged in case management. The strict compliance with procedural requirements relating to issues of this nature would not normally be expected to go to jurisdiction. The provisions tell the judge the order in which he must deal with matters and the considerations he must have in mind. Any default by the judge can be satisfactorily dealt with on appeal when it is to be expected that the court would examine the circumstances and not focus on technicalities. The issue would be, what did justice require, having regard to the Parliamentary code. The court would take into account, as Mr Campbell-Clyne on behalf of Knights urges, ‘the draconian’ nature of the proceedings so far as the defendant is concerned. c
d
e

[38] We turn next to R v Ross [2001] 2 Cr App R (S) 484, in which the Court of Appeal (Potter LJ, Stanley Burnton J and Judge Sir Rhys Davies QC (the Recorder of Manchester)) considered the situation of a judge who had passed sentence and then postponed the confiscation proceedings under the 1994 Act. The confiscation order was quashed. Potter LJ stated (at [18]): f

‘In our judgment, section 2 and section 3 of the Act lay down a clear and mandatory sequence to be followed in a case such as the present when a defendant appears before the Crown Court to be sentenced in respect of one or more drug trafficking offences, and either the prosecution makes a request within section 2(i)(a), or the court considers it is appropriate to proceed under section 2. We say mandatory because of the first five words of section 2(2) [“The court shall first determine ...”].’ g

He went on to state (at [25]):

‘... section 3(1) confers a discretion on the court to postpone making a determination. It is only if that discretion is exercised, by making an order for the postponement of a determination, that sections 3(7) and (8) permit sentence to be passed before the determination is made ... the exercise of that discretion requires a judicial decision. No particular form of words is required, but the decision to postpone must be made manifest and, in particular, it must specify the period of the postponement, which cannot go beyond six months from the date of conviction unless the circumstances are exceptional.’ h
j

[39] This case is in part inconsistent with what we have said earlier. However, the court dealt with the question of whether the language was mandatory but did not ask itself what was the effect of non-compliance with the language. That a court did not have the benefit of Mr Perry's argument. Even this authority requires no more than that there should be a decision made to postpone the confiscation hearing. The nature of the decision and its form are not treated as critical. We understand Potter LJ as indicating that as long as there is a decision to postpone that is all that matters. In other words the decision gives the court jurisdiction. Other matters go to the nature of that decision and could appropriately be dealt with on appeal. R v Phillips [2001] EWCA Crim 2790, [2002] 2 Cr App R (S) 49 can be explained in the same way.

[40] The next case to which we should refer is R v Davies [2001] EWCA Crim 2902, [2002] 1 WLR 1806. In that case it was decided that when ordering a postponement under s 3 of the 1994 Act it is necessary to specify the period of the postponement. In giving the judgment of the court, Pitchford J, explaining the statutory scheme under the 1994 Act, stated:

[26] Before sentence is passed the court must, if asked by the prosecution, or of its own motion if it considers it appropriate, act under section 2 to determine whether the defendant has benefited from drug trafficking, and, if so, determine the amount to be recovered from the defendant ...

[27] Where the court is acting under section 2 but considers it requires further information before making either determination, it may postpone the determination for such period as it may specify ...

[28] The second use of the word "may" in section 3(1) means, in this context, "must" ... In our view, the mandatory nature of the requirement is established by reading section 3(1) together with section 3(3) ...

[29] The plain purpose of the section is to place time limits on the determination proceedings. Had Parliament intended merely to set a period within which, subject to exceptional circumstances, the determination must be made, it could, and in our view would, have explicitly so provided. The whole section, particularly subsection (3), is structured upon the assumption that the setting of a period or periods for postponement will take or has taken place. Without the setting of a period under subsection (1), the limitation imposed by subsection (3) does not bite. It follows that either Parliament intended that there should be no limitation when the court chooses not to specify the period or it intended that the court should specify a period in every case. In our view the latter construction is inevitable.

[30] In expressing its decision under section 3(1), no particular form of words is required, provided that the decision of the court is made before sentence and that the decision of the court is manifest.'

[41] This reasoning of Pitchford J is impeccable but it does not follow that, if this reasoning is correct, Parliament intended that the setting of the period of postponement was a condition precedent to the court's jurisdiction. We would respectfully doubt the correctness of this decision if it means the court inevitably is without jurisdiction because of a failure to specify a date to which there is to be a postponement even if the application in fact is heard within the required period.

[42] We question whether if the argument advanced before us by Mr Perry had been advanced the decision would have been the same. The trial court, or failing the trial court, the appeal court could have fully protected the interests of the defendant. If the confiscation order was made within the period permitted by the 1994 Act we would suggest it is unnecessary by implication to read a requirement into the statutory code which that statutory code does not specify.

[43] In this connection we would prefer the approach of Rix LJ in R v Copeland [2002] EWCA Crim 736, [2002] 2 Cr App R (S) 512. In that case it was held by the Court of Appeal (Rix LJ, Leveson J and Sir Richard Tucker) that a failure to specify a period of postponement did not deprive the Crown Court of jurisdiction to make a confiscation order. The Court of Appeal referred to the decision in R v Ross and stated (at [17]):

‘We are troubled by the reference in Ross to the fact that the court must specify the period in light of the fact that the statute makes no such requirement and that it did not, as we would observe, provide that the court shall specify such a period. The decision in Ross was of course based on facts very different to the facts of the present case. In that case before sentence the Crown originally said there would be no inquiry. It subsequently said that there might be a request for an inquiry and the whole matter was left in the air whether there would be any inquiry at all. That is quite different from the facts of the present case.’

[44] However, in R v Pisciotto [2002] EWCA Crim 1592, [2003] 1 Cr App R 68 (Keene LJ, Davis J and Judge John Griffith Williams (the Recorder of Cardiff)) it was decided that a failure to specify the period of the postponement was fatal to the making of a confiscation order and the reasoning in R v Davies was to be preferred to the reasoning in R v Copeland. We respectfully disagree and would prefer the reasoning in R v Copeland.

[45] There are two authorities which suggest that the Crown Court retains a general power to postpone or adjourn confiscation proceedings, for a period that is limited only by its own discretion as to whether or not there are exceptional circumstances and whether or not the offender is sentenced for the offence prior to the confiscation proceedings. The two decisions are R v Tuegel [2000] 2 All ER 872 and R v Lingham [2001] 1 Cr App R (S) 158.

[46] In R v Tuegel (Rose LJ, Tucker and Elias JJ) it was held ([2000] 2 All ER 872 at 893, 894) that a judge ‘has inherent power at common law to adjourn the whole or part of the sentencing exercise’ and that the power was ‘not subject to any specific common law time limit’. In that case a confiscation order made under the 1988 Act, outside the six-month time limit, was upheld on the basis that the sentencing court and counsel had proceeded on the basis that there were exceptional circumstances which justified a confiscation order being made outside the six-month period.

[47] In R v Lingham [2001] 1 Cr App R (S) 158 the Court of Appeal held that a court may postpone making a confiscation order for a period of more than six months from the date of conviction if the postponement is for a purpose other than that of obtaining information. Speaking for the Court of Appeal, Jowitt J stated (at 161):

‘Leaving aside section 3 of the Drug Trafficking Act 1994, a court is entitled to make its own decision about when an application relating to a case of which it is seized should be heard and whether it should be adjourned. It must act judicially. Subsections (1) and (3) of section 3 are all to be considered against this background. For the legitimacy of this approach see [R v Tuegel [2000] 2 All ER 872 at 894].’

[48] The authorities, to which we have referred so far, do not deal with the question of waiver and in view of our conclusions, it is not necessary for us to give detailed consideration to waiver. However, even without waiver, in our opinion

- a all that is strictly required in order to give the court jurisdiction where a postponement is necessary is that there should be a decision to postpone. This requires no particular form of words. We are not persuaded that the statement of a period of postponement is critical for establishing jurisdiction. It is not a condition precedent for there to be jurisdiction. If there is a failure to specify then this could be a matter of complaint by appeal to the Court of Appeal after a
- b confiscation order has been made. Then the Court of Appeal could, if justice so required, quash the confiscation order. If, however, no injustice was involved, the confiscation order would stand.

- [49] Before leaving the authorities we should refer to two more cases. The first of those cases is R v Kelly [2000] 2 Cr App R (S) 129. In that case the judgment of the court was given by Laws LJ. In the course of his judgment which related
- c to a confiscation order made under the 1994 Act Laws LJ, after having been referred to R v Tuegel, said (at 137):

- ‘Nothing is plainer than that a postponement under section 3(1) is constituted, and only constituted, by a judicial decision unless there is something wholly exceptional that must be taken and done in open court
- d and reasons there given for it.’

- [50] In R v Kelly nothing was said about exceptional circumstances. No period was specified under s 3(1). In our judgment nothing capable of being called a judicial decision was arrived at under s 3(1) on that day. In those circumstances it was decided that the confiscation order was made without jurisdiction. There
- e being no decision at all in that case, we would not question the correctness of the decision.

- [51] The second is R v Palmer (No 1) [2002] EWCA Crim 2202, [2003] 1 Cr App R (S) 572. In R v Palmer a confiscation order in the total sum of £33,243,812.46 had been made on 23 April 2002. In this court Rix LJ presided. The court quashed the
- f confiscation order. Two notices under s 72 had been served by the prosecution. As to the first, Rix LJ indicated (at [57]) that the court had ‘anxiously considered’ the submissions that despite inaccuracies it was valid. He observed that he saw the strength in the Crown’s case ‘that in substance everyone knew where they were going’ and that it was clear to all that the appellant was a wealthy man who had profited enormously from his fraud but he concluded ‘albeit with reluctance’,
- g that the judge was right to find that the first notice was invalid and that the second notice could not make up for its deficiencies. He was of the opinion that the first notice, not having been valid, a second notice served after the confiscation proceedings had commenced could not cure the absence of an effective notice at the outset. The consequence was that it was not possible for the trial court to
- h postpone the confiscation proceedings and proceed to sentence.

- [52] The first notice in R v Palmer referred to the wrong section. The explanation as the court pointed out was that it was drafted with the 1995 provisions in mind when that Act was not in force at the relevant time. So the notice referred to the amended s 71(1)(a) when it should have referred to s 72(1)
- j (the 1995 Act did not apply to the proceedings). In addition, it did not refer to the fact that if an order was made it would at least be for £10,000, which in Palmer’s case was hardly likely to be in issue. The errors were due to the notice being on a standard form developed for use when the 1995 provisions applied. Neither the court nor the defendant, if they had seen the notice, would have been under any doubt that the prosecution thought this was a case where confiscation proceedings should continue. It is difficult to conceive that Parliament intended that technical failures of this sort should affect the jurisdiction of the court to make a confiscation order. a

[53] The Court of Appeal was, however, without the benefit of the argument advanced before us by Mr Perry. Furthermore, they were influenced by two decisions given by this court which shared the same disadvantage. Those decisions being R v Martin [2001] EWCA Crim 2761, [2002] 2 Cr App R (S) 122 and R v Miranda [2000] 2 Cr App R (S) 347. b

[54] After the decision in R v Palmer, counsel appearing for the Crown abandoned the Crown's right to appeal. In those circumstances when Mr Perry, on behalf of the Crown, sought leave to appeal, the court took the view that there was no power to grant leave to appeal.

[55] The question that remains is what is the status of R v Palmer and the other authorities on which it was based. What has happened is that as part of the normal common law process, decision has followed decision extending the principle that there is no jurisdiction if there is a procedural failure from one aspect to another of the confiscation process. R v Palmer is only significant because it dealt with the use of a notice designed for use under a later Act being used as a notice under an earlier Act. Even though the wrong notice was used it could still achieve and did achieve its primary objective of initiating confiscation proceedings. Yet a defendant who had been otherwise properly subjected to a confiscation order in excess of £30m had that order quashed. This is a result that Parliament could not have intended. c

[56] For one constitution of this court to hold that a series of cases have been decided per incuriam, is not a course to be lightly taken. There is now new legislation which contains the section to which we have referred above which is designed to prevent repetition of the problem. There are, however, no doubt other cases in the pipeline which could be affected by the earlier authorities which did not consider Mr Perry's argument. In these circumstances we feel it right to indicate that in our view R v Palmer is wrongly decided and should not be followed and each of the earlier cases to which we have referred should be examined with care to see whether in fact it can be said they should be regarded as doing any more than deciding that there should be a decision to postpone confiscation proceedings, however generally expressed, prior to the completion of sentencing an offender, if confiscation proceedings are to take place after sentencing. d

THE APPEALS OF DALJIT SINGH SEKHON, SATNAM SINGH, SHANGARA SINGH AND GURDEV SINGH DHNOAY

[57] We turn to the individual appeals and set out the sequence of events in the appeals of Daljit Singh Sekhon, Satnam Singh, Shangara Singh and Gurdev Singh Dhnoay. (i) Daljit Singh Sekhon, Satnam Singh and Gurdev Singh Dhnoay pleaded guilty to an offence of conspiracy to cheat the public revenue. The offence occurred between 1 August 1994 and 30 November 1995. The relevant statutory scheme in this case is the 1988 Act as amended by the 1993 Act. (ii) Satnam Singh pleaded guilty to an offence of conspiracy to cheat the public revenue on indictment T971094. The offence occurred between 1 August 1994 and 30 November 1995. The relevant statutory scheme in his case is the 1988 Act as amended by the 1993 Act. (iii) Shangara Singh pleaded guilty to an offence of conspiracy to cheat the public revenue on indictment T980773. The offence occurred between 1 November 1996 and 30 June 1997. The relevant statutory scheme in his case is the 1988 Act as amended by the 1993 Act and the 1995 Act. e a [58] In the case of the appellant Shangara Singh the statutory scheme is that which applied after 1 November 1995, including the 1995 Act, whereas the cases of the other appellants were governed by the 1988 Act as amended by the 1993 Act only. However, this makes no material difference to the issues that we have to consider.

b [59] Unlike the other appellants we are now considering Gurdev Singh Dhnoay does not have leave to appeal and he is seeking leave to appeal out of time. We extend time and grant him leave to appeal. The facts of the offences are unimportant, as the appellants all pleaded guilty at the Crown Court at Newcastle in September 1998. Briefly the case arose from the appellants' different roles in the importation or diversion on a large scale of alcoholic goods on which no duty had been paid. The total revenue evaded was calculated to be about £5,555,600.

c [60] The chronology of events can again be conveniently taken from Mr Perry's submissions. (i) The sentencing hearing was adjourned and took place on 17 and 18 December 1998. (ii) In advance of the sentencing hearing, by a letter dated 8 October 1998, the judge and the appellants Daljit Singh Sekhon, Satnam Singh and Shangara Singh were notified by the prosecution that this was a suitable case in which to proceed under Pt VI of the 1988 Act.

e [61] The sequence of events thereafter was as follows: (i) on 17 December 1998, counsel for the prosecution opened the facts against Daljit Singh Sekhon, Satnam Singh and Gurdev Singh Dhnoay; (ii) on 18 December 1998, counsel for the prosecution opened the facts against Shangara Singh; (iii) Judge Wood passed sentence; (iv) counsel for the prosecution then raised the question of confiscation in open court; (v) the confiscation hearing was adjourned to February 1999; (vi) the confiscation hearing was listed for hearing on 19 February 1999 and on that date, in the cases of Daljit Sekhon, Satnam Singh and Gurdev Singh Dhnoay, f having found exceptional circumstances, Judge Wood postponed the hearing for four months; (vii) the case of Shangara Singh was listed on 2 March 1999 and Judge Wood postponed the matter on the basis of his ruling on 19 February 1999; (viii) the confiscation hearing took place on 7, 8 and 9 June 1999 and Judge Wood made confiscation orders against all of the appellants; (ix) further hearings took place on 12 and 13 August 1999, at which hearings Judge Wood reconsidered the g confiscation order made against Gurdev Singh Dhnoay and made a confiscation order in the case of Daljit Singh Sekhon.

[62] It appears that the appellants were notified of the prosecution's intention to proceed with confiscation proceedings. A restraining order was made prohibiting the appellants from dealing with certain assets on 16 December 1998. h On 17 and 18 December 1998 they appeared at the Crown Court for sentence and (with the possible exception of Shangara) they were sentenced on 18 December 1998. No mention was made of the postponement of the confiscation proceedings before sentence. After sentence, as appears from the transcript, counsel for the prosecution raised the issue of confiscation proceedings and the procedure to be j adopted and clearly had s 72A in mind since he referred to a period of six months. No question was raised as to the need for exceptional circumstances to exist if the adjournment was to be for more than six months. The trial judge, Judge Wood, indicated that the matter should be heard initially in February though the parties considered that it might have subsequently been adjourned to a later date.

[63] Clearly what happened did not comply with the procedure set out in s 72A because that section contemplates the decision to postpone being made prior to the passing of sentence. On the evidence which is before us that did not happen. Thus there was a clear contravention of s 72(4) of the 1988 Act. a

[64] It has to be accepted that subject to there being a decision to postpone, it was intended that the confiscation order should be made before sentence. Whereas other procedural requirements may not be critical, that there should be a postponement of the making of the confiscation order when there is power to do so, is fundamental to the exercise of the jurisdiction to make a confiscation order. In these cases, therefore, in accord with the earlier decisions, we accept that the effect of non-compliance was intended by Parliament to go to jurisdiction subject to any possible argument as to waiver. In the result, therefore, there having been no postponement or even purported decision to postpone until after sentence the confiscation orders were made without jurisdiction, the orders have therefore to be quashed. To this extent the appeals will be allowed. b
c

THE APPLICATION OF KEVIN MCFaul

[65] McFaul was a party to the conspiracy which involved Keith Ross which was the subject of the decision in R v Ross [2001] 2 Cr App R (S) 484. The facts of his case are indistinguishable from those in R v Ross but he made no application to appeal until the decision in R v Ross was brought to his attention. As in the case we have just been considering, in McFaul's case as well there had not been any decision to postpone until after he was sentenced on 9 November 1999. In his case, the relevant legislation was ss 2 and 3 of the 1994 Act. However, there is no material difference between the legislation in that Act and s 72A of the 1988 Act. d
e

[66] Although there was considerable delay in the application for leave to appeal we do not consider it would be right bearing in mind what has happened to his co-accused to allow the confiscation order which was made in the case of McFaul to stand. Accordingly, we grant him leave to appeal and allow his appeal against the confiscation order which was made and quash that confiscation order. f

[67] In both the first case and McFaul's case we have not dealt with any question of waiver since in our judgment it would be wrong to do so when it was raised at a later date.

THE APPEALS OF RICHARD MICHAEL KNIGHTS AND KEVIN MAGUIRE

[68] On 10 July 2000, in the Crown Court at Kingston-upon-Thames, Knights pleaded guilty to being knowingly concerned in dealing with goods which were chargeable with duty which had not been paid with intent to defraud contrary to s 170(1)(b) of the Customs and Excise Management Act 1979. On 12 October 2000 Maguire was convicted of the same offence. On 17 October both were sentenced. g
h

[69] On 30 July 2001 before the same court a confiscation order was made against Knights in the sum of £139,260 and in the case of Maguire, in the sum of £114,930.

[70] One of the grounds of appeal relied upon by Maguire, but not originally by Knights, was that a confiscation order was made in the course of proceedings which were invalid by reason of the circumstances of their initiation and postponement under s 72 of the 1988 Act. This point was subsequently adopted by Knights, so in both cases it is necessary to see whether the points taken as to the jurisdiction to make the order have any validity. However, in the case of Knights and Maguire there had been a hearing on the day prior to the appellants being sentenced and the trial judge, Judge Haworth, set a timetable for j a sentencing and confiscation. Judge Haworth ordered the prosecution to serve its statement in the confiscation proceedings by 11 December 2000 with a mention hearing on 4 January 2001. On the latter date Judge Haworth set a date of 23 January 2001 for the confiscation hearing, having decided that his unavailability until that date amounted to exceptional circumstances.

b [71] We have before us the transcripts dealing with the different proceedings before the trial judge. It is clear from those transcripts that on 16 October 2000 there was discussion with regard to a timetable for confiscation proceedings before sentencing. Judge Haworth was wrongly told on 16 October by counsel that the six months ran from sentence rather than conviction but this does not matter as it did not affect the order which the judge made. Clearly he considered that the proceedings should be postponed starting from the date of conviction. c The need for postponement would be greater from the later date of sentence. Furthermore, it is apparent that he did postpone the proceedings. Much argument took place before us as to whether there was postponement to a specific date because the date which was being selected was a date for, in effect, further directions. However, in our judgment as long as the parties are clearly d envisaging that the process was to take place within the timescale provided for by s 72A, that is sufficient.

[72] On 4 January 2001 it was common ground that the parties were not in a position to deal with matters then and sensibly and appropriately Judge Haworth adjourned the matter to the last date on which he would be sitting in January, namely 23 January.

e [73] Where, as here, there have been complex proceedings, it would be wholly inappropriate for any judge but the trial judge to deal with the confiscation proceedings unless that was unavoidable. In our judgment Judge Haworth was entitled to postpone the confiscation proceedings in the way that he did bearing in mind his availability.

f [74] Accordingly in our judgment there is nothing in the procedural points which have been raised by these appellants and we can now turn to the final issues raised in these appeals, namely the extent to which they had benefited from the crime which they committed. We turn first to the law.

THE LAW

g [75] This involves provisions of the 1988 Act as amended by the 1993 Act and the 1995 Act:

‘71. ... (4) For the purposes of this Part of this Act a person benefits from an offence if he obtains property as a result of or in connection with its commission and his benefit is the value of the property so obtained ...

h (6) Subject to subsection (1C) above the sum which an order made by a court under this section requires an offender to pay shall be equal to—(a) the benefit in respect of which it is made; or (b) the amount appearing to the court to be the amount that might be realised at the time the order is made, whichever is the less.

j (7A) The standard of proof required to determine any question arising under this Part of this Act as to—(a) whether a person has benefited from any offence, or ... (c) the amount to be recovered in his case ... shall be that applicable in civil proceedings.’

[76] These provisions were helpfully discussed in R v Barwick [2001] 1 Cr App R (S) 445 at 453:

'We stress that the scheme of the Act requires the court to perform two distinct and discrete tasks. First, to determine the benefit. Secondly, to determine the amount that might be realised at the time the order is made, which may be very different. Further, the amount that might be realised may be quite unrelated to the identifiable proceeds of the offence, e.g. a lottery win, inheritance, or other lawfully acquired property. In the end, the task of the court at the second stage is to determine the amount "appearing to the court" to be the amount that might be realised. But once the benefit has been proved, it is permissible and ought normally to be the approach of the court, to conclude that the benefit remains available until the defendant proves otherwise; subject to the issue of changes in the value of money to which we now turn.'

THE HEARING

[77] It fell to Judge Haworth to make rulings pursuant to these provisions on 30 July 2001 having heard evidence during several preceding days, the witnesses being both appellants, Mrs Knights (the wife of the first appellant) and Mr Rodger, a co-defendant. The first rulings were as to the respective benefits that accrued to the appellants by reason of their criminal activities. As to this, he ruled that the benefit obtained by Mr Knights amounted to £139,260 and that obtained by Mr Maguire amounted to £114,930.

[78] These rulings are not the subject of current appeal. It is conceded that evidence had been put before Judge Haworth from which he could fairly infer benefits in such sums. That said, two features of the relevant judgment merit mention. First, the rulings necessarily involved total rejection of the respective appellants as witnesses of truth. Knights had contended that the benefit obtained through active participation in a fraud involving the evasion of £3.6m duty on the importation of some 36 tonnes of cigarettes was no more than £5,000. Maguire's statement in response to the prosecutor's statement failed to acknowledge any benefit at all as accruing from his similarly active participation save, possibly, for cash amounting to £19,800 found at his home following arrest. In the course of submissions we gathered that when under cross-examination he seemingly conceded that £4,000 utilised to pay off an overdraft was an obtained benefit.

[79] Secondly, at the time of this ruling and referring to the respective benefits as found, Judge Haworth added:

'There is no evidence that either of these defendants used any of this money to make purchases or fund an extravagant lifestyle. I have no doubt whatsoever that each has his nest egg salted away.'

[80] Having made these rulings Judge Haworth heard further submissions from, respectively, counsel for each appellant and for the Crown and then made additional rulings as to the amounts now due for payment as provided for by s 71(6). The totality of the rulings merits citation:

'Well dealing with each case, as far as Mr Knights is concerned he has the following realisable assets. His share of the equity of the house, £35,000; and the Abbey account £57,41; and his benefit from this enterprise, £139,260, which makes a total realisable asset of £178,699. I do not think it is likely that Mr Knights has spent any of the benefit figure at all. As I have said I am satisfied it is salted away, therefore in his case, I make a confiscation order of the lesser of the two sums, that is the benefit figure, £139,260 with a three-year term imprisonment in default. In Mr Maguire's case I find his a realisable assets to be the equity in Chichester Terrace, £46,250, the Abbey account, £25; the benefit from this enterprise, £114,930 less the £4,000 that was paid into the bank on the 22 November 1997. Therefore his total realisable assets are £157,205. I make the confiscation order in the sum of £114,930 with three years' imprisonment in default.'

b [81] Following this ruling Judge Haworth was prevailed upon to clarify his ruling with respect to Mr Maguire, doing so as follows:

c 'I wanted to make it clear if I did not do so already that I make the same finding in respect of Maguire that I did in respect of Knights namely that I do not think it likely that he has spent any of the benefits and am satisfied that he has salted them away.'

THESE APPEALS

d [82] Mr Boothby, counsel for Mr Maguire, made the principal submission, effectively on behalf of both appellants. He invited us to hold that in these latter rulings Judge Haworth's exercise of discretion was outwith the parameters set by s 71 and in any event wholly unreasonable so that we could and should set it aside. By reference to s 71(6), if the judge was holding that each man was currently retaining his respective benefit as identified in the first rulings then references to other realisable assets were otiose, thus betraying muddled thinking. If in each case the other realisable assets were material to his deliberation then perhaps it was his findings as to benefits being 'salted away' that were open to challenge. In any event there was no attempt made by way of these rulings to address the appellants' individual circumstances nor indeed to address the submissions earlier made to him by counsel. Given evidence that Mr Knights lived frugally whereas Mr Maguire spent money liberally, the judge should have explained his decision that their present financial positions were comparable—
e
f absent such explanation there had to be a doubt as to a finding that each had 'salted away' their respective benefit.

[83] This court is critical of the content of the rulings under appeal. They are so short as to be labelled cursory. They do not in terms address the issues then raised in submissions and the content owes nothing to s 71(6) and (7A). It is not surprising that they have spawned these appeals and this, Mr Boothby's principal g submission, has commanded our careful attention. However, in the event we cannot accept it. We remind ourselves that Judge Haworth had had every opportunity to form views as to the appellants and as to their respective disposal of such benefits as accrued from their fraudulent conduct. Thus he had had several recent days of evidence in turn preceded by the evidence given at the trial.
h It was on the basis of such views that he rejected each man's evidence and asserted in the course of his first rulings that each had in fact 'salted away' his accrued benefit. Given these findings of fact, effectively beyond challenge before this appellate court, the second rulings became inevitable. It is a pity that Judge Haworth did not say as much, and it is a pity that he qualified the simplicity of his j approach by identifying realisable assets other than the respective accrued benefits, that is, assets that lay outwith s 71(6). That said, we have his findings of fact, such amply founded by his receipt of evidence and they serve to sustain the rulings under appeal.

[84] Other subsidiary points were taken. Should the judge have asserted in his first rulings that the respective benefits had been 'salted away'? And should not there have been a forensic pause following the first rulings so as to allow the appellants to, as it were, focus upon the scope for realising the now identified benefits? Neither point carries any weight. The finding made in the course of the first rulings might strictly have been better made by way of the second rulings but both sets of rulings reflect the same receipt of evidence and evidential overlap between the issue as to amount of benefit and the issue as to realisable assets must be on occasions inevitable. As to the second point there should be no need for honest and candid defendants to delay preparation and presentation of a case as to realisable assets until there is a ruling as to accrued benefit. a

b

[85] The respective appeals against the rulings as to realisable assets are rejected and the appeals of both these appellants are dismissed.

Appeals allowed in the cases of Sekhon, Shangara Singh and Satnam Singh. Applications for leave to appeal granted and appeals allowed in the cases of Dhnoay and McFaul. Appeals dismissed in the cases of Knights and Maguire. c

Lynne Townley Barrister.

R v Simpson

[2003] EWCA Crim 1499

COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION

LORD WOOLF CJ, KENNEDY LJ, MITCHELL, HALLETT AND PITCHERS JJ

12, 23 MAY 2003

Precedent – Court of Appeal – Criminal Division – Doctrine of stare decisis not applied with same rigidity as in Civil Division of Court of Appeal.

Sentence – Confiscation order – Application for confiscation order – Whether non-compliance with statutory procedural requirements going to court's jurisdiction – Criminal Justice Act 1988, ss 71, 72 – Proceeds of Crime Act 1995, s 16(5).

The appellant pleaded guilty to offences involving VAT fraud and was sentenced to a total of 30 months' imprisonment. A confiscation order in the sum of £209,351.24 was made under s 71^a of the Criminal Justice Act 1988. The appellant appealed against the confiscation order on the ground, inter alia, that the judge had had no jurisdiction to make it because the notice served on the court by the prosecution was not in the form required by s 72(1)^b of the 1988 Act, and that by virtue of s 16(5)^c of the Proceeds of Crime Act 1995, since one of the offences to which he had pleaded guilty had been committed before 1 November 1995, the amendment to s 72 made by s 1 of the 1995 Act providing that service of a notice was no longer necessary, did not apply. He submitted that the application of s 16(5) was not limited to offences on which the confiscation order was based. The appellant further argued that the court should not follow a recent decision of the Court of Appeal (the recent decision), in which the court, in holding that non-compliance with the statutory procedure did not go to the court's jurisdiction to postpone confiscation proceedings, had disapproved a previous decision (the previous decision) in which a confiscation order had been quashed because a valid s 72 notice had not been served. The appellant argued, inter alia, that it had not been open to the court making the recent decision to conclude that the previous decision was irregular and for that reason should not be followed.

Held – (1) A degree of discretion remained in the Court of Appeal, Criminal Division to decide whether or not a previous decision should be treated as a binding precedent in future, when there were grounds for saying that that decision was wrong. The doctrine of stare decisis did not apply as rigidly to the Court of Appeal in its criminal jurisdiction as in its civil jurisdiction. Whilst there might be a case for restricting the discretion to cases where the departure from authority was in favour of an accused, that should not apply where, as in the instant case, a defendant wished to rely upon a wrongly decided case to provide a technical defence. The law had been misapplied and misunderstood in the previous decision, because the court had not had the opportunity to consider all the authorities which had been considered in the recent decision. There were ample grounds for regarding the previous decision as irregular and therefore not binding on the court. There was no doubt that the recent decision applied to the

^a Section 71, so far as material, is set out at [7], below

^b Section 72, so far as material, is set out at [8], below

^c Section 16, so far as material, is set out at [12], below instant case, and that, accordingly, any defects in the notice had not deprived the sentencing judge of jurisdiction to make the confiscation order (see [32]–[34], [37], [38], [56], below); dicta of Diplock LJ in R v Gould [1968] 1 All ER 849 at 851 applied; R v Sekhon, R v McFaul, R v Knights [2003] 3 All ER 508 approved; R v Palmer (No 1) [2003] 1 Cr App R (S) 572 disapproved.

(2) Section 16(5) had to be construed as applying to an offence in respect of which a confiscation order was or could be sought. To interpret the section otherwise would lead to absurd results. The appeal would therefore be dismissed (see [19], [56], below).

Notes

For decisions of the Court of Appeal as authorities, see 37 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue), para 1242.

Section 16(5) of the Proceeds of Crime Act 1995 has been repealed with effect from 24 March 2003 by the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002, s 457, Sch 12.

Cases referred to in judgment

Critchell v Lambeth BC [1957] 2 All ER 417, [1957] 2 QB 535, [1957] 3 WLR 108, CA.

DPP v Merriman [1972] 3 All ER 42, [1973] AC 584, [1972] 3 WLR 545, HL.

Mirehouse v Rennell (1833) 1 Cl & Fin 527, 6 ER 1015, HL.

R v Ahmed (8 February 2000, unreported), CA.

R v Barwick [2001] 1 Cr App R (S) 445, CA.

R v Copeland [2002] EWCA 736, [2002] Cr App R (S) 512.

R v Gould [1968] 1 All ER 849, [1968] 2 QB 65, [1968] 2 WLR 643, CA.

R v Martin [2001] EWCA Crim 2761, [2002] 2 Cr App R (S) 122.

R v Miranda [2000] 2 Cr App R (S) 347, CA.

R v Newsome, R v Browne [1970] 3 All ER 455, [1970] 2 QB 711, [1970] 3 WLR 586, CA.

R v Newton (1982) 77 Cr App R 13, CA.

R v Palmer (No 1) [2002] EWCA Crim 2202, [2003] 1 Cr App R (S) 572.

R v Sekhon, R v McFaul, R v Knights [2002] EWCA Crim 2954, [2003] 3 All ER 508.

R v Taylor [1950] 2 All ER 170, [1950] 2 KB 368, CA.

Young v Bristol Aeroplane Co Ltd [1944] 2 All ER 293, [1944] KB 718, CA.

Case referred to in skeleton arguments

Bryers v Canadian Pacific Steamships Ltd [1956] 3 All ER 560, [1957] 1 QB 134, [1956] 3 WLR 776, CA; affid sub nom Canadian Pacific Steamships v Bryers [1957] 3 All ER 572, [1958] AC 485, [1957] 3 WLR 993, HL.

Appeal

Ian McDonald Simpson appealed from the confiscation order made against him under the Criminal Justice Act 1988 by Judge Balston in the Crown Court at Maidstone on 1 February 2002 following his pleas of guilty on 8 January 2001 to value added tax offences and cheating the public revenue. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

Raymond Walker QC and Simon Taylor (assigned by the Registrar of Criminal Appeals) for Simpson.

Jonathan Fisher QC and John Law (instructed by the Solicitor for Customs & Excise) for the Crown.

a 23 May 2002. The following judgment of the court was delivered.

LORD WOOLF CJ.

INTRODUCTION

b [1] This is yet a further appeal involving a confiscation order. The confiscation order was made under the provisions of the Criminal Justice Act 1988 by Judge Balston in the Crown Court at Maidstone on 1 February 2002.

c [2] On 8 January 2001 the appellant, Ian McDonald Simpson, had pleaded guilty on re-arraignment to two counts involving value added tax (VAT) offences (counts 4 and 6), two counts of producing a false document for the purposes of VAT (counts 5 and 14), one count of cheating the public revenue (count 16) and one count of being knowingly concerned in the fraudulent evasion of VAT (count 18). Following a Newton hearing (see R v Newton (1982) 77 Cr App R 13) before the same court, on 1 May 2001 the appellant was sentenced to 30 months' imprisonment on count 6 and to concurrent sentences of 12 months' imprisonment on each of the other counts.

d [3] The confiscation order which is the subject of the appeal was made under s 71 of the 1988 Act. The sum of £209,351.34 was ordered to be confiscated with a sentence of 18 months' imprisonment in default of payment. The appellant was also ordered to pay £15,000 towards the costs of the prosecution. There were two other alleged offenders, one was acquitted and the other, Kenneth Anthony Young was prosecuted in Scotland and sentenced to five years' imprisonment on e each count concurrent. In addition, a confiscation order was made in the sum of £26,000.

f [4] The frauds involved taking advantage of the special cash accounting scheme which can be used for making VAT returns. The scheme was introduced to give relief to small businesses which would otherwise have to pay VAT charged on a transaction before the business had received payment from its customer. The scheme also took advantage of the fact that a business may legitimately purchase goods and services from a subsidiary, this involving what is known for VAT purposes as 'outsourcing'. A number of bogus outsourcing agreements were deployed in carrying out the frauds.

g [5] The grounds of appeal fall into two categories. First, there are those in relation to Judge Balston's jurisdiction to make the confiscation order and secondly, there are those which relate to the amount of the confiscation order. It is the grounds of appeal which relate to jurisdiction which explain the constitution of this court. The Crown's contention is that the jurisdictional points are of no substance because of the decision of this court (Lord Woolf CJ, h Holland and Keith JJ) in the case of R v Sekhon, R v McFaul, R v Knights [2002] EWCA Crim 2954, [2003] 3 All ER 508, which clearly establishes that the points are without substance. However, Mr Raymond Walker QC, who together with Mr Simon Taylor, appears on behalf of the appellant contends that the decision in R v Sekhon wrongly indicates that the decision of this court in R v Palmer (No 1) j [2002] EWCA Crim 2202, [2003] 1 Cr App R (S) 572 was wrongly decided and that earlier cases applied in R v Palmer 'should be examined with care' (see R v Sekhon at [56]). It was the decision in R v Palmer that caused the appellant to amend his notice of appeal to raise the jurisdiction points. No leave to appeal has yet been granted to the appellant in respect of the jurisdiction points. However, this court can and does give leave for them to be argued. It should not be thought that we are giving leave because we consider that there is any substance in the jurisdiction points. We only give leave so as to enable the appellant to have a possibility of appealing further by applying to this court to certify a point of law and then applying to this court or the House of Lords for leave to appeal to the House of Lords. If there is no further appeal, it is our hope that this decision will put an end to the string of appeals which are continuing to come before this court. There have already been at least ten decisions in which R v Sekhon has been applied.

THE JURISDICTIONAL ISSUE

[6] The fact that the relevant provisions of the 1988 Act have been the subject of a number of amendments has contributed to the problem. Powers of confiscation appear in similar terms in the Drug Trafficking Act 1994 and they have also been the subject of amendment and give rise to the same problems. The legislative history is set out in R v Sekhon (at [6]–[18]) and it is not necessary to repeat that history. It is sufficient for the purposes of the present appeal to set out the relevant terms of ss 71 and 72 of the 1988 Act as it was originally enacted.

[7] The provisions of s 71 so far as relevant were as follows:

‘(1) The Crown Court and a magistrates’ court shall each have power, in addition to dealing with an offender in any other way, to make an order under this section requiring him to pay such sum as the court thinks fit.

(2) The Crown Court may make such an order against an offender where—(a) he is found guilty of any offence to which this Part of this Act applies; and (b) it is satisfied—(i) that he has benefited from that offence or from that offence taken together with some other offence of which he is convicted in the same proceedings, or which the court takes into consideration in determining his sentence, and which is not a drug trafficking offence; and (ii) that his benefit is at least the minimum amount ...

(4) For the purposes of this Part of this Act a person benefits from an offence if he obtains property as a result of or in connection with its commission and his benefit is the value of the property so obtained.

(5) Where a person derives a pecuniary advantage as a result of or in connection with the commission of an offence, he is to be treated for the purposes of this Part of this Act as if he had obtained as a result of or in connection with the commission of the offence a sum of money equal to the value of the pecuniary advantage.

(6) The sum which an order made by a court under this section requires an offender to pay must be at least the minimum amount, but must not exceed—(a) the benefit in respect of which it is made; or (b) the amount appearing to the court to be the amount that might be realised at the time the order is made, whichever is the less.

(7) For the purposes of this Part of this Act the minimum amount is £10,000 ...’

[8] Section 72, so far as material, provided:

‘(1) A court shall not make a confiscation order unless the prosecutor has given written notice to the court to the effect that it appears to him that, were the court to consider that it ought to make such an order, it would be able to make an order requiring the offender to pay at least the minimum amount.

(2) If the prosecutor gives the court such a notice, the court shall determine whether it ought to make a confiscation order ...

(4) If the court determines that it ought to make such an order, the court shall, before sentencing or otherwise dealing with the offender in respect of a the offence or, as the case may be, any of the offences concerned, determine the amount to be recovered in his case by virtue of this section and make a confiscation order for that amount specifying the offence or offences.'

b [9] Under s 72(1) and (2) the procedure for making an order was dependent on the prosecution giving a notice that there were likely to be sufficient assets to meet it. Where such a notice was given, the court was bound to consider the making of an order. By s 71(4) the court was required to determine the amount to be recovered and make a confiscation order before sentencing or otherwise dealing with the offender.

c [10] Sections 71 and 72 were amended by the Criminal Justice Act 1993, the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994 and the Proceeds of Crime Act 1995. It is the amendments which were made by the 1995 Act which are relevant to the argument which is advanced on behalf of the appellant. Section 1 of the 1995 Act amended s 71(1)–(3). It did so in terms described in the decision in R v Sekhon, R v McFaul, R v Knights [2003] 3 All ER 508 at [13] as follows:

d '(i) a duty was placed upon the court to exercise its powers to embark upon confiscation proceedings in every case in which written notice had been given by the prosecutor; (ii) the court was given a power to institute confiscation proceedings of its own volition; (iii) the minimum figure of £10,000 was abolished. Thus, s 71(1) of the 1988 Act now provides:

e "(1) Where an offender is convicted, in any proceedings before the Crown Court or a magistrates' court, of an offence of a relevant description, it shall be the duty of the court—(a) if the prosecutor has given written notice to the court that he considers that it would be appropriate for the court to proceed under this section, or (b) if the court considers, even though it has not been given such notice, that it would be appropriate for it so to proceed, to act as follows before sentencing or otherwise dealing with the offender in respect

f of that offence or any other relevant criminal conduct.'"

[11] The 1995 Act also repealed s 72(1)–(4). The other amendments made were briefly summarised in R v Sekhon as follows:

g '[14] Section 2 of the 1995 Act inserted s 72AA into the 1988 Act to provide for confiscation in relation to a course of criminal conduct.

[15] Section 3 of the 1995 Act amended s 73 of the 1988 Act (effect of provision of statement by prosecutor) and provided for the service on the court and defendant of statements from the prosecutor.

h [16] Section 4 of the 1995 Act inserted s 73A into the 1988 Act so as to empower the court to order the defendant to provide information to assist it in carrying out its functions under Pt VI of the 1988 Act.

[17] Sections 5–10 of the 1995 Act amended the 1988 Act in relation to such matters as the review and revision of confiscation orders, the enforcement of confiscation orders and the variation of confiscation orders.'

j [12] The commencement of s 1 of the 1995 Act, which amended s 71 of the 1988 Act, was provided for in s 16 of that Act. Subsections (5) and (6) of s 16 provide:

'(5) Section 1 above shall not apply in the case of any proceedings against any person where that person is convicted in those proceedings of an offence which was committed before the commencement of that section.

(6) Sections 8(1) and 9 above shall not apply where the offence, or any of the offences, in respect of which the confiscation order was made was committed before the commencement of section 1 above.’

[13] Section 72, prior to being amended by the 1995 Act, required in mandatory terms, if a literal construction of the section is adopted, the service of a notice on the court setting out the information stated in s 72(1). However, after the 1995 Act came into force that notice was no longer necessary because the court could act on its own motion (see s 71(1)(b) as amended).

[14] Mr Walker argues that in view of the language of s 72 prior to the amendments of the 1995 Act the court did not have jurisdiction to make a confiscation order unless: (i) a notice which complies with s 72(1) was served and (ii) none of the offences on which the appellant is indicted and convicted were committed before 1 November 1995.

[15] On the facts of this case Mr Walker has to advance this submission because he can only rely on count 6 of the indictment for arguing that the 1995 Act was not in force at the relevant time and count 6 was not a count on which the confiscation order was based. While Mr Walker accepts that this is the position, he points to the language of s 16(5) of the 1995 Act which he contends does not limit the restriction of the application of s 16(5) to offences on which a confiscation order is based.

[16] In support of the appellant’s argument reliance was placed upon the decision of this court in the case of R v Ahmed (8 February 2000, unreported) (Kennedy LJ, Goldring J and Sir Charles McCullough). Sir Charles McCullough in giving judgment in that case said:

‘22. In these proceedings there were three offences in the three counts. Count 3 within a period wholly after 1 November 1995. The other two, counts 1 and 2, were in relation to periods partly before and partly after that date. In each of those instances there were overt acts committed in pursuance of the existence of the relevant conspiracy both before and after that date, 1 November 1995.

23. Counsel’s submission is that as the conspiracies in counts 1 and 2 ran from 1 January 1995, the offences in counts 1 and 2 were being committed both before and after 1 November 1995. That being so in these proceedings the appellant was “convicted ... of an offence which was committed before [1 November 1995]”. We agree. It follows that the judge had the discretion to make an order in the full agreed sum of £40,000 or a lesser sum or none at all.’ (My emphasis.)

[17] However, when those paragraphs are read as a whole, it is clear that Sir Charles was not seeking to say anything different from what we have indicated is the position. Sir Charles made it plain that the court was not ‘persuaded that these arguments would or might persuade the judge to do other than he did’.

[18] Reliance was also placed upon the case of R v Martin [2001] EWCA Crim 2761, [2002] 2 Cr App R (S) 122. It is said that the approach of Sir Charles was approved in that later case. However, that does not provide any further assistance to the appellant. The only other point, that it is important not to ignore in relation to R v Ahmed, is that unlike here, there was no issue in that case that the conspiracies were ones to which the 1995 Act could not apply. The dates in the counts of the indictment reflected the actual dates.

[19] Mr Walker's submission, if correct, means that in this case if the appellant had been acquitted on count 6 the confiscation order would be subject to the 1995 Act but because he was convicted of count 6 the confiscation order cannot be made. This is obviously an absurd result and we have no doubt that Mr Jonathan Fisher QC, who appeared on behalf of the Crown, is right in his contention that s 16(5) is not intended to produce this very strange consequence.

In our judgment s 16(5) has to be applied so that after the word 'offence' there appears, the words 'in respect of which a confiscation order is or could be sought' as proposed in the admirable skeleton argument prepared by Mr David Barnard who appeared on behalf of the Crown before Mr Fisher was instructed.

[20] Before coming to Mr Walker's principal point on behalf of the appellant there is the further problem that he faces. This is that while count 6, in the particulars of the offence, refers to 16 October 1995, because that is the date on the invoice which is relied upon by the Crown as the initial act constituting the offence, it is clear from the evidence that the invoice was created on 19 November 1995. So in fact, the offence was committed after 1 November 1995. In any event the argument of the appellant, that the 1995 Act cannot be relied upon, fails on the facts.

THE IRREGULARITY (PER INCURIAM) ISSUE

[21] This is the issue which is of considerable significance and explains why it was thought appropriate to have a decision by a court constituted by the five judges who are hearing this appeal. We will deal with the issue as succinctly as we can but we recognise the broad importance of the issue in relation to both statutory construction and the doctrine of precedent.

[22] Initially, it is necessary to identify the limited nature of the dispute between the parties. The issue in dispute is (on the assumption that s 1 of the 1995 Act was not in force) does the fact that the notice that was served on the court by the prosecution was not in the form required by s 72 of the 1988 Act mean that the court had no jurisdiction to make a confiscation order? This the appellant contends is the position. This is the argument notwithstanding that the Crown had already informed the court prior to the service of the notice that the figure suggested as being the amount that the appellant benefited from the fraud far exceeded the statutory minimum amount of £10,000. In addition, the issue as to jurisdiction was not raised by the appellant prior to the confiscation order being made.

[23] Mr Walker contends that this court should not follow the decision in R v Sekhon in so far as it casts doubt upon the decision in R v Palmer (No 1) [2003] 1 Cr App R (S) 572. In support of this submission he advances three separate arguments. First, he submits that the issue as to the correctness of the decision in R v Palmer was not canvassed during the hearing in R v Sekhon. This submission is the result of his being misinformed as to what happened at the hearing of R v Sekhon. Mr Walker's junior, Mr Simon Taylor, was also junior counsel for Mr Satnam Singh in R v Sekhon. Mr Walker, no doubt as a result of what he had been told by Mr Taylor, was under the impression that there had been no argument as to the correctness of the decision in R v Palmer on the appeal in R v Sekhon. This impression was wrong. It is perhaps to be explained by the fact that at the beginning of the hearing in R v Sekhon the court indicated that it was proposing to allow the appeals in the case of Mr Taylor's client and his co-defendants who were involved in his appeal. Accordingly, the court indicated it was not necessary for the legal advisers of those appellants to attend during the argument relating to the other appellants who were also involved in the appeal. The appeals of the other three appellants then proceeded and it was in relation to those appeals that the effect of the decision in R v Palmer was contested. However, unusually since unless Mr Perry was able to persuade us otherwise, those appeals would have to be allowed as well, by agreement Mr Perry advanced his arguments on behalf of the Crown prior to the appellants advancing their argument. The right approach to the law was, however, fully canvassed. There is therefore no substance in this point.

[24] After the course of events in R v Sekhon had been discussed, Mr Walker turned to his argument that it had not been open to the court in R v Sekhon to conclude that R v Palmer had been decided irregularly and for that reason should not be followed. As to this, there was a striking division between the views of the parties since Mr Barnard in his skeleton argument on behalf of the Crown contended that R v Sekhon itself was a binding precedent as to the status of R v Palmer and this court should refuse to go behind the R v Sekhon decision.

[25] Mr Walker, when developing his submissions, relies on 37 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 1242 as to the situations in which it is appropriate for the Court of Appeal to depart from a decision otherwise binding on the court. The situations are stated to be: (i) where the court has acted in ignorance of a previous decision of its own court or a court of co-ordinate jurisdiction which covered the case before it. If this is the case the court must decide which case to follow; (ii) where the court has acted in ignorance of a decision of the House of Lords; (iii) where the court has given its decision in ignorance of the terms of a statute or a rule having statutory force; or (iv) where in exceptional and rare cases, the court is satisfied that there has been a manifest slip or error and there is no prospect of an appeal to the House of Lords.

[26] He also refers to two further passages in the same paragraph of Halsbury's Laws as to the Court of Appeal (Criminal Division). The first stating that a full Court of Appeal has no greater powers than the usual constitution of the court of three judges and, except in the cases mentioned above has no power to overrule a previous decision of the court. The other citation is that—

'In its criminal jurisdiction the Court of Appeal applies the same principles as on the civil side, but recognises that there are exceptions (a) where the applicant is in prison and in the full court's opinion wrongly so; (b) where the court thinks the law was misunderstood or misapplied; and (c) where the full court is carrying out its duty to lay down principles and guidelines in relation to sentencing.'

[27] These statements from Halsbury's Laws are unexceptional and are soundly based upon the authorities to which they refer. Prominent among them is the decision in Young v Bristol Aeroplane Co Ltd [1944] 2 All ER 293, [1944] KB 718. However, the paragraphs in Halsbury's Laws should not be read as if they are contained in a statute. The rules as to precedent reflect the practice of the courts and have to be applied bearing in mind that their objective is to assist in the administration of justice. They are of considerable importance because of their role in achieving the appropriate degree of certainty as to the law. This is an important requirement of any system of justice. The principles should not, however, be regarded as so rigid that they cannot develop in order to meet contemporary needs.

[28] One of the earliest statements on the rationale underpinning this doctrine was made by Parke J (see Mirehouse v Rennell (1833) 1 Cl & Fin 527 at 546, 6 ER 1015 at 1023) when he stated:

- a 'Our common-law system consists in the applying to new combinations of circumstances those rules of law which we derive from legal principles and judicial precedents; and for the sake of attaining uniformity, consistency and certainty, we must apply those rules, where they are not plainly unreasonable and inconvenient, to all cases which arise; and we are not at liberty to reject them, and to abandon all analogy to them, in those to which they have not yet been b judicially applied, because we think that the rules are not as convenient and reasonable as we ourselves could have devised.' (My emphasis.)

[29] In Lord Greene MR's judgment in Young's case [1944] 2 All ER 293 at 300, [1944] KB 718 at 729, Lord Greene was careful to provide for a degree of flexibility. He stated:

- c 'We do not think that it would be right to say that there may not be other cases of decisions given per incuriam in which this court might properly consider itself entitled not to follow an earlier decision of its own.'

- d [30] The House of Lords is in a special position because it is, so far as this jurisdiction is concerned, the final court of appeal in both criminal and civil matters, but the reasons for it departing from its previous practice are worth repeating. They appear in the Practice Statement (Judicial Precedent) [1966] 3 All ER 77, [1966] 1 WLR 1234:

- e 'Their lordships regard the use of precedent as an indispensable foundation upon which to decide what is the law and its application to individual cases. It provides at least some degree of certainty upon which individuals can rely in the conduct of their affairs, as well as a basis for orderly development of legal rules. Their lordships nevertheless recognise that too rigid adherence to precedent may lead to injustice in a particular case and also unduly restrict the proper development of the law. They propose therefore to modify their f present practice and, while treating former decisions of this House as normally binding, to depart from a previous decision when it appears right to do so. In this connexion they will bear in mind the danger of disturbing retrospectively the basis on which contracts, settlements of property and fiscal arrangements have been entered into and also the especial need for g certainty as to the criminal law. This announcement is not intended to affect the use of precedent elsewhere than in this House.'

- h [31] The passage from Halsbury's Laws makes a distinction between the position of the Criminal and Civil Divisions of the Court of Appeal but there is no general power in the Court of Appeal (Criminal Division) equivalent to that contained in the practice statement.

- i [32] That the position in the criminal jurisdiction of the Court of Appeal should be different from that in the civil is derived from the judgment of Diplock LJ in R v Gould [1968] 1 All ER 849 at 851, [1968] 2 QB 65 at 68–69. The relevant passage reads as follows:

- j 'In its criminal jurisdiction, which it has inherited from the Court of Criminal Appeal, the Court of Appeal does not apply the doctrine of stare decisis with the same rigidity as in its civil jurisdiction. If on due consideration we were to be of opinion that the law had been either misapplied or misunderstood in an earlier decision of this court, or its predecessor the Court of Criminal Appeal, we should be entitled to depart from the view as to the law expressed in the earlier decision notwithstanding that the case could not be brought within any of the exceptions laid down in Young v. Bristol Aeroplane Co., Ltd. ([1944] 2 All ER 293, [1944] KB 718) as justifying the Court of Appeal in refusing to follow one of its own decisions in a civil case (R. v. Taylor ([1950] 2 All ER 170, [1950] 2 KB 368)). A fortiori we are bound to give effect to the law as we think it is if the previous decision to the contrary effect is one of which the ratio decidendi conflicts with that of other decisions of this court or its predecessors of co-ordinate jurisdiction.’

[33] What Lord Diplock said in R v Gould has to be read in the light of his later comment in DPP v Merriman [1972] 3 All ER 42 at 58, [1973] AC 584 at 605. There he stated:

‘These decisions it rightly treated as binding, for although the Criminal Division of the Court of Appeal is not so strictly bound by its own previous decisions as is the Civil Division, its liberty to depart from a precedent which it is convinced was erroneous is restricted to cases where the departure is in favour of the accused. This would not be the case in the instant appeal.’

[34] There is nothing to suggest in DPP v Merriman that Lord Diplock was reminded of what he said in R v Gould. We appreciate that there may be a case for not interpreting the law contrary to a previous authority in a manner that would mean that an offender who otherwise would not have committed an offence would be held to have committed an offence. However, we do not understand why that should apply to a situation where a defendant, as here, wishes to rely upon a wrongly decided case to provide a technical defence. While justice for a defendant is extremely important, justice for the public at large is also important. So is the maintenance of confidence in the criminal justice system. If the result in R v Palmer (No 1) [2003] 1 Cr App R (S) 572 had to be applied to other cases even though the Court of Appeal had acted in ignorance of the appropriate approach this would indeed, reveal a most unattractive picture of our criminal justice system’s ability to protect the public.

[35] Here we prefer the approach indicated in Bennion on Statutory Interpretation (4th edn, 2002) p 134 which states:

‘The basis of the per incuriam doctrine is that a decision given in the absence of relevant information cannot safely be relied on. This applies whenever it is at least probable that if the information had been known the decision would have been affected by it.’

[36] It is now convenient to refer to another argument advanced by Mr Walker. He submits that the issue raised in R v Sekhon, R v McFaul, R v Knights [2003] 3 All ER 508 was not the same issue as that in R v Palmer and therefore that the views in R v Sekhon about R v Palmer should not be regarded as necessary for the decision in R v Sekhon. This argument of Mr Walker misses the point. Although R v Sekhon was dealing with another procedural failure, namely the need to postpone the confiscation proceedings to a specific date, the approach to interpretation required in both cases was the same. If R v Palmer was correctly decided, then the same approach would have also applied to the contested issue in R v Sekhon. As Lord Evershed MR said in Critchell v Lambeth BC [1957] 2 All ER 417 at 424, [1957] 2 QB 535 at 545:

‘I think that it would be wrong for this court to introduce into a matter already complicated enough, and made complicated by what I cannot help feeling to be the imperfections of the drafting of these Acts, refinements and narrow distinctions between cases which might fall under one section rather than another of the same legislation.’

a [37] This court considers that the law was misunderstood and misapplied in R v Palmer. In R v Palmer the court did not have the opportunity to consider all the authorities which were considered in R v Sekhon. There was also before R v Palmer conflicting decisions, including another decision of this court with Rix LJ presiding in R v Copeland [2002] EWCA 736, [2002] Cr App R (S) 512. The combination of these features provided in our judgment ample grounds for this court to regard the decision in R v Palmer as being irregular and therefore not binding upon this court. We do not, however, accept the contention of Mr Barnard that this court was not entitled to look behind the decision in R v Sekhon. The normal position is that courts will not do so but they undoubtedly have a residual discretion to do so.

b [38] In addition, it is not wholly without significance that the present court is constituted by five members of the Court of Appeal (Criminal Division). We consider a degree of discretion remains in this court to decide whether a previous decision should be treated as a binding precedent in future or not when there are grounds for saying that the decision is wrong. In exercising that residual discretion, the constitution of the court is of relevance. We would here refer to the judgment of Widgery LJ in the five-judge court in R v Newsome, R v Browne [1970] 3 All ER 455, [1970] 2 QB 711. There the court was dealing with the question of a guideline judgment on sentence. In that case, as in R v Sekhon there was good reason to adopt a flexible approach. In R v Sekhon the court made it clear that the discretion to depart from a previous precedent was not to be exercised lightly and we endorse that restrictive and cautious approach.

c [39] It is, however, relevant to note in relation to the Court of Appeal (Criminal Division) that there can be situations when a wrong decision of the Criminal Division can create a greater problem than decisions of the Civil Division with regard to appealing to the House of Lords. There are many situations where in practice there is little prospect of an appeal to the House of Lords because of the requirements, prior to an appeal, of a certificate that there is a point of law of general public importance involved (see s 33 of the Criminal Appeal Act 1968) and the absence of a right to appeal after an acquittal. For example, if a judge of first instance is bound by a decision of the Criminal Division and as a result a defendant is acquitted there will be no right to appeal from that acquittal so there can be no confiscation proceedings that will be subject to appeal, as an order can only be made after the defendant has been convicted. In addition, there will be little if any prospect of the Attorney General being entitled to refer the case to the Court of Appeal never mind the House of Lords if a judge refuses to make a confiscation order. So here, if R v Palmer had been allowed to stand notwithstanding that it was indeed wrongly decided, the consequences are that in a future case there could be considerable difficulty in obtaining a decision from the Lords. The only conceivable route would appear to be a reference to the Court of Appeal in the later case by the Attorney General under his powers to refer an unduly lenient sentence. However, it is doubtful that the refusal to make a confiscation order on the grounds of lack of jurisdiction is in fact an unduly lenient sentence. However, we do not finally decide this point.

d [40] There is no doubt that if the decision of this court in R v Palmer represents the law then it provides very considerable assistance to the appellant, subject to the points made earlier. However, in R v Sekhon in relation to the case of R v Palmer it was stated as follows:

[51] The second is R v Palmer (No 1) [2002] EWCA Crim 2202, [2003] 1 Cr App R (S) 572. In R v Palmer a confiscation order in the total sum of £33,243,812.46 had been made on 23 April 2002. In this court Rix LJ presided.

The court quashed the confiscation order. Two notices under s 72 had been served by the prosecution. As to the first, Rix LJ indicated that the court had “anxiously considered” the submissions that despite inaccuracies it was valid. He observed that he saw the strength in the Crown’s case “that in substance everyone knew where they were going” and that it was clear to all that the appellant was a wealthy man who had profited enormously from his fraud but he concluded “albeit with reluctance”, that the judge was right to find that the first notice was invalid and that the second notice could not make up for its deficiencies. He was of the opinion that the first notice, not having been valid, a second notice served after the confiscation proceedings had commenced could not cure the absence of an effective notice at the outset. The consequence was that it was not possible for the trial court to postpone the confiscation proceedings and proceed to sentence.

[52] The first notice in R v Palmer referred to the wrong section. The explanation as the court pointed out was that it was drafted with the 1995 provisions in mind when that Act was not in force at the relevant time. So the notice referred to the amended s 71(1)(a) when it should have referred to s 72(1) (the 1995 Act did not apply to the proceedings). In addition, it did not refer to the fact that if an order was made it would at least be for £10,000, which in Palmer’s case was hardly likely to be in issue. The errors were due to the notice being on a standard form developed for use when the 1995 provisions applied. Neither the court nor the defendant, if they had seen the notice, would have been under any doubt that the prosecution thought this was a case where confiscation proceedings should continue. It is difficult to conceive that Parliament intended that technical failures of this sort should affect the jurisdiction of the court to make a confiscation order.

[53] The Court of Appeal was, however, without the benefit of the argument advanced before us by Mr Perry. Furthermore, they were influenced by two decisions given by this court which shared the same disadvantage. Those decisions being R v Martin [2001] EWCA Crim 2761, [2002] 2 Cr App R (S) 122 and R v Miranda [2000] 2 Cr App R (S) 347 ...

[55] The question that remains is what is the status of R v Palmer and the other authorities on which it was based. What has happened is that as part of the normal common law process, decision has followed decision extending the principle that there is no jurisdiction if there is a procedural failure from one aspect to another of the confiscation process. R v Palmer is only significant because it dealt with the use of a notice designed for use under a later Act being used as a notice under an earlier Act. Even though the wrong notice was used it could still achieve and did achieve its primary objective of initiating confiscation proceedings. Yet a defendant who had been otherwise properly subjected to a confiscation order in excess of £30m had that order quashed. This is a result that Parliament could not have intended.

[56] For one constitution of this court to hold that a series of cases have been decided per incuriam, is not a course to be lightly taken. There is now new legislation which contains the section to which we have referred above which is designed to prevent repetition of the problem. There are, however, no doubt other cases in the pipeline which could be affected by the earlier authorities which did not consider Mr Perry’s argument. In these circumstances we feel it right to indicate that in our view R v Palmer is wrongly decided and should not be followed and each of the earlier cases to which we have referred should be examined with care to see whether in fact it can be said they should be regarded as doing any more than deciding that a there should be a decision to postpone confiscation proceedings, however generally expressed, prior to the completion of sentencing an offender, if confiscation proceedings are to take place after sentencing.'

[41] We have no doubt we should apply these paragraphs of the judgment in R v Sekhon. They are fatal to the arguments of the appellant on the jurisdiction issue. Any defects in the notice did not deprive the trial judge of jurisdiction.

THE AMOUNT OF THE CONFISCATION ORDER

[42] Next and finally we turn to the complaints concerning Judge Balston's approach to two aspects of the merits of making a confiscation order. First, it is said that he erred in including the sum of £115,000 in the benefit figure and second, it is said that Judge Balston erred in his approach to the assessment of the appellant's realisable assets. The judge made a confiscation order for the full amount of the benefit—namely, £209,351.34.

[43] The benefit of £115,000 is said to have arisen in this way. In the autumn of 1996 the appellant and Young embarked upon a joint enterprise to cheat the public revenue by means of the 'outsourcing companies' fraud. Arising out of his fraudulent transactions Young paid the appellant a total of £38,779.70 by way of commissions. That is not disputed nor is it disputed that that money fell to be included as a 'benefit' of the appellant.

[44] After Customs and Excise had searched Young's premises in March 1997 and effectively brought an end to the fraud, Young transferred £115,000 to the appellant who in turn transferred it to a Swiss account. It is not disputed that the money represented the profit from the fraud. It is said on behalf of the appellant that the purpose of the transfer was to enable the appellant to invest the money on behalf of Young. The appellant subsequently in June and August 1997 repaid a total of £35,000 to Young but retained the balance of £80,000. When the appellant applied for an individual voluntary arrangement, Young was shown as a creditor. Did the transfer of £115,000 constitute a benefit for the appellant arising from the offence alleged in count 16? The answer to that question depends upon whether, under s 71(4) of the 1988 Act (as amended), that money was a benefit obtained by the appellant 'as a result of or in connection with' the commission of an offence. On behalf of the appellant it is said first that the £115,000 was outside the scope of the joint fraudulent enterprise involving the appellant and Young and second that the circumstances in which the appellant had obtained control of this money were such that it cannot be described as a benefit obtained 'as a result of or in connection with' the offence.

[45] We have unhesitatingly concluded that the appellant did 'obtain' this money 'as a result of or in connection with' the offence charged in count 16 and that accordingly to that extent he had benefited from the offence. There was the clearest evidence before the judge that this money was obtained as a result of or in connection with the offence of cheating the public revenue because it represented a part of the proceeds of the fraud upon which together the appellant and Young had embarked. The fact that by virtue of some private arrangement part of the proceeds passed from Young's hands into the appellant's is neither here nor there. When that occurred he 'obtained' the property and the value of the property determined the extent of his benefit.

[46] As to the judge's assessment of the appellant's realisable assets, it is settled law (see R v Barwick [2001] 1 Cr App R (S) 445) that the onus of proving the 'benefit' obtained is upon the prosecution. If a defendant wishes to contend that the amount which can be realised falls short of the benefit figure the burden is upon him to establish that to the civil standard. The court said (at 453):

‘... the scheme of the Act requires the court to perform two distinct and discrete tasks. First, to determine the benefit. Secondly, to determine the amount that might be realised at the time the order is made, which may be very different. Further, the amount that might be realised may be quite unrelated to the identifiable proceeds of the offence, e.g. a lottery win, inheritance, or other lawfully acquired property. In the end, the task of the court at the second stage is to determine the amount “appearing to the court” to be the amount that might be realised. But once the benefit has been proved, it is permissible and ought normally to be the approach of the court, to conclude that the benefit remains available until the defendant proves otherwise; subject to the issue of changes in the value of money ...’

[47] That approach was clearly adopted by Judge Balston:

‘Turning to the question of what assets are realisable for the purpose of making a confiscation order, the accepted approach of the court is to conclude that the benefit remains available until the defendant proves otherwise. This places on him the burden of proving that the realisable assets available to him are less than the benefit he has been found to have received. He must prove it on the civil standard of proof.’

[48] Over the following 15 pages of transcript Judge Balston proceeded to give clear and unassailable reasons for concluding that the appellant had failed to make a full disclosure of his assets. Furthermore Judge Balston was ‘satisfied that he has other assets which may well exceed the deductions he is claiming’ by way of living and business expenses.

[49] In the result it is not surprising that Judge Balston was unable to conclude that the appellant had satisfied him on a balance of probability that the value of his benefit exceeded the value of his realisable assets. In this case, unlike in many, Judge Balston was not confronted with an acceptance on the part of the prosecution that the value of the realisable assets (whatever it might be) fell far short of the benefit figure. It was the prosecution’s case here that the assets did exceed the benefit figure and that one significant component of his realisable assets was his equitable interest in the matrimonial home at 80 London Road, Hailsham. The appellant claimed that his wife arranged the mortgage and purchased the property herself in the late 1980s. He maintained he had no interest in it. It is true that the property was registered in the name of his wife. Judge Balston, however, investigated the background to this transaction in some detail. He concluded that some years earlier (in the early 1980s)—

‘There was an agreement between the defendant and his wife that for the future they would so arrange their affairs that their assets would be unassailable by the defendant’s creditors.’

[50] Although not accepted by the defence the prosecution’s valuation of the property was £402,500. There were two endowment policies charged to the building society with a surrender value of about £61,799. It was calculated that following repayment of the mortgages and the costs of the sale there should be an equity of £205,746. Contrary to the appellant’s contention the prosecution claimed he had a 50% interest in the equity. The assets thus available from this source alone amounted to £102,873.

a [51] Quite apart from not accepting either the figures or the fact of his interest in the property the appellant further claimed that Barclays Bank had a charge on the property. As to that Judge Balston while accepting that a caution was registered against the title, declined to allow any reduction, attributable to the charge, from the value of this realisable asset. He said:

b 'There is no evidence that has been placed before me that confirms that the debt to the bank has not been paid. There is no evidence to tell me how the debt was originally incurred. It could, for example, have arisen from a guarantee by Mrs Simpson of a debt owed by the defendant to the bank. There is no evidence as to the amount now due under the charging order, if indeed the money has not been paid. The onus is upon the defendant to satisfy me about these matters. He has not done so.'

c [52] Further, as to the policies Judge Balston said:

d 'It is further contended by the defence that the surrender value of the life policies is not an asset available to the defendant. I disagree. He has supplied no details of these policies other than the surrender values. The inference that I draw from their existence is that they are additional security for the payment of the mortgages and that when the mortgages are redeemed or the policies mature, the proceeds will go towards extinguishing the mortgage debt.'

e [53] Finally as to whether or not the appellant did have an equitable interest in the property Judge Balston said:

f 'I have also concluded that he has an equitable interest in the house and land at Hamelsham Manor, not only because of his interest in the proceeds of sale of 13 Howlett Drive but also because he has failed to satisfy me as to the origin of the moneys he says were found by Mrs Simpson. Additionally, his statement that he was paying rent for the use of the property by his business is again unsupported by any evidence and if it is true, is a contribution to the mortgage repayments in disguise.'

g [54] The appellant's wife did not give evidence. Of her absence from the witness box Judge Balston said this:

h 'One witness who might greatly have helped the court is Mrs Simpson. I am told there are matrimonial problems between her and the defendant, but one might have expected her to have been called to give evidence as, if what the defendant tells me about her part in this affair is true, her evidence could have been expected to be of assistance to the defendant.'

j [55] We find it is impossible to fault Judge Balston's approach to this particular issue. His reasons for rejecting the appellant's claim as to the extent of his assets seem to us to be unanswerable and in our judgment the conclusion that the appellant had failed to satisfy Judge Balston that the confiscation order should be other than in the sum of the benefit figure was inevitable.

[56] Accordingly, the appeal is dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Inland Revenue Commissioners v Bebb Travel plc

[2003] EWCA Civ 563

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

WARD, MAY AND ARDEN LJJ

24 MARCH, 16 APRIL 2003

Employment – Remuneration – National minimum wage – Non-compliance – Whether compliance officer having power to serve enforcement notice in respect of employer’s failure to pay national minimum wage to former workers – National Minimum Wage Act 1998, s 19.

A compliance officer acting for and on behalf of the Revenue concluded that the respondent employer had not paid the national minimum wage to certain former workers. Section 19(1)^a of the National Minimum Wage Act 1998 provided that if an officer was of the opinion that a worker who ‘qualifies’ for the national minimum wage had not been remunerated for any pay reference period by his employer at a rate at least equal to the national minimum wage, the officer could serve an enforcement notice requiring the employer to remunerate the worker for pay reference periods ending on or after the date of the notice at a rate equal to the national minimum wage. Section 19(2) provided that an enforcement notice could ‘also’ require ‘the employer’ to pay to ‘the worker’ the difference between the wages received and the minimum wage in respect of the employer’s previous failure to remunerate the worker at a rate at least equal to the national minimum wage. The officer issued an enforcement notice under s 19, requiring the employer to pay the former workers the difference between the wages received and the national minimum wage. The employer appealed to an employment tribunal, contending that the notice was invalid since it did not relate to any pay reference period for present workers ending on or after the date of service of the notice, but only to past pay periods in respect of past workers. The tribunal allowed the appeal and rescinded the notice. That decision was upheld by the Employment Appeal Tribunal. The Revenue appealed to the Court of Appeal, contending, inter alia, that s 19(1) could be construed to refer to workers who had ceased to be employed, and that s 19(2) was not dependent on the power to issue an enforcement notice provided by s 19(1), but rather empowered the service of an independent enforcement notice, relating to a worker no longer employed by an employer.

Held – On the true construction of s 19 of the 1998 Act, a valid enforcement notice could only relate to present workers in respect of present and future wages, and also, if appropriate, in respect of past wages. There was thus no power to issue an enforcement notice in respect of past workers for past pay. The use of the present tense in ‘qualifies’ in s 19(1) was deliberate. Construed in its context, it made no sense to say that an individual was a qualifying worker when he was in fact a past worker. The emphasis on the present was confirmed by that part of s 19(1) which set out the terms of the enforcement notice that the officer

^a Section 19 is set out at [12], below

- a was empowered to serve. The notice could require payment of the minimum wage for the current and future period. Current and future periods could only relate to present workers. Moreover, s 19(2) was not a freestanding provision. 'The employer' and 'the worker' in sub-s (2) were those referred to in sub-s (1), leading to the conclusion that the enforcement notice referred to in sub-s (2) was the same as that referred to in sub-s (1). The dependency of sub-s (2) on sub-s (1)
- b was conclusively demonstrated by permitting the enforcement notice 'also' to require the employer to pay up for his past failures to remunerate properly. The ordinary natural meaning of 'also' was 'in addition'. Under sub-s (1) present and future payments of the national minimum wage could be required in respect of a present worker, and under sub-s (2) past payments could also be required to be paid, ie past in addition to present and future. Accordingly, the appeal would be
- c dismissed (see [23]–[25], [27], [31], [34], [35], [38]–[44], below).

Decision of the Employment Appeal Tribunal [2002] 4 All ER 534 affirmed.

Notes

- d For the power of an officer to issue an enforcement notice, see 16 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn) (2000 reissue) para 186.

For the National Minimum Wage Act 1998, s 19, see 16 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2000 reissue) 895.

Cases referred to in judgments

- e A-G's Ref (No 1 of 1988) [1989] 2 All ER 1, [1989] AC 971, [1989] 2 WLR 729, HL.
M (a minor) (care orders: threshold conditions), Re [1994] 3 All ER 298, [1994] 2 AC 424, [1994] 3 WLR 558, HL.

Appeal

- f The Inland Revenue Commissioners appealed with permission of the Employment Appeal Tribunal (Judge J R Reid QC, G Mills and P A L Parker CBE) from its decision on 16 August 2002 ([2002] 4 All ER 534) dismissing their appeal from the decision of an employment tribunal sitting at Cardiff, and sent to the parties on 11 September 2001, rescinding an enforcement notice under s 19 of the National Minimum Wage Act 1998 served on the respondent, Bebb Travel plc,
- g on 6 October 2000. The facts are set out in the judgment of Ward LJ.

John Cavanagh QC and Jennifer Eady (instructed by the Solicitor of Inland Revenue) for the Inland Revenue.

Daniel Oudkerk (instructed by Dechert) for Bebb.

h

Cur adv vult

16 April 2003. The following judgments were delivered.

WARD LJ.

- j [1] This is an appeal about the enforcement procedure available under the National Minimum Wage Act 1998. The employment tribunal decided in a decision promulgated on 11 September 2001 that an enforcement notice served under the 1998 Act be rescinded and on 16 August 2002 the Employment Appeal Tribunal (the appeal tribunal) upheld that decision (see [2002] 4 All ER 534). Because the point was thought to be 'one of some general significance', the appeal tribunal granted permission to appeal.

THE STATUTORY BACKGROUND

[2] The 1998 Act came into force on 1 April 1999. It gives 'workers' the right to be paid at least the national minimum wage as fixed from time to time by the National Minimum Wage Regulations 1999, SI 1999/584. At the time with which we are concerned the minimum wage was £3.60 per hour but it has since risen to £4.20 and will rise again in October to £4.50 an hour. 'Worker' is defined by s 54(3) of the 1998 Act to mean: '... an individual who has entered into or works under (or, where the employment has ceased, worked under)—(a) a contract of employment ...' One notes that worker thus defined includes the individual whose employment has ceased and for convenience I shall call such a person a 'past worker' to distinguish him or her from the individual currently working under a contract of employment (a 'present worker').

[3] In order to determine whether an individual is being paid the national minimum wage, it is necessary to determine the hourly rate of pay. This is calculated as an average hourly rate in respect of a 'pay reference period' which is either one month or, if the worker is paid by reference to a shorter period than a month, that shorter period (see reg 10). Where remuneration is received at some date after the pay reference period during which it was earned, eg bonus pay or commission, then the 1999 regulations provide that it is to be allocated to the period during which it was earned rather than that when it was received. The regulations provide a detailed set of rules for calculating pay and hours for the purposes of the 1998 Act, including detailed rules on how various types of payment are to be treated (see regs 30–37) and as to how different categories of work are to be treated (see regs 15–29A).

[4] Employers are under a duty to keep records in respect of each worker for a minimum of three years so as to be able to demonstrate that the worker is being paid at a rate at least equal to the national minimum wage (see reg 38). A right to inspect those records is provided both to the individual worker who suspects that he has not been paid the national minimum wage (see s 10 of the 1998 Act) and to an enforcement officer (see s 14). The officers are appointed by the Secretary of State and he has arranged that the Inland Revenue shall provide those officers.

[5] These officers are given wide-ranging powers. In addition to having the right to inspect records, they may demand that information be given to them and they may even enter premises to exercise those powers. Relevantly for the purpose of this appeal, the officers are given power to issue enforcement notices under s 19 and if that notice is not complied with then the officer has a power to sue for wages on behalf of the worker (see s 20) or serve a penalty notice (see s 21).

[6] The worker is given a range of new rights. Under s 17 the worker is to be taken to be entitled under his contract to be paid as additional remuneration any shortfall between his contractual wage and the minimum wage. He is able to enforce that right by action taken in the county court. The worker is also given the right not to suffer detriment (see s 23) and can enforce that right by proceeding in the employment tribunal. Dismissal may be automatically regarded as unfair (see s 25).

[7] Just to emphasise the seriousness of this legislation, s 31 creates an offence for refusing or wilfully neglecting to pay the minimum wage and an employer guilty of the offence is liable to a fine not exceeding level 5 on the standard scale ie not exceeding £5,000. In civil proceedings the ordinary burden of proof is a reversed because it is presumed that the individual qualifies for the minimum wage unless the contrary is established.

THE ORIGINS OF THIS DISPUTE

b [8] Bebb Travel plc (Bebb) operates a coach service. It employed stewards and stewardesses on the coaches to carry out various tasks for the company for which they received their basic pay. The actual hourly rate of remuneration calculated in accordance with the 1999 regulations was below the applicable hourly rate of national minimum wage. The stewards and stewardesses were, however, allowed by Bebb to provide and sell refreshments on the coach and to retain any profits made from those sales but to bear any losses. They were treated for that purpose as self-employed persons.

c [9] In February and in May 2000 a national minimum wage compliance officer acting for and on behalf of the Inland Revenue visited Bebb's premises and examined the wage records. In May 2000 Bebb dismissed all its stewards and stewardesses. It is not suggested in this case that the dismissal was in any way related to the officer's visits: in fact Bebb had good and proper cause to terminate this arrangement and all the workers were properly paid redundancy in accordance with their rights.

d [10] The compliance officer visited again in September and having formed the opinion that the workers had not been paid the minimum wage, he issued an enforcement notice under s 19 of the 1998 Act on 6 October 2000. That enforcement notice related to 25 of the former stewards and stewardesses. All e had long since ceased to work for Bebb, some for a very long time, for example one lady ended her employment with the company in April 1999. The enforcement notice required Bebb to pay each of the workers sums due to them under s 17 of the 1998 Act (the difference between the wages received and the minimum wage). The sums due ranged from £26.52 to £4,892.45, the total f shortfall being £37,649.43. Bebb was required to pay that sum by 13 October 2000. The company was informed of its right to appeal but was also informed that failure to comply with the notice might result in the company becoming liable to pay the financial penalty under s 21 of the 1998 Act. That penalty accrued at the rate of £7.40 [sic] in respect of each worker to whom the failure to comply related for each day that Bebb failed to comply with the whole or part of g the notice. The penalties due to date would therefore be in the region of £160,000.

THE APPEAL TO THE EMPLOYMENT TRIBUNAL

h [11] Bebb exercised the right of appeal given under the 1998 Act and sought an order that the enforcement notice be rescinded. Bebb contended that the enforcement notice was invalid as it did not relate to any pay reference period for present workers ending on or after the date of service of the notice but only to past pay periods in respect of past workers. The argument depends upon the proper construction of s 19 of the 1998 Act.

j THE SECTIONS OF THE 1998 ACT BEARING UPON THE POINT

[12] Section 19 lies at the heart of the appeal. It provides as follows:

'Power of officer to issue enforcement notice.—(1) If an officer acting for the purposes of this Act is of the opinion that a worker who qualifies for the national minimum wage has not been remunerated for any pay reference period by his employer at a rate at least equal to the national minimum wage, the officer may serve a notice (an "enforcement notice") on the employer requiring the employer to remunerate the worker for pay reference periods ending on or after the date of the notice at a rate equal to the national minimum wage. a

(2) An enforcement notice may also require the employer to pay to the worker within such time as may be specified in the notice the sum due to the worker under section 17 above in respect of the employer's previous failure to remunerate the worker at a rate at least equal to the national minimum wage. b

(3) The same enforcement notice may relate to more than one worker (and, where it does so, may be so framed as to relate to workers specified in the notice or to workers of a description so specified).

(4) A person on whom an enforcement notice is served may appeal against the notice before the end of the period of four weeks following the date of service of the notice. c

(5) An appeal under subsection (4) above lies to an employment tribunal.

(6) On an appeal under subsection (4) above, the employment tribunal shall dismiss the appeal unless it is established—(a) that, in the case of the worker or workers to whom the enforcement notice relates, the facts are such that an officer who was aware of them would have had no reason to serve any enforcement notice on the appellant; or (b) where the enforcement notice relates to two or more workers, that the facts are such that an officer who was aware of them would have had no reason to include some of the workers in any enforcement notice served on the appellant; or (c) where the enforcement notice imposes a requirement under subsection (2) in relation to a worker,—(i) that no sum was due to the worker under section 17 above; or (ii) that the amount specified in the notice as the sum due to the worker under that section is incorrect; and in this subsection any reference to a worker includes a reference to a person whom the enforcement notice purports to treat as a worker. d

(7) Where an appeal is allowed by virtue of paragraph (a) of subsection (6) above, the employment tribunal shall rescind the enforcement notice. e

(8) If, in a case where subsection (7) above does not apply, an appeal is allowed by virtue of paragraph (b) or (c) of subsection (6) above—(a) the employment tribunal shall rectify the enforcement notice; and (b) the enforcement notice shall have effect as if it had originally been served as so rectified. f

(9) The powers of an employment tribunal in allowing an appeal in a case where subsection (8) above applies shall include power to rectify, as the tribunal may consider appropriate in consequence of its decision on the appeal, any penalty notice which has been served under section 21 below in respect of the enforcement notice. g

(10) Where a penalty notice is rectified under subsection (9) above, it shall have effect as if it had originally been served as so rectified. h

[13] Section 19(2) refers to s 17. Section 17 provides: i

'(1) If a worker who qualifies for the national minimum wage is remunerated for any pay reference period by his employer at a rate which is less than the national minimum wage, the worker shall be taken to be entitled under his contract to be paid, as additional remuneration in respect of that period, the amount described in subsection (2) below.'

a (2) That amount is the difference between—(a) the relevant remuneration received by the worker for the pay reference period; and (b) the relevant remuneration which the worker would have received for that period had he been remunerated by the employer at a rate equal to the national minimum wage.

b (3) In subsection (2) above, “relevant remuneration” means remuneration which falls to be brought into account for the purposes of regulations under section (2) above.’

[14] It is perhaps necessary to refer to other sections in a little detail. Section 20 gives power to the officer to sue on behalf of the worker:

c ‘(1) If an enforcement notice is not complied with in whole or in part, an officer acting for the purposes of this Act may, on behalf of any worker to whom the notice relates,—(a) present a complaint under section 23(1)(a) of the Employment Rights Act 1996 (deductions from worker’s wages in contravention of section 13 of that Act) to an employment tribunal in respect of any sums due to the worker by virtue of section 17 above; or ...
d (c) commence other civil proceedings for the recovery, on a claim in contract, of any sums due to the worker by virtue of section 17 above.

(2) The powers conferred by subsection (1) above for the recovery of sums due from an employer to a worker shall not be in derogation of any right which the worker may have to recover such sums by civil proceedings.’

e [15] Section 21 provides for a financial penalty for non-compliance. By sub-s (1) it gives the officer satisfied that there has been a failure to comply with the enforcement notice power to serve a penalty notice requiring the employer to pay a financial penalty to the Secretary of State. Subsection (3) provides:

f ‘The amount of the financial penalty shall be calculated at a rate equal to twice the hourly amount of the national minimum wage (as in force at the date of the penalty notice) in respect of each worker to whom the failure to comply relates for each day during which the failure to comply has continued in respect of the worker.’

g There was some confusion about the application of these penalty provisions. Mr John Cavanagh QC, who appeared for the Inland Revenue, was minded at first to contend that the penalty related only to the period between the time of failure to pay under the enforcement notice and the time of the penalty notice but he later received instructions from the Inland Revenue confirming that the Inland Revenue were of the view that the penalties would continue to be payable day after day until payment was actually made. It is a view with which I agree.
h Subsection (8) provides that any sums received by the Secretary of State by virtue of this section shall be paid into the consolidated fund. Mr Cavanagh therefore accepts that this is a penal provision with the consequence that if there are two reasonable constructions to be given to the 1998 Act, the court should adopt the more lenient construction. But this applies only where the court is left in real j doubt about the true meaning.

[16] Mr Daniel Oudkerk, for Bebb, draws our attention to s 28(1) which provides:

‘Where in any civil proceedings any question arises as to whether an individual qualifies or qualified at any time for the national minimum wage, it shall be presumed that the individual qualifies or, as the case may be, qualified at that time for the national minimum wage unless the contrary is established.’ (My emphasis.) a [17] In my judgment it is also necessary to refer closely to some of the definitions. I have already given the definition of ‘worker’. Section 55(1) provides:

‘In this Act, unless the context otherwise requires—“enforcement notice” shall be construed in accordance with section 19 above ... “person who qualifies for the national minimum wage” shall be construed in accordance with section 1(2) above; and related expressions shall be construed accordingly ...’ b

Section 1(2) provides: c

‘A person qualifies for the national minimum wage if he is an individual who—(a) is a worker; (b) is working, or ordinarily works, in the United Kingdom under his contract; and (c) has ceased to be of compulsory school age.’

Section 1(1) is also relevant as also providing that whole raison d’être for the 1998 Act: d

‘A person who qualifies for the national minimum wage shall be remunerated by his employer in respect of his work in any pay reference period at a rate which is not less than the national minimum wage.’

THE DECISION OF THE EMPLOYMENT TRIBUNAL

[18] The essential findings of the employment tribunal were these: e

‘7. ... In our view the wording of s 19(1) is clear. We can see no ambiguity. The subsection empowers the officer to serve a notice where he is of the opinion that the worker “qualifies” for the national minimum wage. That is in the present. The situation with which this case is concerned does not relate to workers who qualified when the enforcement notice was issued. It relates to past workers who in the past had qualified for the national minimum wage. f

8. Also the wording to remunerate “for pay reference periods ending on or after the date of the notice” could hardly be clearer. The empowering subsection is concerned purely with pay reference periods subsisting in the month leading up to the notice or after the notice. In the present case there was no pay reference period subsisting in the month leading up to the date when the notice was served. There had not been one for four-and-a-half months ... g

10. ... Subsection (2) does not empower an officer to serve notice. It merely empowers him to include previous failures in a validly served notice. There is nothing in sub-s (2) capable of altering the clear meaning of sub-s (1). It merely adds to it as is clearly indicated by use of “also”, and by reference not to a worker and an employer but ‘the’ worker and ‘the’ employer, who can only be the worker and employer referred to in sub-s (1) where the worker “qualifies” in the present.’ h
j

[19] The employment tribunal concluded that Bebb had established that an officer aware of the fact that there had been no pay reference periods for four-and-a-half months prior to the date of the issue of the notice would have had no reason to serve a notice on that date. Accordingly the tribunal allowed Bebb’s appeal and rescinded the notice.

THE DECISION OF THE APPEAL TRIBUNAL

- a [20] The appeal tribunal ([2002] 4 All ER 534) dismissed the Inland Revenue's appeal. There was a carefully reasoned judgment delivered by Judge JR Reid QC. He carefully analysed the language and concluded that, although there were oddities in the 1998 Act, these did not persuade the appeal tribunal that the employment tribunal were wrong. One of the oddities of the 1998 Act they noted
- b was that an officer bringing civil proceedings could be met by a Limitation Act defence, but the daily penalty under s 21 for failing to pay the statute-barred amount would continue to run until payment. Another oddity was that if there were two workers who were underpaid and one left just before the pay period to which the enforcement notice related, then the notice can require back payments to the one who has stayed on but not to the one who has left. Their conclusion
- c (at [20]) was:

'Subsection (2) provides a summary way of obtaining underpayments for existing workers. It was not intended to enable or require enforcement officers to investigate and initiate recovery proceedings for workers who had long since moved on.'

THE INLAND REVENUE'S SUBMISSIONS

- d [21] I hope I do justice to Mr Cavanagh's sustained submissions by summarising them as follows. (i) Section 19(1) is in two parts. The first describes the threshold for its operation, viz the officer being of the opinion that a worker who qualifies
- e has not received the national minimum wage. If the threshold is met then the second part describes the power the officer may exercise, viz to serve an enforcement notice requiring the employer to remunerate the worker. (ii) He accepts that if s 19(2) gives a separate power not parasitic upon s 19(1), then s 19(2) must be read as if the first part of s 19(1) is imported into it. (iii) He has to accept that, because s 19(1) is concerned with the requirement that the
- f employer remunerate the worker for a pay reference period which ends on or after the date of the notice, it must necessarily therefore contemplate payment to a worker who is in employment at the time of that pay reference period, i.e a present worker. Nevertheless he submits it can (not necessarily must) also be construed to refer to workers who have ceased to be employed. Section 19(1)
- g does look back because it contemplates the power to issue enforcement notices being given in respect of past failures to pay the minimum wage in that: (a) 'has not been remunerated' contemplates a past event; (b) 'for any pay reference period' (my emphasis) makes it plain that the operation of the subsection is not confined to present and/or future pay reference periods, and must be capable of referring to past periods; (c) in any event it may not be possible to determine that
- h there has been a failure to pay the minimum wage in respect of a current period if, as is possible, part of the remuneration is to be made in the future, for example, by way of a bonus. The officer would in those circumstances have to be looking back at past performance. (iv) 'Worker' as defined in s 54(3) includes a worker whose employment has ceased and so the worker who qualifies must include the
- j past worker. (v) 'Qualifies' has a timeless effect so that it can include: (a) those currently employed where a current failure to pay can be demonstrated; (b) those currently employed where a past failure only can be shown and who were qualified at that time in the past; and also (c) those no longer qualified at present but who were qualified at some time in the past. (vi) Even though his construction strains the natural meaning of the words, it is not an impossible construction: compare the way the House of Lords construed the words 'is suffering ... significant harm' in s 31(2) of the Children Act 1989 and decided that in that instance 'is' means 'was': see Re M (a minor) (care orders: threshold conditions) [1994] 3 All ER 298, [1994] 2 AC 424. (vii) Section 19(2) is not dependent upon the power to issue the enforcement notice provided by s 19(1). If it were, s 19(2) would read 'the enforcement notice' not 'an enforcement notice'. (viii) If s 19(2) was intended to be parasitic, the legislature would have said 'an enforcement notice under s 19(1)' or words to that effect to make the position clear. (ix) 'May also' are permissive words which do not connote any necessary dependency upon s 19(1). 'Also' for this purpose means 'further, in addition, besides, too'. Section 19(2) should be read in the sense that besides the circumstances which might apply under s 19(1) an enforcement notice may be issued in the circumstances envisaged by s 19(2). As the skeleton argument puts it: "I may run and I may also jump" does not imply that the two actions must be carried out simultaneously or that one is necessarily dependent upon the other.' (x) 'The employer' and 'the worker' in s 19(2) refer not to the employer and the worker described in s 19(1) but to the employer and worker under s 17. (xi) The language of s 19(1) and (2) is at least ambiguous. A construction should therefore be given which best gives effect to the purpose of the 1998 Act. (xii) Even if, as he concedes, the enforcement provisions of ss 19 and 21 are penal in their effect, the court must still adopt a purposive approach notwithstanding a strained meaning to the language results. See the approach adopted in A-G's Ref (No 1 of 1988) [1989] 2 All ER 1, [1989] AC 971. (xiii) The purpose is to protect a vulnerable body of workers especially those in the 'fringe economy'. These workers being vulnerable through lack of knowledge of their rights, impecuniosity, or the sheer disadvantage of the misfortune of being menial, the reservation to them of a right to issue proceedings themselves is an insufficient protection. That is the mischief which is cured by providing an independent enforcement procedure taken by a third party. That protects the underpaid workers from being victimised in one way or another, for example, by dismissal or refusal to re-engage or from the reluctance of a new employer to engage a known 'troublemaker'. Past workers are just as entitled to protection as present workers. (xiv) The appeal tribunal's construction produced the recognised 'oddity' that an unscrupulous employer—and there is no suggestion whatever in this case that Bebb is an unscrupulous employer—can evade the consequences of an enforcement notice by sacking their workers as soon as inquiries by an enforcement officer create the obvious risk that notice will follow in due course.

BEBB'S SUBMISSIONS

[22] Mr Oudkerk submits: (i) Section 19(1) clearly contemplates operation in respect of current workers and s 19(1) cannot apply to former workers. (ii) 'Qualifies' in the clause 'a worker who qualifies' is expressed in the present tense. The present tense is appropriate for s 19(1). The words mean what they say. Where the legislature wished to refer to a worker who was qualified, the 1998 Act says so (see s 28). (iii) Since s 19(1) defines an 'enforcement notice', the words 'an enforcement notice' in s 19(2) must refer to the same enforcement notice contemplated by s 19(1). The exercise of the power must be as prescribed by s 19(1) which is confined to current workers. (iv) 'The employer' and 'the worker' in s 19(2) also refer back to s 19(1). (v) In the phrase 'may also require', 'also' means in addition to the requirements capable of being imposed under s 19(1). (vi) Since the obligation under the enforcement notice is to pay remuneration to the worker, the Inland Revenue's construction would place a potentially

- a impossible burden on the employer where the workers have disappeared, especially if, as is the case, there is no time limit for the issue of the enforcement notice and so steps can, at least in theory, be taken years after the cessation of employment and even years after the obligation to keep records has expired. (vii) No statutory purpose can be divined for s 19(1) and (2). (viii) The former employee is not without his remedy: he or she can sue in the county court.
- b (ix) Workers who suffer 'detriment' are given rights under ss 23–25.

MY ANALYSIS OF THE POSITION

- [23] I start with s 19(1). I agree that the first part sets out what conditions must exist to give the officer the power to serve the enforcement notice. He must be of the opinion that 'a worker who qualifies for the national minimum wage' has not been properly remunerated 'for any pay reference period'. Use of the present tense in 'qualifies' was deliberate: where the draughtsman wished to distinguish between the present tense and the past tense, he was capable of making the distinction explicit (see s 28). There is a further indication that the present tense is intended. The clause 'a worker who qualifies for the national minimum wage' is defined in s 55 which refers back to s 1(2). That too is couched in the present tense—'a person qualifies ... if he is an individual who—(a) is a worker' (my emphasis). Because the whole clause is defined the defined meaning must prevail and it cannot, in my judgment, be permissible to take the word 'worker' out of the clause and give it the different meaning conferred by s 54(3). Construed in its context—'a worker who qualifies'—it makes no sense to say that an individual is a qualifying worker when he is in fact a past worker.
- e

- [24] The emphasis on the present is confirmed by the second part of s 19(1) which sets out the terms of the enforcement notice the officer is empowered to serve. That enforcement notice may require the employer to remunerate the worker 'for pay reference periods ending on or after the date of the notice', i.e. to require payment of the minimum wage for the current and future period. Current and future pay periods can only relate to present workers. They cannot be made to apply to past workers. The view of the employment tribunal was correct.
- f

- [25] As for s 19(2), I accept Mr Cavanagh's point that any dependence upon s 19(1) would have been clear if s 19(2) had referred to 'the enforcement notice', as opposed to 'an enforcement notice'. 'An enforcement notice' by itself more naturally suggests some notice other than the notice referred to in sub-s (1). Mr Cavanagh accepts, however, and he is right to accept, that this is but one straw in the wind. Other straws are blown more strongly in the opposite direction. The employment notice under s 19(2) may also require 'the employer to pay to the worker' the sums due (my emphasis). If s 19(2) was free-standing, it is impossible to know who that employer and that worker is. The more natural meaning is then they are the employer and worker referred to in sub-s (1), leading to the conclusion that the enforcement notice referred to in sub-s (2) is the same enforcement notice referred to in sub-s (1).
- g

- [26] Then there is the reference to 'the sum due to the worker under section 17 above'. Section 17 applies to 'a worker who qualifies for the national minimum wage', which brings in ss 55 and 1(2), and, for the reasons already given, this is a reference to a present worker, not a past worker.
- h

- [27] The dependency of sub-s (2) on sub-s (1) is to my mind conclusively demonstrated by permitting the enforcement notice 'also' to require the employer to pay up for his past failures to remunerate properly. The ordinary
- j

natural meaning of 'also' is 'in addition'. Under sub-s (1) present and future payments of the national minimum wage can be required in respect of a present worker and under sub-s (2) past payments can also be required to be paid, ie past in addition to present and future. a [28] In my judgment there is a problem with the Inland Revenue's contention that 'also' means 'besides' in the sense that if 'besides' the enforcement notice issued under s 19(1), a 'further'—and necessarily different—enforcement notice can be issued under s 19(2). The problem, as it seems to me, is that if s 19(2) is independent of s 19(1) then there is no indication in the language of s 19(2), read in isolation, of the threshold that has to be crossed before the notice can be issued. 'Enforcement notice' is a defined phrase and s 55 requires it to be construed in accordance with s 19. Section 19(1) contains the real clue because in s 19(1) the notice which the officer is empowered to serve is given a special meaning—'the officer may serve a notice (an "enforcement notice")'. Consequently 'an enforcement notice', whether for the purpose of sub-ss (1) or (2) is the notice the officer may serve if he is of the opinion that the worker is a worker who qualifies. We are back to the present tense and to the restriction explicit in sub-s (1) that 'an enforcement notice' can only relate to a present worker not a past worker. b

c
d

[29] Subsection (4) gives a person on whom an enforcement notice is served—which must include an enforcement notice served under sub-s (2)—the right to appeal against 'the notice'. On an appeal the employment tribunal shall dismiss the appeal unless it is established under sub-s (6)(a) that in the case of the worker to whom the enforcement notice relates, the facts are such that an officer who was aware of them would have no reason to serve any enforcement notice on the appellant. So the enforcement notice served under s 19(2) is to be judged against the facts of which the officer should have been aware. This must be a reference to the threshold requirement in s 19(1) that he be of the opinion that there is a worker who qualifies for the national minimum wage and that that worker is not being properly remunerated. Everything points to the precondition for the service of the notice set by sub-s (1) being carried into sub-s (2). It is all one of a piece. e
f

[30] Mr Cavanagh has to accept that some preconditions have to be implied into sub-s (2) and he concedes that the first part of sub-s (1) must be implied into sub-s (2). As soon as he does that, his case is dead. If, for reasons I have set out, the worker who qualifies for sub-s (1) purposes is and can only be a present worker, then it seems to me impossible when construing the word 'qualifies' if imported into sub-s (2), to mean 'qualified'. The same word cannot mean different things in one section of the Act. g

[31] In the result I am in no doubt about the meaning to be given to s 19. A valid enforcement notice can only relate to present workers in respect of present and future wages (see sub-s (1)) and also, if appropriate, their past wages (see sub-s (2)). There is no power to issue an enforcement notice in respect of past workers for past pay. h

[32] Because I am not in doubt as to the meaning, I do not need to gauge in the tortuous attempt to find a particular purpose for s 19(1) and (2). This is an Act 'to make provision for and in connection with a national minimum wage'. Its purpose is obvious in the sense that the 1998 Act is there to boost the wages of a menial group who are inevitably disadvantaged and vulnerable to exploitation. They are likely to be unable easily to assert their rights and a proper purpose of the 1998 Act is undoubtedly to enable enforcement to be taken by an independent officer on their behalf. I find it impossible, however, to identify any particular j

a mischief which so afflicts past workers that any ambiguity in s 19 would have to be construed to include them. Mr Oudkerk convinces me that an employer could be placed at such severe disadvantage if years after the event he is required to pay past workers, often itinerant workers, when he would have no idea where they are nor the means ever to find them. Yet if he does not pay he is subject to penalties. That would be an odd state of affairs. A scheme to assist the current workforce works no injustice. These are, however, idle musings on my part. I could not divine a specific purpose if I had to, but fortunately I do not have to try.

b [33] I do not know if I am entitled to derive wry amusement from the fact, or whether I should simply ignore the fact, that there is already a Bill before Parliament which will introduce an amendment to s 19 by inserting the following:

c '(2A) If an officer acting for the purposes of this Act is of the opinion that a worker who has at any time qualified for the national minimum wage has not been remunerated for any pay reference period (whether ending before or after the coming into force of this subsection) by his employer at a rate at least equal to the national minimum wage, the officer may serve on the employer an enforcement notice which imposes a requirement under subsection (2) above in relation to the worker, whether or not a requirement under subsection (1) above is, or may be, imposed in relation to that worker (or any other worker to whom the notice relates).

d (2B) An enforcement notice may not impose a requirement under subsection 2 above in respect of any pay reference period ending more than six years before the date on which the notice is served.'

e [34] That seems clear enough. It is as if the employment tribunal had marked the Parliamentary draftsman's essay and suggested he should try again. But I should not tease. All I should do is dismiss the appeal.

f MAY LJ.

[35] I agree that this appeal should be dismissed for the reasons given by Ward LJ, whose account of the facts and circumstances of this appeal I gratefully adopt. I agree that the Employment Appeal Tribunal (the appeal tribunal) reached the correct conclusion for the correct reasons. I record briefly in my own words my reasons for rejecting Mr Cavanagh QC's submission that s 19(2) of the National Minimum Wage Act 1998 should be construed as empowering a free-standing enforcement notice.

g [36] Section 19 of the 1998 Act provides:

h '(1) If an officer acting for the purposes of this Act is of the opinion that a worker who qualifies for the national minimum wage has not been remunerated for any pay reference period by his employer at a rate at least equal to the national minimum wage, the officer may serve a notice (an "enforcement notice") on the employer requiring the employer to remunerate the worker for pay reference periods ending on or after the date of the notice at a rate equal to the national minimum wage.

j (2) An enforcement notice may also require the employer to pay to the worker within such time as may be specified in the notice the sum due to the worker under section 17 above in respect of the employer's previous failure to remunerate the worker at a rate at least equal to the national minimum wage.'

[37] The respondent, Bebb Travel plc (Bebb), contends and the appeal tribunal held that the requirement in s 19(2) could only be made in an enforcement notice served under s 19(1). The Inland Revenue contend that s 19(2) empowers the service of an independent enforcement notice, relating to a worker no longer employed by an employer, requiring the former employer to pay to the worker a sum due to the worker for the employer's previous failure to remunerate the worker at a rate at least equal to the national minimum wage. Mr Cavanagh accepts that this requires a strained construction of s 19(1) and (2). But he submits that his strained construction should be adopted so as not to defeat what he maintains is the purpose of the legislation.

[38] In my judgment, the construction for which Bebb contends is plainly correct. I do not consider that Mr Cavanagh's construction can be strained even as a possible construction of the two subsections read in the context of the statute as a whole. In addition, the purpose for which Mr Cavanagh needs to contend is not, in my view, apparent from the statute itself and there is no external material from which that purpose can be gleaned. The general purpose of the statute is obvious, that is to require employers to pay their workers remuneration at a rate which is not less than the national minimum wage. Section 19 is however concerned with enforcement. It is one only of four possible means of enforcement. Mr Cavanagh's purpose has to be that Parliament intended that an enforcement officer should be able to serve an enforcement notice in relation to past failures by an employer in relation to workers who had ceased to be employed by the employer when the enforcement notice is served. Mr Cavanagh gave an array of possible reasons why this may have been Parliament's purpose. But in my view the Parliamentary purpose may equally have been that enforcement notices should mainly be used to require employers to comply with the legislation in relation to their existing employees for the future. There would then be sense in enabling an enforcement notice for that first purpose also to address past failures. Just as Mr Cavanagh had reasons why the purpose for which he contended might have been the Parliamentary intention, so Mr Oudkerk, counsel for Bebb, pointed to the penal nature of these provisions and employers' difficulties in complying with an enforcement notice for past failures relating to workers who had long since left and might be difficult to trace. In my view, Mr Cavanagh's purpose assumes the construction of the section for which he contends. There is no other material from which that purpose could be derived.

[39] It is accepted that the enforcement notice in s 19(1) has to relate to an existing worker, because it has to require the employer to remunerate the worker at a rate equal to the national minimum wage for pay reference periods ending on or after the date of the notice. This also, in my view, derives from the expression 'a worker who qualifies for the national minimum wage'. As Ward LJ pointed out during the hearing, that expression is defined in s 55 so that it is to be construed in accordance with s 1(2). Section 1(2) defines a person who qualifies for the national minimum wage as an individual who is a worker. Mr Cavanagh struggled to extricate himself from the present tense use of 'qualifies' in s 19(1). He did not in my view succeed. Section 28(1), in using the expression 'whether an individual qualifies or qualified', shows that this statute refers to past qualification when it intends to do so. I accept Mr Cavanagh's submission that the trigger for service of an enforcement notice under s 19(1) has to be a past failure to remunerate the worker at a rate at least equal to the national minimum wage. But that derives, not from a strained meaning of the word 'qualifies', but a from the natural meaning of the succeeding words 'has not been remunerated for any pay reference period by his employer at a rate at least equal to the national minimum wage'.

[40] There are the following additional clear indications in favour of Bebb's construction. Section 19(1) defines 'enforcement notice' as a notice requiring the employer to remunerate the worker for pay reference periods ending on or after the date of the notice at a rate equal to the national minimum wage. The expression thus defined has to have the defined meaning when it appears in s 19(2). The use of the definite article for 'the employer' and 'the worker' in s 19(2) plainly refer back to 'a worker' and 'his employer' in s 19(1). Mr Cavanagh's attempt to take these definite articles back to s 17 was not remotely persuasive. The expression 'may also' connotes that a s 19(1) enforcement notice may also deal with previous failures to remunerate the worker at a rate at least equal to the national minimum wage. These words in their context do not relate to a free-standing enforcement notice independent of a notice under s 19(1). If that had been the intention, the structure of the material now in two subsections would naturally have been different. The two different kinds of enforcement notice would naturally have been subordinated grammatically to a single introductory expression.

[41] For these reasons, in my judgment Bebb's construction of these subsections is plainly correct.

ARDEN LJ.

e [42] For the reasons given below, I agree that s 19(2) of the National Minimum Wage Act 1998 is supplemental to s 19(1) and that accordingly the powers conferred by the former subsection can only be used where the enforcement notice also satisfies s 19(1).

[43] In my judgment, an enforcement notice can be served under s 19(1) only if the officer forms the requisite opinion about a person who is then a worker in relation to the employer on whom it is proposed to serve the enforcement notice. This follows from the fact that under s 19(1) the worker must be a person 'who qualifies for the national minimum wage'. The use of the present tense is clear and can be contrasted with the use of the words 'qualifies or qualified at any time for the national minimum wage' in s 28(1). Under s 19(1) the question whether the worker also had to be qualified at the date he was remunerated below the required rate is left silent. If he is required also to be qualified at that date, the requirement is implicit and is not to be found in the word 'qualifies', which is plainly in the present tense.

[44] Furthermore, an enforcement notice for the purpose of the opening clause of s 19(2) is defined by s 19(1). It is—'a notice ... on the employer requiring the employer to remunerate the worker for pay reference periods ending on or after the date of the notice at a rate equal to the national minimum wage.'

j This demonstrates that s 19(2) cannot confer a free-standing power to serve an enforcement notice. The use of the definite article 'the' with the words 'employer' and 'worker' support the conclusion that the employer and worker have just been identified, that is in s 19(1) and not (as submitted) in s 17. In addition, my preferred construction gives the word 'also' in s 19(2) its normal meaning. It confers one option and one option only: that of adding a stipulation about past defaults to the enforcement notice dealing with the future. It does not provide an alternative approach. On the Inland Revenue's construction, the word 'also' has to mean 'further or alternatively'. a [45] Moreover, Mr Cavanagh QC, for the Inland Revenue, accepts that even if s 19(2) is a free-standing power the officer must still be of the opinion described in the opening words of s 19(1). However, he goes on to submit that, under that requirement as it applies to s 19(1), it must be the officer's opinion that 'a worker who qualified for the national minimum wage has not been remunerated' for the relevant period at the appropriate rate. It need hardly be observed that it would be odd, if s 19(2) is a free-standing provision, for it to be silent about the essential precondition of its operation, especially if that precondition has not only to be imported from s 19(1) but modified. I am not disposed to accept the submission which confers on the word 'qualifies' such chameleon-like character. In particular, I do not accept Mr Cavanagh's submission that it is a word of 'universal tense' (whatever that may mean) or that (in the alternative) the true construction of 'qualifies' in s 19(1) is 'qualified'. b

c

[46] I do not consider the conclusion that s 19(2) is not free-standing to be absurd as the Inland Revenue submits. It was open to Parliament to determine that the class of low paid workers who would benefit from s 19 should not be the whole class of such persons, but only a limited part of such class, principally current employees. Such an approach could not be said to be irrational: on the contrary it would be consistent with a policy of placing a limit on the need for the public resources to be devoted to the service of enforcement notices and the taking of steps under s 20. Such a policy is also supported by the absence of time limits in ss 19 and 21. It would also afford some practical recognition of the difficulties for an employer in maintaining records and tracing past employees in order to make shortfall payments to them. There is certainly nothing in the 1998 Act to compel the conclusion that Parliament must have intended that the whole class should benefit, and in my judgment the Inland Revenue would need to show that to establish that it was right to depart from the plain meaning of s 19 so as to make s 19(2) a free-standing power. d
e
f

[47] I have reached the above conclusion simply by interpreting s 19 in the context of the 1998 Act. For my part, I do not find it necessary to apply any presumption against the Inland Revenue's construction. It is enough, in my view, to give s 19 its fair interpretation. g

Appeal dismissed.

Melanie Martyn Barrister.

a Marcq v Christie Manson & Woods Ltd (trading as Christie's)
[2003] EWCA Civ 731

b COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION
PETER GIBSON, TUCKEY AND KEENE LJ
12, 13, 23 MAY 2003

c Conversion – Auctioneer's liability – Return of goods to consignor – Whether auctioneer, acting in good faith and without notice, liable in conversion if not selling true owner's goods but merely returning them to consignor.

d The claimant had at all material times been the owner of a painting painted by a Dutch master in about 1667. The painting was stolen in 1979. Its theft was reported to the police and it was registered as stolen on the Art Loss Register. In or about 1997, the defendant auctioneers obtained possession of the painting from S for the purposes of selling it at auction. They catalogued and advertised the painting and offered it for sale at a public auction in July 1997. The painting was unsold, and the defendants returned it to S. The claimant commenced proceedings against the defendants, claiming that they were liable to him in conversion or bailment. The defendant's application in the county court to strike e out the statement of case was granted, on the ground that it disclosed no reasonable grounds for bringing the claim. The claimant's appeal to the High Court was dismissed. He appealed, contending that the defendants were strictly liable in conversion having regard to the extent of their encroachment on the claimant's rights as owner of the picture; and that they had breached their obligation as bailees to take such care as was reasonable in all the circumstances f to ensure that the person who had delivered the goods had the right to do so, and that the person to whom they redelivered the goods had a right to receive them.

g Held – (1) An auctioneer who received goods from their apparent owner, and merely redelivered them to him when they were unsold, was not liable in conversion, provided that he had acted in good faith and without knowledge of any adverse claim to the goods. If the auctioneer sold the goods, he would incur liability if he delivered them to the buyer. His intention to sell the goods did not, however, make him liable: it was what he did in relation to the goods which determined liability (see [24], [43], below).

h (2) An agent who received goods from someone who was their apparent owner and later returned them to him did not owe a duty to their true owner to investigate title, in the absence of anything to put him on inquiry. The claim in bailment failed and the appeal would, accordingly, be dismissed (see [54]–[59], below).

Decision of Jack J [2002] 4 All ER 1005 affirmed.

j Notes

For liability of auctioneers for conversion, see 2 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 926.

Cases referred to in judgments

Australian and New Zealand Banking Group Ltd v Curlett, Cannon and Galbell Pty Ltd [1992] 2 VR 647, Vic SC.

- AVX Ltd v EGM Solders Ltd* (1982) Times, 7 July.
- Barclays Mercantile Business Finance Ltd v Sibec Developments Ltd* [1993] 2 All ER 195, [1992] 1 WLR 1253. a
- Barker v Furlong* [1891] 2 Ch 172, [1891–4] All ER Rep Ext 2030.
- City Television v Conference and Training Office Ltd* [2001] EWCA Civ 1770.
- Cochrane v Rymill* (1879) 40 LT 744, CA.
- Consolidated Co v Curtis & Son* [1892] 1 QB 495. b
- Fowler v Hollins* (1872) LR 7 QB 616, Ex Ch; affd sub nom Hollins v Fowler (1875) LR 7 HL 757, [1874–80] All ER Rep 118, HL.
- Heffron v Imperial Parking Co* (1974) 46 DLR (3d) 642, Ont CA.
- Jackson v Cochrane* [1989] 2 Qd R 23, Qld Full Ct.
- Kuwait Airways Corp v Iraqi Airways Co (No 3)* [2002] UKHL 19, [2002] 3 All ER 209, [2002] 2 AC 883, [2002] 2 WLR 1353. c
- Lancashire Waggon Co Ltd v Fitzhugh* (1861) 6 H & N 502, 158 ER 206.
- Loeschman v Machin* (1818) 2 Stark 311.
- McCowan v McCulloch* [1926] 1 DLR 312, NS SC.
- Michael Gerson (Leasing) Ltd v Wilkinson* [2001] 1 All ER 148, [2001] QB 514, [2000] 3 WLR 1645, CA. d
- Mitchell v Ealing London Borough* [1978] 2 All ER 779, [1979] QB 1, [1978] 2 WLR 999, QBD.
- Moorgate Mercantile Co Ltd v Finch* [1962] 2 All ER 467, [1962] 1 QB 701, [1962] 3 WLR 110, CA. e
- National Mercantile Bank Ltd v Rymill* (1881) 44 LT 767, CA.
- Parker v British Airways Board* [1982] 1 All ER 834, [1982] QB 1004, [1982] 2 WLR 503, CA.
- Pioneer Container, The, KH Enterprise (cargo owners) v Pioneer Containers (owners)* [1994] 2 All ER 250, [1994] 2 AC 324, [1994] 3 WLR 1, PC. f
- Saleh Farid v Theodorou and Blacklake Securities* [1992] CA Transcript 51.
- Smith (Administrator of Cosslett (Contractors) Ltd) v Bridgend County BC* [2001] UKHL 58, [2002] 1 All ER 292, [2002] 1 AC 336, [2001] 3 WLR 1347.
- Southland Hospital Board v Perkins Estates* [1986] 1 NZLR 373, NZ HC.
- Tear v Freebody* (1858) 4 CBNS 228, 140 ER 1071, CP.
- Williams v Millington* (1788) 1 Hy Bl 81, 126 ER 49, [1775–1802] All ER Rep 124. g
- Willis (RH) and Son (a firm) v British Car Auctions Ltd* [1978] 2 All ER 392, [1978] 1 WLR 438, CA.

Appeal

The claimant, Philippe Marcq, appealed from the decision of Jack J on 29 October 2002 ([2002] EWHC 2148 (QB), [2002] 4 All ER 1005) upholding the decision of Judge Hallgarten QC at the Central London County Court on 25 January 2002 whereby he held that the defendant, Christie Manson & Woods Ltd (t/a Christie's) was entitled to succeed on its application to strike out proceedings for conversion and breach of duty as bailee brought against it by Mr Marcq. The facts are set out in the judgment of Tuckey LJ. h a 23 May 2003. The following judgments were delivered.

Professor Norman Palmer and Angus Piper (instructed by Ralph Davis) for the claimant.
John McCaughran QC (instructed by Stephenson Harwood) for Christie's.

TUCKEY LJ (delivering the first judgment at the invitation of Peter Gibson LJ).

b [1] If a painting is unsold at auction and returned to the prospective seller who is not in fact its true owner, is the auctioneer, who has acted in good faith and without notice, liable in conversion or bailment to its owner? This question arises on appeal from Jack J who upheld on 29 October 2002 (see [2002] EWHC 2148 (QB), [2002] 4 All ER 1005) a decision by Judge Hallgarten QC made in the Central London County Court that the auctioneer was not liable.

THE FACTS

c [2] Judge Hallgarten's decision was made on an application to strike out the claimant's statement of case because it disclosed no reasonable grounds for bringing the claim. Conventionally such applications are decided on the assumption that the facts alleged by the claimant are true. In his judgment Jack J refers to a few additional facts which were not pleaded by the claimant. We were told that this information was given to Jack J orally at his request without objection from the claimant. However Professor Palmer, who appeared for the claimant below, complains that Jack J should not have taken this additional information into account, although this is not one of the grounds of appeal. To avoid further controversy about this, the facts I set out below are only those which appear in the draft amended particulars of claim which were before Jack J.

e [3] The claimant is now and has at all material times been the owner of an oil painting known as the Backgammon Players painted by the Dutch master Jan Steen in or about 1667. The painting was stolen from the claimant's London house over Easter 1979. Its theft was reported to the police and it was registered as stolen on the Art Loss Register before 1997. In or about July 1997 the defendants, Christie, Manson & Woods Ltd (Christie's), obtained possession of the painting from a Mr Schünemann for the purposes of selling it at auction on the terms of their conditions of business. Under this contract Christie's catalogued and advertised the painting and offered it for sale at a public auction of old masters on 4 July 1997. The painting was unsold and 'thereafter Christie's caused and/or procured and/or permitted' the removal of the painting from their London premises and its return to Mr Schünemann.

g [4] Before Judge Hallgarten and Jack J the claimant was able to keep open the possibility of being able to allege want of good faith and notice against Christie's although no such case had been pleaded. Both judges held that irrespective of where the burden of proof lay, the claimant had to plead any case he had on these issues. He was given a final chance to do this by Jack J's order which said:

j 'The claimant shall by 19 November 2002 make an application to the Central London County Court business list for permission to serve a reply out of time for the purpose of pleading want of good faith and notice annexing a draft reply to that application, failing which this action shall stand dismissed.'

No such application was made and on 28 November 2002 the claim was dismissed. Professor Palmer maintains that it is still open to the claimant to contend that Christie's had notice of the theft of the picture in answer to Christie's assertion that they did not. I do not agree. The claimant has had disclosure of all Christie's documents and more than ample opportunity to state his case about notice and has not done so. We must proceed therefore on the basis that Christie's acted in good faith and without notice. a [5] Christie's terms of business cover their contractual relationship with prospective sellers and buyers. Those relating to sellers include:

2. Christie's role as agent

Our sales at public auction are undertaken as agent, on behalf of the Seller ... b

4. Expenses

The Seller will bear all costs relating to: (a) packing and shipping the Lot to us for sale ... (c) packing and shipping the Lot if it is returned to the Seller ... (d) insurance under Christie's Fine Arts Policy (explained below) ... (f) catalogue illustration ... (k) a contribution to our general expenses if the Lot is not sold equal to 5% of the Insured Value c

5A. Where Insurance is arranged by us

(a) Unless we agree otherwise, the Lot will be automatically insured under Christie's Fine Arts Policy for the amount that we from time to time consider to be its appropriate value. (b) We shall charge the Seller a sum to cover insurance, at the rate of 1% of ... if the Lot is unsold, its insured value ... d

6. The Seller's undertakings regarding the Lot

We shall handle the Lot, and the Buyer will purchase, on the basis of the Seller's undertakings that; (a) the Seller is the sole owner of the Lot with an unrestricted right to transfer title to the buyer free from all third party rights or claims ... (c) the Seller has notified us in writing ... of any concerns expressed by third parties in relation to the ownership of the Lot. e

7. Sale Arrangements

... (c) The Seller may not withdraw the Lot from sale without our consent ... (d) If either we or the Seller withdraw the Lot, we shall charge the Seller a fee equal to 10% of the Insured Value, plus an amount equal to our commission if the Lot had been sold at the Insured Value, together with any applicable VAT and insurance and other expenses ... f

9. After the Sale

(a) Accounting ... If for any reason we make payment to the Seller of the amount due before payment by the Buyer, we shall acquire complete ownership of and title in the Lot ... (d) Unsold Lot If any Lot is unsold, or is not included in a sale, or is withdrawn from sale for any reason, it must be collected from us within 35 days after we send the Seller a notice requiring the Seller to collect it. If any such Lot remains uncollected for a period exceeding 35 days, a storage charge of £1 per item per day will apply and an additional charge will be made for insurance. The Seller will not be entitled to collect the Lot until all outstanding charges are met. If any such Lot is not collected within 90 days after the date of the sale or the date of the notice referred to above (whichever occurs first) it may be disposed of by us as we see fit, which may involve its removal to a third party warehouse at the Seller's expense and its sale by public auction on such terms as we consider appropriate, including those relating to estimates and reserves. We shall then account to the Seller for the proceeds of sale, having deducted all amounts due. If any Lot is bought in or otherwise unsold by auction, we are authorised as the exclusive agent for the Seller for a period of two months following the auction to sell such Lot privately for a price that will result in a payment to the Seller of not less than the net amount—i.e. after deduction of all charges due from the Seller—to which the Seller would have been g a entitled had the Lot been sold at a price equal to the Reserve, or for such lesser amount as we and the Seller shall agree. In such event the Seller's obligations to us with respect to such a Lot are the same as if it had been sold at auction ...'
h
j

THE JUDGMENTS BELOW

b [6] I should start by paying tribute to both judges' judgments. They are models of industry and clarity.

[7] Professor Palmer argued that Christie's were strictly liable in conversion having regard to the extent of their encroachment on the claimant's rights as owner of the picture. Jack J correctly noted that there was no reported case in which a court has had to consider the liability of an auctioneer who had simply put goods up for auction and then returned them unsold to the would-be seller. After an extensive review of the authorities he concluded ([2002] 4 All ER 1005 at [41]):

d 'I deduce that there is a strong line of authority in the Court of Appeal that, for an auctioneer to be liable where he receives in good faith and without notice goods for auction from a non-owner, there must be a sale in which he is sufficiently involved followed by delivery to the purchaser. I am therefore so far against Professor Palmer's submission. So I would uphold the similar conclusion of Judge Hallgarten ...'

e [8] He then went on to consider whether Christie's terms of business, particularly cl 7(c), which prevents the seller from withdrawing the lot, and cl 9(d), which gives Christie's a lien, made any difference. Firstly he pointed out that auctioneers had always had a lien at common law and then said:

f '[44] Secondly it is clear that the lien here was never exercised against anyone, let alone against [the claimant]. Nor did a right to exercise the lien arise. For the right would only arise after a notice had been sent requiring collection. No such notice was sent by Christie's here. Even if a right of lien had been exercised by Christie's against Mr Schunemann, I think it doubtful whether that would amount to a conversion as against [the claimant] ...

g [45] I do not consider that the fact that Christie's took a right as against Mr Schunemann to refuse to permit the picture to be withdrawn prior to auction can by itself, or if added to the other circumstances, convert what would not otherwise be a conversion, into one.

h [46] It was the view of Judge Hallgarten that what matters in conversion is not the taking of powers by a bailee against his consignor but their exercise. I agree.'

j [9] Professor Palmer had also submitted that by taking a lien coupled with a right of sale in cl 9(d) Christie's received the picture as a pledge. This was conversion because s 11(2) of the Torts (Interference with Goods) Act 1977 says: 'Receipt of goods by a way of pledge is conversion if delivery of the goods is conversion.'

[10] Jack J said there was a short answer to this submission. The circumstances in which Christie's were entitled to a right of sale had never come about.

[11] Jack J dealt with the claim in bailment quite shortly. He records Professor Palmer's submission as being that Christie's were to be treated as the bailees of the claimant. They were in the position of a finder or an unconscious bailee and as such owed duties to the claimant.

[12] Jack J rejected these submissions because, like Judge Hallgarten, he could not accept that the law of bailment and conversion were quite different. He derived support for this view from a passage from Lord Goff of Chieveley's judgment in The Pioneer Container, KH Enterprise (cargo owners) v Pioneer Containers (owners) [1994] 2 All ER 250 at 262, [1994] 2 AC 324 at 342, to which I will refer later. a

CONVERSION b

[13] Professor Palmer started his submissions by reminding us of the ways in which conversion has been defined in a number of cases over the years. In those cases however there is a recognition that definition is difficult and none is exhaustive. Thus in the latest case, Kuwait Airways Corp v Iraqi Airways Co (No 3) [2002] UKHL 9 at [39], [2002] 3 All ER 209 at [39], [2002] 2 AC 883 Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead said: 'Conversion of goods can occur in so many different circumstances that framing a precise definition of universal application is well nigh impossible.' He went on to add however: c

'In general, the basic features of the tort are threefold. First the defendant's conduct was inconsistent with the rights of the owner (or other person entitled to possession). Second, the conduct was deliberate, not accidental. Third, the conduct was so extensive an encroachment on the rights of the owner as to exclude him from use and possession of the goods. The contrast is with lesser acts of interference.' d

In the instant case the first and second of these features are present. It is the third which gives rise to the argument. Was there a sufficient encroachment on the claimant's rights as owner to amount to conversion? e

[14] Professor Palmer first submitted that any unauthorised possession of goods amounted to conversion with the possible exception of passive or minimal possession. But this submission flies in the face of a long line of authority which shows that possession of goods by an agent on the instructions of their apparent owner for the purpose of carrying out what have been described as ministerial acts such as storage or carriage does not amount to conversion. The possession in such cases is inconsistent with the rights of the true owner and is deliberate but does not encroach sufficiently on the owner's title to the goods. This principle was stated by Blackburn J in Hollins v Fowler (1875) LR 7 HL 757 at 766-767: f

'I cannot find it anywhere distinctly laid down, but I submit to your Lordships that on principle, one who deals with goods at the request of the person who has the actual custody of them, in the bonâ fide belief that the custodian is the true owner, or has the authority of the true owner, should be excused for what he does if the act is of such a nature as would be excused if done by the authority of the person in possession, if he was a finder of the goods, or intrusted with their custody. I do not mean to say that this is the extreme limit of the excuse, but it is a principle that will embrace most of the cases which have been suggested as difficulties. Thus a warehouseman with whom goods had been deposited is guilty of no conversion by keeping them, or restoring them to the person who deposited them with him, though that person turns out to have had no authority from the true owner ... And the same principle would apply to ... persons "acting in a subsidiary character, like that of a person who has the goods of a person employing him to carry them, or a caretaker, such as a wharfinger."' g a [15] Auctioneers do not fall within this statement of principle since they are not simply entrusted with the custody of goods but also asked to sell them. Professor Palmer submits that this makes all the difference since a sale necessarily encroaches on the true owner's title. There is, he submits, no authority which compels this court to decide in favour of Christie's in this case and other authority which supports his main argument which is that if one looks at all the b circumstances of this case and in particular what he described as the penetrative, invasive and retentive rights which Christie's assumed over the picture under their contract terms their conduct amounted to conversion.

[16] It is convenient to start by referring to the auctioneer cases which Professor Palmer submitted we should put on one side as being decisions on their own facts.

c [17] In National Mercantile Bank Ltd v Rymill (1881) 44 LT 767 the plaintiff was the owner of horses the subject of a bill of sale. The grantor of the bill sold the horses privately in the defendant's auction yard and following the sale, on the grantor's instructions, the auctioneer delivered the horses to the buyer. It was held that there had been no conversion. Bramwell LJ said that the auctioneer—

d 'has not claimed to transfer the title, and he has not purported to sell; all the dominion he exercised over the chattels was to re-deliver them to the person to whom the man from whom he had received them had told him to redeliver them.'

e Brett and Cotton LJ agreed that on the evidence there had been no sale by the auctioneer. This case has been criticised, mainly for the conclusion that there had been no sale by the auctioneer.

f [18] In Barker v Furlong [1891] 2 Ch 172 Romer J decided that an auctioneer who sold and delivered goods to the buyer at auction was liable. In that case the executor plaintiffs were entitled to furniture which was sent to auction without their knowledge or consent. Some of the furniture was returned unsold to the would-be seller and no claim was made against the defendant auctioneer in respect of that furniture. But he was held liable for the furniture he sold. Romer J said (at 181–182):

g '... where, as here, the auctioneer receives the goods into his custody, and, on selling them, hands over the goods to the purchasers with a view to passing the property in them, then I think the auctioneer has converted the goods and is liable accordingly ... The general rule is that where an agent takes part in transferring the property in a chattel and it turns out that his principal has no title, his ignorance of this fact affords him no protection. I h was referred to the cases of a carrier and packing agent as supporting the case of the auctioneers. But the carrier and packing agent are generally held not to have converted, because by their acts they merely purport to change the position of the goods, and not the property in them.'

j [19] Consolidated Co v Curtis & Son [1892] 1 QB 495 was another case of an auctioneer who sold and delivered goods the subject of a bill of sale. Collins J held that an auctioneer who sells and delivers is liable because he is acting as more than a mere broker or intermediary. Earlier in his judgment however he said (at 497–498):

'... it is not easy to draw the line at the precise point where a dealing with goods by an intermediary becomes a conversion. The difficulty is diminished by remembering that in trover the original possession was by a fiction deemed to be lawful ... and some act had therefore to be shewn constituting a conversion by the defendant of the chattel to his own use, some act incompatible with a recognition on his part of the continuous right of the true owner to the dominion over it. All acts, therefore, as suggested by Blackburn, J., in his opinion ... in Hollins v. Fowler, which are consistent with the duty of a mere finder such as the safe guarding by warehousing or asportation for the like purpose, may well be looked upon as entirely compatible with the right of the true owner, and, therefore, as not constituting a conversion by the defendant. It may be, as suggested by Brett, J., in the same case, that the test is whether there is an intent to interfere in any manner with the title of or ownership in the chattel, not merely with the possession. The difficulty is, I think, rather in drawing the true inference from facts in particular cases than in grasping the principle. There are, however, happily many cases which fall clearly on one side or other of the line. It is clear that there can be no conversion by a mere bargain and sale without a transfer of possession. The act, unless in market overt, is merely void, and does not change the property or the possession: [Lancashire Waggon Co Ltd v Fitzhugh (1861) 6 H & N 502, 158 ER 206], and per Brett, J., in Fowler v. Hollins ((1872) LR 7 QB 616 at 627). A fortiori, mere intervention as broker or intermediary in a sale by others is not a conversion.'

This passage emphasises the point that it is interference with the title or ownership of the chattel which counts for conversion. Thus it is the act of delivery following sale which makes the auctioneer liable in conversion since that is what interferes with the title or ownership of the goods. A sale without delivery does not have this effect and does not therefore amount to conversion.

[20] In RH Willis and Son (a firm) v British Car Auctions Ltd [1978] 2 All ER 392, [1978] 1 WLR 438 a car on hire purchase was sold and delivered by auctioneers on the instructions of the hirer. The main issue was whether the auctioneers' liability was affected by the fact that the car had been sold under their provisional bid procedure. This court held the auctioneers liable. In his judgment Lord Denning MR said ([1978] 2 All ER 392 at 396, [1978] 1 WLR 438 at 442):

'It is now, I think, well established that if an auctioneer sells goods by knocking down his hammer at an auction and thereafter delivers them to the purchaser—then although he is only an agent—then if the vendor has no title to the goods, both the auctioneer and the purchaser are liable in conversion to the true owner, no matter how innocent the auctioneer may have been in handling the goods or the purchaser in acquiring them: see Barker v Furlong ... and Consolidated Co. v Curtis & Son ... This state of the law has been considered by the Law Reform Committee ... in 1971 as to innocent handlers. But Parliament has made no change in it; no doubt it would have done so in the Torts (Interference with Goods) Act 1977 if it had thought fit to do so.'

[21] The report (Law Reform Committee Eighteenth Report on Conversion and Detinue (Cmd 4774) (September 1971)) to which Lord Denning MR refers was prepared by a distinguished committee chaired by Lord Pearson. Commenting on National Mercantile Bank Ltd v Rymill (1881) 44 LT 767 they say (para 41):

'If rightly decided, it is an authority for the proposition that a bailee escapes liability for conversion, not only where he merely re-delivers to his bailor, a but where he delivers at the bailor's directions to a third party without knowledge of any adverse claim, though with knowledge that such delivery is in pursuance of a sale or other disposition.'

They then discuss (para 43) the rule that receipt under a purported sale would amount to conversion and justify its retention without the need for a demand 'subject to the principle that a bailee who has accounted for the goods to his bailor should be exempt from liability to any other person'. Turning to the problem of the innocent handler they say:

c '46. It is clear ... that there are many cases in which the existing law imposes liability in conversion upon an "innocent handler" of goods ... But it is not entirely clear which acts of a handler will, and which will not, attract this liability. It has been said that a merely ministerial handling of goods at the request of an apparent owner having the actual control of them is not a conversion and that a handling is ministerial where it merely changes the position of the goods and not the property in them.'

d After referring to Blackburn J's test in Hollins v Fowler (1875) LR 7 HL 757, [1874-80] All ER Rep 118 they conclude:

e '47. Where the handler, having received goods from an apparent owner and without knowledge of any adverse claim, merely re-delivers them to the same person, we consider that all the above tests can fairly be said to have been satisfied, and we think that the same applies where the handler delivers the goods at the direction of the apparent owner to a third party without knowledge of any adverse claim or that any question of title is involved. But difficulties arise where the handler has knowledge that a question of title is involved, as where the act he is required to do is to his knowledge in pursuance of a sale or other disposition by the apparent owner to a third party. In such a case, on the authority of National Mercantile Bank v. Rymill no liability attaches unless the defendant himself effected the sale as agent for the apparent owner; and, although the facts of that case hardly satisfy the test propounded by Blackburn, J. (whether the act done by the defendant can fairly be said to have changed no more than the position of the goods), we do not, on a balance of the conflicting considerations involved, recommend a statutory reversal of this decision.'

[22] The auctioneer cases and the report of the Law Reform Committee led Jack J to the conclusion ([2002] 4 All ER 1005 at [41]) that for an auctioneer to be h liable there must be a sale in which he is sufficiently involved followed by delivery to the buyer.

[23] Professor Palmer submits that this conclusion was too restrictive. An auctioneer, for example, will be liable in conversion for misdelivery (see Jackson v Cochrane [1989] 2 Qd R 23 at 25, 26 where the English cases are referred to). There j is also a suggestion in Cochrane v Rymill (1879) 40 LT 744 (an earlier case where this auctioneer sold horses and carriages the subject of a bill of sale) that simply dealing with goods amounts to conversion. This was a case however where the auctioneer took the goods as security for a loan to the grantor. They were then sold and delivered at auction and the loan was repaid from the proceeds of sale. I do not see anything in this case which was subsequently distinguished on its facts in the National Mercantile Bank case which justifies any more extensive liability for auctioneers than the later cases establish. Nor does the fact that an auctioneer may be liable for misdelivery.

[24] Without reference to the particular facts of this case, I agree with Jack J and Judge Hallgarten that the authorities indicate that an auctioneer who receives goods from their apparent owner and simply redelivers them to him when they are unsold is not liable in conversion provided he has acted in good faith and without knowledge of any adverse claim to them. Although strictly the cases do not compel this conclusion they cannot simply be put aside as Professor Palmer suggests. The auctioneer intends to sell and if he does so will incur liability if he delivers the goods to the buyer. But his intention does not make him liable; it is what he does in relation to the goods which determines liability. Mere receipt of the goods does not amount to conversion. In receiving the goods from and redelivering them to their apparent owner the auctioneer in such a case has only acted ministerially. He has in the event merely changed the position of the goods and not the property in them. This I think is a just conclusion, although I realise it may be dangerous to test issues of strict liability in this way. Nevertheless I think it would be unduly harsh if auctioneers were to be held liable in circumstances such as these.

[25] So I turn to the particular facts of this case. The first question is how relevant are the contractual terms agreed between Mr Schünemann and Christie's? They govern his (and any buyer's) relationship with Christie's but do not and cannot affect the legal position between the claimant and Christie's. What Christie's may do in exercising their contractual rights may impact upon the claimant's title but the mere existence of those rights will not.

[26] Professor Palmer argues that this analysis is contrary to authority. He relied on Smith (Administrator of Cosslett (Contractors) Ltd) v Bridgend County BC [2001] UKHL 58, [2002] 1 All ER 292, [2002] 1 AC 336 where a company had plant on a site owned by the council. When the company got into financial difficulties the council were entitled to use the plant but entered into a continuation contract with other contractors which, on completion of the contract, passed title to the plant to the contractors and allowed them to remove it from the site. The case principally involved issues about fixed and floating charges but the House also had to decide whether the council had converted the plant. Professor Palmer referred us to Lord Scott of Foscote's judgment ([2002] 1 All ER 292 at [73]–[75]) where he appears to have decided that the continuation contract itself amounted to conversion. But Lord Scott was in the minority. The majority judgment was given by Lord Hoffmann with whom Lord Bingham of Cornhill, Lord Browne-Wilkinson and Lord Rodger of Earlsferry agreed. Lord Hoffmann said (at [39]):

'The council consented to the removal of the plant by [the other contractor] in violation of the company's right to possession. The fact that they gave such consent in advance, at a time when the company was not entitled to possession, can make no difference. The consent remained effective until the moment when [the other contractor] took the plant. This was sufficient to amount to a conversion.'

This gives no support to Professor Palmer's submission. I read Lord Hoffmann as saying that the conversion took place when the plant was removed and that the council were liable because it happened with their consent which had been given earlier in the continuation contract.

[27] If the contract terms between Christie's and Mr Schünemann are irrelevant unless Christie's exercise of their contractual rights impacted on the

a claimant's title there is a simple answer to all or at least most of Professor Palmer's main argument: there is no allegation that Christie's exercised a lien or power of sale or any of their other contractual rights to the detriment of the claimant's title; so his submissions based simply on the contract terms get him nowhere.

b [28] But lest this analysis is wrong I shall consider Professor Palmer's submissions in more detail. Looking at the contract he says it permitted Christie's to catalogue, market and expose the painting for sale. The seller was not allowed to withdraw it from the sale without Christie's consent (see cl 7(c)) and when it was unsold they were entitled to keep it for two months to try and sell it privately (see cl 9(d)). All the while charges were being incurred for carriage, insurance and Christie's expenses (see cl 4) which they could require to be paid before the picture could be collected, and if they were not they could sell it (see cl 9(d)). Such an intrusion on the claimant's right to immediate possession of his picture amounts to conversion.

c [29] Professor Palmer referred us to three cases which he said supported these submissions by analogy. The first of these was Saleh Farid v Theodorou and Blacklake Securities [1992] CA Transcript 51 where the first defendant had entered into an unauthorised sale and leaseback of the claimant's car to secure a loan. The second defendant finance company admitted that they had converted the car even though they had not physically possessed it. Their involvement had 'rendered them parties to the deprivation of the plaintiff's title to the car'. I do not see how this case helps Professor Palmer. Although they had not been in possession of the car the finance company had admittedly been parties to the first defendant's conversion. The car was worth very substantially more than the amount it had been 'sold' for and in any event had been pledged as security for repayment of the loan.

d [30] The second case Michael Gerson (Leasing) Ltd v Wilkinson [2001] 1 All ER 148, [2001] QB 514 also involved an unauthorised sale and leaseback to a finance company. The question was whether the finance company could rely on s 24 of the Sale of Goods Act 1979 which protects buyers in good faith and without notice if the goods or their documents of title have been delivered or transferred to the buyer. Clarke LJ said [2001] 1 All ER 148 at 158, [2001] QB 514 at 526 (para 30)), with which the other two members of the court agreed, that the effect of the sale and leaseback was that the goods must be taken to have been delivered to the finance company because otherwise they could not have leased them back. He said ([2001] 1 All ER 148 at 159, [2001] QB 514 at 527 (para 36)) it made 'commercial sense to hold that such arrangements involve a transfer of constructive possession to the finance company' as the purchase of goods was commonly financed by sale and leaseback contracts. Professor Palmer says that this case shows that there may be a sale without actual delivery and by analogy offering ('hawking or touting' as he put it) for sale should also be considered as the equivalent of sale and delivery. I am perfectly prepared to accept that an auctioneer may be liable if following a sale his delivery of the goods to the purchaser may be constructive, but I think the analogy which Professor Palmer seeks to make is impossible. Offering something for sale is not a sale; nor does it involve any delivery, constructive or otherwise.

j [31] Professor Palmer's third case was Moorgate Mercantile Co Ltd v Finch [1962] 2 All ER 467, [1962] 1 QB 701. There the hirer of a car on hire purchase lent the car to the second defendant who used it to smuggle watches. He was caught and the car was forfeited by Customs and Excise. The court held that the second defendant had converted the car because what he had done would in all probability have resulted in the owners being deprived of it. He was to be taken to have intended the likely consequences of his conduct. Professor Palmer says that this case shows that you can convert goods by exposing them to risk and that is what Christie's did by offering the picture for sale. I do not think this case, the result of which is entirely unsurprising, justifies any such conclusion. The car was converted when it was forfeited and the defendant was held liable because that was the natural and probable consequence of what he had done. a

b

[32] I turn then to the terms themselves. First is what Professor Palmer called 'the sealed maze' which may give Christie's possession of the goods for a substantial period of time. He submits that a right to subtract and enjoy a substantial possessory portion from the claimant's overall possessory right without his consent amounts in effect to a non-statutory exception to the nemo dat principle. c

[33] I think the simple answer to this point is that the duration of Christie's possession is of itself of no consequence. Mere possession, for however long, is immaterial. It all depends upon what else, if anything, Christie's do and if that encroaches on the claimant's title. If, for example, the claimant had made a demand for the return of the picture which Christie's refused they would be liable. But if such a demand was made by Mr Schünemann and Christie's, relying on their terms, refused, this would be of no consequence to the claimant. d

[34] The fact that Christie's catalogued and offered the picture for sale and did so for reward adds nothing to the claimant's case; that is an auctioneer's business. e

[35] At common law an auctioneer has a lien over the goods for his costs and commission (see Williams v Millington (1788) 1 Hy Bl 81, 126 ER 49). Under cl 9(d) the seller is not entitled to collect his goods until all outstanding charges are met. As I have already said, in this case it is not alleged that Christie's exercised any lien or similar right under cl 9(d) over the picture. The need for such a right to be exercised was made clear by Millett J in Barclays Mercantile Business Finance Ltd v Sibec Developments Ltd [1993] 2 All ER 195 at 199, [1992] 1 WLR 1253 at 1257–1258 when he said: f

'Demand is not an essential precondition of the tort in the sense that what is required is an overt act of withholding possession of the chattel from the true owner. Such an act may consist of a refusal to deliver up the chattel on demand made, but it may be demonstrated by other conduct, for example by asserting a lien. Some positive act of withholding, however, is required; so that, absent any positive conduct on the part of the defendant, the plaintiff can establish a cause of action in conversion only by making demand.' g
h

[36] If the lien was exercised in response to a demand for the picture by the claimant there is no doubt that this would amount to conversion. In Loeschman v Machin (1818) 2 Stark 311 at 312 Abbott J said: i

'... if he [the hirer of the goods] send them to an auctioneer to be sold, he is guilty of a conversion of the goods; and that if the auctioneer afterwards refuse to deliver them to the owner, unless he will pay a sum of money which he claims, he is also guilty of a conversion.'

This case is not however authority for the proposition that the exercise of a lien against the would-be seller would amount to conversion against the true owner. As Jack J said there must be some doubt about this.

a [37] The other case about lien to which Professor Palmer referred was Tear v Freebody (1858) 4 CBNS 228, 140 ER 1071 in which the surveyor to a parish was found to have taken possession of the plaintiff's materials so as to obtain an unfounded lien over them. This was therefore the overt assertion of a lien against the owner of the materials which not surprisingly was held to amount to conversion and so takes the matter no further.

b [38] I turn finally to consider the submission that Christie's received the picture by way of pledge because of the lien and the right to sell contained in cl 9(d).

[39] Volume 36(1) of Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) paras 101–104 states:

c 'A "pawn" or "pledge" is a bailment of personal property as a security for some debt or engagement ... Pawn has been described as a security where, by contract, a deposit of goods is made a security for a debt and the right to the property vests in the pawnee so far as is necessary to secure the debt; in this sense it is intermediate between a simple lien and a mortgage which wholly passes the property in the thing conveyed ... The rights of the pawnee in the thing pawned are distinguishable from a common law lien in d that he acquires a special property or special interest in the property pawned, whereas a person exercising a lien has only a right to detain the subject matter of the lien until he is paid, and a lien is not transferable to a third person.'

e [40] Professor Palmer relied on the Australian case of Australian and New Zealand Banking Group Ltd v Curlett, Cannon and Galbell Pty Ltd [1992] 2 VR 647 at 649 where customs agents refused to deliver up goods which they were holding because they had not been paid by their customers. Their contract entitled them to a 'special and general lien and pledge for moneys due' over all goods which came into their possession. The bank who had a charge over the customer's f assets argued that this was not a pledge. Ormiston J in the Supreme Court of Victoria held that it was and in doing so rejected the bank's arguments that pledge was confined to securing a loan or other advance, that the debt had to exist at the time the goods were deposited and that the deposit had to be for the sole purpose of securing the obligation in question.

g [41] I have no difficulty in accepting these general propositions. But the first question is, whether looking at the contract as a whole, the parties have intended that the goods should be pledged. In the Australian and New Zealand Banking Group case the clearest indication of the parties' intentions was to be found in the contract which expressly pledged the goods. There is no such expressed intention in the instant case. The deposit of the picture with Christie's was for the purpose h of their selling it as agents for Mr Schünemann. If one asks whether it was also deposited for the purpose of providing security for some future debt I think the answer must be no. The court should be slow to infer such a purpose because otherwise any custodian who takes a lien over goods with a residual right to sell (as most do) would be a pledgee. Some may wish to provide expressly for this, j but it should not be readily inferred from contract terms such as cl 9(d).

[42] Those terms themselves provide a further reason for saying that there is no pledge here. Assuming that it is possible to spell out a pledge simply from the right to sell, cl 9(d) only confers that right if an unsold lot is uncollected 90 days after the sale or 35 days after notice to collect has been given. There is no right to sell before this time and no general right attaching to all goods as there was in the Australian and New Zealand Banking Group case. Looking at the language of s 11(2) of the 1977 Act I do not think it can be said that Christie's receipt of the picture from Mr Schünemann was a 'receipt of goods by way of pledge'. At the time of receipt Christie's had no power of sale whatsoever. a [43] I concluded (in [24], above) that generally an auctioneer who has acted in good faith and without notice is not liable in conversion if he returns unsold goods to the prospective seller. For the reasons I have given I do not think the particular facts of this case make Christie's liable to the claimant in conversion b either.

BAILMENT

[44] The draft amended particulars of claim allege that Christie's were in breach of their obligations 'as a bailee of the claimant or as a person owing the obligations of or equivalent to those of a finder, or as an involuntary or unconscious bailee'. As such Christie's are alleged to have had a variety of duties which Professor Palmer summarised in his final submissions to us as follows: c

'A person taking possession of goods for a limited period or purpose owes a duty to take such care as is reasonable in all the circumstances to ensure that the person who delivers has the right to do so and the person to whom he redelivers the goods has a right to receive them.' d

[45] Professor Palmer supports these submissions with a broad plea to the merits of the claimant's case. His picture has been stolen. It has passed through the hands of international auctioneers who should at least have to explain why they did not discover it had been stolen. Auctioneers should have a strong interest in the provenance of high-value portable items and not simply rely on their client's word. Such standards are now expected as, for example, the Return of Cultural Objects Regulations 1994, SI 1994/501 and the British Art Market Federation Code 2000 show. e

[46] The critical question is whether any relationship of bailor and bailee or the like existed between Christie's and the claimant. Such a relationship undoubtedly existed between Christie's and Mr Schünemann. But how can it be said to have existed with the claimant of whose interest in the painting Christie's were wholly unaware? f

[47] Professor Palmer relied on a number of cases to say that it could. First he referred us to three cases of gratuitous bailment: McCowan v McCulloch [1926] 1 DLR 312 where a man mistakenly took the plaintiff's suitcase from a train, Mitchell v Ealing London Borough [1978] 2 All ER 779, [1979] QB 1 where the council stored the plaintiff's goods after they had evicted her and City Television v Conference and Training Office Ltd [2001] EWCA Civ 1770 where the defendants came into possession of equipment stolen from the plaintiffs. Next we were referred to two cases of what Professor Palmer called constructive bailment where the interest of the owner was reasonably foreseeable: Southland Hospital Board v Perkins Estates [1986] 1 NZLR 373, where a hospital were held to be bailees of a deceased patient's ring and Heffron v Imperial Parking Co (1974) 46 DLR (3d) 642 where the owners of a parking lot were held to be bailees of the contents of a car which was stolen from the lot. Then we were referred to Parker v British Airways Board [1982] 1 All ER 834, [1982] QB 1004 where the rights and obligations of a finder were considered. After this flurry of citation Professor Palmer submitted that there was no case since the war in which someone in the position of bailee or the like had not been found subject to some duty. g a [48] But this begs the question: duty to whom? None of these cases sheds light on the critical question in this case. Christie's were not a gratuitous or involuntary bailee. There was no doubt as to what they were bailees of and they were not finders. They believed they were bailees for reward of Mr Schünemann and no one else.
h
j

b [49] Support for the view that a bailee must have some knowledge of the existence of his bailor is to be found in The Pioneer Container, KH Enterprise (cargo owners) v Pioneer Containers (owners) [1994] 2 All ER 250 at 262, [1994] 2 AC 324 at 342 where Lord Goff said:

c 'Their Lordships wish to add that this conclusion ... produces a result which in their opinion is both principled and just. They incline to the opinion that a sub-bailee can only be said for these purposes to have voluntarily taken into his possession the goods of another if he has sufficient notice that a person other than the bailee is interested in the goods so that it can properly be said that (in addition to his duties to the bailee) he has, by taking the goods into his custody, assumed towards that other person the responsibility for the goods which is characteristic of a bailee. This they believe to be the underlying principle.'

d [50] Professor Palmer rightly submits that the House of Lords was not concerned with the position of a bailor who sub-bails the goods without the owner's authority. Nevertheless the statement emphasises the obvious, which is that if you are to owe duties to someone else you should know or at least have some means of knowing of his existence. We have not been referred to any authority to the contrary.

e [51] Professor Palmer placed considerable reliance on the decision of Staughton J in AVX Ltd v EGM Solders Ltd (1982) Times, 7 July. In that case the defendants had agreed to the return of defective spheres of solder which they had manufactured for the plaintiffs. By mistake, as well as returning the defective solder in one box, the plaintiffs returned 21 boxes of capacitors which were as the judge said 'finished goods which could not, by any stretch of imagination, be said to look remotely like solder spheres'. The defendants set about scrapping the capacitors in the mistaken belief that they were their own property and mixed them with the rejected solder spheres so that it became uneconomic to retrieve them. The judge held that they were liable as unconscious bailees whose duty before dealing with the goods was to 'use what is in all the circumstances of the case a sufficient standard of care to ascertain that they were truly' their own goods.

g [52] On the facts of that case I should have thought that there would have been no difficulty in establishing negligence without invoking any relationship of bailor and bailee. A person, who destroys goods which are self-evidently not his in the mistaken belief that they are, must be liable. In the instant case Christie's asserted no personal rights of ownership over the picture and after it went unsold simply returned it to Mr Schünemann from whom they had received it in the first place. So I do not think that the AVX case is authority for the proposition that an agent who receives goods from someone who is their apparent owner and later returns them to him owes any duty to their true owner to investigate title in the absence of anything to put him on inquiry.

j [53] Professor Palmer's proposed duty has far-reaching implications, not only for auctioneers but also for other custodians such as warehousemen and carriers whose position has been clear since the decision in Hollins v Fowler (1875) LR 7 HL 757.

Professor Palmer tried to allay our concern about this by saying that in many cases it might not be reasonable for such agents to have to make inquiries about their customer's title. But this illustrates the problem. In what circumstances, for example, should a warehouseman who is asked to store a high-value portable item have to make his own inquiries about his customer's title and what inquiries should he have to make of whom? a [54] If of course there are circumstances which should put the agent on inquiry then a positive case of negligence on conventional grounds can be alleged. But no such case is or, on the assumed facts, could be made here. I do not accept that the law of bailment or something akin to it can be stretched so as to found a duty of the kind alleged. Quite apart from anything else the law of conversion, which attaches strict liability in certain circumstances, has been developed over the years to provide the remedy, if any, in cases such as these. Now to invoke different principles from the law of bailment is not justified. Auctioneers such as Christie's must of course take care to avoid dealing with works of doubtful title since they will be strictly liable if they sell on behalf of anyone other than the true owner, but that is not a policy reason for making them liable when they do not sell and simply return the goods to their client in good faith and without notice of the true owner's interest. b

c
d

[55] For these reasons I think Jack J and Judge Hallgarten were right to conclude that the claim in bailment failed.

CONCLUSION

[56] I would therefore dismiss this appeal. There were no reasonable grounds for bringing the claim in conversion or bailment and Judge Hallgarten and Jack J were right to strike out the claimant's statement of case. e

[57] The appellant's notice says that Jack J should not have ordered the claimant to pay all Christie's costs, but this point was not pursued by Professor Palmer, rightly in my view because there was nothing in it. f

KEENE LJ.

[58] I agree.

PETER GIBSON LJ.

[59] I also agree. g

Appeal dismissed.

Kate O'Hanlon Barrister.

a

R (on the application of Carson) v
Secretary of State for Work and Pensions
R (on the application of Reynolds) v Secretary of State for Work and Pensions b [2003] EWCA Civ 797

c

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION
SIMON BROWN, LAWS AND RIX LJJ
24–26 MARCH, 17 JUNE 2003

d

Social security – Retirement pension – Inflation uprating – Claimant not entitled to inflation uprating of state pension because of residence in South Africa – Whether freeze on claimant’s pension infringing her human rights – Human Rights Act 1998, Sch 1, Pt I, art 14, Pt II, art 1.

e

Social security – Jobseeker’s allowance – Age-related amount – Highest age-related amount applicable to persons who had attained age of 25 years – Claimant aged 24 years old receiving contributions-based jobseeker’s allowance calculated by reference to age-related amount for persons aged between 18 and 24 years – Whether receipt of lesser age-related amount infringing her human rights – Human Rights Act 1998, Sch 1, Pt I, art 14, Pt II, art 1.

In the first of two conjoined appeals, the claimant was a South African resident. She had spent most of her working life in England and had paid full national insurance contributions. On retirement, she received a United Kingdom state retirement pension. Domestic legislation disqualified her from receiving the annual increase based on price inflation which was received by pensioners who had paid like contributions but remained resident in the United Kingdom. Such increases were payable, however, to pensioners who lived in countries with which the United Kingdom government had entered into bilateral agreements providing for such uprating. South Africa was not such a country. The claimant brought proceedings for judicial review against the Secretary of State, contending, inter alia, that the failure to pay her the annual increases violated art 14^a of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998) when read with art 1^b of the First Protocol to the convention (the right to peaceful enjoyment of possessions) by discriminating between her and those pensioners, whether resident in the United Kingdom or abroad, who did receive the inflation uplift. The judge dismissed her application and she appealed.

In the second appeal, the claimant, who was then 24 years old, received a contributions-based jobseeker’s allowance. As a person in the 18 to 24 years age range, she was paid a lesser allowance than she would have received if she had been 25 years or over. She applied for judicial review on the basis, inter alia, of art 14 and art 1 of the First Protocol, alleging discrimination in that she had been less favourably treated than persons aged over 25. The judge dismissed her

a Article 14 is set out at [2], below

b Article 1, so far as material, is set out at [2], below

application and she appealed. On both appeals, an issue arose as to whether art 14, when read with art 1, was engaged at all.

Held – Article 14 of the convention, taken with art 1 of the First Protocol, was engaged, since the payment of contributions gave rise to a species of pecuniary right, such as to constitute a possession for the purposes of art 1. While states were in general free to grant, amend or discontinue social security benefits and to change the conditions for entitlement to them as they pleased without any convention constraint, where contributions were exacted as a price of entitlement the contributor should be awarded a measure of protection. It had cost him something to acquire the benefit. A reduction or qualification of the right to be paid thus engaged art 1, although it might not amount to a violation of the article simpliciter because the convention conferred no right to receive any particular amount. However, the reduction or qualification was subject to the constraints of art 14: if it were done on discriminatory grounds, the discrimination had to be justified. When a court was invited to consider complaints of discrimination contrary to art 14, one of the questions to be asked was whether the circumstances of the comparator and the putative victim of discrimination were so similar as to call, in the mind of a rational and fair minded person, for a positive justification for the less favourable treatment of one in comparison with the other. In the first appeal, the circumstances of the claimant and the chosen comparators were not so similar as to call for a positive justification for the withholding of the pension increase in the cases where it was withheld. In the second appeal, the circumstances of a person over 25 and a person under 25 were so similar as to call for a positive justification for the less favourable treatment of those under 25 in comparison with those over 25. However, the Secretary of State had demonstrated a perfectly reasonable justification for the differential payments of jobseeker's allowance. The appeals would therefore be dismissed (see [47], [48], [61], [63], [75], [84]–[87], below).

Gaygusuz v Austria (1997) 23 EHRR 364 and Wandsworth London BC v Michalak [2002] 4 All ER 1136 considered.

Decision of Stanley Burnton J [2002] 3 All ER 994 affirmed.

Notes

For the convention prohibition of discrimination and the right to property, see 8(2) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) paras 164, 165.

For the Human Rights Act 1998, Sch 1, Pt I, art 14, Pt II, art 1, see 7 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2002 reissue) 556.

Cases referred to in judgments

Abdulaziz v UK (1985) 7 EHRR 471, [1985] ECHR 9214/80, ECt HR.

Andersson v Sweden (1986) 46 DR 251, E Com HR.

Aston Cantlow and Wilmcote with Billesley Parochial Church Council v Wallbank [2001] EWCA Civ 713, [2001] 3 All ER 393, [2002] Ch 51, [2001] 3 WLR 1323; rvsd [2003] UKHL 37, [2003] All ER (D) 360 (Jun).

Azinas v Cyprus [2002] ECHR 56679/00, ECt HR.

Belgian Linguistic Case (No 2) (1968) 1 EHRR 252, [1968] ECHR 1474/62, ECt HR.

Botta v Italy (1998) 4 BHRC 81, ECt HR.

Carlin v UK App no 27537/95 (3 December 1997, unreported), E Com HR.

Chapman v UK (2001) 10 BHRC 48, ECt HR.

Corner v UK App no 11271/84 (17 May 1985, unreported), E Com HR.

- a Gaygusuz v Austria* (1997) 23 EHRR 364, [1996] ECHR 17371/90, ECt HR.
Ghaidan v Mendoza [2002] EWCA Civ 1533, [2002] 4 All ER 1162, [2003] 2 WLR 478.
James v UK (1986) 8 EHRR 123, [1986] ECHR 8793/79, ECt HR.
Jankovic v Croatia App no 43440/98 (12 October 2000, unreported), ECt HR.
JW v UK (1983) 34 DR 153, E Com HR.
Mařckx v Belgium (1979) 2 EHRR 330, [1979] ECHR 6833/74, ECt HR.
- b Matthews v UK* App no 40302/98 (28 November 2000, unreported), ECt HR.
Moustaquim v Belgium (1991) 13 EHRR 801, [1991] ECHR 12313/86, ECt HR.
Müller v Austria (1975) 3 DR 25, E Com HR.
Nasser v United Bank of Kuwait [2001] EWCA Civ 556, [2002] 1 All ER 401, [2002] 1 WLR 1868.
- c National Union of Belgian Police v Belgium* (1975) 1 EHRR 578, [1975] ECHR 4464/70, ECt HR.
Petrovic v Austria (2001) 33 EHRR 307, [1998] 20458/92, ECt HR.
R (on the application of Alconbury Developments Ltd) v Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions [2001] UKHL 23, [2001] 2 All ER 929, [2001] 2 WLR 1389.
- d R (on the application of ProLife Alliance) v BBC* [2003] UKHL 23, [2003] 2 All ER 977, [2003] 2 WLR 1403.
R v DPP, ex p Kebeline, R v DPP, ex p Rechachi [1999] 4 All ER 801, [2000] 2 AC 326, [1999] 3 WLR 972, HL.
R v Secretary of State for Education, ex p Schaffter [1987] IRLR 53.
- e Shackell v UK* App no 45851/99 (27 April 2000, unreported), ECt HR.
Sporrong v Sweden (1982) 5 EHRR 35, [1982] ECHR 7151/75, ECt HR.
Stubbings v UK (1996) 23 EHRR 213, [1996] ECHR 22083/93, ECt HR.
Szrabjser v UK, Clarke v UK App nos 27004/95 and 27011/95 (23 October 1997, unreported), E Com HR.
- f Vaughan v UK* App no 12639/87 (12 December 1987, unreported), E Com HR.
Walden v Liechtenstein App no 33916/96 (16 March 2000, unreported), ECt HR.
Wandsworth London BC v Michalak [2002] EWCA Civ 271, [2002] 4 All ER 1136, [2003] 1 WLR 617.
Wessels-Bergervoet v Netherlands [2002] ECHR 34462/97, ECt HR.
Willis v UK [2002] ECHR 36042/97, ECt HR.
- g X v Italy* (1977) 11 DR 114, E Com HR.

Cases referred to in skeleton arguments

- Advocate General v MacDonald* 2002 SC 1, Ct of Sess; affd [2003] UKHL 34, [2003] All ER (D) 259 (Jun), (2003) Times, 20 June.
- h Aftab v Norway* App no 32365/96 (4 May 2000, unreported), ECt HR.
Bellet v France App no 40832/98 (27 April 1999, unreported), ECt HR.
Burton v UK (1996) 22 EHRR CD 134, E Com HR.
Coke v UK App no 38696/97 (9 September 1998, unreported), E Com HR.
Council of Civil Service Unions v Minister for the Civil Service [1984] 3 All ER 935, [1985] AC 374, [1984] 3 WLR 1174, HL.
- j Dove v Scottish Ministers* 2002 SC 257, Ct of Sess (OH); affd 2002 SLT 1296, Ct of Sess (Ex Div).
East African Asians v UK (1973) 3 EHRR 76, E Com HR.
Fredin v Sweden (1991) 13 EHRR 784, [1991] ECHR 12033/86, ECt HR.
Frette v France [2002] ECHR 36515/97, ECt HR.
Hadzic v Croatia App no 48788/99 (13 September 2001, unreported), ECt HR.

